So large were the profits of the business, however, that a margin could be allowed for bribery of officials, and restrictions and prohibitions alike soon became almost dead letters. Vessels were known, in 1856 and 1857, to kidnap full cargoes within sight of Macao. Owners of vessels from American ports would enter into contracts with parties in the West Indies or South America to transport Coolies at from fifty to eighty dollars a head, freighting the ships often for some other than a Chinese port, but eventually arriving at Macao or Hong Kong, fitted and ready for the trade.

Such was the condition of the trade in 1857, when the ship Norway, of nearly 3000 tons, sailed from New York loaded with coal for the United States naval squadron in the China seas. It would be little to the purpose of the narrative to enter into a detailed account of the outward voyage, the waiting at Hong Kong, the transportation of laborers from China to the Australian mines, or describe the thousand incidents of a long stay in a Chinese port. Enough to say that nearly three-fourths of a year elapsed ere our human cargo was ready. During the latter part of this time extensive preparations were made to receive them.

Down the whole length of both lower decks were built tier on tier of berths, or rather shelves—for they were without sides or dividing partitions. Large quantities of beef, pork, rice, etc., were stowed away. Hundreds of water-casks filled the holds, and on the upper or spar deck were erected galleys for cooking. Over every hatchway save one were set iron gratings to prevent too free access from below to the upper deck; that one, the main and nearly central one, was covered by the ordinary housing. As the covering of these hatches was afterward of vital importance to us, a word of description will be necessary. The gratings were made of bars of iron, arched in the centre, and having a circular opening of eight or nine inches diameter at the summit of the arch. The housing was merely the continuation of the ordinary one in which were the galleys, the door of it opening outward. In addition to these preparations on the spar deck a barricade was built, running athwart ship, from rail to rail, a short distance in front of the captain's cabin, twelve feet wide, ten feet high, and arranged so that a guard of armed men could, from their station on top, command the whole deck, while within it were accommodations for their sleeping. When all was ready we sailed for Macao, from the vicinity of which port the cargo was to be received.

Thousands had been collected from every quarter of the kingdom, under every pretext, and crowded into barracoons, amidst not less fearful horrors than characterize those of the slave districts of Africa. Many had been induced to leave their homes under the most cruel misrepresentations, and once at the barracoons, cowed by the lash or torture, were taught to reply as their masters commanded to the questions of Government officials who, at long intervals, came to inspect them. These barracoons are termed Chu-tze-kwan, "Pig-Pens"—and from their usual filthy condition well deserve the name. Many Coolies died of diseases incident to such confinement, and suicides among them were not uncommon.

We lay off shore several miles, and it was therefore necessary to bring the Coolies to the ship in boats. These boats are termed sampans, and are capable of carrying from thirty to one hundred men besides the rowers. A woman usually sits in the stern to steer, and sometimes to scull the boat, while the rowers, unlike our own, stand on planks projected over the side.

The Coolies mounted the side one after another, most of them naked to the waist, wearing only the loose Coolie trowsers and broad-brimmed straw-hat. Slung at the belt were a pouch and purse, and a little case for the chop-sticks. A few were in good humor, but most were sullen or desponding. They were tallied over the gangway like so many bales of cotton, mustered in rows upon the deck, and their baggage and persons searched for opium or weapons. When all were on board a Government official came ostensibly to see that none were unwilling emigrants. A public announcement was made that any one who was on board against his will should step forward. Only one had the hardi-hood to do so, they knowing full well the improbability of getting nearer their homes than the dreaded barracoon. The man who came forward was immediately set ashore, and as the wind promised fair all hands of the crew were turned to getting ready for sea. The whole number of Coolies received was one thousand and thirty-seven, and each was stowed away as rapidly as the confusion and bustle incident to such a barbarous gathering would admit. The embarkation consumed the greater part of two days. Besides the Coolies there were several lady passengers and children returning by way of Cuba to their homes in the United States. They occupied a part of the cabin protected by the barricade.

It was evening ere the anchors were weighed, the sails loosed, and the ship under way, yet every one worked with energetic zeal, stimulated by the prospect of returning home, and none but those who have been long separated from home and friends can appreciate the exhilarant feeling that fills the breast of a sailor as the ship flies along on her homeward voyage. There were two interpreters on board, who had come from Havana, whose experience in the trade had been as varied as extensive. They were a sort of half Chinaman half Portuguese, and were in nowise friendly to the mass of Coolies on board.

A SAMPAN.

THE INTERPRETERS.

PRESERVING THE PEACE.

Warned by their representation of the treacherous nature of our barbarous freight guards were stationed at all necessary points, a police force appointed, and indeed every precaution taken to subdue any disaffection that might arise. The necessity for such precaution may be appreciated if the comparatively small number of our crew (sixty, all told) be considered. The barbarians, moreover, were constantly quarreling, and within the very first twenty-four hours several were brought up and flogged after the old approved navy style. One or two suicides occurred, and one man was found strangled, whether by his own hand or by some of his companions was never ascertained.

A word or two regarding the way in which these Coolies passed their time and deported themselves generally may not be uninteresting. They were not usually unclean in their habits, but, on the contrary, were fond of dabbling in water like children, and some of them wore around their necks pieces of muslin to use as towels. Many had tooth-brushes, and little pieces of bone used for scraping the tongue—a habit, strangely enough, which they religiously observed. They had but two meals daily, principally of rice and salt fish, with, at noon, or about eleven o'clock, a bowl of tea. Their rice was boiled at the galleys on deck in baskets, and the whole number of Coolies being divided into messes, the portion for each was served and carried below in other baskets. They then sat around on the deck, and, helping themselves each to a quantity in a small china bowl, fell to a rapid demolition of the contents with their chopsticks. Much of their time was spent in gambling, almost always with dominoes, and when not engaged at this they were either quarreling or playing on musical instruments, of which they had a great number. Their barbarous music would hardly strike the ear of an American virtuoso as melodious. It was a most ingeniously discordant variation, from the tum-tum-ti-tilly of a one-string violin to the hoarse uproar produced by enormous clarionets without keys, flutes six feet long, cymbals, gongs, drums, and marine trumpets. Occasionally, but more particularly toward the end of a voyage, they will attempt a rough sort of theatricals to while away the monotonous hours, yet in point of scenery or incident the most absurd.

But to proceed to our departure from Macao: The Coolies were allowed perfect freedom, in limited numbers, on the forward part of the upper deck, and their food carefully prepared and served. Had it not been for a providential mischance on the evening of the third day out the terrific incidents that followed would have come upon us totally unprepared. A not unusual quarrel had occurred on the lower deck, the shouting and altercation soon running to blows. The police, some of whom it may be remarked were Coolies, were quickly on the spot, and after great difficulty succeeded in quelling the riot; not, however, in time to prevent one man being cut down with a cleaver. This man, quite seriously wounded, together with four of the principal rioters, were brought up, and the latter chained by the wrist to the combings of the after-hatch. The former, immediately upon being alone with the surgeon and interpreter, asked for the captain, and in the heat of passion and revenge laid out the details of a plot the most cold-blooded and inhuman.

The leaders were desperadoes who had voluntarily come to the barracoons, having studied the plot for weeks; and ere they had been on board an hour were at work, urging, with every plea of cupidity or revenge, the rising en masse, murdering every man who opposed, seizing the ship and cruising as they chose. The exact object of the seizure was not clear, but the plan was simply this: The temporary berths were to be torn down to furnish clubs and materials for building a fire under the foremost hatch. A large number was to be ready, when the flames should rise and the crew run forward to extinguish it, to rush up the main-hatchway, massacre every man as he came in their way, and thus gain possession. They had chosen their captain, navigator, and other officers, and it was concerning this choice that altercation had arisen. The opinions about the truth of this statement were various—the captain ridiculing the idea as absurd, but the two interpreters joining in their belief that it was true, and ominously shaking their heads at the captain's disbelief.

For two days the matter rested, nothing farther being heard concerning the mutiny. The ship was bowling along finely before a nine-knot breeze toward midnight of the third day, the moon shining beautifully, and all quiet save the rippling of the water under our bows, and the regular tread of the sentry at his post. We were expecting to make the land at Angier Point about daylight. Suddenly a bright gleam of flame shot up from the fore-castle, and a yell like that of ten thousand demons burst on the still night. It needed no farther alarm to arouse every body from sleep. Every man was up and at his post as the fearful conviction of his imminent danger presented itself. The door of the main hatch, the only means of egress, was instantly locked; every blunderbuss, cutlass, and pistol passed out by the stewardess, who, with great presence of mind, had run to the arm chests; the ship put about, and the pumps manned in less time than it takes to describe it.

Knowing that a crowd was collected under and on the ladder, the top of the main housing was broken in in order to dislodge them; but, meanwhile, several of the foremost rioters were striving to force the door with cleavers stolen from the cooks, and had partially succeeded in prying it open against a dozen men who were endeavoring to fasten a spar across outside. In spite of the utmost exertion the door yielded far enough to allow an arm to be thrust through and a blow struck, wounding an officer. Quick as thought the muzzle of a pistol was against his breast, and with its explosion the Coolie reeled backward, carrying with him all on the ladder, and allowing the door to be effectually closed.

Then commenced a scene the most terrific

MORTE D'ARTHUR.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

AN ARM
ROSE UP FROM OUT THE BOSOM OF THE LAKE, HOLDING THE SWORD.

SO all day long the noise of battle roll'd
Among the mountains by the winter sea;
Until King Arthur's table, man by man,
Had fall'n in Lyonesse about their Lord,
King Arthur: then, because his wound was deep,
The bold Sir Bedivere uplifted him,
Sir Bedivere, the last of all his knights,
And bore him to a chapel nigh the field,
A broken chancel with a broken cross,
That stood on a dark strait of barren land.
On one side lay the Ocean, and on one
Lay a great water, and the moon was full.

Then spake King Arthur to Sir Bedivere:
"The sequel of to-day unsolders all
The goodliest fellowship of famous knights
Whereof this world holds record. Such a sleep

They sleep—the men I loved. I think that we Shall never more, at any future time,
Delight our souls with talk of knightly deeds,
Walking about the gardens and the halls
Of Camelot, as in the days that were.
I perish by this people which I made,— Tho' Merlin sware that I should come again
To rule once more—but let what will be, be,
I am so deeply smitten thro' the helm
That without help I cannot last till morn.
Thou therefore take my brand Excalibur,
Which was my pride: for thou rememberest how
In those old days, one summer noon, an arm
Rose up from out the bosom of the lake,
Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful,
Holding the sword—and how I row'd across

And took it, and have worn it, like a king:
 And, wheresoever I am sung or told
 In aftertime, this also shall be known:
 But now delay not: take Excalibur,
 And fling him far into the middle mere:
 Watch what thou seest, and lightly bring me word."

To him replied the bold Sir Bedivere:
 "It is not meet, Sir King, to leave thee thus,
 Aidless, alone, and smitten thro' the helm.
 A little thing may harm a wounded man.
 Yet I thy hest will all perform at full,
 Watch what I see, and lightly bring thee word."

So saying, from the ruin'd shrine he stept
 And in the moon athwart the place of tombs,
 Where lay the mighty bones of ancient men,
 Old knights, and over them the sea-wind sang Shrill, chill, with flakes of foam. He, stepping down

By zig-zag paths, and juts of pointed rock,
 Came on the shining levels of the lake.

There drew he forth the brand Excalibur,
 And o'er him, drawing it, the winter moon,
 Brightening the skirts of a long cloud, ran forth
 And sparkled keen with frost against the hilt:
 For all the haft twinkled with diamond sparks,
 Myriads of topaz-lights, and jacinth-work
 Of subtlest jewellery. He gazed so long
 That both his eyes were dazzled, as he stood,
 This way and that dividing the swift mind,
 In act to throw: but at the last it seem'd
 Better to leave Excalibur conceal'd
 There in the many-knotted waterflags,
 That whistled stiff and dry about the marge.
 So strode he back slow to the wounded King.

Then spake King Arthur to Sir Bedivere:
 "Hast thou perform'd my mission which I gave?
 What is it thou hast seen? or what hast heard?"

And answer made the bold Sir Bedivere:
 "I heard the ripple washing in the reeds,
 And the wild water lapping on the crag."

To whom replied King Arthur, faint and pale:
 "Thou hast betray'd thy nature and thy name,
 Not rendering true answer, as beseem'd
 Thy fealty, nor like a noble knight:
 For surer sign had follow'd, either hand,
 Or voice, or else a motion of the mere.
 This is a shameful thing for men to lie.
 Yet now, I charge thee, quickly go again
 As thou art lief and dear, and do the thing
 I bid thee, watch, and lightly bring me word."

Then went Sir Bedivere the second time
 Across the ridge, and paced beside the mere,
 Counting the dewy pebbles, fix'd in thought;
 But when he saw the wonder of the hilt,
 How curiously and strangely chased, he smote
 His palms together, and he cried aloud.

"And if indeed I cast the brand away,

Surely a precious thing, one worthy note,
 Should thus be lost for ever from the earth,
 Which might have pleased the eyes of many men.
 What good should follow this, if this were done?
 What harm, undone? deep harm to disobey,
 Seeing obedience is the bond of rule.
 Were it well to obey then, if a king demand
 An act unprofitable, against himself?
 The King is sick, and knows not what he does.
 What record, or what relic of my lord
 Should be to aftertime, but empty breath
 And rumours of a doubt? but were this kept,
 Stored in some treasure-house of mighty kings,
 Some one might show it at a joust of arms,
 Saying, 'King Arthur's sword, Excalibur,
 Wrought by the lonely maiden of the Lake.
 Nine years she wrought it, sitting in the deeps
 Upon the hidden bases of the hills.'
 So might some old man speak in the aftertime
 To all the people, winning reverence.
 But now much honour and much fame were lost."

So spake he, clouded with his own conceit,
 And hid Excalibur the second time,
 And so strode back slow to the wounded King.
 Then spoke King Arthur, breathing heavily:
 "What is it thou hast seen? or what hast heard?"
 And answer made the bold Sir Bedivere:
 "I heard the water lapping on the crag,
 And the long ripple washing in the reeds."

To whom replied King Arthur, much in wrath:
 "Ah, miserable and unkind, untrue,
 Unknightly, traitor-hearted! Woe is me!
 Authority forgets a dying king,
 Laid widow'd of the power in his eye
 That bow'd the will. I see thee what thou art,
 For thou, the latest-left of all my knights,
 In whom should meet the offices of all,
 Thou wouldst betray me for the precious hilt;
 Either from lust of gold, or like a girl
 Valuing the giddy pleasure of the eyes.
 Yet, for a man may fail in duty twice,
 And the third time may prosper, get thee hence:
 But, if thou spare to fling Excalibur,
 I will arise and slay thee with my hands."

Then quickly rose Sir Bedivere, and ran,
 And, leaping down the ridges lightly, plunged
 Among the bulrush-beds, and clutch'd the sword, And strongly wheel'd and threw it. The great brand
 Made lightnings in the splendour of the moon,
 And flashing round and round, and whirl'd in an arch,
 Shot like a streamer of the northern morn,
 Seen where the moving isles of winter shock
 By night, with noises of the northern sea.
 So flash'd and fell the brand Excalibur:
 But ere he dipt the surface, rose an arm

Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful,
And caught him by the hilt, and brandish'd him
Three times, and drew him under in the mere.
And lightly went the other to the King.

Then spoke King Arthur, drawing thicker breath:
"Now see I by thine eyes that this is done.
Speak out: what is it thou hast heard, or seen?"

And answer made the bold Sir Bedivere:
"Sir King, I closed mine eyelids, lest the gems Should blind my purpose, for I never saw,
Nor shall see, here or elsewhere, till I die,
Not tho' I live three lives of mortal men,
So great a miracle as yonder hilt.
Then with both hands I flung him, wheeling him;
But when I look'd again, behold an arm,
Clothed in white samite, mystic, wonderful,
That caught him by the hilt, and brandish'd him
Three times, and drew him under in the mere."

And answer made King Arthur, breathing hard:
"My end draws nigh; 'tis time that I were gone.
Make broad thy shoulders to receive my weight,
And bear me to the margin; yet I fear
My wound hath taken cold, and I shall die."

So saying, from the pavement he half rose,
Slowly, with pain, reclining on his arm,
And looking wistfully with wide blue eyes
As in a picture. Him Sir Bedivere
Remorsefully regarded thro' his tears,
And would have spoken, but he found not words,
Then took with care, and kneeling on one knee,
O'er both his shoulders drew the languid hands,
And rising bore him thro' the place of tombs.

But, as he walk'd, King Arthur panted hard,
Like one who feels a nightmare on his bed
When all the house is mute. So sigh'd the King, Muttering and murmuring at his ear "Quick, quick!
I fear it is too late, and I shall die."
But the other swiftly strode from ridge to ridge,
Clothed with his breath, and looking, as he walk'd,
Larger than human on the frozen hills.
He heard the deep behind him, and a cry
Before. His own thought drove him like a goad.
Dry clash'd his harness in the icy caves
And barren chasms, and all to left and right
The bare black cliff clang'd round him, as he based His feet on juts of slippery crag that rang
Sharp-smitten with the dint of armed heels—
And on a sudden, lo! the level lake,
And the long glories of the winter moon.

Then saw they how there hove a dusky barge,
Dark as a funeral scarf from stem to stern,
Beneath them; and descending they were ware
That all the decks were dense with stately forms
Black-stoled, black-hooded, like a dream—by these Three Queens with crowns of gold—and from them rose

A cry that shiver'd to the tingling stars,
And, as it were one voice, an agony
Of lamentation, like a wind, that shrills
All night in a waste land, where no one comes,
Or hath come, since the making of the world.

Then murmur'd Arthur, "Place me in the barge,"
And to the barge they came. There those three Queens

Put forth their hands, and took the King, and wept.
But she, that rose the tallest of them all
And fairest, laid his head upon her lap,
And loosed the shatter'd casque, and chafed his hands,

And call'd him by his name, complaining loud,
And dropping bitter tears against his brow
Striped with dark blood: for all his face was white
And colourless, and like the wither'd moon
Smote by the fresh beam of the springing east;
And all his greaves and cuisses dash'd with drops
Of onset; and the light and lustrous curls—
That made his forehead like a rising sun
High from the dais-throne—were parch'd with dust;
Or, clotted into points and hanging loose,
Mix'd with the knightly growth that fringed his lips.
So like a shatter'd column lay the King;
Not like that Arthur who, with lance in rest,
From spur to plume a star of tournament,
Shot thro' the lists at Camelot, and charged
Before the eyes of ladies and of kings.

Then loudly cried the bold Sir Bedivere, "Ah! my Lord Arthur, whither shall I go?
Where shall I hide my forehead and my eyes?
For now I see the true old times are dead,
When every morning brought a noble chance,
And every chance brought out a noble knight.
Such times have been not since the light that led
The holy Elders with the gift of myrrh.
But now the whole ROUND TABLE is dissolved
Which was an image of the mighty world;
And I, the last, go forth companionless,
And the days darken round me, and the years,
Among new men, strange faces, other minds."

And slowly answer'd Arthur from the barge:
"The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfils himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.
Comfort thyself: what comfort is in me?
I have lived my life, and that which I have done
May He within himself make pure! but thou,
If thou shouldst never see my face again, Pray for my soul. More things are wrought by prayer

Than this world dreams of. Wherefore, let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer

Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
 For so the whole round earth is every way
 Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.
 But now farewell. I am going a long way
 With these thou seest—if indeed I go—
 (For all my mind is clouded with a doubt)
 To the island-valley of Avilion;
 Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
 Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies
 Deep-meadow'd, happy, fair with orchard-lawns

And bowery hollows crown'd with summer sea,
 Where I will heal me of my grievous wound—

So said he, and the barge with oar and sail
 Moved from the brink, like some full-breasted swan
 That, fluting a wild carol ere her death,
 Ruffles her pure cold plume, and takes the flood
 With swarthy webs. Long stood Sir Beldivere
 Revolving many memories, till the hull
 Look'd one black dot against the verge of dawn,
 And on the mere the wailing died away.

 AND FAIREST, LAID HIS HEAD UPON HER LAP

what your early history, Ramsay? Tradition hesitates to say.

Aristocrats as we were in Summerfield, of the deepest dye, we yet loved a little fun; and once a year we went off to a picnic on the borders of a beautiful pond. It was generally understood that the rigorous distinctions of society were on this occasion to be laid aside—Mrs. Blake and Mrs. Clay were on terms of equality. We had observed that the cake of the lower classes was apt to be better than ours, and we would fain give them gentility for goodies—rank and title for money-lags and flesh-pots.

So on one lovely August morning the little town moved to adjourn for the day to the shores of Lilypad Pond. Family arks were gotten out; all the things which went upon four wheels were in requisition; huge hampers of provision were with difficulty induced to get under the legs of the cramped driver. Will Percival, mad with excitement, was driving from one end of town to the other, doing nothing, but thinking he was doing worlds of work. He had determined to drive Fanny down in twenty-eight minutes; what was his disgust at being informed by that young lady that she was "previously engaged," and to see the Judge drive slowly along, in his plain old chaise, and take the lovely Fanny as a matter of course, and start off leisurely, giving the brown cob a rather more animated whack than usual as he passed the discomforted Will!

The Judge and Fanny were passed by the huge van, containing a crowd of Meddlecombs and Elkinses; by Mrs. Percival's old family coach, where she sat in state with Mr. Milman and two Meddlecombs—there were always as many as that in every carriage; they had to be taken by somebody, so every body resigned himself to two; by Will Percival with Sarah Hartman, looking lovely enough to have made up for his disappointment; by carriage after carriage, every body looking out and joking them because they drove so slowly; to which the Judge made some jocose allusion to his old horse, and Fanny did what she always did—laughed.

Finally came two vehicles, the lumbering Ramsay concern, with the addition of Miss Jones to the family-party, who "sweetly smiled" as she looked out on the Judge and Fanny, and young Abram Brown, modestly keeping behind Mr. Ramsay and taking his dust, though Abram was driving a light wagon and a good horse, and could have distanced aristocracy in no time.

To Fanny's great surprise the Judge touched his hat respectfully to the clerk.

"Tell me about that young man, he seems somewhat refined and educated," said Fanny.

"Very much so," said the Judge; "I have lately had occasion to examine him as a witness, and he showed some remarkable qualities. However, if he is good for any thing he will not stay long in that country-store. I asked him why he did so: he blushed and refused to tell me."

But the Judge and Fanny had other things to talk about. Fanny was lovely in her straw-hat and blue ribbons—the fresh morning gave her a glow, and she was sitting by the side of the man she most admired and respected in the world. He, shy old bachelor of forty-four, drank in her loveliness at every pore. He, too, talked his best; and they were both disappointed when the groves which surround Lilypad Pond became visible. Every body had arrived and dismounted; and the Judge and Fanny had to run the inevitable gauntlet of jokes and significant looks as they drove into the circle of dismayed vehicles.

Miss Jones caught the Judge later in the day and found him in great spirits; indeed, he was so gallant that her heart jumped into her throat. She was walking pensively, leaning on his arm, through the soft glades of the wood, when they heard Fanny's ringing laughter at a little distance.

"What a pity Miss Clifford laughs so loud!" said Miss Jones, pensively.

"Do you think she laughs loud? To me it is the sweetest music in the world!"

Jones's heart jumped back again. They ate, they drank, they boated on the pond, groups wandered into the wood, groups sat on the water's edge. Like Mary and her lamb—

"Every where that Fanny went
The Judge was sure to go."

Will Percival was furious. He drank Champagne, he rowed furiously in the hot sun, he got very red; but it did not affect the predisposed order of things. Miss Jones sneered, the Meddlecombs twittered, Mr. Milman grew pale and sighed. It did no good. The Judge was evidently épris.

Fanny whispered to the Judge; he rose quickly and walked toward young Abram Brown and asked him to go out on the pond in the boat. Poor Brown up to this time had been neglected. No party had included him. He accepted with quiet dignity and began arranging the oars; a Meddlecomb was immediately found ready to go, and a male Elkins; and the Judge then asked Fanny, who declined on the ground of a natural hydrophobia—she was afraid, as any sensible woman should be, of these cockleshells. Miss Jones, however, accepted the Judge's invitation. So they went sailing about, the Judge gallantly tugging at an oar, Jones dipping her fair hand in the water, Brown at the helm quiet and somewhat amused, the Meddlecomb and the Elkins flirting in a grotesque way, when over went the boat, and our party were seen struggling in the water; the Elkins came safely to land with the rescued Meddlecomb, Brown arrived with Miss Jones clinging around his neck in a pitiable condition, and before we knew it was putting back for the Judge, who was hanging on to the capsized boat unable to swim. The distance was not great, but Brown had done very well. The Judge struggled ashore, and thanked the dripping young preserver—himself a Leander who could not swim—and they all went off to get dry clothes. They reappeared in the clothes of a neighboring farmer much too large for them.

but bore our shouts of laughter with great philosophy. The Judge's dignity was as conspicuous as ever, although he was deprived of his constitutional black coat.

After the submerged were properly dried we started home. The Judge, stimulated doubtless by the douche he had taken, started the brown cob at a notable pace, but again lagged behind; and all the vehicles passed him except Percival's and Brown's—Percival having asked Miss Hartman to drive around the pond by a more distant route, and that young lady having consented. As for poor Brown, with his usual luck, he could not find a sufficient wardrobe for himself to drive home in, and was waiting for his coat to dry.

The moon came out before the brown cob had reached the confines of the grove—that chaste luminary surprised the Judge in a manly confession of his love. With the simplicity and directness of his nature he had asked her to tell him at once his fate; and the moonlight helped him to read the charming intelligence in Fanny's blushing face, which, just at that moment, she could not find words fitting to express.

It was that golden moment which comes perhaps but once in a lifetime, so full of fruition that the heart could not bear it often.

The delicious silence and happiness which wrapped them both was broken by a sound of wheels, a crash, and a shriek.

The upset boat was not the only catastrophe of the picnic.

Will Percival was unfortunately not quite himself as he started to drive home. Too much Champagne had not improved his eye for the road. He had upset his little light wagon, and lodged Miss Hartman in a neighboring stump-fence. Fortunately Brown had nearly caught up with him, and arrived at the scene of disaster in time to extricate Miss H., while the Judge turned his horse's head in the direction, and arrived a moment later. Fanny found her friend very much hurt; her arm was broken; she was bruised and bleeding. She was put in the Judge's chaise, Fanny crouching down on the floor thereof to make herself a support in some way for the poor wounded thing; while Will Percival, somewhat stunned, was driven home by Brown, leaving his own broken vehicle to be brought home at some future period.

The Judge's engagement was a great piece of news all over the State, and the wedding, which took place almost as soon as poor Sarah Hartman's arm was well, was the great event of Summerfield. The old satin dresses which were disinterred for that occasion would have clothed the entire chorus of the opera. The bride was more subdued than we had ever seen her, but lovely as possible. As for the Judge, all his friends looked at him with astonishment: such an effect had happiness had upon him that he seemed twenty years younger.

Miss Jones was there, bearing it bravely. No one but the Meddlecombs saw that her brow was strangely set, though her lips were smiling.

Will Percival had offered himself to Sarah Hartman, and been accepted. He was not, however, a very serene lover, and drank too much wine to be altogether an agreeable one.

Mr. Milman performed the ceremony. When I saw him, with the dignity and sacredness of his high office, give to another the hand which he prized most highly on earth—when I saw the heart-felt manner in which he wished her joy—I forgave him for a thousand affectations, and respected him and pitied him from the depths of my heart.

My pity was not much diminished, although my respect was, when I heard that he had succumbed to the Meddlecomb attack, and was betrothed to Kitty, the third, or fifth, or seventh daughter, and the softest-voiced and most malicious of them all.

After the engagement was announced, the whole tribe dilated on the long and ever repulsed affection of Mr. Milman for Kitty, and the savage and desperate nature of Fanny's opposition to the match.

However, when they came to marry, the Judge and Fanny nearly furnished their house for them. The Meddlecombs showed the gifts, and dilated on Kitty's wedding presents, but did not mention who gave them.

Fanny's house was beautiful. Her position was a charming one. She went abroad for a year, and brought home all sorts of nice things. Her cup was running over.

She had too much.

One day the Judge came in quite pale, and sank on the sofa. Fanny flew to his side.

"I feel quite faint and ill, dear wife," taking her hand and laying it on his heart. "There is something wrong here."

However, it passed away. Fanny recalled years after the pang which shot through her at that moment; for it was the knell of their happiness.

One or two more warnings came; and at length the horrible news went through the town that the Judge had been stricken dead in court while listening to an argument.

Disease of the heart. It was perhaps a poor consolation to know that he could not have been cured; but it was a great and never-failing one to remember that the Angel of Death found the servant of the Most High Judge ready, with a prayerful spirit and a clear record, awaiting his coming.

Poor Fanny! It was many a long year before we heard her laugh again.

Poor Mr. Milman was next called. He had never been strong, body or mind, and his pale face grew paler, and his cough more racking, till at length he gave up his duties and took to his bed. When he got very ill he sent for Fanny, having something important to say to her.

She went to see him. The air was heavy with Meddlecombs. Poor Milman asked them meekly to leave the room. Kitty remained, of course.

"Did your husband"—poor Milman began.

heavily and with difficulty—"ever tell you of the existence—of certain papers—relating to the Percival family?"

"No," said Fanny, "but he gave me once a little trunk, which he wished me to keep safely, as he had in it some important papers belonging to another person. He gave it to me, I remember, after his first seizure. I have never thought of it since."

"Dear Fanny," said the poor dying man, "keep that safely until old Mrs. Percival dies. It contains a secret which no one knew but your husband and myself; and now that he is gone, and I am going, it must be given to you. Kitty, my wife, as you value my parting blessing, do you never reveal what you have heard. After old Mrs. Percival's death break the lock, and give the papers to whom they belong. And write down what I have told you, put the paper in the possession of some man of respectability, that the evidence may be complete should any thing happen to you. Now, farewell, dear and excellent friend."

Poor Milman died without revealing the secret, which his wife thought a great outrage to her, and she loved Fanny even less after this scene than before.

The Meddlecombs began to observe that Fanny often went into Mr. Bowen's store, and had an occasional word for Abram Brown at church or Sunday-school. How a woman of her pride could so far descend was to them a wonder of wonders. Perhaps they thought it a proof of the supremacy of her position that she could do such a thing. Abram went on in the same old way, always showing some superiority to his position, but never gaining ground in "society."

Will Percival, who had married poor Sarah Hartman, had gone steadily down hill. He had become a blustering, drinking, harsh man; and his mother grew paler day by day, and his wife sank away from a blooming young woman into one prematurely old and sorrow-stricken.

Will had a profound despise at Brown, and never lost an opportunity of insulting him. He never could forgive him for having done him the service of bringing him home when he was drunk from the picnic. Brown bore this course of conduct, as he did every thing, silently, until Percival grew too unbearably insulting in the reading-room of the public library, when Brown coolly and quietly slapped his face. Percival sprang at him like a tiger. Brown knocked him down, and held him until some gentlemen interfered.

"You will do me the justice to say, gentlemen, that I did not seek this quarrel, and that no gentleman could have done less," said Brown.

"We will, we will!" said half a dozen men.

"Gentleman!" hissed Percival between his teeth as he strode off.

The village of Summerfield had never had an emotion like unto that which followed the news of this quarrel, but it was soon to be startled and shocked still more; for on one calm Sunday morning young Abram Brown walked toward Fanny's stately mansion, took its fair mistress on his arm, and walked to church with her, composedly seated himself in her pew, and in less than five minutes the electric message ran through the town that Fanny was going to marry him!

The horror and disgust of the Percivals, the delight and triumph of the Meddlecombs, the wonder and disapproval of all her friends was beyond words. Between these two there was a great gulf fixed in our estimation. We neither knew nor cared for the worth of the man; we contrasted him with the man whom we had delighted to honor, the Judge, and all felt a diminished regard for Fanny.

The Judge had been dead six years. Fanny was now but thirty, but we felt that she had no right to insult his memory by marrying Abram Brown.

However, marry him she did. He ceased to be Mr. Bowen's clerk; he proved to have some money, and had all his wife's estate settled on herself.

The Browns were very happy apparently, and quite indifferent to our opinion of them.

Poor old Mrs. Percival died at length, and, true to her instructions, Fanny opened the box.

Death came not once but twice to Raymond Hill. Poor Sarah Percival had never had much health or happiness. The death of her gentle and sympathizing mother-in-law took away her only support and consolation in this earth, and Will grew more savage and drunken every day. He had not allowed his wife to speak to Fanny since her marriage, but on her death-bed she demanded to see her. Fanny watched over her, sustained her, and closed her poor dying eyes.

Then Fanny went for the neglectful husband. He was in his own room stupefying himself with wine, but Fanny bade him come with her. As he looked upon the poor pale face, now no longer reproachful, his manhood came back to him, and he knelt by her side. But repentance was brief with him. The horror of death came over him, and he turned to leave the room.

"Stay, William Percival," said Fanny; "look at what you have done. You have killed this woman. Now repent while there is life in you. By the side of this dead saint promise me that you will try and reform yourself."

"Why, Fanny, how can you talk so when you know my love for you was the cause of my downfall?" said poor Will, whimpering. "If you had married me I should have been all right, but you married some one else, and then I sank lower and lower. This poor thing loved me, and for a little while I determined to be a better man, but my evil passions got the better of me." Here he fell into a great fit of weeping, as he looked at the poor dead face lying there so still and pale.

"Do not flatter yourself, Will, that any one was to blame but yourself. Self-indulgence has always been your plan of life. I beg of you, by an old friendship, by the memory of your mother, by the memory of this wife you have so injured, by the honored name you bear, I entreat you to reform. There are years left for you in which to rub out the disgrace of your life. I pray you do it."

But her earnest words had no effect. Will was too intoxicated to appear at his wife's funeral, and his course was desperately downward.

Fanny made one more attempt in his favor. She took Mr. Selden, the old lawyer of the Percivals—he who had always administered the affairs of Raymond Hill, and who watched the ruin of its heir with peculiar sorrow—and drove to his house one fine morning in early summer, a few months after poor Sarah's death. They found him swearing at his dogs and servants, but enough of the gentleman left in him to receive them courteously. Mr. Selden hemmed and hawed, and finally giving a bundle of papers into Fanny's hands begged of her to open the business.

Fanny began in the usual woman's way, by bursting into tears. When she got composed she said:

"Will, you know, perhaps, that your father's life was clouded in some mysterious manner, perhaps you do not know how. Here is a paper, drawn up by himself, giving his own story. He was married to a young girl in Scotland, by whom he had a son, and whom he deserted before he met your mother. By changing his name and coming to this country he thought to escape the punishment of his crime. But his unfortunate wife found out his whereabouts and followed him even here. With a woman's generosity she failed to expose him, when she came to see him, but in justice to her son demanded this paper of him, swearing solemnly to conceal it until the death of his innocent victim, your mother. He gave it to her in the presence of my husband, the Judge, and not long after, borne down by the shame and contrition which overwhelmed him, he disappeared, and died soon after.

"Not many years ago the Judge received a packet of papers from Scotland, containing the record of the marriage of the first wife, the baptismal record of the son, and such accounts of the whereabouts, personal appearance of the son, as to enable him to be identified without trouble. The Judge took into his confidence Mr. Milman, our late clergyman, after a certain period, in order that the secret might be in good hands if any thing should happen to him. Death has removed both those recipients of this secret. I and two others share it with you."

Will Percival looked stupefied and remained silent. "So you are come to taunt me with my want of birth and name," he said, at length, in a husky voice.

"No, Will, I am come to make you an offer. If you will promise me to become a better man I will burn this paper, and swear that its contents shall never be known."

"But what would my elder brother, the legitimate brother, say to this?" said poor Will, bitterly.

"He has given his consent to the burning of this paper," said Fanny, slowly; and with trembling fingers she gave Will a letter. Will tore it open.

"I knew it; I knew it. Your present husband, that wretch, that scum of the earth, Abram Brown—pah! my mouth rebels against the plebeian word—never, no never will I accept a favor at his hands, and my name, my name is Brown. Tell me, tell me, Fanny, to what depths am I descended?"

"Your name is Beaumont, William, if a few more letters can do you any good, and my husband's name is Arthur Beaumont, your older brother; but he has lived so long under the humble and quiet alias, which he took when his mother died, that he does not care for the empty distinction. You have always borne an honorable name, and are the heir of an honorable race. Keep it. The deception is an innocent one, as long as those most interested permit it. Keep it; but, William, do it more honor than you do by your present most unworthy life. Believe me, I do not want to frighten you into compliance; but so much do I wish to save you, that I have thought it proper to tell you what others are willing to forego for your sake, if for theirs you will become a better man."

Will Percival, degraded, lost as he was, could not but be touched by this appeal; he knelt before her, he kissed her hand, but when he rose he said, quietly, "Too late, too late!"

"It is never too late," urged Fanny.

"One question: Did you know this fact when you married Brown?" said Will.

"No. I opened this trunk of papers when your mother died. I had married Brown because I loved him, because I saw in him powers and virtues which the world did not see. I only knew him as the poor clerk, and I determined, if my love could give him that position which he deserved, he should have it. He had long loved me, and for a time my pride rebelled; but love is stronger than pride, and for his goodness and nobility of soul I had a voucher that none could fail to respect, the Judge."

"Did he know of the identity of Abram Brown and Arthur Beaumont?"

"No, he was simply the recipient of confidence from both parties, but liked him as I did for himself. When I opened the trunk I called my husband to my side to determine what I was to do with these papers; then for the first time he told me who he was, and produced the fellows to these papers. Even the wedding-ring was halved. One half was in the trunk, the other in his possession. Locks of hair were given to him, braided together in a peculiar manner, and in the trunk were the same. The coat of arms, engraved on very curious old rings, were alike divided between the trunk and himself."

"Why did he come here and live this obscure life?"

"His mother's family, proud and injured by her desertion, treated them coldly, and they came here: his mother, with true womanly generosity, hesitated to sacrifice her husband's innocent victim. When she died her generosity descended to her son. Perhaps he came here, drawn by the ties of relationship, for here lived his only brother."

The long hatred and persecution rose up before him; perhaps he felt a moment's remorse, but the life-long pride of his character and race—for he had proud blood on both sides—choked the expression of it.

"So, like a dog in the manger, he has descended as low as he could, and watched for the hour of revenge: he has made himself a base tape-seller to point my degradation. I will not accept his generosity. My property is my own, if my name is not, and publish your vile tale as soon as you please. Mr. Selden, are you an accessory to this insult?"

"Mr. Percival, I was only a recipient of the confidence of Mrs. Brown so far as the words of our late clergyman, Mr. Milman, are concerned, and have this morning only received the particulars which you now hear. I have sworn to secrecy, and only accompanied Mrs. Brown here to lend her my protection, and to show you, as an old and trusted friend of your family, that a sincere wish for your welfare induced this visit."

"Fanny," said Will, "you were always a good woman, a good friend. I feel all your goodness, and I wish I were more worthy of your efforts in my behalf; but I hate your husband, my brother, who has wronged me by the very fact of his being. I do not accept his offers of secrecy; go, I beg of you, announce the fact of my mother's shame. I shall take every step to free myself from every obligation to Mr. Brown."

He left them in a paroxysm of rage—the next thing which we heard was that he was raving in delirium tremens.

Still, while Will Percival lived the secret did not transpire; drunk or sober he never told it. The Browns were as secret as he: as for Mr. Selden, he was a tomb of secrets.

What need to go on and detail the steps of his sure and certain descent after this? He had long ago entered upon that fearful downward path from which return by the unaided strength of the traveler is all but hopeless. Men of high moral natures have struggled vainly against the fearful propensity. Will Percival's nature was not a high one. Besides, he bore within him a secret, known to others who had no cause to love him, which once divulged would cost him all that he still prized in life. Every month found him lower than before. At length, after months of debauch, Will Percival died. He had had moments of sanity and of apparent reformation; but as Fanny had told him, "self-indulgence had been his plan of life," and he could form no other.

When his will was opened this remarkable clause was found in it:

"I give to Fanny Clifford, the wife of Abram Brown, alias Arthur Beaumont, my older brother (as I am told), my estate of Raymond Hill, with the portraits of my late mother and wife, and all other fixtures and furniture thereunto belonging, asking her to preserve the portraits for the love she bore to the originals, and to make such disposition of the estate as she may think best."

Of course the secret was known. Of course we all saw an immense change in Mr. Arthur Beaumont. Many of us remembered that we had thought his carriage noble, his face indicative of high birth. Like poor Mary Raymond, the first wife of Mr. Beaumont had been of proud and honorable lineage, and he, the father, had been the unworthy descendant of good ancestors.

Why he had condescended to be Mr. Bowen's clerk we never knew; perhaps he was crushed by his mother's misfortunes, and after her death cared little what became of him; perhaps he wished to be near his secret, for he of course knew of the little trunk; perhaps—oh, dreadful thought!—he did not care for the opinion of the aristocrats of Summerfield, but bided his time. Certain it was, he went on as he had begun, unassuming, self-contained, and reserved, but faithful, honorable, and of good report.

William Percival sleeps by the side of his mother and wife, and the marble which marks the spot bears the name he bore through life. It is an error which harms no one, and the noble estate which witnessed his ruin has received a consecration, for it is the scene of a noble charity. Fanny and Arthur Beaumont, after securing it from change or downfall, as far as the changeable influences of our country permit, gave it as an asylum for a class of unfortunates, too little cared for in this utilitarian age; and every year Raymond Hill returns to society some restored human being who needed but that "helping hand to the weak" which the poet speaks of:

"A helping hand to the weak,
A friendly arm to the friendless;
Kind words so short to speak,
But whose echo is endless.
The world is wide, these things are small,
They may be nothing, but they are all!"

And, on a soft summer evening, Fanny and Beaumont, who are one in all true and noble sentiments, walk together with their children to a consecrated spot, never without its green turf and beautiful flowers, or imperishable ivy, and talk of all his goodness and loyalty who sleeps beneath. Beaumont can afford to share his wife's regard with that noble memory, and when Christmas comes the marble bust which stands always in the library, looking down with the true serenity of the man it images, on the group below, is surrounded by these words:

"WE KEEP HIS MEMORY GREEN."

WINE-MAKING IN CALIFORNIA.

BUENA VISTA RANCHE AND VINEYARD.

IF any reliance can be placed upon statistics, the production of Wine is the most important branch of agricultural industry on earth. At all events, there are only to be compared with it the culture of rice—which forms the staple food of nearly one-third of the human race—and that of wheat. Europe is the main seat of wine culture. According to official reports there are in Europe twelve and a quarter millions of acres devoted to the growth of the grape, producing a little more than three thousand millions of gallons a year, which, estimating the average value at place of production at twenty-five cents a gallon, is worth on the spot more than 775,000,000 of dollars. Making the most liberal estimate of the cotton crop of the world, in its palmiest days, it will be hard to bring the value up to more than one-third of this sum. Moreover, as wine is to a considerable extent an article of commerce, fifty cents a gallon would not be a high estimate for its average value at the place of consumption. Thus the real value of the wine crop of Europe would be more than 1,500,000,000 of dollars a year. If these figures are exaggerated the fault is not ours. We find them in official reports, which ought to be reliable.

We are assured on as good authority as that of Mr. Haraszthy that California has five millions of acres suited to grape-culture; that in a considerable part the vine flourishes better than in the most favored regions of Europe; so that when, in a generation or so, this shall be planted with vines, the wine product of that State will be worth, on the spot, at only twenty-five cents a gallon, more than five hundred million dollars.

Making all due allowances for the enthusiasm of a sanguine vine-grower, and guided only by what has actually been demonstrated, we may be certain that the production of wine is to become a leading branch of the industry of the Golden State. We therefore present an account of the processes of grape-culture and wine-making as now conducted in California, at the largest establishment of the kind in the world.

The "Buena Vista Vinicultural Association" is an incorporated Company, composed chiefly of residents of San Francisco. The estate has the largest vineyard in the world, and upon it the business of wine-making has here reached a higher development—in so far as the application of machinery is concerned—than in any other vineyard in America. There are a greater variety of grape, a greater variety of production here, than in any other vineyard of the State, and its extent and production are rapidly increasing.

The estate of the Association, lying within thirty miles of San Francisco, contains 6000 acres in one body, bordering on the town of Sonoma, and running six miles eastward toward Napa City. About 4000 acres are valley land, the remainder well timbered and hilly. The property is bounded on the north by a fine creek, which runs during the whole year; also on the northeast of the boundary-line is a large creek, called the Caneros. Besides these several others cross the estate in all directions, one forming a cascade of from two to three hundred feet.

fall, in groves of evergreen, pine, redwood, live-oak, madronia, wild chestnut, laurel, and mansanito; the laurel, madronia, and mansanito—all evergreens—are most beautiful in foliage and bark. On the estate there are over 50,000 cords of wood; and the mineral springs are celebrated for their healing qualities. There are four different springs—one yellow sulphur, one white sulphur, one magnesia and sulphur, and one yellow sulphur, magnesia, and iron. All the springs are 80° warm; three of them have bathing-houses built over them. There is also a large soda-water spring, which furnishes excellent strong and effervescing soda-water, which requires no artificial means except to cork well the bottle. The land is volcanic, and varies in quality throughout the domain. Some is dark-red—burned by volcanic fires—some is gray, yellow, darkish blue, and black. This variety renders the estate so eminently qualified for the production of the grape, for all foreign vines may be planted in the same soil that they had in their native place. The soil mostly contains magnesia; and to this may perhaps be attributed the fact that Buena Vista produces from its imported vines wines equal to celebrated European varieties, especially for the making of Champagne.

Of the 6000 acres about 400 are planted in vines; 260 of them with Mission, or native, vines—as those are called which were imported from Spain by the Catholic missionaries from 1715 to 1740; and 140 acres with vines imported from all parts of Europe. The vines are planted eight feet apart, so that a two-horse plow can easily pass between them. Of the 290,000 vines, 1300 were planted in 1832, 6700 in 1854, 13,000 in 1857, 34,000 in 1858, 30,000 in 1859, 70,000 in 1860, and 135,000 in 1861. The vines thirty-one years old are healthy, and bear the most abundantly. They were planted by an Indian who endeavored to establish a home under the law of the Mexican republic, which offered grants of land to red men engaged in the cultivation of the soil. Salvador Vallejo became the next owner; then Benjamin Kelsy; then Julius K. Ross, from whom Mr. A. Haraszthy purchased it in 1856. In the following years Mr. Haraszthy added various tracts of land to the estate. The titles of the estate went through the different forums of courts, were approved, and finally recognized by the United States Government. Up to the time of the purchase of Mr. Haraszthy there were but 7900 vines planted on the estate, and only on spots where they could be irrigated during the summer months. It was well known to Californians that vines were profitable, and never failed to bear, but it was universally believed that all vines required watering. There were but few spots where vines could be watered, therefore but few vineyards were planted in California, and in Sonoma but two: the above mentioned and that of General Vallejo—about 30 acres altogether. When Mr. Haraszthy became proprietor of the Buena Vista property he at once planted 13,000 vines on lands without irrigating them, but using the plow instead of water, contending that by stirring the ground repeatedly during the summer months the moisture would be drawn from the atmosphere, and the plants would flourish in the loose soil. The old settlers of the valley felt sorry that the new proprietor should waste his money on so hopeless an enterprise. The vines, however, thrived, much to the amazement of the unbelievers, who then said that the vines might grow, but would not bear grapes without irrigation. They waited two years, when many of the more thrifty vines had grapes much finer and sweeter than those before raised on watered vines. This gave conclusive evidence of the practicability of raising vines without water. Then every body began to plant, seeing that Mr. Haraszthy annually increased by thousands his plantation on land which for grain culture was not worth a cent; and now the Valley, which in 1856 had but 30 acres of vines, has more than 2000 acres in thrifty vineyards. Land in the neighborhood of Buena Vista went up from $6 to $130 the acre.

This impulse was not only felt in Sonoma, but throughout the upper part of California. The State Agricultural Society watched the progress of the promising enterprise. As early as 1858 the Board of the Society requested Mr. Haraszthy to write an essay on wine-planting, wine-making, etc. With this request he complied by writing an essay which was received with great enthusiasm; extracts were published in most of the newspapers, and thousands were printed by the Legislature and distributed among the people. Many who never before knew any thing of vine-raising or wine-making, by this work were made familiar with the business, and found that, after all, there was no mystery in it. The proof of this is the fact that, according to the State statistics taken in 1856, there were 1,540,134 vines, large and small; and of those the old Spanish settlement of Los Angeles had 726,000 vines, the remainder were scattered through the State in old Missions and Spanish ranches, where they were irrigated. In 1862 the standing Committee of the Legislature on Vines report 20,000,000 of vines planted throughout the State.

The success which attended this enterprise, and the untold wealth which it promised the State, soon manifested itself to every one; and to foster the rapidly growing enterprise the Legislature, in 1861, appointed a Commission to report on the Ways and Means best adapted to promote the improvement and growth of the grape in California. Mr. Haraszthy being appointed one of the commissioners, proceeded to Europe, where he traveled through the principal vine-growing States. Being in an official capacity, and supplied by Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, with a letter to the different Ministers and Consuls of the United States, he had access to all reports from Government committees on vine-raising and wine-making. Besides this, his position as commissioner procured him introductions to the most scientific men, who had spent their lives in practically cultivating and making wine. These gentlemen freely gave him their mode and experience. All these, together with his personal experience, he has collected into a large and valuable book, which has received a wide circulation, not only in the United States but through Europe.*

During his European tour Mr. Haraszthy collected 380 of the most distinguished varieties of vines in Europe; these are now planted on the Buena Vista estate, where they are flourishing beyond all belief. So that the Buena Vista estate may be said to possess all known valuable varieties of grape-vines in the civilized world.

In planting vines the soil is plowed, subsoiled, and well harrowed, then lined off every eight feet each way. A two-foot stake is stuck into the ground when this is done, and the lines are perfectly straight; holes are dug two feet in diameter and twenty inches deep, the surface soil being thrown on one side and the bottom soil on the other. Then to each row are two men; one with vines, which he places in the holes, spreads their roots, while the other man, with his hoe, covers the roots with the surface ground, and fills up the hole with the bottom earth. When this is done he slightly presses down the soil around the vine with his feet. This is all that is necessary to plant the vine. In Buena Vista the planting is done in December, January, and February. Much caution is used in selecting the ground for the vines imported from Europe. The soil is first analyzed, and they are placed in such earth and locality as they had in their native country.

In the month of March the old as well as the young vines are plowed, with two-horse plows, first one way then the other. After this men with hoes follow, and hoe all around each vine; this is done after every plowing, and so the vines are cultivated four times each way. This lasts till July, after which time nothing more is done to the vine till the gathering of the fruit.

The old vines are pruned in the months of December and January. The best wood on the vine is selected, and cut down to spurs of three buds. The spurs are in accordance with the age and strength of the vine. Those from six to ten years old are pruned to six, and even eight spurs, to bear from ten to fifteen pounds of good healthy grapes; older vines are pruned to more wood and bearing. The cutting is done with shears made for this purpose, and imported from France and Germany. They cut smoother and squarer than the knife. Young vines, one year old, are cut down to two buds; all sprouts from the side and root are carefully cut away. The two-year-old vines are pruned in the same manner, with this difference, that two spurs are left on the vine to form a sort of head. The three-year-old vines are cut to two buds but three spurs, and then they bear grapes. In the following years they are pruned according to their strength.

* Grape Culture, Vines, and Wine-Making; with Notes upon Agriculture and Horticulture. By A. HARASZTHY. With numerous Illustrations. Harper & Brothers.

Gathering the grapes is generally done in October or November.* Men with wooden boxes similar to a claret box, and holding about fifty pounds of grapes, will each take a row of vines. They cut the grape bunches with scissors made for this purpose, fill their boxes, and carry them to a wagon, which is provided for every five men. This wagon follows with empty boxes, which are taken off as the full ones are loaded on. Thirty-five boxes form a load, which is then taken to the Press-House. One man will gather in a good vineyard 2000 pounds per day.

The wagon with the grapes is driven to the platform of the Press-House, where there is a car on two massive cast-iron wheels. On this car the boxes and grapes are placed. When full the car is drawn up to the wine-press. This is done by a two-inch rope fastened to the upper end of the car, and also attached to an iron axle turned by a drum, which is propelled by a leather belt fixed on the engine below. When the car is loaded a bell gives the signal to the engineer. He starts the drum which pulls the rope, and thus the loaded car is raised to the third story, where there is a platform; and next the platform is the Grape-Crusher, consisting of two cylinders two and a half feet long and twelve inches thick. The cylinders are supplied with a hopper, like a grain-mill, to hold the grapes. These cylinders have a cog-wheel on one side and a fly-wheel on the other. The whole is moved by a wheel, on which the belt runs, driven by the engine.

The grapes are thrown from the platform into the hopper, a box at a time, by a man standing on the car; another man is beside the crusher, and moves the bunches into the hopper; by this process one load, containing about 1750 pounds, is crushed in five or six minutes. As the grapes run through the cylinders they are thoroughly crushed, and fall down into a large wooden square box beneath the crusher. But the cylinders are so arranged that the seeds are never broken, for that would be injurious to the wine. The box has a double bottom; the top one is perforated with holes, which permits the grape-juice to run through into the other bottom, from whence it is carried by a spout, and through an iron tube to the basement floor, where there are twelve large vats placed to receive the juices pressed out by the crusher. The tanks are placed in a row close to a large reservoir, which is sunk in the ground beneath the tanks. The reason for not at once letting the juices into the reservoir is that the must may first settle for five or six hours in the tanks. All the foreign substance and dust that may be on the grapes, and would be in the must, in the six hours will settle to the bottom of the tanks. From thence the must is drawn into the reservoir. This prevents the wine having a "ground taste."

The square box before mentioned stands over the press, and from this the press is filled with the crushed grapes. This press has an iron screw five inches in diameter and six feet long; the thread is very fine, so as to give the greatest possible power. This screw is in the centre of a square box, measuring six feet each way, and well-matured branch of a healthy vine is taken, placed in the ground so that it will be from eight to twelve inches deep, and have two, three, or four buds above ground. In Europe there are many fancy modes of producing vines. Sometimes a little basket is placed in the ground, about a foot from an old vine; through this basket the layer is led, and allowed to have two buds above ground. At the proper time this layer is cut off from the mother plant, and, with the basket which contains it, is planted in the place intended for it. Rooted vines produced in this manner will bear fruit within one year from planting. Another method is to lead a vine through the bottom of a flower-pot filled with rich soil. In the autumn, when the grapes are ripe, the vine in the pot is cut from the mother plant, the pot carefully removed, and the shoot transplanted. To promote the formation of roots the vine is sometimes split up a couple of inches, and the split kept open with a wedge. In a large establishment like that of the California Association, where immediate practical results are aimed at, the simple method of cuttings is chiefly employed. We trust, however, that the slow method of raising from seeds will not be neglected. One first-class new variety thus produced will amply repay the cost and trouble.

four feet deep. The sides are slid in, and have a quarter of an inch space between, so that the juice—but not the seeds or stems—may escape. The press is worked by the steam-engine. The pressure, when full, is 282,000 pounds. The wood-work is made of heavy beams, and it required three thousand square feet of timber to complete it. Additional presses will be made in order to be able to work up in time the increased produce. The filling of the press is done in the following manner: Six inches of crushed grapes, then three-inch square pieces of wood, then again six inches of crushed grapes, and then the pieces of wood till the press is full, when it contains about eight thousand pounds of crushed grapes.*

When it is full the pressing commences; this requires an hour and ten minutes. When no more juice runs the stems, seeds, and skins are thrown into baskets and taken to the fermenting tanks, which stand in the basement, and will be described hereafter. When the tank is full and contains thirty-five thousand pounds, water is let into it from a tank standing on the

* From Mr. Haraszthy's work on Grape-Culture we extract a few hints on various methods of training and pruning. The main object to be attained is to have the vine form a stout and healthy head; the more healthy the head, the more durable and fruitful the vine. To form this head the young shoot is cut off close to the old wood. Vines may be trained in three ways: First, Free; Second, on Props; Third, on Trellises. For wine-making the methods are the best which permit the grapes to grow as near the ground as possible; for the perfect ripening of the grapes depends more on the heat radiated from the earth than upon that which comes directly from the sun. Figure 1 shows the form of Head-Pruning. All shoots with year-old wood are pruned off, and of the new ones four or ten are left, which are pruned so that each has one bud left. After the blooming the young shoots may be brought upward and tied together, the ends being cut off above the place where they are tied. The vine-head then presents the shape of a balloon, the grapes hanging in wreaths all around; in this position each cluster has the full benefit of air, light, and sun.—Bush-Pruning differs from the foregoing only in leaving a few of the last year's shoots on the vine, which are pruned down to two or three buds. If there are ten or a dozen of these shoots left (as in Figure 2) they may be divided, some tied over the stem balloon-wise, and others supported by props. Various methods of training upon trellises are shown in Figures 3, 4, and 5. The height is the only essential point in which they differ: two and a half and six feet are the usual limits.

second floor, and filled by a large pump driven by steam. The water is obtained from the crystal stream running in front of the cellar. When within one foot of being full the man-hole is closed, leaving only a glass tube open for the gas to escape into a jar of water. This mass is suffered to ferment from five to ten days. When it has sufficiently fermented it is drawn off into the reservoir already mentioned, from which,

by a steam-pump throwing one hundred gallons per minute, it is pumped into a reservoir standing outside of the building on the side-hill. From thence the wine is led to the different cellars and tanks. This wine is called "Picquet," and is used to make brandy.

The above is the process used to make first quality of white wine out of blue grapes, but when grapes are crushed for making red wine the press is not just then used. But the crushed grapes falling from the grape-crusher into the square wooden box placed under the crusher as described, are taken—stems, seeds, skins, and all—to the fermenting vats in the basement. Each of these holds 4000 gallons, and reaches to the second floor. In the head of each of these tanks is a square hole through which the grapes are thrown into the fermenting tanks below, and the product is red wine.

It has been said above that, for making white wine, the juice runs from the square box and press into tanks below, where it is left to settle for several hours. It is then drawn into a reservoir sunk into the ground, from which the steam-pump brings the must into a tank standing on the side-hill, from which it is conveyed into the different cellars by 3-inch pipes into the 4000-gallon tanks. One of these tanks is filled within 18 inches of the top, as already mentioned in describing the process of making red wine. The fermentation will in three to five days be so violent that one can hear the fluid bubble and sputter like boiling water. It generally requires from eight to fifteen days for such a tank to become quiet. It then begins to clear and assume a wine taste.

Nothing more is done to this tank till January, except to keep it constantly filled with similar wine. Then the tank is tapped at the bottom, and the wine drawn into the next standing tank in the following manner: A hose is attached to the faucet, and through it the wine runs into a reservoir, from which it is pumped by hand into the next tank, which has been made ready for it by clearing and sulphuring. The emptied tank is now cleared and sulphured for the reception of the wine from the one next below it; and so on, one tank in each cellar always standing empty ready for the contents of its neighbor. By this means, no matter how many thousands of gallons of wine are to be drawn off, only one extra tank is needed. The white wine is drawn off three times during the first year, twice during the second, once during the third, and then it is left in the tanks until sent to market.

The process of making "Champagne" presents some peculiarities. In the beginning of February, when the white wine is first drawn from the tank, it is cleared with isinglass or some similar substance; tanin is added. A small tank, holding 3000 bottles, is then placed in the basement of the Press-House. This tank is filled from the white wine intended for Champagne. Then the required quantity of rock-candy is dissolved, thrown in, and well stirred. One man draws it into bottles which are corked by another, wired by a third, who has a machine to help tighten the wire; and then a fourth man hoists the bottles to the first floor, where they are piled up in racks. The piles are seven feet high, and eight feet long. The bottles are laid in tiers on small laths. There are six avenues between the piles, which resemble walls, made of bottles. Here the bottles lie for two or three months till the wine has fermented. When the fermentation is too vehement—that is, when more than eight per cent. of the bottles are found to be bursting they are removed to a cooler place in the cellar below. This checks the too rapid fermentation. When the wine has fully fermented, and is ready for clearing, the bottles are put on racks with the neck downward. Every day they are shaken by hand so that the sediment may settle in the neck and on the cork. This process lasts six weeks.

When the Champagne is perfectly clear in the bottle, and the sediment is all in the neck, the operation of disgorging commences. This is extremely difficult, and requires an experienced person. The "disgorger" takes the bottle in hand carefully so as not to disturb the sediment.

He twists off the wire, the cork flies out, and with it all the sediment which had collected. As soon as all this has been popped out, the operator places his thumb on the mouth of the bottle to prevent more wine or gas escaping, and hands the bottle to a man who stands ready to fill up the bottle with the required liquid, which is dissolved candy, fine old brandy, sherry, or Madeira, according to the taste of the customers at the place where the Champagne is to be sent. If it is to be sent to England it is not made so sweet, but "stronger." When filled, the bottle is recorked by a machine, only the finest corks being used. One man ties on the twine while the other fastens the wire. This done, it is given to the person who affixes the labels. Then it passes to the hands of others who wrap it up as carefully as though it were a new-born infant, and pack it in baskets for transportation.

Attached to the Press-House is a machine-shop, where the different apparatus are placed, viz., a steam-engine with double cylinders, a large steam-boiler, which has pipes leading to the distillery about 300 feet distant. A cast-iron pipe is also connected with the boiler, and the large steam-chest where the staves for the tanks are cured, also lumber for building purposes. This chest is 30 feet long, 4 feet wide, $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high. The green redwood staves are placed in it in such a manner that the steam may penetrate between the staves; when the chest is filled steam is let in continually for from sixteen to twenty hours. At first the water running out of the chest will be as black as ink, then gradually it becomes clearer, and clearer, till it is white, when the staves are done. When taken out, they are dry, and have lost nearly one-half of their former weight. Not a particle of sap remains in them. They are now much easier for the coopers to work than unseasoned wood. All lumber used for doors, window sashes, etc., must be seasoned; without this steam-chest the Company would be at a loss to supply themselves with tanks for the annually increasing produce. It may be here mentioned that the vine-growers felt considerable uneasiness as to how, and from where, they should get oak-wood for making the required barrels, tanks, etc. They appointed committees to report whence and how to import staves. Dalmatia, through Venice, and Canada were recommended. But it was all too expensive, and would have made the cost for a gallon from twelve to thirteen cents. California oak is too porous, and will not do. These facts were a damper to the vine-growing interest till Mr. Haraszthy demonstrated the utility of redwood for tanks, etc. Having foreseen the difficulty about staves, in 1859 he had some small barrels made, applied steam to them by means of an India-rubber hose from a brandy distillery, for at that time there was on the estate no steam-boiler. He steamed a barrel for an hour, then had it washed with clear spring water, and filled with old wine, as new wine will acquire taste much readier than the old. An oak barrel was filled with the same wine at the same time, so as to ascertain whether the wine in the redwood barrel acquired any foreign taste. The wine was left in for years, but it gave not the slightest taste. Not satisfied with this one test, he increased the number of his tanks, etc., and conclusively proved that the experiment was perfect. This is a great saving, for the redwood abounds, is easily worked, and durable. There are posts planted in the ground that have been there for a hundred years, having been placed there by the old priests, and they are still perfectly sound. The cost per gallon of casks made of this wood is three cents.

Next to the steam-chest is placed a grain-mill, which grinds the barley or wheat for the horses of the estate. Much wheat is used for horse feed. This mill is also driven by steam. There are also several circular saws driven by steam: these are used by the carpenters for sawing lumber for building purposes, making boxes in which to ship the wine or grapes to market. In this building are placed different pumps; some from the reservoir to the tank on the side-hill, others to pump water to the different reservoirs, all worked by the steam-engine.

In the Distillery are three tanks made of redwood three-inch staves, each holding 2300 gallons of wine. Tank No. 1 is on the lowest floor; in it a copper steam-pipe is placed. This tank is filled from tank No. 2 by a valve, No. 2 is filled from No. 3, and No. 3 by a cast-iron pipe from the reservoir on the side-hill. When all three tanks are full steam is let into No. 1. In one hour it commences to boil. When boiling the alcoholic vapor rises, and passes into No. 2, in which is a copper warmer. The wine in No. 2, surrounding this warmer, is not only warmed by this but also precipitates the watery parts rising up from No. 2. The alcoholic vapor rises through No. 3, which has a similar warmer, which again warms the wine, and precipitates the watery vapor that rising from the first, passed through the second, and entered the third tank. Then the spirit rises and enters a globe which is surrounded with running water. From the globe the spirit descends into pan No. 1, and on these pans cold water is also running. All these pans and the globe are made of copper, and will separate such watery vapor as may have penetrated through the tanks Nos. 2 and 3, or through the globe, so that the pure wine spirit will run into the "worm," where it cools. This worm is 220 feet long, made of copper, and placed in a large tank filled with water. The spirit runs through this worm.

At the other end of the worm is a tube into which the spirit runs: this tube is furnished with an "Alcoholometer," which gives the exact strength of the brandy. The brandy comes out of this tube at a temperature of from 94° to 70° . When at 70° the wine in No. 1 is let out, filled from No. 2, which of course is now boiling hot, and begins to make the brandy run in ten minutes; No. 2 is filled from No. 3, which is lukewarm. By this much fuel is saved, also time, for this apparatus can make 1000 gallons of brandy in 24 hours. There is nothing used but pure wine for making brandy or "Cognac." The newly-made Cognac is put into kegs of 25 gallons, and transferred to the rock cellar. Brandy made with steam is healthier than if made in copper stills; for a still heated by fire will burn the fluid more or less, or at least will give it a smoky taste.

THE CELLARS.

There are at present six cellars excavated in the solid rock. Their dimensions are 12 feet high, 16 feet wide. The tanks stand in the middle, are 8 feet high, and 12 feet in diameter. The length of some of the cellars is 140 feet, and they are annually lengthened as the increasing crop requires. Their temperature is 60°, and seldom varies more than one or two degrees during the year. They are kept very clean, nothing being allowed in them which will decay; for wine, like milk, will quickly assume any foreign odor. Whenever a barrel is emptied it is immediately taken to the machine-shop, thoroughly steamed, washed, sulphured, and replaced in its former position. The cleanliness of the cellars and their utensils is considered so important that oil lamps are not used, for fear that the smoke may affect the wine. Therefore sperm candles light all the cellars.

When the wine is considered "ripe" enough for bottling, which varies from three to five years, according to the quality—light wine being sooner ripe—a preparation of isinglass is made. The very best isinglass is put overnight into a dish of pure wine to soak; next morning it is worked up to paste with the hand; more is added to form the thickness of cream. This done, it is taken to the barrel which is to be cleared; a tub is placed before the barrel; a siphon is placed in the bung hole; from six to ten gallons of wine are taken from the barrel and put into the tub; the isinglass is poured into the whole mass, beaten to a foam with sticks or a clean chain. This foamy substance is gradually poured back into the barrel, whose contents are thoroughly stirred up, so as to be mixed with it. The bung-hole is then closed, and remains so for twenty or thirty days, when the wine is drawn off into a clean barrel, and the same process renewed. Some wine requires to be cleared three times. Red wine is cleared in a similar manner, only that instead of isinglass fresh eggs are used, as isinglass would injure the color of the red wine.

After the clearing process is satisfactorily accomplished the wine is drawn into bottles, which are cleanly washed in running water. The corking of the bottles is done by machinery. The best corks are used for the finer wines; for much good wine is lost in many establishments on account of bad corking. An experienced man is employed to inspect and select the corks to be used. From the corker the bottle is handed to the man who wraps on the lead, then to the labeler, then to the person putting on the paper wrapper, and finally to the packer, who places twelve bottles in straw in a box; then twelve boxes are placed in one large box, which, being bound with iron hoops, is ready to be shipped.

In the Vinegar Factory are six tanks, holding 1000 gallons each. The inside of one tank is filled with vine-cuttings loosely placed. The wine destined for vinegar is let into tank No. 1, where it stands twenty-four hours. It is then drawn into No. 2; and so on successively into the whole six, always remaining twenty-four hours in each tank. Generally in one month's time the vinegar is excellent. The temperature of the place is kept at eighty degrees by means of a stove.

Making raisins is done in a very simple manner. The grapes for raisins are picked in the heat of the day, when they are free from the morning dew, and carried to a drying establishment on the side-hill. The drying-pan is forty feet long, twelve feet wide, two feet deep, and is made as follows: The hill is very steep, about an angle of forty degrees; it is solid rock. The rock was excavated the above length and width to the depth of four and a half feet. In this excavation are four floors built even, running from the lower part of the hill upward the whole length. These floors are covered with sheet-iron. On the surface of this iron red gravelly clay is strewn four inches thick. The grape-bunches are placed on the pan. During the day, when the sun is shining, no fire is used, but toward evening a fire is made beneath; and by this means the pan is warmed. There being four inches of clay on the sheet-iron plates, the heat is gradual, and keeps the soil warm during the night. Every evening the pan is covered with boards, to prevent the dew falling on the grapes. It requires from twelve to fourteen days before the raisins are ready to be packed. Three pounds of grapes will give two pounds of raisins. The grave-vines for raisins were imported from Malaga and Smyrna. As yet there are but few raisins made, as the vines are just beginning to bear. In a couple more years there will be from forty to fifty tons produced.

THREE LIVES.

"We meet at one gate

When all's over. The ways they are many and wide,
And seldom are two ways the same. Side by side
May we stand at the same little door, when all's done!
The ways they are many, the end it is one."

"IN our course through life we shall meet the people who are coming to meet us, from many strange places, and by many strange roads; and what it is set to them to do to us, and what it is set to us to do to them, will all be done."

When I came upon this passage in the book I was reading I shut it up and fell to thinking. Somehow the words carried me back along the way of my own life—a rugged, commonplace highway enough, and yet not without some strange, sudden turnings in it, which made me understand what the old Greeks meant by Fate. Mine has not been a stirring career. I have not guided boats through mad seas, tossing white crests of defiance to a threatening sky; I have not ministered in prisons, or nursed in hospitals. Yet is my quiet life not without its own lesson; not without its temptations, its struggles, its hours of terrible anguish; and I have thought it might be a good employment for the long, solitary days of summer, to set it all down; that, perchance, sometime when the mould grows over my pulseless heart, and my faded eyes are closed forever, some other, tried and tempted as I was, may read and learn that the right has its sure rewards. If they are not always of the earth; if the crown is eternal, and the flowers are such as never fade, are they therefore the less worth the winning?

How far off my youth seems, and yet I am but thirty-five! and it is only because my life must be measured, not by years, but by the incidents which have followed each other so fast, that I seem now like an old woman, for whom it remains only to sit among the shadows and wait for the morning.

Back across the years I look to the morning-land of youth. I see a bright, happy home, kind parents, brothers and sisters, so many and so merry. Our life, in the pleasant country town where our home was, was not wanting in variety. We had society enough as we grew up, and the great hospitable house used to ring with gay laughter and cheery talk. In winter Yule fires burned in the wide-mouthed chimneys, for we were come of English stock, and liked to keep up good old customs; the long tables bent under the weight of bounteous Christmas cheer, and of all the glad young faces on which the fire-light flashed none was more glad than mine. I did not know what trouble meant in those days. There was a strange fascination for me in reading in books about misery and heart-ache—a pleasant luxury, in the soft tears I wept, for sorrows so far removed from my own life.

They spoiled me a little because I was the beauty of the family, and they were all proud of me. No one would guess it now, but in my youth, when these eyes, which so many tears have dimmed, were black and full of sparkling light, when roses flamed on these now pale cheeks, when my lips were coral red, and my long dark hair defied comb and band to curb its luxuriant growth, I was the belle of the country town—the centre of attraction at every fête and festival. The discipline of my life has cured me of vanity. It thrills my pulses now with no throb of the old pride to remember how I queened it once; to recall the perilous pleasure of being followed, and praised, and sought for; the one without whom every company was incomplete. It is fashionable nowadays to make book heroines who are pale and retiring; not handsome till some inspiration kindles their eyes and colors their cheeks, and then, all at once, radiant. My beauty was not of that kind. It was bright and positive.

Of course I had many suitors; but I was not easy to win. I was reluctant to resign my proud dominion over the many to sit quietly down at one man's fireside. Yet I was no coquette; I gave no encouragement, and if any were disappointed I did not hold myself to blame. I was nineteen, and had been for three years the centre of attraction in all the society the neighborhood of Kempton afforded, before I had ever allowed any one to approach me near enough to be my lover.

I hardly know now what it was which moved me when Fred Hartright came. He was my second cousin, but he was an orphan, and had passed most of his life away from Kempton—in school, or traveling, or at the house of his guardian in New York. When I was nineteen he came to Kempton for the summer; and, of course, with the tie of relationship between us, he was brought into constant association with our family.

He was very handsome. I think it ran in the Hartright blood; my mother was a Hartright, and I took my beauty from her. The Hamiltons are all like my father—sturdy, and brave, and true, strong to work for God and man, but wanting a little the Hartright charm.

I had never seen any one like Fred; never, certainly, any one so graceful, so accomplished, so gifted with that rare fascination of manner which makes every thing its possessor does and says seem at once thoroughly sincere, and the most subtle of compliments. Perhaps it was no wonder that we attracted each other, thrown together as we were in all the pleasant, dangerous intimacy of country life—riding, driving, boating, singing, and dreaming.

When he asked me to marry him, however, I hardly knew what to say, for I had not been thinking of him in that light. Pleasant friend, gay companion he had been—nothing more. But when I listened to his passionate persuasions; when I met his dark eyes so full of pleading; above all, when I knew I must be all to him or nothing—that, if I said no to his suit, my gallant, tender friend would go away from Kempton forever, I began to think how sorely I should miss him, and to long to keep him by my side. There was something very fascinating, moreover, in his intense, earnest way of making love. No one had ever talked so to me before. I did not believe I had ever been half so dear to any one else, and I thought I should never be so beloved again.

Before I fairly knew it we were engaged, and while I passed my days in a sort of charming, cooing bewilderment at Fred's side, my mother and sisters were busily at work upon my wedding outfit.

It was September when our bridal vows were plighted, and we were to be married at the Christmas tide, on my twentieth birthday. The three months intervening were long enough to show me Fred in other phases than the gay companion or chivalrous wooer. I began to recognize in him a passionate temper, an undisciplined will, a jealousy cruel as the grave. Oh, if I had been warned in time. But no one seemed to mind; only my grandmother Hamilton said to me one day—it was after we had quarreled and made up, when she was there on a visit—

"Remember, child, stormy wooing never ends in quiet wedding."

I answered her cheerfully:

"Oh, there'll be no trouble after we are married, grandma. It is only that Fred loves me so well now he can't bear any one else to look at me. After we have settled down into the quiet of wedded life, and our mutual trust is strengthened by time, it will all be different. We shall jog along just as other people do."

Grandmother shook her head.

"If you could build a great stone pyramid on the top of a volcano it might keep it under, perhaps—the thing would be to keep the volcano still till you got it builded."

I knew what she meant. She thought there would never be peace enough between us to give time for building up the quiet trust of which I had spoken. With my nineteen-years-old wisdom I smiled at her fears, and thought she knew neither Fred nor me, or our love for each other.

And indeed there was something fascinating about those very outbursts of temper. I am not sure that they did not make his hold on me stronger than a calmer lover's would have been. Not that I liked his anger or his injustice; but the tender sweetness of making up seemed to atone for all. When I saw him at my feet, so humbled, so sorry, so fearful I would never forgive him, and so certain that all he needed to cure him forever was to have me all his own, and be sure that no one else would dare to think of me, is it strange that I was ready to pardon all?

I have wondered since that my mother was not alarmed for my future happiness; but she took kindly even to the Hartright foibles, and thought all Fred's passionate injustice sprang from the fervor of his love.

So I went on.

I remember the frosty pomp of my bridal morning. An early snow glittered on the tree-boughs and whitened the road-side, and the bright December sun struck it all to diamond sparkles. Fred was ecstatic. Never had bride been so lovely, or groom so blest. No doubt or misgiving troubled him—there was no little cloud in all the blue sky that arched smiling over his future.

Did his rhapsodies chill me, or why was my heart so heavy? At the very last a vague presentiment of evil oppressed me. Still I felt no inclination to draw back. I thought what I experienced was but the natural, girlish tremor which overflows in some in bridal tears, but which turned me, instead, cold and still. I spoke my vows willingly, and with unfaltering lips—pledged myself of my own free-will, and surely the contract was binding. I could have no right to complain if Fate or Providence exacted its fulfillment to the uttermost farthing.

When the ceremony was over the chill and gloom were uplifted from my mood. I was happy, as brothers and sisters and friends crowded round me with congratulations, and I turned proud eyes on my handsome, graceful husband. Many a time afterward the bitterness of thoughts which would have been harsh was softened by the memory of that hour—of the triumph in his eyes, the love-words on his lips, the tremulous joy of which my own heart was full.

There was need enough, as time passed on, of tender and softening memories. My grandmother had been right. Stormy wooing does not end in quiet wedding.

We lived together, in outward peace, more than three years. On the incidents of those miserable years I will not dwell. They are my secret—let the world speculate on them as it may. Both of us were wrong; both suffered. He was unkind, exacting, causelessly jealous, needlessly cruel. I was defiant, unyielding, not ready enough to forgive. And so the breach between us grew wider. If any child's hand had been stretched out to draw us together, any baby lips had smiled for us, it might have saved us; but God knew best, and He sent no such blessing.

There are men and women, perhaps, who could go through a long lifetime together in outward harmony, when between their hearts was yawning a fathomless, bridgeless gulf of disunion and discordance. Such must have cooler, more controlled, more long-suffering temperaments than ours.

There came a time at last, after months of alienation—months during which not one word had been spoken between us that the necessities of life or of society did not exact—when Fred entered one afternoon the room where I was sitting.

It was a June day. There was a scent of heliotropes in the air. I remember the way every article of furniture was placed—what music was open on the piano, what book I held in my hand, even a white shred on the carpet which tormented my eyes while he spoke.

“I have something to say to you, Margery.”

His tone was quiet, yet with a certain note of resolve which made it forceful. He had always called me Margery, even when we were most at variance; but it seemed to me his voice lingered a little on the name now, with an inflection that made me think of old, happier times. I looked up expectantly, yet with a cold certainty at my heart that reunion was impossible; a secret, bitter determination never again to forgive him, say what he would. But he had not come for prayers or entreaties. Looking at me searchingly, he said,

“Do you remember the address Charles Forsyth gave us in his last letter?”

Charles was our cousin—his as well as mine—and had been among the first to follow the gold rumors to California. I began to guess at Fred's intentions; but I rose quietly, took the letter from a desk, and handed it to him.

“I have made all my arrangements,” he went on, just glancing at it, “to go out to California by the next steamer. I shall join Forsyth. I have no doubt he can put me in the way of establishing myself. I shall go in a week, unless”—here he came close to me, and looked steadily down into my eyes—“unless you ask me to stay, Margery.”

What was my duty? I could not tell. God forgive me if I judged wrongly. He had worn my love out, if indeed it had ever been worth calling love. It was dead utterly. It would be a relief to have him go—a blessed relief—if I could only creep away into some solitude, where the world would forget me, and find rest. Yet I was not without a conscience. If I had thought any reconciliation could be permanent, remembering my marriage-vows I would have said, stay. But I was so weary of such trials! They had been made so often and so vainly! What was the use, I thought, of going through a new mockery of forgiveness and promises, and those miserable scenes after all? So I just said—and I know my voice was cold, for I felt as if I was turning to stone—

“I shall neither say go nor stay. To talk of any influence of mine over you is an absurdity. Do as you choose.”

He put his hand on my shoulder, and, bending down a little, looked into my eyes with a curious expression; hardly tender, yet certainly not harsh; expectant, perhaps. I wondered if he thought there was still any magnetism for me in his touch, any spell in his eyes. I did not speak.

“I wait, Margery, for your bidding. Remember you are deciding the whole future for us both.”

“Did you not understand me? I will take no such responsibility. If you go, you go. If you stay, you stay. I will have nothing to do with the matter.”

He looked at me for a moment without speaking. He seemed studying my face. I think he read there a resolve sterner than his own. He drew a long breath at last, and announced his determination.

“I go, Margery. I shall trouble you no more. See to it that you can quiet your conscience as easily in the days when our vows and the way we have kept them are brought up before us in judgment as you can quiet my voice now.”

I was silent. I might have upbraided him with his own offenses against our mutual compact; but I said nothing, and I thought my silence magnanimous. And yet a few words, even of reproach, would have kept him; for a softened heart looked out of his lingering eyes. A few words then might have saved us perhaps from so much that came after, and I did not speak them. Was it fate?

When he had gone out of the room, and I knew the matter was all settled, I felt no regret. I think I had suffered so much that it made me torpid. I felt like a frozen creature, with only one emotion—a blind, vague sense of relief that I should be put upon the rack no more, should hear no more bitter words, be subjected to no more upbraidings. I could go away—it was all I craved—and rest.

During the week that yet remained before he left I think a few words from me would at any time have changed all his plans. I think, now that he was about to leave me, his heart yearned over me with a sorrowful, longing tenderness. He was more passionate than I—in a certain sense more cruel—but he was at the same time more forgiving. Besides, his nature was not so hard—did not retain impressions as mine did. Our three years and over of perpetual, miserable bickering had not so worn into his soul as they had into mine. It would have been possible for him to forget—to me the very tenacity of my memory was a curse.

I did not then realize, however, that he was longing to stay, waiting and hoping for some small sign of concession from me. If I had, I think I should have yielded, out of duty, not love. But it was not till afterward that the truth came home to me—when I remembered the long looks that sought my face with a speechless entreaty, the slight errands into the room where I was sitting, the little cares for my comfort. All in vain. I responded to none of them. Silent and still, cold and impassive, as if frozen to stone, I sat through the long June days, with a bit of work in my fingers for a pretense, or some book which I never read.

At last—it was the day before he was to go—he spoke to me directly.

"I have spared you all the trouble I could, Margery; done as far as I could without consulting you; but it is necessary that you should tell me your wishes about some things. Will you stay here after I am gone? or would you prefer to go to your father's? I have invested money enough in your name to make you independent; so you can choose your own course."

It seemed to me then that I would have died before I would have remained after he went away in his house. I thought food bought with his money would choke me if I should be starving. I waited a moment till I could speak quietly.

"Thank you," I said, as I would have answered a stranger. "I shall not care to stay here. My plans for the future are all made. I should wish to get away from Kempton, and I shall go to my grandmother Hamilton. She will be glad of my company. I should prefer that you would withdraw the investments you mention. I shall never use them. The money my father settled on me at my marriage will suffice for all my necessities. I think it might be well to leave your attorney the care of letting this house, furnished. It would be an easy manner of disposing of it. I shall remove all my personal effects as soon as you are gone. While you staid I thought it but right to continue my superintendence of the housekeeping, that you might not be uncomfortable."

I looked back to my book for a sign that the conversation was ended, but still he stood there and looked at me.

"Who are you?" he cried, after a moment, in a raised, passionate tone. "You are not Margery Hamilton, the impulsive, thoughtless, gay Margery I loved and won—the Margery that used to love me!"

"No, I am not Margery Hamilton. There is a difference between her and Mrs. Hartright. You should know me, for I am what you have made me."

He went out, muttering between his teeth something which I did not hear.

The next day he went away. I think, at the very last, it took all his pride to sustain him, and make him go. After all, he was better than I—his heart was warmer and tenderer. I know my hand was cold when he touched it. My eyes looked stonily into his. I manifested no trace of emotion, because I felt none. The very fountains of my being seemed frozen up. Else, surely, the despairing tenderness that looked so wistfully out of his eyes would have moved me to some throb of pity. I think until the very last the hope had not quite failed him that I would relent, and ask him to stay. When he saw no softening in the cold resolve of my face he spoke his farewell.

"Good-by, Margery, wife. We shall never meet again, perhaps. May God forgive us both!"

"Amen!" I said, solemnly, for in that prayer at least my whole heart joined.

Then he went. The long, sad experiment was over. I was a wife, and yet no wife.

VOL. XXIX.—No. 169.—C

That was morning. Before noon every thing which I wished to remove was packed and sent to the railroad station. I did not go home. I did not know whether my family knew any thing of Fred's departure. They surely had heard nothing from me; and I could not have borne to see them just then. I thought it would be time enough after I was settled with my Grandmother Hamilton at Woodstock. I discharged my two servants, locked my house, and sent the key to my husband's man of business. Then I turned my back on Kempton.

It was sunset when I stood before my grandmother's door. I had not shed a single tear when I parted with the man whom I had vowed to love and cherish till death came between us—not one when I went out from that home to which I had gone, with such bright hopes, a bride; but when the door opened, and I saw my grandmother's kind face, with the look of surprise blending with her welcome, I remembered how helpless and lonely I was, and I burst into tears.

"Will you take me in?" I asked, amidst my sobs. "I have no other refuge."

She did not say a word. She just led me in silently and up stairs to a pleasant room. She untied my bonnet, took off my shawl, brushed my hair away from my face, and bathed my eyes very gently. Then, in the twilight, she sat down by me with her "Now, child!" and I knew she was ready for my story.

I kept back nothing. To her, at least, if she was to give me comfort and shelter, the whole truth was due. I told her the whole sad history. She held my hand in hers all the time, and when I was through she did not reproach me. She only said,

"Poor Margery! Poor Fred! How I pity you both! Perhaps your coldness was as much to blame as his passion. I think the most love was on his side. He could have gone on forever getting angry and making up; and never, perhaps, have loved you a whit the less. But you could not go on forgiving, and so the breach widened. Two natures that to all human judgment never ought to have come together. How often we see such things in this world! And yet, God knows. Some day we may see how it was all for the best."

"Do you think I ought to have said 'stay,' grandma?"

I asked this question longing yet fearing to know her verdict. She thought a while before she answered me.

"I can't say, child. As we grow older we form our opinions more cautiously; and there are some cases where it is hard to lay down the rule of right and wrong for another soul. I think he wanted you to ask him to stay; and that he would have staid if you had. But whether it would have been any better, whether there would have been any thing but the old, miserable scenes over again, a good deal more suffering, and then separation after all, I don't know. From the first I fear there was want of forbearance on your side, and want of love. It is too late to change any thing now, unless he should come back and ask you to live with him. If he should I should have no two minds about your duty. If we vow a vow unto the Lord we must keep it, even though it be to our hurt."

I shivered inwardly. I thought I had escaped from the fetters of my rash vow. I could not bear to feel that they had yet a possible hold on me. Perhaps grandmother read my thoughts. I did not express them. I only drew closer to her, and whispered, through the gathering night gloom,

"Will you keep me? May I stay with you?"

"Did you think I would ever send you away?"

And then, when her soft, kind arms took me into their shelter, I cried again for joy that my rest was won.

The next day I wrote to my father and mother, telling them only that Fred was gone to California, and begging them to come over to Woodstock for all farther explanations.

When they came grandmother saw them first. She yielded to my entreaties, and spared me the pain of telling my own story by telling it all in my stead.

When they saw me they were most kind. I had always been their darling, and I know their hearts yearned over me in my desolation. They urged me not a little to come home; but at last I made them understand how trying it would be for me in Kempton, among all the old scenes and the old faces, with my changed prospects and blighted life. I think my mother, with a woman's sensitiveness to public opinion, sympathized fully with my feelings. If my father did not, he at least ceased to oppose my determination. So my life with my grandmother began.

What a quiet life it was! For a year I never even went home. The only changes that came to me were the occasional visits of father, mother, brothers, and sisters; and they always came into my presence with hushed tread and carefully-modulated voices, as one approaches a person on whom a great sorrow has fallen.

I had received a letter soon after I came to Woodstock from my husband's attorney, telling me that, by Mr. Hartright's directions, the house I had vacated would not be let, but remain always ready for my occupancy. Also he informed me that he held property in trust for me to an amount which I knew covered more than half poor Fred's fortune.

This letter touched me profoundly. Fred had been so generous to me in spite of my coldness. Of course I should never occupy the house nor use the money, but it moved me to the heart to see what his care had been for me to the last.

After a year had passed my mother was taken suddenly ill. Then, for a few weeks, I went home, and came back again in mourning clothes, with a new sorrow, an added sense of desolation.

Through every thing no words can tell how tender and pitiful my grandmother was. I found rest and strength leaning on her great strong heart. For her sake I struggled for cheerfulness, and learned still to find some interest in life.

When Fred had been gone two years a letter came from Charley Forsyth, the cousin he had joined in California, to tell me of his death. They had been up into the Indian region, Charley, and Fred, and two others, on a business expedition. They had been attacked by a party of hostile Indians of more than twice their own number. For a while they tried to resist and defend their property; but being overpowered at length, Forsyth and one of his companions had escaped, leaving dead upon the field Fred and the other.

By the tone of the letter, the pity, the tender sympathy it breathed for me, I knew that Fred had kept our secrets, and that Charley never dreamed that his going to California had been brought about by any alienation from me.

He had been generous to the last, my poor Fred! He had loved me, and he was gone. Now, indeed, my heart smote me. Now I would have given worlds to have recalled the obstinacy of that last miserable week. Now if I could but have gone to his side and whispered, "Stay." But he would never wait again for word of mine. Those thirsty, far-off sands had drunk his blood. Savage eyes had glared into his dying face; no friend, not one, had whispered a prayer on which his parting soul could rise toward heaven. It was not love I felt for him even then, not the surging, passionate overflow of a woman's heart that I could have given him; but I was melted with a sorrow so intense, a pity so profound, that I would have laid down all the rest of my life only to have spoken one tender word which he could hear. Day and night, without sleep or rest, I mourned for him, sorrowed over the pitiable, irremediable past. Again I believed, as I had done once, that he loved me as no one would ever love me again; and I blamed the poor requital I had made him for all the pain there had been in our lives.

In this passion of self-reproachful sorrow my grandmother strove after a while to comfort me. She let me grieve unreprieved at first, for she knew that wild rush of misery must have its way. Then she tried to persuade me to see God's hand in all, to believe that He knew how it would be from the foundation of the world; that it was His will, and in some way, in the midst of sorrow and darkness, His work was going on, making our souls ready for the eternal morning. Perhaps Fred had drawn nearer to Him in loneliness and sorrow than he would ever have done in joy; and if human love and human help were far from him in his hour of peril the Divine arm had held him up.

How was it that, wise and tender as her words were, they sounded so hollow to my need, so empty to my longing? They seemed not to touch me. I listened in my dumb sorrow as one who heard not.

Of course my bereavement was generally known. The estrangement between me and my husband had never been made public. People had wondered at his going to California, young and prosperous as he was. They may have guessed, with Yankee shrewdness, that he was unhappy; but all certain knowledge of our affairs was confined to my own family. Every one sympathized with me, therefore, when the tidings of his death became known. Little thinking that I had never expected to see him again in this world, they pitied me for my great loss, and eyes and voices grew softer when I came among them.

I had been withdrawn from society before, and, except going regularly to church, I continued to seclude myself. My sorrow brought me but one new friend.

Six months before, Parson Wells, the good, kindly old man who had broken bread for forty years in the church at Woodstock, who had married the elders, baptized the children, and buried the dead, had suddenly, after many years of poor health and constant suffering, lost his voice, and his people had been reluctantly obliged to choose his successor. It was with their old minister's entire approbation that their choice fell on the Reverend Hugh Walden.

I went to hear him, for the first time, a little reluctantly. He was young I knew. Woodstock was his first parish. It seemed to me that after the teachings of Parson Wells, enriched by a lifetime of experience, this young man—who had never suffered, who only knew life by traditions gathered from books, not at all from grappling with its verities, standing face to face with the naked souls of men, in moments when the sense of eternity closing round them rent like a flimsy veil the disguises of mortality—could give us nothing to feel. Something to admire, perhaps; pretty sentiment, graceful imagery, a rose or two to gather, the whipped syllabub of the banquet, no more.

I was disappointed.

I can see him now as he rose that day in his pulpit—grand yet simple. His great forehead, with the thin brown hair scantily shading it; his eyes earnest with the depth of the soul looking through them; his mouth gentle and sweet as a child's. There was something in the cadence of his voice as he spoke which thrilled me as no oratory had ever done. He made no attempt at display, either in matter or manner; but there was an unconscious eloquence which carried his words home. I knew that I was in the presence of genius; that strange, subtle power which can dispense sometimes with experience, and reveal to its possessor depths of the heart which no commonplace knowledge of a lifetime could fathom. By virtue of his own capacity to feel—to enjoy and to suffer beyond the measure of most men—you knew instinctively that he could enter without profanation into the holiest of your sorrows.

And yet, feeling from the first his power to understand and to sympathize, I felt so keenly also my own anomalous situation, that I had held myself aloof from him, even as from others. When he had called I had never seen him. It was not until after the news of my husband's death that he made a visit expressly to me; and, my grandmother being out, I was obliged to receive him alone.

I descended to the parlor with no idea of confiding in him. I meant only to listen to his condolences, and endure them as best I could. I hardly know how it was that my self-command failed me. I believe I was drawn on partly by my sense of justice, partly by my need of pity. When he looked at me with such compassionate eyes, and seemed to feel so much for me because I could not have been with my husband at the last, as if that were almost the bitterest drop in my cup of woe, I felt that he was thinking better of me than I deserved; and I longed to have him know me as I was, and speak, not to the general requirements of a wife's sorrow, but to the particular needs of my own soul. So somehow, I hardly know how, I began at the very beginning, and told him all.

I did Fred justice. I told all that was noble and generous in his nature; all his tender care for me when he went away; but I kept back none of the misery of our life together. I poured out my whole soul, as the angels of resurrection may read it at the last—the wrong, the suffering, the remorse. Words can not tell the relief it was thus to anticipate the terror of Heaven's final sentence by submitting myself thus, with all my weary burden, to the judgment of a good man on earth.

"I can make no atonement," I said, fearfully, when all was told. "Dead is dead, and I can not undo the past. Is there any hope of pardon?"

How his voice fell on my ear—calm, firm, yet tender, and inexpressibly sweet.

"If our hopes depended on the atonement we ourselves could make, where should we all be? Thank Heaven that another has borne the burden of our transgressions. There is forgiveness for every soul which claims it, even the worst. You have been wrong indeed. A hasty, ill-advised marriage is a terrible misfortune; and yet marriage is marriage, all the same. The vow voluntarily assumed is binding. You should have been more patient, more gentle, more long-suffering; and surely, at the last, when he waited for your bidding, you should have told him to stay. But the error is past—the forgiveness is present. We shall learn in time to thank God even for sorrow and remorse when they make us feel our need of Him."

Hitherto all my grandmother's tender consolations had been powerless. They had fallen unheeded in the throbs of my dull heartache. But in Mr. Walden's words was an authority which carried them home. He talked to me for an hour, probing the innermost depths of my secret woe. And before he went I was able to pray with faith for forgiveness.

That interview had drawn us near to each other as months of common acquaintance could not have done. When soul had spoken to soul heart and mind could not be strangers.

There was a year and a half after that of calm, placid friendship between us. I was scarcely conscious how necessary he was growing to me. I never thought of the possibility of marrying again. My first marriage had been so hopeless, so miserable, had ended in such untold bitterness and desolation, that I forgot I was free, and only twenty-seven.

It almost frightened me when Mr. Walden asked me to be his wife. It was a day in early spring. Violets were opening their blue eyes in the clefts—birds were singing in the boughs—the tender green of bursting leaf and springing grass was every where. We went out to ramble a little while among the spring sights and sounds, and, walking by my side, he told me how unconsciously he had learned to love me. He had looked upon me at first as one consecrated and set apart from human ties by sorrow; but with his more intimate knowledge of me I had grown into his heart until he knew now that I held in my hands every hope of his life on earth. Could I love him? Could I stand beside him before God and give him my life?

Then, in that moment, my own soul's secret flashed suddenly into the light. This was love—this that I felt for him—this that I had never felt before. For me, even for me, the sun of life had not set. It was spring for me as well as for the year. After my long winter again would come song of birds, and blooming of flowers. I turned toward him and stretched out my hands. His grasp closed on them firm and fast. "God has given me my heart's desire," I heard him murmur—then, to me, with a half-jealous eagerness, "Are you sure, Margery? Is there no doubt, no misgiving? You know what love is not—are you certain you know what it is?"

Yes, I was sure. I told him so. At last I had learned the sweet secret—the passionate bliss, for which every human heart waits, and, if it comes not in this world, laments as for a lost birth-right.

How happy I was! What a day it was that day! Sitting here, thirty-five years old, and all alone, again its glory bathes earth and sky—its music, subtly sweet, throbs through the silence—its bliss makes my heart beat with the old, passionate pulses. I was too happy, perhaps. I wonder, sometimes, if to every life is apportioned only a certain measure of joy—a cup just so full—and, if we drain it all in a day or a year, we must thirst in vain forever after for the magic wine?

When the sun set Hugh went home with me. In the soft spring twilight he led me in front of the chair where my grandmother sat, with placid hands folded upon her lap, and the silver hair shining softly above her quiet brow.

"I have asked Margery to be mine, and she has promised. Have we done well?"

"Truly, my children, I believe Heaven made you for each other. May the God you both serve bless you and your love, and make smooth before you the paths of your life!"

We both bent before her as she rose and laid her dear, trembling hands on our heads; and her blessing made us feel as if our love was holy.

What a summer followed that night! We were not to be married till the autumn; for I insisted—I hardly knew why myself, though afterward I felt it was God's guidance—on waiting till Fred had been dead two years. Besides, my bliss, just as it was, satisfied me fully. I feared any change might mar its perfectness. Our betrothal was kept secret. I wanted to escape the curious comments of Hugh's parishioners. It seemed to me a bliss with which no stranger had any right to interfere. I do not know whether any one commented on our being so much together. No one, surely, had any right to complain, for he neglected no other duties for my sake. It was only when his day's work was over that he came to me, and we tasted the delights of full confidence, love unquestioned and unquestioning. I found again the youth that had left me at twenty. I was joyous enough to sing with the summer birds. I saw bluer skies, brighter stars, a fairer earth.

So the summer went by us with flying feet, and the autumn came.

One autumn night my lover, soon to be my husband, bade me good-by. He held me in his arms a moment and left some long, fond kisses on my lips which fearlessly kissed him back again, for our wedding-day was nigh.

We had been sitting at the door together, and after he was gone I sat there still, watching moon and stars, and thinking how happy I was. The door behind me was open into the sitting-room, where my grandmother was alone through the twilight. All had been still so long that I started when I heard the sound of her aged, tremulous voice,

"In the midst of life we are in death."

I knew she said the words to herself, musing among the shadows on the night to which she was drawing nigh, and without any thought of me. Still they struck me with a sudden chill—a sort of presentiment of coming doom. For the first time I remembered that I held my happiness by a frail thread after all. An accident, a step off the river's brink in the darkness, a stroke of summer lightning, a few days of fever—how easily could my world be made a blank! Gone was the glory of the night. A cold wind seemed to rise from the grave-yard, whose white stones I could see gleaming in the moonlight a quarter of a mile away and blow toward me mockingly—menace and defiance in its breath. I rose with a shudder and went in, closing the door behind me.

Soon I went to bed, and still I seemed to hear that long, defiant blast, blowing up from the rest of the dead, keening outside. It lulled me into a strange, unquiet slumber, visited by troublous dreams, but from which I did not awake till morning.

All that forenoon I moved about as one under a baleful spell. I scented trouble in the air. I knew some sharp, sudden stroke was coming. But all the forenoon the house was still. Not even a neighbor broke our solitude. When dinner was over my grandmother went to her own room, as was her custom, for a little rest. She did not hear, therefore, when a visitor came to the door and asked for me.

I went trembling into the parlor, where he had been shown, and found there Charley Forsyth. I knew him at once, though I had not seen him since I was fifteen, and despite the bronzed face and heavy, slightly grizzled beard. I went up to him and called him by his name.

"So you know me," he said, as if surprised and pleased at my recognition. "I thought I should have to tell you who I was. I have come to bring you strange tidings. Can you bear them—listen to them calmly?"

I knew then what he had come to say as well as I knew when all his story had been told. I shivered with sudden cold. I shook in every limb; but I shut my hands tightly on the arms of the chair in which I was sitting. I would keep still; I would hear all calmly. I would not weep or cry out. I could not speak, but I motioned to him to go on.

"I have misled you most cruelly," he began, "but most unintentionally. When I escaped from the Indians I believed that I left Frederick Hartright dead upon the field. It was to save my own life that I fled without burying him; but I thought he was past all human help. I believed this until three months ago. In a journey over the mountains I came upon him face to face. I had heard him speaking, and knew his voice before I saw him. But for that I might not have recognized him perhaps, he was so terribly changed. There was scarcely a vestige of his old self about him. I spoke to him, and he could not deny his identity. He had escaped in some mysterious way from the jaws of death; he said it was by no wish or effort of his own. Since then, knowing that I thought him dead, he had lived in solitary places, and tried to avoid every chance of our meeting. When I asked why he had chosen to be dead to all the world I could win no reply from him except that so far he had always been a curse to every one he loved, and he thought the kindest thing he could do would be to keep out of the way, and darken no one's sunshine. This is the sole confidence he ever bestowed on me. I do not know whether you and he are alienated: I could only guess it from his resolution to pass for dead and keep himself out of sight. I had meant to come home before—I wanted to see father and mother once more before they died—but this matter hurried me. I made my preparations as rapidly as I could, and here I am, to set all right, so far as I can, and atone, if possible, for misleading you so unwittingly two years ago. Cousin Margery, can you forgive me?"

"I do not see that you are to blame," I forced myself, out of justice, to say; but it came hard. What an awful calamity his unintentional misstatement had been to me! My tongue seemed to cleave to the roof of my mouth, and it was only by a painful effort I could articulate. I got up and took a glass of water from the table, and drank a swallow. Then I could speak better.

"You have been kind, Cousin Charles," I said: "will you be yet kinder? Does any one know you have been here?"

"No one. Fred told me you were in Woodstock, and I came here without going to Kempton. You are the first person who has recognized me since I set foot in Connecticut. I must be off for Vermont as soon as I can, and see if they'll know me there. My heart is hungry for a sight of the old homestead, and the old faces."

"Will you go, then, without seeing any one here, even my father? When you have made your visit at home come back and see us all. I can bear better by-and-by to have all this talked over. Just now I want a little time to realize it myself, and know where I stand."

So he went, and all the dreary afternoon I sat and waited. I did not make any plans, or think at all what I was going to do. My powers seemed all paralyzed by the suddenness of the blow. I only sat silent, and thought over and over again one terrible thought: it would be a sin to love Hugh any more; my dream was over. A few times my grandmother, who had come down soon after Cousin Charles went away, spoke to me; but finding me disinclined to talk, as her way was, she let me alone.

Just at night, when I knew it was time for Hugh to come, I went out and walked a little way along the path to meet him. Soon I heard his quick, glad footstep; saw his face wearing the eager, loving brightness of meeting. Slowly I went forward. He took my hands and bent to kiss me. I turned my face away, and said—I suppose my tones sounded husky and strange—

"You must never do that again, Hugh; never in all the world!"

"Never kiss you again, Margery! and you, in three weeks more, to be my wife! Are you mad, my darling?"

"No, I am not mad," I said, drearily; "I wish I were."

Then I told him all the truth.

When I was done he looked into my eyes.

"Margery," he said, "I believe Heaven meant us for each other. Your grandmother said so once, and she is a good woman. Do you think I can give you up? That man does not seek or claim you. He has been away from you four years and over. You can get a divorce easily enough; and we will outlive this storm, and be happy yet."

How his face glowed—how his eyes claimed me with loving looks which thrilled down to the core of my poor, quivering heart! Had I got to do all? Must all the courage, the renunciation, the resolve, be on my side—and I so crushed, so weak?

"Have I not heard you say," I asked, "that divorces were wicked? Were they wrong for others, and right for you and me?"

His face grew pale. He looked at me helplessly—almost hopelessly.

"I don't know, Margery. I have said divorces, save for the one cause God's law mentions, were a sin. But I may have judged wrongly. It seems to me now that I did. I can not think any other wrong so great as for a man and a woman voluntarily to give up the pure joy which is every soul's birth-right—blight their lives—their power of being good or happy. God help me, Margery! I don't know where I am."

"Go home," I said; "go now, and ask Heaven for counsel. Come to me in the morning, and tell me what to do. Remember, if you are my lover, you are also my minister—God's messenger; and that you will have to answer before Him for the way you guide any soul which lays its life in your hands."

Without another word he turned away. I listened to his footsteps going slowly and sadly back over the path along which they had come with such eager joy. Then I went in, and kneeling by my grandmother's side I told her my story. When I had told all, I said, "Grandmother, must I give up Hugh? What is right?"

"For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth."

Solemnly through the twilight shadows fell her voice, saying slowly those words from the book which to her was sole authority in all vexed questions, all doubtful issues. I was answered. I only sobbed, half unconsciously, from the depths of my desolation,

"It is so hard!"

And then I felt on my forehead the touch of her quivering lips, and as she drew me close into her pitying arms she whispered,

"It is the Lord's doing, and He doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men."

With the morning came Hugh. When I saw his pale, resolved face I knew what that night's vigil had taught him. I told him the question I had asked grandmother, and the words of authority in which she had answered. He looked at me with eyes full of an unfathomable misery.

"She is right, Margery. Since Frederick Hartright lives he is your husband. I have no right to urge you to set aside your marriage vow. I will never dare again to say what is wrong for another; but for us, let us choose the safe side. Better to be parted here than to buy this world's happiness with the sacrifice of God's peace."

How could I describe our parting—we who had so nearly been made one flesh? What last words we spoke; what hopes shone, star-like, through our darkness—hopes of a better country, even a heavenly, where the broken threads of this imperfect life shall be woven again into brightness; and, through it all, how he upheld me, strengthened my soul for the conflict—it is all written upon my heart, where only the pitying eyes of the merciful Father can ever read. Let me pass briefly over the agony of that hour.

In two weeks Hugh had resigned his parish and left Woodstock. His reasons no one knew; but, reluctant as were his people to part with him, they found his resolution unalterable.

He went, and even I knew nothing of his destination. We felt it right to separate utterly, to bridge the gulf between us with no knowledge. I never expected to hear from him again. I knew I should not die. I expected to live, and I knew my one duty was to forget. For him, he had his work in life, and I believed he would do it. He might live till he was old and gray. I had faith that he would live well; and I believed that I should know him, despite all the scars and changes of his life, when we should meet in the far "Silent Land—the boundless regions of all perfection."

I was unutterably thankful when he was gone. It seemed to me that I could not have borne my fate if he had staid where I must see him, hear his voice, breathe the same air. He being gone, there was more hope. I could bury the two years I had known him in my heart; and in time kind Heaven might lend me aid to set a watch upon memory, and roll a stone to the door of my sepulchre.

Charley Forsyth did not come back. Some business call hurried him away to California, and no one in Woodstock, save my grandmother, knew the secret he had told me—knew that my husband was alive in this world.

On Christmas there came to me a letter. Eight years ago that day I had spoken my bridal vows. It was a strange coincidence which brought me that letter on this very day. I knew the moment I looked at the cover that it was from Fred. My heart beat suffocatingly. My hand trembled so I could hardly break the seal; but somehow I had strength to read its contents. It almost broke my heart, it was so touching, so penitent. I had been as much to blame in the past as he, but he took all the blame to himself. He told me how well he had loved me, and how hard he had tried, for the sake of my peace, to live away from me. He had been silent, he said, until it seemed to him the burden of his misery was greater than he could bear. Perhaps he should still have kept silence, for my sake, if he had not known that I would hear from Forsyth that he was alive. He was hungry and thirsty for my love; it was the only hope earth held for him. Still, until he heard from me he would not come. He knew that for two years I had thought him dead; perhaps, so thinking, I had formed some new tie. If so, I need not write to tell him. Not hearing from me, he would know his fate, and bear it in silence. But if I was still his wife—if I could give him any hope—write, and he would come to try and make what amends he could for the errors of years ago.

How doubly thankful I was when I had read that letter that Hugh was gone—that Charley Forsyth had saved me from the sin I had been so near unconsciously committing. A love entered into my soul for Fred, deep and tender beyond words; not such a love as I could have given Hugh Walden, but a tenderness pure and passionless, heightened by remorse, intensified by pity. I wrote him only these words:

"Eight years ago to-day I became your wife. I am your wife still. Come."

When I showed my grandmother his letter and my answer she looked at me with tears in her kind eyes as she said,

"You have done right, child. That is your work in life. God will help and strengthen you to make Fred happy."

With the spring he came. His wounds and exposures, his desolate, uncared-for life, had told on him fearfully. His face retained few traces of its once fascinating charm. A worn, prematurely old man he came back to me, and I gave him welcome. I had resolved, in the strength of God, that no coldness of mine should ever chill him: he should never be disappointed in me. Whatever pain my life held I would bear alone; and the remnant of his years I would make happy.

There was something strangely touching in the change which had been wrought in him. The passionate temper, the haughty, indomitable will, where were they? Sometimes I longed to see him assert himself with a little of the old domineering sway; but it never came. When I expressed my desire to continue to live with grandmother he made no objection, but sold the house in Kempton, which had remained unoccupied ever since he went away.

And so we lived on together quietly for two years, we three. I think I did make Fred's life happy. I do not think he missed anything from my love. Do you ask if my own lot was wretched? I think nothing but willful sin can utterly darken my life. There was one fountain in my nature, the purest and sweetest perhaps, sealed up. Never more would its bright waters leap and sparkle in the sunshine. But there was much left to enjoy. It is impossible to be quite miserable while one works unselfishly for others. My grandmother was growing feeble, and I found occupation enough in nursing her and attending to Fred. I had no time for profitless musings.

There came a night at last when I was summoned by a sharp, sudden cry of pain. It broke through the stillness of my first slumbers, and I sprang up and hurried to my grandmother's bedside. I saw at once that she was very ill, and dispatched Fred for a physician. A few days followed of intense suffering, borne with saintly patience. Just at the last she was a little easier. I sat by her side, and she beckoned me to place my ear to her lips. Faintly she whispered,

"You have done right. Be good to Fred, and God will be good to you."

Those were her last words, her benediction, her farewell. The long-suffering soul was at peace. The willing hands would do no more work for God or man. The kindly heart had throbbled with its last impulse of human charity. She could rest now.

I think Fred mourned for her almost as sincerely as I did. At any rate he sympathized most tenderly with my sorrow.

I redoubled my devotion to him, now that I had no one else to care for. And there was need of it; for month by month I saw that he was wasting away. His desolate years had done their slow, sure work. Oh, with what bitter pangs of remorse I watched him! How gladly I would have laid down my life to save his! I never could forget that I had refused to ask him to stay when he had waited for my bidding, and I knew how much that obstinacy had cost us both. Sometimes, at his expressions of affection, I felt such a torturing sense of unworthiness as I could hardly bear. Through all he had been faithful to me—had loved me entirely. Sometimes it seemed to me that the only ease for my heart must be to pour it out at his feet—as if I must tell him all that I had felt or die. Then it seemed to me that would be but another form of selfishness. To tell him that I had loved another would be to put it out of my power to make him happy. For the sake of easing my own heart I had no right to lay its burden on him. The least I could do was to leave him the happiness of believing in my love.

Thank Heaven he did believe in it, and so I was able to comfort him to the last. All through the months of his slow decline I watched by his side. It was pitiful to see how he clung to me. It seemed to be the one agony, which nothing could soothe away, that he must leave me. Looking into my face with those great, mournful eyes, full of unutterable meaning, he would break the silence with his longing cry:

"Oh, if you could only go with me, Margery! How shall I live again without you? I have known what that is."

I tried to lead him to the higher love that could never fail him; but still he clung to me until the very last hour of his life. Did he see in that final hour some strange, soul-subduing glimpse of the heavenly glory? Who can tell? I only know that with a new light breaking sea-like and radiant into his eyes he cried:

"Margery, I am going from you to Him. His love is tender, and in His presence is fullness of joy. Margery, wife, darling, His hands are outstretched—I have no fear. Kiss me now. Let me carry your kiss where I am going."

I bent over him, and pressed my lips to his in a passion of love and woe. Just then how dear he was! It seemed to me I could not give him up. I would have held him back from death in my arms, or died for him. But God took him. Even then, with my kiss thrilling on his lips, my arms clinging to him, his soul went out—into the infinite spaces.

A strange peace came to me as he lay there dead. I felt as certain as of my own existence that he knew all now—held the secret I had kept from him for his own sake only, and had forgiven me. The smile, that last sweetest smile of all, frozen upon his dead lips, calmed me and comforted me, almost as if I had heard him speak my pardon. And indeed, if he could read my heart now, he must have known with what late tenderness it was swelling. He was my husband. He had loved me well and faithfully, and he was dead. Did not every claim he had upon my love assert itself? Did I fail to remember his generosity when he left me—his changeless constancy through all those years of separation, his patient tenderness since?

On his grave I planted roses and violets. To me it was a shrine. I went there for my holiest communings with the world where he was.

Six months after he left me there came a packet directed in an unfamiliar hand. It was postmarked at a Western city. I broke it open, and saw a letter directed to me in Hugh Walden's writing, and with it a notice of his death, and a few lines in the stranger hand telling me how he died. In his ministrations among the sick he had taken a malignant fever, and in three days after first sending for a physician was dead. The inclosed letter had been found among his papers, with a request that it should be sent to me. A few more lines there were—a tribute to his usefulness and self-sacrificing devotion, a lament for his loss.

Then I opened his letter. It was as if his soul spoke again to mine when I read it:

"Margery, I should not write you these words did I not know that your husband is dead, and that your hearing from me once more can give pain to no mortal. You have never heard from me in the long silent years which have fallen betwixt us; but I have found means to inform myself, from time to time, of your welfare. I know that you have done your duty in God's fear.

"When I heard that you were free, a fond sweet hope stole into my heart—Heaven forgive me if it was sin—of some day standing once more by your side, looking again into your eyes, hearing again your well-loved voice. I know the sad years have changed you. Your eyes would not be so bright; perhaps there is silver in your hair. I think you would not have been less beautiful to me if I had lived to come to you. But God knew best. I was doing His work when I breathed in this fever that is killing me. There is no hope. When I have finished this letter I shall send for a physician. I would not send for one before lest he should forbid these last words to you. But I know I shall never get well. I pray only for strength to write a few lines more.

"I am not sorry to be called home. God judges right. I dare not, if I could, choose even the joy of life with you before the blessedness of His rest. And yet, Margery, my heart clings to you. With this fever burning in my veins, swimming in my head, I can not say what I would. Only this, darling, in this hour of uttermost peril, when very soon my soul will stand before God, I know we did right. It is only a little life, this one of toil and waiting—the life comes after that will never end. Since I left you I have striven to do God's work among the sick and needy—His poor children. You have done it too, in your way; and now for me is the end, the rest—for you, waiting. But not for long, not long. Soon for you, too, will the light break over the eternal mountains. It grows dark—my sight is dim. Margery, my soul's Margery, good-by!"

The last lines were written in a cramped, irregular hand, as by one who could not see. Do you think I can tell you how I felt as I read them? Is there any language which translates heart-beats?

I recognized God's hand, and I was content that so that beloved life should end. In this world I could never see him again. Hand to hand, lip to lip, we should never meet more. I could not even go to his far-off grave. Yet was there left me the promise of his last words. For me, too, should break the dawn-light over the eternal mountains. A blessedness not of earth, and which the world could not take away, was in the thought that I had not sold my birth-right for a mess of pottage. I had yet a right to look upward.

They are both dead! One here, with the roses and violets on his grave, and tender tears to quicken them into beauty. The other far away, in a resting-place fashioned by stranger hands, where my steps can never go, or my tears fall. Both dead! and I sit among the shadows and wait for my morning; but my hope is sure.

MY SWORD SONG.

DAY in, day out, through the long campaign,
I march in my place in the ranks;
And whether it shine or whether it rain
My good sword cheerily clanks;
It clanks and clangs in a lordly way,
Like the ring of an armed heel:
And this is the song which day by day
It sings with its lips of steel:

"Oh, friend from whom, a hundred times,
I have felt the steadfast grip
Of the all-renouncing love that climbs
The heights of fellowship,
Are you tired with treading the weary miles,
Are you faint with your bleeding limbs?
Do you hunger back for the olden smiles,
And the sound of the olden hymns?

"Has your heart grown weak since the radiant hour
When you leaped with a single bound
From your dreamy ease to the sovereign power
Of a living soul world-crowned?
Behold! the aloes of sacrifice
Are better than any wine;
And the bloody sweat of a Cause like this Is an agony divine.

"Under the wail of the shuddering world,
Amoaning for its dead sons:
Over the bellowing thunders hurled
From the throats of wrathful guns;
Above the roar of the plunging line
That rocks with the fury of hell,
Runs the absolute voice—'O Earth of mine,
Be patient, for all is well!'"

Thus sings my sword to my soul; and I,
Albeit the way is long,
And black clouds thicken athwart the sky,
Still keep my spirit strong;
For whether I live, or whether I lie
On the red ground ghastly and stark,
Beyond the carnage I shall descry
God shining across the dark.

RICHARD REALE.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE FATE OF THE SMALL HOUSE.

THERE was something in the tone of Mrs. Dale's voice, as she desired her daughter to come up to the house, and declared that her budget of news should be opened there, which at once silenced Lily's assumed pleasantry. Her mother had been away fully two hours, during which Lily had still continued her walk round the garden, till at last she had become impatient for her mother's footstep. Something serious must have been said between her uncle and her mother during those long two hours. The interviews to which Mrs. Dale was occasionally summoned at the Great House did not usually exceed twenty minutes, and the upshot would be communicated to the girls in a turn or two round the garden; but in the present instance Mrs. Dale positively declined to speak till she was seated within the house.

"Did he come over on purpose to see you, mamma?"

"Yes, my dear, I believe so. He wished to see you, too; but I asked his permission to postpone that till after I had talked to you."

"To see me, mamma? About what?"

"To kiss you, and bid you love him; solely for that. He has not a word to say to you that will vex you."

"Then I will kiss him, and love him too."

"Yes, you will when I have told you all. I have promised him solemnly to give up all idea of going to Guestwick. So that is over."

"Oh, oh! And we may begin to unpack at once? What an episode in one's life!"

"We may certainly unpack, for I have pledged myself to him; and he is to go into Guestwick himself and arrange about the lodgings."

"Does Hopkins know it?"

"I should think not yet."

"Nor Mrs. Boyce! Mamma, I don't believe I shall be able to survive this next week. We shall look such fools! I'll tell you what we'll do—it will be the only comfort I can have—we'll go to work and get every thing back into its place before Bell comes home, so as to surprise her."

"What! in two days?"

"Why not? I'll make Hopkins come and help, and then he'll not be so bad. I'll begin at once and go to the blankets and beds, because I can undo them myself."

"But I haven't half told you all; and, indeed, I don't know how to make you understand what passed between us. He is very unhappy about Bernard. Bernard has determined to go abroad, and may be away for years."

"One can hardly blame a man for following up his profession."

"There was no blaming. He only said that it was very sad for him that, in his old age, he should be left alone. This was before there was any talk about our remaining. Indeed he seemed determined not to ask that again as a favor. I could see that in his eye, and I understood it from his tone. He went on to speak of you and Bell, saying how well he loved you both; but that, unfortunately, his hopes regarding you had not been fulfilled."

"Ah, but he shouldn't have had hopes of that sort."

"Listen, my dear, and I think that you will not feel angry with him. He said that he felt his house had never been pleasant to you. Then there followed words which I could not repeat, even if I could remember them. He said much about myself, regretting that the feeling between us had not been more kindly. 'But my heart,' he said, 'has ever been kinder than my words.' Then I got up from where I was seated, and going over to him, I told him that we would remain here."

"And what did he say?"

"I don't know what he said. I know that I was crying and that he kissed me. It was the first time in his life. I know that he was pleased—beyond measure pleased. After a while he became animated, and talked of doing ever so many things. He promised that very painting of which you spoke."

"Ah, yes, I know it; and Hopkins will be here with the pease before dinner-time to-morrow, and Dingles with his shoulders smothered with rabbits. And then Mrs. Boyce! Mamma, he didn't think of Mrs. Boyce; or, in very charity of heart, he would still have maintained his sadness."

"Then he did not think of her; for when I left him he was not at all sad. But I haven't told you half yet."

"Dear me, mamma; was there more than that?"

"And I've told it all wrong; for what I've got to tell now was said before a word was spoken about the house. He brought it in just after what he said about Bernard. He said that Bernard would, of course, be his heir."

"Of course he will."

"And that he should think it wrong to encumber the property with any charges for you girls."

"Mamma, did any one ever—"

"Stop, Lily, stop; and make your heart kinder toward him if you can."

"It is kind; only I hate to be told that I'm not to have a lot of money, as though I had ever shown a desire for it. I have never envied Bernard his man-servant, or his maid-servant, or his ox, or his ass, or any thing that is his. To tell the truth I didn't even wish it to be Bell's, because I knew well that there was somebody she would like a great deal better than ever she could like Bernard."

"I shall never get to the end of my story."

"Yes, you will, mamma, if you persevere."

"The long and short of it is this, that he has given Bell three thousand pounds, and has given you three thousand also."

"But why me, mamma?" said Lily, and the color of her cheeks became red as she spoke. There should if possible be nothing more said about John Eames; but whatever might or might not be the necessity of speaking, at any rate let there be no mistake. "But why me, mamma?"

"Because, as he explained to me, he thinks it right to do the same by each of you. The money is yours at this moment—to buy hairpins with, if you please. I had no idea that he could command so large a sum."

"Three thousand pounds! The last money he gave me was half a crown, and I thought that he was so stingy! I particularly wanted ten shillings. I should have liked it so much better now if he had given me a nice new five-pound note."

"You'd better tell him so."

"No; because then he'd give me that too. But with five pounds I should have the feeling that I might do what I liked with it; buy a dressing-case, and a thing for a squirrel to run round in. But nobody ever gives girls money like that so that they can enjoy it."

"Oh, Lily; you ungrateful child!"

"No, I deny it. I'm not ungrateful. I'm very grateful, because his heart was softened, and because he cried and kissed you. I'll be ever so good to him! But how I'm to thank him for giving me three thousand pounds I can not think. It's a sort of thing altogether beyond my line of life. It sounds like something that's to come to me in another world, but which I don't want quite yet. I am grateful, but with a misty, mazy sort of gratitude. Can you tell me how soon I shall have a new pair of Balmoral boots because of this money? If that were brought home to me I think it would enliven my gratitude."

The squire, as he rode back to Guestwick, fell again from that animation which Mrs. Dale had described into his natural sombre mood. He thought much of his past life, declaring to himself the truth of those words in which he had told his sister-in-law that his heart had ever been kinder than his words. But the world, and all those nearest to him in the world, had judged him always by his words rather than by his heart. They had taken the appearance, which he could not command or alter, rather than the facts, of which he had been the master. Had he not been good to all his relations?—and yet was there one among them that cared for him? "I'm almost sorry that they are going to stay," he said to himself; "I know that I shall disappoint them." Yet when he met Bell at the Manor-house he accosted her cheerily, telling her with much appearance of satisfaction that that flitting into Guestwick was not to be accomplished.

"I am so glad," said she. "It is long since I wished it."

"And I do not think your mother wishes it now."

"I am sure she does not. It was all a misunderstanding from the first. When some of us could not do all that you wished, we thought it better—" Then Bell paused, finding that she would get herself into a mess if she persevered.

"We will not say any more about it," said the squire. "The thing is over, and I am very glad that it should be so pleasantly settled. I was talking to Dr. Crofts yesterday."

"Were you, uncle?"

"Yes; and he is to come and stay with me the day before he is married. We have arranged it all. And we'll have the breakfast up at the Great House. Only you must fix the day. I should say some time in March. And, my dear, you'll want to make yourself fine; here's a little money for you. You are to spend that before your marriage, you know." Then he shambled away, and as soon as he was alone again became sad and despondent. He was a man for whom we may predicate some gentle sadness and continued despondency to the end of his life's chapter.

We left John Eames in the custody of Lady Julia, who had overtaken him in the act of erasing Lily's name from the railing which ran across the brook. He had been premeditating an escape home to his mother's house in Guestwick, and thence back to London, without making any further appearance at the Manor-house.

But as soon as he heard Lady Julia's step, and saw her figure close upon him, he knew that his retreat was cut off from him. So he allowed himself to be led away quietly up to the house. With Lady Julia herself he openly discussed the whole matter—telling her that his hopes were over, his happiness gone, and his heart half-broken. Though he would perhaps have cared but little for her congratulations in success, he could make himself more amenable to consolation and sympathy from her than from any other inmate in the earl's house. "I don't know what I shall say to your brother," he whispered to her, as they approached the side door at which she intended to enter.

"Will you let me break it to him? After that he will say a few words to you of course, but you need not be afraid of him."

"And Mr. Dale?" said Johnny. "Every body has heard about it. Every body will know what a fool I have made myself." She suggested that the earl should speak to the squire, assured him that nobody would think him at all foolish, and then left him to make his way up to his own bedroom. When there he found a letter from Cradell, which had been delivered in his absence; but the contents of that letter may best be deferred to the next chapter. They were not of a nature to give him comfort or to add to his sorrow.

About an hour before dinner there was a knock at his door, and the earl himself, when summoned, made his appearance in the room. He was dressed in his usual farming attire, having been caught by Lady Julia on his first approach to the house, and had come away direct to his young friend, after having been duly trained in what he ought to say by his kind-hearted sister. I am not, however, prepared to declare that he strictly followed his sister's teaching in all that he said upon the occasion.

"Well, my boy," he began, "so the young lady has been perverse."

"Yes, my lord. That is, I don't know about being perverse. It is all over."

"That's as may be, Johnny. As far as I know not half of them accept their lovers the first time of asking."

"I shall not ask her again."

"Oh yes, you will. You don't mean to say you are angry with her for refusing you?"

"Not in the least. I have no right to be angry. I am only angry with myself for being such a fool, Lord De Guest. I wish I had been dead before I came down here on this errand. Now I think of it, I know there are so many things which ought to have made me sure how it would be."

"I don't see that at all. You come down again—let me see—it's May now. Say you come when the shooting begins in September. If we can't get you leave of absence in any other way, we'll make old Buffle come too. Only, by George, I believe he'd shoot us all. But never mind; we'll manage that. You keep up your spirits till September, and then we'll fight the battle in another way. The squire shall get up a little party for the bride, and my lady Lily must go then. You shall meet her so; and then we'll shoot over the squire's land. We'll bring you together so; you see if we don't. Lord bless me! Refused once! My belief is, that in these days a girl thinks nothing of a man till she has refused him half a dozen times."

"I don't think Lily is at all like that."

"Look here, Johnny. I have not a word to say against Miss Lily. I like her very much, and think her one of the nicest girls I know. When she's your wife I'll love her dearly, if she'll let me. But she's made of the same stuff as other girls, and will act in the same way. Things have gone a little astray among you, and they won't right themselves all in a minute. She knows now what your feelings are, and she'll go on thinking of it, till at last you'll be in her thoughts more than that other fellow. Don't tell me about her becoming an old maid because at her time of life she has been so unfortunate as to come across a false-hearted man like that. It may take a little time; but if you'll carry on and not be down-hearted, you'll find it will all come right in the end. Every body doesn't get all that they want in a minute. How I shall quiz you about all this when you have been two or three years married!"

"I don't think I shall ever be able to ask her again; and I feel sure, if I do, that her answer will be the same. She told me in so many words; but never mind, I can not repeat her words."

"I don't want you to repeat them; nor yet to heed them beyond their worth. Lily Dale is a very pretty girl; clever, too, I believe, and good, I'm sure; but her words are not more sacred than those of other men or women. What she has said to you now she means, no doubt, but the minds of men and women are prone to change, especially when such changes are conducive to their own happiness."

"At any rate I'll never forget your kindness, Lord De Guest."

"And there is one other thing I want to say to you, Johnny. A man should never allow himself to be cast down by any thing—not outwardly, to the eyes of other men."

"But how is he to help it?"

"His pluck should prevent him. You were not afraid of a roaring bull, nor yet of that man when you thrashed him at the railway station. You've pluck enough of that kind. You must now show that you've that other kind of pluck. You know the story of the boy who would not cry though the wolf was gnawing him underneath his frock. Most of us have some wolf to gnaw us somewhere; but we are generally gnawed beneath our clothes, so that the world doesn't see, and it behooves us so to bear it that the world shall not suspect. The man who goes about declaring himself to be miserable will be not only miserable, but contemptible as well."

"But the wolf hasn't gnawed me beneath my clothes; every body knows it."

"Then let those who do know it learn that you are able to bear such wounds without outward complaint. I tell you fairly that I can not sympathize with a lackadaisical lover."

"I know that I have made myself ridiculous to every body. I wish I had never come here. I wish you had never seen me."

"Don't say that, my dear boy; but take my advice for what it is worth. And remember what it is that I say; with your grief I do sympathize, but not with any outward expression of it;—not with melancholy looks, and a sad voice, and an unhappy gait. A man should always be able to drink his wine and seem to enjoy it. If he can't, he is so much less of a man than he would be otherwise—not so much more, as some people seem to think. Now get yourself dressed, my dear fellow, and come down to dinner as though nothing had happened to you."

As soon as the earl was gone John looked at his watch and saw that it still wanted some forty minutes to dinner. Fifteen minutes would suffice for him to dress, and therefore there was time sufficient for him to seat himself in his arm-chair and think over it all. He had for a moment been very angry when his friend had told him that he could not sympathize with a lackadaisical lover. It was an ill-natured word. He felt it to be so when he heard it, and so he continued to think during the whole of the half hour that he sat in that chair. But it probably did him more good than any word that the earl had ever spoken to him—or any other word that he could have used. "Lackadaisical! I'm not lackadaisical," he said to himself, jumping up from his chair, and instantly sitting down again. "I didn't say any thing to him. I didn't tell him. Why did he come to me?" And yet, though he endeavored to abuse Lord De Guest in his thoughts, he knew that Lord De Guest was right, and that he was wrong. He knew that he had been lackadaisical, and was ashamed of himself; and at once resolved that he would henceforth demean himself as though no calamity had happened to him. "I've a good mind to take him at his word, and drink wine till I'm drunk." Then he strove to get up his courage by a song,

If she be not fair for me,
What care I how—

"But I do care. What stuff it is a man writing poetry and putting into it such lies as that! Every body knows that he did care—that is, if he wasn't a heartless beast."

But nevertheless, when the time came for him to go down into the drawing-room he did make the effort which his friend had counseled, and walked into the room with less of that hang-dog look than the earl and Lady Julia had expected. They were both there, as was also the squire, and Bell followed him in less than a minute.

"You haven't seen Crofts to-day, John, have you?" said the earl.

"No; I haven't been any where his way!"

"His way! His ways are every way, I take it. I wanted him to come and dine, but he seemed to think it improper to eat two dinners in the same house two days running. Isn't that his theory, Miss Dale?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Lord De Guest. At any rate it isn't mine?"

So they went to their feast, and before his last chance was over John Eames found himself able to go through the pretense of enjoying his roast mutton.

There can, I think, be no doubt that in all such calamities as that which he was now suffering the agony of the misfortune is much increased by the conviction that the facts of the case are known to those round about the sufferer. A most warm-hearted and intensely-feeling young gentleman might, no doubt, eat an excellent dinner after being refused by the girl of his devotions, provided that he had reason to believe that none of those in whose company he ate it knew any thing of his rejection. But the same warm-hearted and intensely-feeling young gentleman would find it very difficult to go through the ceremony with any appearance of true appetite or gastronomic enjoyment, if he were aware that all his convives knew all the facts of his little misfortune. Generally, we may suppose, a man in such condition goes to his club for his dinner, or seeks consolation in the shades of some adjacent Richmond or Hampton Court. There he meditates on his condition in silence, and does ultimately enjoy his little plate of whitebait, his cutlet, and his moderate pint of sherry. He probably goes alone to the theatre, and in his stall speculates with a somewhat bitter sarcasm on the vanity of the world. Then he returns home, sad indeed, but with a moderated sadness, and as he puffs out the smoke of his cigar at the open window—with perhaps the comfort of a little brandy-and-water at his elbow—swears to himself that, "By Jove, he'll have another try for it." Alone, a man may console himself, or among a crowd of unconscious mortals; but it must be admitted that the position of John Eames was severe. He had been invited down there to woo Lily Dale, and the squire and Bell had been asked to be present at the wooing. Had it all gone well nothing could have been nicer. He would have been the hero of the hour, and every body would have sung for him his song of triumph. But every thing had not gone well, and he found it very difficult to carry himself otherwise than lackadaisically. On the whole, however, his effort was such that the earl gave him credit for his demeanor, and told him when parting with him for the night that he was a fine fellow, and that every thing should go right with him yet.

"And you mustn't be angry with me for speaking harshly to you," he said.

"I wasn't a bit angry."

"Yes, you were; and I rather meant that you should be. But you mustn't go away in dudgeon."

He staid at the Manor-house one day longer, and then he returned to his room at the Income-tax Office, to the disagreeable sound of Sir Raffle's little bell, and the much more disagreeable sound of Sir Raffle's big voice.

CHAPTER LIX.

JOHN EAMES BECOMES A MAN.

EAMES, when he was half-way up to London in the railway carriage, took out from his pocket a letter and read it. During the former portion of his journey he had been thinking of other things; but gradually he had resolved that it would be better for him not to think more of those other things for the present, and therefore he had recourse to his letter by way of dissipating his thoughts. It was from Cradell, and ran as follows:

"INCOME-TAX OFFICE, May —, 186—.

"MY DEAR JOHN,—I hope the tidings which I have to give you will not make you angry, and that you will not think I am untrue to the great friendship which I have for you because of that which I am now going to tell you. There is no man—[and the word man was underscored]—there is no man whose regard I value so highly as I do yours; and though I feel that you can have no just ground to be displeased with me after all that I have heard you say on many occasions, nevertheless in matters of the heart it is very hard for one person to understand the sentiments of another, and when the affections of a lady are concerned, I know that quarrels will sometimes arise."

Eames, when he had got so far as this, on the first perusal of the letter, knew well what was to follow. "Poor Caudle!" he said to himself; "he's hooked, and he'll never get himself off the hook again."

"But let that be as it may, the matter has now gone too far for any alteration to be made by me; nor would any mere earthly inducement suffice to change me. The claims of friendship are very strong, but those of love are paramount. Of course I know all that has passed between you and Amelia Roper. Much of this I had heard from you before, but the rest she has now told me with that pure-minded honesty which is the most remarkable feature in her character. She has confessed that at one time she felt attached to you, and that she was induced by your perseverance to allow you to regard her as your fancy. [Fancy-girl he probably conceived to be the vulgar English for the elegant term which he used.] But all that must be over between you now. Amelia has promised to be mine—[this also was underscored]—and mine I intend that she shall be. That you may find in the kind smiles of L. D. consolation for any disappointment which this may occasion you, is the ardent wish of your true friend,

"JOSEPH CRADELL.

"P.S.—Perhaps I had better tell you the whole. Mrs. Roper has been in some trouble about her house. She is a little in arrears with her rent, and some bills have not been paid. As she has explained that she has been brought into this by those dreadful Lupexes, I have consented to take the house into my own hands, and have given bills to one or two tradesmen for small amounts. Of course she will take them up, but it was the credit that was wanting. She will carry on the house, but I shall, in fact, be the proprietor. I suppose it will not suit you now to remain here, but don't you think I might make it comfortable enough for some of our fellows; say half a dozen, or so? That is Mrs. Roper's idea, and I certainly think it is not a bad one. Our first effort must be to get rid of the Lupexes. Miss Spruce goes next week. In the mean time we are all taking our meals up in our own rooms, so that there is nothing for the Lupexes to eat. But they don't seem to mind that, and still keep the sitting-room and best bedroom. We mean to lock them out after Tuesday, and send all their boxes to the public house."

Poor Cradell! Eames, as he threw himself back upon his seat and contemplated the depth of misfortune into which his friend had fallen, began to be almost in love with his own position. He himself was, no doubt, a very miserable fellow. There was only one thing in life worth living for, and that he could not get. He had been thinking for the last three days of throwing himself before a locomotive steam-engine, and was not quite sure that he would not do it yet; but, nevertheless, his place was a place among the gods as compared to that which poor Cradell had selected for himself. To be not only the husband of Amelia Roper, but to have been driven to take upon himself as his bride's fortune the whole of his future mother-in-law's debts! To find himself the owner of a very indifferent lodging-house—the owner as regarded all responsibility, though not the owner as regarded any possible profit! And then, above and almost worse than all the rest, to find himself saddled with the Lupexes in the beginning of his career! Poor Cradell indeed!

Eames had not taken his things away from the lodging-house before he left London, and therefore determined to drive to Burton Crescent immediately on his arrival, not with the intention of remaining there, even for a night, but that he might bid them farewell, speak his congratulations to Amelia, and arrange for his final settlement with Mrs. Roper. It should have been explained in the last chapter that the earl had told him before parting with him that his want of success with Lily would make no difference as regarded money. John had, of course, expostulated, saying that he did not want any thing, and would not, under his existing circumstances, accept any thing; but the earl was a man who knew how to have his own way, and in this matter did have it. Our friend, therefore, was a man of wealth when he returned to London, and could tell Mrs. Roper that he would send her a check for her little balance as soon as he reached his office.

He arrived in the middle of the day—not timing his return at all after the usual manner of Government clerks, who generally manage to reach the metropolis not more than half an hour before the moment at which they are bound to show themselves in their seats. But he had come back two days before he was due, and had run away from the country as though London in May to him were much pleasanter than the woods and fields. But neither had London nor the woods and fields any influence on his return. He had gone down that he might throw himself at the feet of Lily Dale—gone down, as he now confessed to himself, with hopes almost triumphant, and he had returned because Lily Dale would not have him at her feet. "I loved him—him, Crosbie—better than all the world besides. It is still the same. I still love him better than all the world." Those were the words which had driven him back to London; and having been sent away with such words as those, it was little matter to him whether he reached his office a day or two sooner or later. The little room in the city, even with the accompaniment of Sir Raffle's bell and Sir Raffle's voice, would now be more congenial to him than Lady Julia's drawing-room. He would therefore present himself to Sir Raffle on that very afternoon, and expel some interloper from his seat. But he would first call in Burton Crescent and say farewell to the Ropers.

The door was opened for him by the faithful Jemima. "Mr. Heames, Mr. Heames! ho dear, ho dear!" and the poor girl, who had always taken his side in the adventures of the lodging-house, raised her hands on high and lamented the fate which had separated her favorite from its fortunes. "I suppose you knows it all, Mister Johnny?" Mister Johnny said that he believed he did know it all, and asked for the mistress of the house. "Yes, sure enough, she's at home. She don't dare stir out much, 'cause of them Lupexes. Ain't this a pretty game? No dinner and no nothink! Them boxes is Miss Spruce's. She's agoing now, this minute. You'll find 'em all up stairs in the drawen-room." So up stairs into the drawing-room he went, and there he found the mother and daughter, and with them Miss Spruce, tightly packed up in her bonnet and shawl. "Don't, mother," Amelia was saying; "what's the good of going on in that way? If she chooses to go, let her go."

"But she's been with me now so many years," said Mrs. Roper, sobbing; "and I've always done every thing for her! Haven't I, now, Sally Spruce?" It struck Eames immediately that, though he had been an inmate in the house for two years, he had never before heard that maiden lady's Christian name. Miss Spruce was the first to see Eames as he entered the room. It is probable that Mrs. Roper's pathos might have produced some answering pathos on her part had she remained unobserved, but the sight of a young man brought her back to her usual state of quiescence. "I'm only an old woman," said she; "and here's Mr. Eames come back again."

"How d'ye do, Mrs. Roper? how d'ye do — Amelia? how d'ye do, Miss Spruce?" and he shook hands with them all.

"Oh, laws," said Mrs. Roper, "you have given me such a start!"

"Dear me, Mr. Eames; only think of your coming back in that way," said Amelia.

"Well, what way should I come back? You didn't hear me knock at the door, that's all. So Miss Spruce is really going to leave you?"

"Isn't it dreadful, Mr. Eames? Nineteen years we've been together—taking both houses together, Miss Spruce, we have, indeed." Miss Spruce at this point struggled very hard to convince John Eames that the period in question had in truth extended over only eighteen years, but Mrs. Roper was authoritative, and would not permit it. "It's nineteen years if it's a day.

No one ought to know dates if I don't, and there isn't one in the world understands her ways unless it's me. Haven't I been up to your bedroom every night, and with my own hand given you—" But she stopped herself, and was too good a woman to declare before a young man what had been the nature of her nightly ministrations to her guest.

"I don't think you'll be so comfortable any where else, Miss Spruce," said Eames.

"Comfortable! of course she won't," said Amelia. "But if I was mother I wouldn't have any more words about it."

"It isn't the money I'm thinking of, but the feeling of it," said Mrs. Roper. "The house will be so lonely like. I sha'n't know myself; that I sha'n't. And now that things are all settled so pleasantly, and that the Lupexes must go on Tuesday— I'll tell you what, Sally; I'll pay for the cab myself, and I'll start off to Dulwich by the omnibus to-morrow, and settle it all out of my own pocket. I will indeed. Come; there's the cab. Let me go down, and send him away."

"I'll do that," said Eames. "It's only sixpence off the stand," Mrs. Roper called to him as he left the room. But the cabman got a shilling, and John, as he returned, found Jemima, in the act of carrying Miss Spruce's boxes back to her room. "So much the better for poor Caudle," said he to himself. "As he has gone into the trade it's well that he should have somebody that will pay him."

Mrs. Roper followed Miss Spruce up the stairs and Johnny was left with Amelia. "He's written to you, I know," said she, with her face turned a little away from him. She was certainly very handsome, but there was a hard, cross, almost sullen look about her, which robbed her countenance of all its pleasantness. And yet she had no intention of being sullen with him.

"Yes," said John. "He has told me how it's all going to be."

"Well?" she said.

"Well?" said he.

"Is that all you've got to say?"

"I'll congratulate you, if you'll let me."

"Pshaw—congratulations! I hate such humbug. If you've no feelings about it, I'm sure that I've none. Indeed I don't know what's the good of feelings. They never did me any good. Are you engaged to marry L. D.?"

"No; I am not."

"And you've nothing else to say to me?"

"Nothing—except my hopes for your happiness. What else can I say? You are engaged to marry my friend Cradell, and I think it will be a happy match."

She turned away her face further from him, and the look of it became even more sullen. Could it be possible that at such a moment she still had a hope that he might come back to her?

"Good-by, Amelia," he said, putting out his hand to her.

"And this is to be the last of you in this house?"

"Well, I don't know about that. I'll come and call upon you, if you'll let me, when you're married."

"Yes," she said, "that there may be rows in the house, and noise, and jealousy—as there have been with that wicked woman up stairs. Not if I know it, you won't! John Eames, I wish I'd never seen you. I wish we might have both fallen dead when we first met. I didn't think ever to have cared for a man as I've cared for you. It's all trash and nonsense and foolery; I know that. It's all very well for young ladies as can sit in drawing-rooms all their lives, but when a woman has her way to make in the world it's all foolery. And such a hard way, too, to make as mine is!"

"But it won't be hard now."

"Won't it? But I think it will. I wish you would try it. Not that I'm going to complain. I never minded work, and as for company, I can put up with any body. The world's not to be all dancing and fiddling for the likes of me. I know that well enough. But—" and then she paused.

"What's the 'but' about, Amelia?"

"It's like you to ask me; isn't it?" To tell the truth he should not have asked her. "Never mind. I'm not going to have any words with you. If you've been a knave I've been a fool, and that's worse."

"But I don't think I have been a knave."

"I've been both," said the girl; "and both for nothing. After that you may go. I've told you what I am, and I'll leave you to name yourself. I didn't think it was in me to have been such a fool. It's that that frets me. Never mind, Sir; it's all over now, and I wish you good-by."

I do not think that there was the slightest reason why John should have again kissed her at parting, but he did so. She bore it, not struggling with him; but she took his caress with sullen endurance. "It'll be the last," she said. "Good-by, John Eames."

"Good-by, Amelia. Try to make him a good wife, and then you'll be happy." She turned up her nose at this, assuming a look of unutterable scorn. But she said nothing further, and then he left the room. At the parlor door he met Mrs. Roper, and had his parting words with her.

"I am so glad you came," said she. "It was just that word you said that made Miss Spruce stay. Her money is so ready, you know! And so you've had it all out with her about Cradell. She'll make him a good wife, she will indeed; much better than you've been giving her credit for."

"I don't doubt she'll be a very good wife."

"You see, Mr. Eames, it's all over now, and we understand each other; don't we? It made me very unhappy when she was setting her cap at you; it did indeed. She is my own daughter, and I couldn't go against her; could I? But I knew it wasn't in any way suiting. Laws, I know the difference. She's good enough for him any day of the week, Mr. Eames."

"That she is—Saturdays or Sundays," said Johnny, not knowing exactly what he ought to say.

"So she is; and if he does his duty by her she won't go astray in hers by him. And as for you, Mr. Eames, I'm sure I've always felt it an honor and a pleasure to have you in the house; and if ever you could use a good word in sending to me any of your young men, I'd do by them as a mother should; I would indeed. I know I've been to blame about those Lupexes, but haven't I suffered for it, Mr. Eames? And it was difficult to know at first; wasn't it? And as to you and Amelia, if you would send any of your young men to try, there couldn't be any thing more of that kind, could there? I know it hasn't all been just as it should have been; that is as regards you; but I should like to hear you say that you've found me honest before you went. I have tried to be honest, I have indeed."

Eames assured her that he was convinced of her honesty, and that he had never thought of impugning her character either in regard to those unfortunate people, the Lupexes, or in reference to other matters. "He did not think," he said, "that any young men would consult him as to their lodgings; but if he could be of any service to her, he would." Then he bade her good-by, and having bestowed half a sovereign on the faithful Jemima, he took a long farewell of Burton Crescent. Amelia had told him not to come and see her when she should be married, and he had resolved that he would take her at her word. So he walked off from the Crescent, not exactly shaking the dust from his feet, but resolving that he would know no more either of its dust or of its dirt. Dirt enough he had encountered there certainly, and he was now old enough to feel that the inmates of Mrs. Roper's house had not been those among whom a resting-place for his early years should judiciously have been sought. But he had come out of the fire comparatively unharmed, and I regret to say that he felt but little for the terrible scorplings to which his friend had been subjected and was about to subject himself. He was quite content to look at the matter exactly as it was looked at by Mrs. Roper. Amelia was good enough for Joseph Cradell—any day of the week. Poor Cradell, of whom in these pages after this notice no more will be heard! I can not but think that a hard measure of justice was meted out to him, in proportion to the extent of his sins. More weak and foolish than our friend and hero he had been, but not to my knowledge more wicked. But it is to the vain and foolish that the punishments fall; and to them they fall so thickly and constantly that the thinker is driven to think that vanity and folly are of all sins those which may be the least forgiven. As for Cradell I may declare that he did marry Amelia, that he did, with some pride, take the place of master of the house at the bottom of Mrs. Roper's table, and that he did make himself responsible for all Mrs. Roper's debts. Of his future fortunes there is not space to speak in these pages.

Going away from the Crescent, Eames had himself driven to his office, which he reached just as the men were leaving it, at four o'clock. Cradell was gone, so that he did not see him on that afternoon; but he had an opportunity of shaking hands with Mr. Love, who treated him with all the smiling courtesy due to an official big-wig—for a private secretary, if not absolutely a big-wig, is semi-big, and entitled to a certain amount of reverence—and he passed Mr. Kissing in the passage, hurrying along as usual with a huge book under his arm. Mr. Kissing, hurried as he was, stopped his shuffling feet; but Eames only looked at him, hardly honoring him with the acknowledgment of a nod of his head. Mr. Kissing, however, was not offended; he knew that the private secretary of the First Commissioner had been the guest of an earl; and what more than a nod could be expected from him? After that John made his way into the august presence of Sir Raffle, and found that great man putting on his shoes in the presence of FitzHoward. FitzHoward blushed; but the shoes had not been touched by him; as he took occasion afterward to inform John Eames.

Sir Raffle was all smiles and civility. "Delighted to see you back, Eames: am, upon my word; though I and FitzHoward have got on capitally in your absence; haven't we, FitzHoward?"

"Oh yes," drawled FitzHoward. "I haven't minded it for a time, just while Eames has been away."

"You're much too idle to keep at it, I know; but your bread will be buttered for you elsewhere, so it doesn't signify. My compliments to the duchess when you see her." Then FitzHoward went. "And how's my dear old friend?" asked Sir Raffle, as though of all men living Lord De Guest were the one for whom he had the strongest and the oldest love. And yet he must have known that John Eames knew as much about it as he did himself. But there are men who have the most lively gratification in calling lords and marquises their friends, though they know that nobody believes a word of what they say—even though they know how great is the odium they incur, and how lasting is the ridicule which their vanity produces. It is a gentle insanity which prevails in the outer courts of every aristocracy; and as it brings with itself considerable annoyance and but a lukewarm pleasure, it should not be treated with too keen a severity.

"And how's my dear old friend?" Eames assured him that his dear old friend was all right, that Lady Julia was all right, that the dear old place was all right. Sir Raffle now spoke as though the "dear old place" were quite well known to him. "Was the game doing pretty well? Was there a promise of birds?"

Sir Raffle's anxiety was quite intense, and expressed with almost familiar affection. "And, by-the-by, Eames, where are you living at present?"

"Well, I'm not settled. I'm at the Great Western Railway Hotel at this moment."

"Capital house, very; only it's expensive if you stay there the whole season." Johnny had no idea of remaining there beyond one night, but he said nothing as to this. "By-the-by, you might as well come and dine with us to-morrow. Lady Buffle is most anxious to know you. There'll be one or two with us. I did ask my friend Dumbello, but there's some nonsense going on in the House, and he thinks that he can't get away." Johnny was more gracious than Lord Dumbello, and accepted the invitation. "I wonder what Lady Buffle will be like?" he said to himself, as he walked away from the office.

He had turned into the Great Western Hotel, not as yet knowing where to look for a home; and there we will leave him, eating his solitary mutton-chop at one of those tables which are so comfortable to the eye, but which are so comfortless in reality. I speak not now with reference to the excellent establishment which has been named, but to the nature of such tables in general. A solitary mutton-chop in a hotel coffee-room is not a banquet to be envied by any god; and if the mutton-chop be converted into soup, fish, little dishes, big dishes, and the rest, the matter becomes worse and not better. What comfort are you to have, seated alone on that horse-hair chair, staring into the room and watching the waiters as they whisk about their towels? No one but an Englishman has ever yet thought of subjecting himself to such a position as that! But here we will leave John Eames, and in doing so I must be allowed to declare that only now, at this moment, has he entered on his manhood. Hitherto he has been a hobbledehoy—a calf, as it were, who had carried his calfishness later into life than is common with calves; but who did not, perhaps, on that account, give promise of making a worse ox than the rest of them. His life hitherto, as recorded in these pages, had afforded him no brilliant success—had hardly qualified him for the rôle of hero which he has been made to play. I feel that I have been in fault in giving such prominence to a hobbledehoy, and that I should have told my story better had I brought Mr. Crosbie more conspicuously forward on my canvas. He, at any rate, has gotten to himself a wife—as a hero always should do; whereas I must leave my poor friend Johnny without any matrimonial prospects.

It was thus that he thought of himself as he sat moping over his solitary table in the hotel coffee-room. He acknowledged to himself that he had not hitherto been a man; but at the same time he made some resolution which, I trust, may assist him in commencing his manhood from this date.

CHAPTER LX.

CONCLUSION.

It was early in June that Lily went up to her uncle at the Great House, pleading for Hopkins—pleading that to Hopkins might be restored all the privileges of head gardener at the Great House. There was some absurdity in this, seeing that he had never really relinquished his privileges; but the manner of the quarrel had been in this wise:

There was in those days, and had been for years, a vexed question between Hopkins and Jolliffe the bailiff on the matter of — stable manure. Hopkins had pretended to the right of taking what he required from the farm-yard, without asking leave of any one. Jolliffe in return had hinted that, if this were so, Hopkins would take it all. “But I can’t eat it,” Hopkins had said. Jolliffe merely grunted, signifying by the grunt, as Hopkins thought, that though a gardener couldn’t eat a mountain of manure fifty feet long and fifteen high—couldn’t eat it in the body—he might convert it into things edible for his own personal use. And so there had been a great feud. The unfortunate squire had of course been called on to arbitrate, and, having postponed his decision by every contrivance possible to him, had at last been driven by Jolliffe to declare that Hopkins should take nothing that was not assigned to him. Hopkins, when the decision was made known to him by his master, bit his old lips, and turned round upon his old heel, speechless. “You’ll find it’s so at all other places,” said the squire, apologetically. “Other places!” sneered Hopkins. Where would he find other gardeners like himself? It is hardly necessary to declare that from that moment he resolved that he would abide by no such order. Jolliffe on the next morning informed the squire that the order had been broken, and the squire fretted and fumed, wishing that Jolliffe were well buried under the mountain in question. “If they all is to do as they like,” said Jolliffe, “then nobody won’t care for nobody.” The squire understood that an order if given must be obeyed, and therefore, with many inner groanings of the spirit, resolved that war must be waged against Hopkins.

On the following morning he found the old man himself wheeling a huge barrow of manure round from the yard into the kitchen garden. Now, on ordinary occasions, Hopkins was not required to do with his own hands work of that description. He had a man under him who hewed wood and carried water and wheeled barrows—one man always, and often two. The squire knew when he saw him that he was sinning, and bade him stop upon his road.

“Hopkins,” he said, “why didn’t you ask for what you wanted, before you took it?” The old man put down the barrow on the ground, looked up in his master’s face, spat into his hands, and then again resumed his barrow. “Hopkins, that won’t do,” said the squire. “Stop where you are.”

“What won’t do?” said Hopkins, still holding the barrow from the ground, but not as yet progressing.

“Put it down, Hopkins,” and Hopkins did put it down. “Don’t you know that you are flatly disobeying my orders?”

“Squire, I’ve been here about this place going on nigh seventy years.”

“If you’ve been going on a hundred and seventy it wouldn’t do that there should be more than one master. I’m the master here, and I intend to be so to the end. Take that manure back into the yard.”

“Back into the yard?” said Hopkins, very slowly.

“Yes; back into the yard.”

“What—afore all their faces?”

Hopkins paused a moment, looking away from the squire, and shaking his head as though he had need of deep thought, but by the aid of deep thought had come at last to a right conclusion. Then he resumed the barrow, and putting himself almost into a trot, carried away his prize into the kitchen garden. At the pace which he went it would have been beyond the squire’s power to stop him, nor would Mr. Dale have wished to come to a personal encounter with his servant. But he called after the man in dire wrath that if he were not obeyed the disobedient servant should rue the consequences forever. Hopkins, equal to the occasion, shook his head as he trotted on, deposited his load at the foot of the cucumber frames, and then at once returning to his master, tendered to him the key of the green-house.

“Master,” said Hopkins, speaking as best he could with his scanty breath, “there it is—there’s the key; of course I don’t want no warning, and doesn’t care about my week’s wages. I’ll be out of the cottage afore night, and as for the work’us, I suppose they’ll let me in at once, if your honor’ll give ’em a line.”

Now as Hopkins was well known by the squire to be the owner of three or four hundred pounds, the hint about the work-house must be allowed to have been melodramatic.

“Don’t be a fool,” said the squire, almost gnashing his teeth.

“I know I’ve been a fool,” said Hopkins, “about that ’ere doong; my feelings has been too much for me. When a man’s feelings has been too much for him, he’d better just take himself off, and lie in the work’us till he dies.” And then he again tendered the key. But the squire did not take the key, and so Hopkins went on. “I s’pose I’d better just see to the lights and the like of that till you’ve suited yourself, Mr. Dale. It ’ud be a pity all them grapes should go off, and they, as you may say, all one as fit for the table. It’s a long way the best crop I ever see on ’em. I’ve been that careful with ’em that I haven’t had a natural night’s rest, not since February. There ain’t nobody about this place as understands grapes, nor yet any where nigh that could be got at. My lord's head man is very ignorant; but even if he knew ever so, of course he couldn't come here. I suppose I'd better keep the key till you're suited, Mr. Dale."

Then for a fortnight there was an interregnum in the gardens, terrible in the annals of Allington. Hopkins lived in his cottage indeed, and looked most sedulously after the grapes. In looking after the grapes, too, he took the green-houses under his care; but he would have nothing to do with the outer gardens, took no wages, returning the amount sent to him back to the squire, and insisted with every body that he had been dismissed. He went about with some terrible horticultural implement always in his hand, with which it was said that he intended to attack Jolliffe; but Jolliffe prudently kept out of his way.

As soon as it had been resolved by Mrs. Dale and Lily that the flitting from the Small House at Allington was not to be accomplished, Lily communicated the fact to Hopkins.

"Miss," said he, "when I said them few words to you and your mamma, I knew that you would listen to reason."

This was no more than Lily had expected; that Hopkins should claim the honor of having prevailed by his arguments was a matter of course.

"Yes," said Lily; "we've made up our minds to stay. Uncle wishes it."

"Wishes it! Laws, miss, it ain't only wishes. And we all wishes it. Why, now, look at the reason of the thing. Here's this here house—"

"But, Hopkins, it's decided. We're going to stay. What I want to know is this; can you come at once and help me to unpack?"

"What! this very evening, as is—"

"Yes, now; we want to have the things about again before they come back from Guestwick."

Hopkins scratched his head and hesitated, not wishing to yield to any proposition that could be considered as childish; but he gave way at last, feeling that the work itself was a good work. Mrs. Dale also assented, laughing at Lily for her folly as she did so, and in this way the things were unpacked very quickly, and the alliance between Lily and Hopkins became, for the time, very close. This work of unpacking and resettling was not yet over, when the battle of the manure broke out, and therefore it was that Hopkins, when his feelings had become altogether too much for him "about the doong," came at last to Lily, and laying down at her feet all the weight and all the glory of his sixty odd years of life, implored her to make matters straight for him. "It's been a killing me, miss, so it has, to see the way they've been a cutting that sparagus. It ain't cutting at all. It's just hocking it up—what is fit, and what isn't, altogether. And they've been a putting the plants in where I didn't mean 'em, though they know'd I didn't mean 'em. I've stood 'by, miss, and said never a word. I'd a died sooner. But,

Miss Lily, what my sufferings have been, 'cause of my feelings getting the better of me about that—you know, miss—nobody will ever tell; nobody—nobody—nobody." Then Hopkins turned away and wept.

"Uncle," said Lily, creeping close up against his chair, "I want to ask you a great favor."

"A great favor. Well, I don't think I shall refuse you any thing at present. It isn't to ask another earl to the house, is it?"

"Another earl!" said Lily.

"Yes; haven't you heard? Miss Bell has been here this morning, insisting that I should have over Lord De Guest and his sister for the marriage. It seems that there was some scheming between Bell and Lady Julia."

"Of course you'll ask them."

"Of course I must. I've no way out of it. It'll be all very well for Bell, who'll be off to Wales with her lover; but what am I to do with the earl and Lady Julia, when they're gone? Will you come and help me?"

In answer to this, Lily of course promised that she would come and help. "Indeed," said she, "I thought we were all asked up for the day. And now for my favor. Uncle, you must forgive poor Hopkins."

"Forgive a fiddlestick!" said the squire.

"No, but you must. You can't think how unhappy he is."

"How can I forgive a man who won't forgive me? He goes prowling about the place doing nothing; and he sends me back his wages, and he looks as though he were going to murder some one; and all because he wouldn't do as he was told. How am I to forgive such a man as that?"

"But, uncle, why not?"

"It would be his forgiving me. He knows very well that he may come back whenever he pleases; and, indeed, for the matter of that he has never gone away."

"But he is so very unhappy."

"What can I do to make him happier?"

"Just go down to his cottage and tell him that you forgive him."

"Then he'll argue with me."

"No; I don't think he will. He is too much down in the world for arguing now."

"Ah! you don't know him as I do. All the misfortunes in the world wouldn't stop that man's conceit. Of course I'll go if you ask me, but it seems to me that I'm made to knock under to every body. I hear a great deal about other people's feelings, but I don't know that mine are very much thought of." He was not altogether in a happy mood, and Lily almost regretted that she had persevered; but she did succeed in carrying him off across the garden to the cottage, and as they went together she promised him that she would think of him always—always. The scene with Hopkins can not be described now, as it would take too many of our few remaining pages. It resulted, I am afraid I must confess, in nothing more triumphant to the squire than a treaty of mutual forgiveness. Hopkins acknowledged with much self-reproach that his feelings had been too many for him ; but then, look at his provocation ! He could not keep his tongue from that matter, and certainly said as much in his own defense as he did in confession of his sins. The substantial triumph was altogether his, for nobody again ever dared to interfere with his operations in the farm-yard. He showed his submission to his master mainly by consenting to receive his wages for the two weeks which he had passed in idleness.

Owing to this little accident Lily was not so much oppressed by Hopkins as she had expected to be in that matter of their altered plans ; but this salvation did not extend to Mrs. Hearn, to Mrs. Crump, or, above all, to Mrs. Boyce. They, all of them, took an interest more or less strong in the Hopkins controversy ; but their interest in the occupation of the Small House was much stronger, and it was found useless to put Mrs. Hearn off with the gardener's persistent refusal of his wages, when she was big with inquiry whether the house was to be painted inside as well as out. " Ah," said she, " I think I'll go and look at lodgings at Guestwick myself, and pack up some of my beds." Lily made no answer to this, feeling that it was a part of that punishment which she had expected. " Dear, dear," said Mrs. Crump to the two girls ; " well, to be sure, we should a been lone without 'ee, and mayhap we might a got worse in your place ; but why did 'ee go and fasten up all your things in them big boxes just to unfasten 'em all again ?"

" We changed our minds, Mrs. Crump," said Bell, with some severity.

" Yees, I know ye changed your mindses. Well, it's all right for the loiks o' ye, no doubt ; but if we changes our mindses we hears of it."

" So, it seems, do we!" said Lily. " But never mind, Mrs. Crump. Do you send us our letters up early, and then we won't quarrel."

" Oh, letters ! Drat them for letters. I wish there weren't no sich things. There was a man here yesterday with his imperence. I don't know where he come from—down from Lun'on, I b'leeve : and this was wrong, and that was wrong, and every thing was wrong ; and then he said he'd have me discharged the sarvice."

" Dear me, Mrs. Crump ; that wouldn't do at all."

" Discharged the sarvice ! Tuppence farden a day ! So I told 'um to discharge hisself, and take all the old bundles and things away upon his shoulders. Letters indeed ! What business have they with post-missusses, if they can not pay 'em better nor tuppence farden a day ?" And in this way, under the shelter of Mrs. Crump's storm of wrath against the inspector who had visited her, Lily and Bell escaped much that would have fallen upon their own heads ; but Mrs. Boyce still remained. I may here add, in order that Mrs. Crump's history may be carried on to the farthest possible point, that she was not " discharged the sarvice," and that she still receives her twopence farthing a day from the Crown. " That's a bitter old lady," said the inspector to the man who was driving him. " Yes, Sir ; they all says the same about she. There ain't none of 'em get much change out of Mrs. Crump."

Bell and Lily went together also to Mrs. Boyce's. " If she makes herself very disagreeable I shall insist upon talking of your marriage," said Lily.

" I've not the slightest objection," said Bell ; " only I don't know what there can be to say about it. Marrying the doctor is such a very commonplace sort of thing."

" Not a bit more commonplace than marrying the parson," said Lily.

" Oh yes, it is. Parsons' marriages are often very grand affairs. They come in among county people. That's their luck in life. Doctors never do ; nor lawyers. I don't think lawyers ever get married in the country. They're supposed to do it up in London. But a country doctor's wedding is not a thing to be talked about much."

Mrs. Boyce probably agreed in this view of the matter, seeing that she did not choose the coming marriage as her first subject of conversation. As soon as the two girls were seated she flew away immediately to the house, and began to express her very great surprise—her surprise and her joy also—at the sudden change which had been made in their plans. " It is so much nicer, you know," said she, " that things should be pleasant among relatives."

" Things always have been tolerably pleasant with us," said Bell.

" Oh yes ; I'm sure of that. I've always said it was quite a pleasure to see you and your uncle together. And when we heard about your all having to leave—"

" But we didn't have to leave, Mrs. Boyce. We were going to leave because we thought mamma would be more comfortable in Guestwick ; and now we're not going to leave, because we've all 'changed our mindses,' as Mrs. Crump calls it."

" And is it true the house is going to be painted?" asked Mrs. Boyce.

" I believe it is true," said Lily.

" Inside and out?"

" It must be done some day," said Bell.

" Yes, to be sure ; but I must say it is generous of the squire. There's such a deal of wood-work about your house. I know I wish the ecclesiastical commissioners would paint ours ; but nobody ever does any thing for the clergy. I'm sure I'm delighted you're going to stay. As I said to Mr. Boyce, what should we ever have done without you ? I believe the squire had made up his mind that he would not let the place."

" I don't think he ever has let it."

" And if there was nobody in it, it would all go to rack and ruin ; wouldn't it ? Had your mamma to pay any thing for the lodgings she engaged at Guestwick ?"

" Upon my word I don't know. Bell can tell you better about that than I, as Dr. Crofts settled it. I suppose Dr. Crofts tells her every thing." And so the conversation was changed, and Mrs. Boyce was made to understand that whatever further mystery there might be, it would not be unraveled on that occasion.

It was settled that Dr. Crofts and Bell should be married about the middle of June, and the squire determined to give what grace he could to the ceremony by opening his own house on the occasion. Lord De Guest and Lady Julia were invited by special arrangement between her ladyship and Bell, as has been before explained. The colonel also with Lady Fanny came up from Torquay on the occasion, this being the first visit made by the colonel to his paternal roof for many years. Bernard did not accompany his father. He had not yet gone abroad, but there were circumstances which made him feel that he would not find himself comfortable at the wedding. The service was performed by Mr. Boyce, assisted, as the County Chronicle very fully remarked, by the Reverend John Joseph Jones, M.A., late of Jesus College, Cambridge, and curate of St. Peter's, Northgate, Guestwick; the fault of which little advertisement was this, that as none of the readers of the paper had patience to get beyond the Reverend John Joseph Jones, the fact of Bell's marriage with Dr. Crofts was not disseminated as widely as might have been wished.

The marriage went off very nicely. The squire was upon his very best behavior, and welcomed his guests as though he really enjoyed their presence there in his halls. Hopkins, who was quite aware that he had been triumphant, decorated the old rooms with mingled flowers and greenery with an assiduous care which pleased the two girls mightily. And during this work of wreathing and decking there was one little morsel of feeling displayed which may as well be told in these last lines. Lily had been encouraging the old man while Bell for a moment had been absent.

"I wish it had been for thee, my darling!" he said; "I wish it had been for thee!"

"It is much better as it is, Hopkins," she answered, solemnly.

"Not with him, though," he went on, "not with him. I wouldn't a hung a bough for him. But with t'other one."

Lily said no word further. She knew that the man was expressing the wishes of all around her. She said no word further, and then Bell returned to them.

But no one at the wedding was so gay as Lily—so gay, so bright, and so wedding-like. She flirted with the old earl till he declared that he would marry her himself. No one seeing her that evening, and knowing nothing of her immediate history, would have imagined that she herself had been cruelly jilted some six or eight months ago. And those who did know her could not imagine that what she then suffered had hit her so hard that no recovery seemed possible for her. But though no recovery, as she herself believed, was possible for her—though she was as a man whose right arm had been taken from him in the battle, still all the world had not gone with that right arm. The bullet which had maimed her sorely had not touched her life, and she scorned to go about the world complaining either by word or look of the injury she had received. "Wives when they have lost their husbands still eat and laugh," she said to herself, "and he is not dead like that." So she resolved that she would be happy, and I here declare that she not only seemed to carry out her resolution, but that she did carry it out in very truth. "You're a dear good man, and I know you'll be good to her," she said to Crofts just as he was about to start with his bride.

"I'll try, at any rate," he answered.

"And I shall expect you to be good to me too. Remember you have married the whole family; and, Sir, you mustn't believe a word of what that bad man says in his novels about mothers-in-law. He has done a great deal of harm, and shut half the ladies in England out of their daughters' houses."

"He sha'n't shut Mrs. Dale out of mine."

"Remember he doesn't. Now, good-by!" So the bride and bridegroom went off, and Lily was left to flirt with Lord De Guest.

Of whom else is it necessary that a word or two should be said before I allow the weary pen to fall from my hand? The squire, after much inward struggling on the subject, had acknowledged to himself that his sister-in-law had not received from him that kindness which she had deserved. He had acknowledged this, purporting to do his best to amend his past errors; and I think I may say that his efforts in that line would not be received ungraciously by Mrs. Dale. I am inclined therefore to think that life at Allington, both at the Great House and at the Small, would soon become pleasanter than it used to be in former days. Lily soon got the Balmoral boots, or, at least, soon learned that the power of getting them as she pleased had devolved upon her from her uncle's gift; so that she talked even of buying the squirrel's cage; but I am not aware that her extravagance led her as far as that.

Lord De Courcy was left suffering dreadfully from gout and ill-temper at Courcy Castle. Yes, indeed! To him in his latter days life did not seem to offer much that was comfortable. His wife had now gone from him, and declared positively to her son-in-law that no earthly consideration should ever induce her to go back again;—"not if I were to starve!" she said. By which she intended to signify that she would be firm in her resolve, even though she should thereby lose her carriage and horses. Poor Mr. Gazebee went down to Courcy, and had a dreadful interview with the earl; but matters were at last arranged, and her ladyship remained at Baden-Baden in a state of semi-starvation. That is to say, she had but one horse to her carriage.

As regards Crosbie, I am inclined to believe that he did again recover his power at his office.

He was Mr. Butterwell's master, and the master also of Mr. Optimist, and the major. He knew his business, and could do it, which was more, perhaps, than might fairly be said of any of the other three. Under such circumstances he was sure to get in his hand and lead again. But elsewhere his star did not recover its ascendancy. He dined at his club almost daily, and there were those with whom he habitually formed some little circle. But he was not the Crosbie of former days—the Crosbie known in Belgravia and in St. James's Street. He had taken his little vessel bravely out into the deep waters, and had sailed her well while fortune stuck close to him. But he had forgotten his nautical rules, and success had made him idle. His plummet and lead had not been used, and he had kept no look-out ahead. Therefore the first rock he met shivered his bark to pieces. His wife, the Lady Alexandrina, is to be seen in the one-horse carriage with her mother at Baden-Baden.

THE END.

YOUR HUMBLE SERVANT.

RICH as we are in money, and profuse in spending it in order to heighten the enjoyment of life, the good servant—that essential of comfort and luxury—seems beyond our reach. Superfine houses we have, and superfine furniture, and superfine ladies, and all other ornamental superfluities in excess; but those plain utilities—the skillful cook, the handy maid, and the trusty nurse, we rarely possess.

Though the finished article is scarce, the raw material is abundant. Three-quarters of the globe have become tributary to the lucky fourth we inhabit. Asia, Africa, and Europe have poured their overflowing populations into the heaving ocean of American labor. China has sent from its swarming hives thousands of its patient Coolies to California and Oregon, where our fellow-citizens are served with an enviable obedience by the long-tailed children of the sun.

Virginia and the Carolinas have their millions of negroes, whose stolen labor was once the boasted blessing of their masters, but soon to be confessed their curse. What the future may be of these prolific children of Ham who can tell? But Humanity hopes that, with the rights of man conceded, the duties of man may be fulfilled; while Political Economy is devising plans to save the waste of so much bone and muscle, and to bring their productive force into co-operation with the general utility.

Among the slaves of the South there are some few accomplished domestic servants who have been perfected in the households of the luxurious planters. These, when luxurious planters shall be no more, are destined, no doubt, to fill appropriate places in the rich and free houses of the North. Most of the negroes, however, even those who are called domestic servants, brought up as they have been in the slatternly households of the South and Southwest, would be as out of place in the better-ordered homes of the North as a bull in a china-shop. As for the old negro servants, once so common in our Northern kitchens and halls, they have become almost extinct through inherent weakness or the force of external pressure.

Ireland and Germany have long been, and will continue to be, the chief sources of supply of domestic servants for the Eastern, Middle, and Western States. It is from these countries that we obtain most of the raw material, and very raw it is; for those who come from afar to cook our dinners, to guard our superfine upholstery, and to tend the darlings of our homes, are, for the most part, peasants, whose condition in their own land has been hardly less rude than that of the American Indian. The servants in Europe are generally the most thriving of the lower classes, and consequently the least inclined to emigrate. It is rare to find accomplished European domestics in this country, although there are many no doubt who profess to be such.

England, France, Belgium, and Switzerland, however, send us an occasional coachman, groom, valet, cook, or bonne des enfans, who is more or less an expert.

Native Americans, however lowly their position, have an invincible repugnance to become menials, and there is consequently no hope of a supply of servants from this source until the present social relations between master and man, and mistress and maid, are materially changed. It is from no indisposition to work, for native Americans can find no task-masters as exacting as themselves; but they associate with domestic service the idea of servile dependence, and will not submit to be the humble servants of any master or mistress. The word "Help" was coined for their especial benefit; but though invoked by this flattering appellation they persistently refuse their aid.

Our female servants are, for the most part, Irish and German, and of these the former greatly predominate; for the latter, though of more aptitude, have less inclination for service; and besides finding husbands readily soon become mistresses of households of their own. The main-stay, then, of our domestic establishments is the Irish female peasant. She it is who is both the necessity and plague of our homes. As we can not dispense with her strong arms, we have to endure her ignorance, her uncouth manners, her varying caprices, and her rude tongue.

Housekeepers complain bitterly of Bridget's ignorance and awkwardness, and will tell you, with tears in their eyes, how she cut off the tender and eatable parts of the asparagus and served up the tough stalks; how she washed her feet in the soup-tureen; how, in her zeal for a shine, she rubbed off the coat of bronze from the tea-urn; how she scrubbed the family portraits with soap and water, and wore off a nose and knocked out an eye; how she left open the front-door and let in the prowling thief, who made a clean sweep of the hats and coats in the hall; how she choked baby, who hasn't cut a tooth, with a chicken bone; how she cut wood with the best ivory-handled carver, and stirred the fire with the silver gravy spoon; and how, in fine, "these Irish servants are the plague of our lives." As for the minor offenses of Bridget, such as burning the daily roast to a cinder, setting the table all awry, breaking the crockery, letting baby fall into the fire, sweeping the parlor carpet with the street broom, soaking the ivory-handled knives and forks in boiling water, and letting the cat drink up all the milk: these are such everyday occurrences that they are hardly worth mention.

The ignorance of Bridget is, no doubt, tormenting to the careful housekeeper; but what else can we expect? Where has she had an opportunity to learn? Surely not in her native Connaught. Born and bred in a mud-hovel, in the companionship of boorish peasants like herself—the "finest pisantry in the world," as O'Connell called them—and the family pig, she can know nothing of the simplest elements of civilized life. Her knowledge of cookery is confined to the mixing of buttermilk and potatoes for the daily meal of the whole domestic circle, including the hog. The very utensils of the kitchen, beyond a soot-covered iron pot, are mysteries to her. Her ideas of tending a baby are derived from an affectionate reminiscence of a sturdy brat of an infant brother or sister sprawling, naked, in the mud, in close proximity, and mingling its cries with the sonorous grunt of the pig. As for chamber-work and waiting, what occasion is there for learning any thing about either in a hovel, where all help themselves to their food out of a common pot, and lie down promiscuously upon the ground? In regard to washing and ironing, these are refinements we should no more expect her to have learned at home than to play on a piano or to dance the polka. What Bridget may pick up of the domestic proprieties during her voyage across the Atlantic, huddled up in a ship's steerage with hundreds of her compatriots, and kept upon a severe regimen of a pint of fresh water a day, salt pork, sea biscuit, and potatoes, can not add much to her information of the duties of a servant. Arrived in the United States, she may catch at the house of a friend or relative a glimpse—and the first of her life—of a joint of meat, cooked probably at the baker's round the corner, and of other humble comforts of civilization; but this can not greatly increase her knowledge. She soon learns, however, that labor is in demand and wages high. To get six, seven, or eight dollars a month, as it may be, she believes to be the chief duty of a servant, and troubles herself very little about the rest. She soon gets a place; for her service, in the want of better, is indispensable. Thus she undertakes to do what she knows nothing about, and becomes the torment and the subject of complaint of every housekeeper.

It is true that there are a few of the wealthiest who are not obliged to take their Bridgets entirely in the raw state. Such by paying the highest wages can always command the best in the market, and thus secure servants who have managed to gather more or less experience of their duties in the course of a rapid circulation for several years among city families. But even these are notoriously unequal to the services required, and our dames of wealth and luxury are accordingly among the first to complain of the universal grievance. The absenteeism of the American rich in Paris and on the Continent of Europe, which was becoming so general until checked by the advancing premium on gold and consequent rise in exchange, has been attributed to the impossibility, from the want of good servants, of obtaining a well-ordered domestic establishment at home. However this may be, a still worse practice of our well-to-do people, that of abandoning the private house for the boarding-house and public hotel, is constantly excused on this ground. Bridget's incompetency is thus responsible for one of the worst evils of American life—an evil which is not only corrupting but fast extinguishing the chief source of personal and national virtue—domestic existence.

It is not only of the incapacity of the servant to perform properly the services for which she is hired, that complaint is made, but of her pretentiousness or her "uppishness," as it is called. If one is found ever so little capable of performing the simple functions of her place, and likely to suit in the kitchen, parlor, or nursery, housekeepers tell us that she will so presume upon her small modicum of acquirements that none but the highest wages, the greatest privileges, and a minimum of work will satisfy her. She becomes so exacting that, before accepting an engagement, she asks more questions than she answers, and seems as solicitous about the character of her employer as her employer about hers. She has her own notions, too, of gentility; and having a high idea of her own respectability, is particularly inquisitive in regard to that of her would-be mistress. "How many servants do you keep, misthrus?" "Three—a cook, chambermaid, and waiter." "Is it a man wathur or a woman wathur?" "A woman." "It isn't the likes of me, then, who will be after living wi' ye if ye don't keep a man sarvant." A lady of our acquaintance having selected a likely-looking girl at an intelligence office, proposed to take her home with her at once. On getting into the street the lady called an omnibus; whereupon the girl asked her if she didn't keep a carriage? Upon being answered "No," she turned away, and refused the place for which she had been just engaged. In their advertisements for a place they take care to remind us that "none but respectable families need apply." These are facts, and confirm the truthfulness of the basis of Leech's series of humorous illustrations in Punch of the aspiring tendencies of the modern servant.

York Herald is a more public manifestation of high life below stairs, and shows that the vulgar use of the word "lady," instead of the honorable appellation of woman, so frequent in the parlor, is echoed in the kitchen:

WANTED—SITUATIONS IN A PRIVATE FAMILY by two young ladies; one as cook, and the other as chambermaid. Inquire at ——— Street for two days.

Here is another advertisement from the same paper, in which the applicant for a place in the kitchen not only assures us that she is a lady, but a respectable one:

A SITUATION WANTED—BY A RESPECTABLE young lady, as cook, washer, and ironer, or would do general housework in a small private family. Can give good reference. Call for two days at ——— Street.

Here is a third:

TWO GERMAN LADIES WISH SITUATIONS IN American families—one to do housework and make herself generally useful; the other as housekeeper. Inquire at ——— Street, in the dry-goods store.

A ferocious ring at the bell drew the writer from his work on this very article to the door, where he was met by the demand from a grimy fellow to see "the lady (his wife) that's washing here to-day." The "lady" was the charwoman, or "woman who goes out to day's work," who had condescended, for the small consideration of seventy-five cents, to assist in "getting up" the week's linen of a small establishment.

One of the most annoying faults of Bridget is her frequent change of place. She has hardly received, we can't say earned, her first month's wages, when, for some frivolous excuse or other, she gives short or often no notice at all, and is off to serve some other disconsolate housekeeper in her turn in the same way. A domestic establishment is thus never complete, never settled. The household is the scene of a perpetual revolution. To-day there is a change of dynasty in the kitchen, to-morrow in the chamber or nursery. Domestic anarchy and confusion are the inevitable consequences. The master of the house returns from the cares and vexations of his day's business, seeking repose in his home, but only finds disquiet. The old cook has gone, and the new one hasn't come, or changed her mind, or wouldn't suit, and there's no dinner, or his wife is smutting her delicate hands or blowsing her lovely face over the kitchen fire trying to cook one. If it isn't the cook it is the nurse, whose month is up, and she "wouldn't stay, no, not a minute longer, if Mistrus Smith would give her twice the wages." So the infant Augustus is squalling in the parlor and mamma crying with vexation when papa arrives expectant of a cheerful greeting. If not the cook's or nurse's, it is sure to be the waiter's or chambermaid's turn to go, and the table is not set or the beds are not made, or the floors not swept, or the parlors not dusted, and the mistress of the house not dressed for dinner, and consequently not in a state of mind or body very favorable to connubial bliss. Is it surprising that, with the household thus all awry, its so-called master should betake himself to the club or Delmonico's, or with his wife give up house and home altogether, and seek refuge from these "plagues of servants" in the ease, however corrupting and costly, of the well-ordered hotel?

There is nothing so sets off an establishment as neat and appropriately-dressed servants, and yet they are seldom found even in the most magnificent of our houses. It is not that Bridget is averse to dress. On the contrary, she is as fond of fine feathers as her mistress, and often carries a twelve-month's wages on her back. She will spend all her money for a silk dress, a lace collar, a velvet hat, and a flashy parasol, and not have a few shillings left to pay for a decent calico gown and a cotton neckerchief. Indoors and on duty she is as slattern as a beggar; outside on a Sunday or a holiday she is as fine a lady as her mistress, and might readily be mistaken for her. In France and England female servants are always dressed in a neat and appropriate costume, consisting of a white cap, a frilled apron of the same color, and a tightly-fitting spencer, with a short skirt or a gown of plain gingham or calico. Thus neatly and simply attired European waiting and nursery maids are ornaments to a household, and even the cooks and scullions fresh from the kitchen not unsightly. This plain dress so accords with the occupation and rude beauty of the class, that the ruddy English maid and the dark-faced French bonne, thus attired, are a great deal more picturesque, and not less attractive, than their fashionably-draped mistresses. We would defy Madame Calicot, with all the latest fashions at her command, to make up a Fifth Avenue beauty that could compete successfully in grace of form, harmony of color, and tasteful adornment with the Chocolate girl of the Dresden Gallery, who, it will be recollected, won a husband and a fortune by decorousness of dress no less than by beauty of person.

We know a housekeeper who has made a strenuous effort toward reform in this matter of servants' dress. She keeps a supply of white caps and gingham dresses, and makes it a condition, on hiring a waiting-maid or nurse, that she should put her head into the one and her body into the other. All her attempts upon Bridget have failed. She prefers shaking to the wind her frowsy locks reeking with castor-oil and bergamot and bobbing about, her hoops hung with rags, to wearing "a cotton night-cap and a common gingham frock." Our reformer must have given up the struggle had she not had the luck to fall in with a Belgian and a Frenchwoman, who had the good sense to see the propriety of wearing a costume suitable to their occupations, and to appreciate the economy of being dressed at the expense of their mistress.

Bridget, with her vigorous organization, has a strong appetite, and is apt to make a clean sweep in the kitchen of the sirloin and pudding, hardly touched in the dining-room, much to the annoyance of the economical housekeeper, who is groaning over the cost of meat at twenty-five cents a pound, and of eggs at fifty cents a dozen.

Bridget is wasteful, no doubt, so have we all been in this most prodigal of lands until "war prices" taught us a lesson of saving; and she, like the rest, has naturally wallowed in the general profusion. Bridget is fastidious, however; and though her palate was early smothered in and dulled by the buttermilk and potatoes of her native Connaught, it has sharpened in America to a keen taste for the delicacies. Whatever luxury has been barely tasted—cut and taken away to come again another day—and delicately appreciated in the parlor, is sure to be enjoyed and devoured in the kitchen. As for coffee, tea, sugars, butter, Bridget must have them à discretion, cost what they may, as she deems an unlimited allowance of them as much a portion of her wages as her monthly greenbacks; for Bridget, once such a stickler for gold, has been forced to yield to Mr. Chase's deluge of paper.

There are some screws of housekeepers who insist upon doling out the bread by the slice and the sugar by the spoonful. But as parsimony is by no means the best economy, such lose more than they gain, for they are never well served, while all they have is held to be fair plunder.

In Great Britain there are more complaints on the score of the voraciousness of servants than in this country. English employers have found a remedy in what is called board-wages, an allowance in money in lieu of food from the family table and larder. "Every body," says an English writer, "is tired of hearing of the gluttony of the class, of the waste, of the fastidiousness, of the indolence of a set of persons who were reared on potatoes and buttermilk, and who may come to be glad of a crust before they die. The facts may be true, but there is no use in ringing the changes upon them and making them a text for complaints and indignation. The servants who run to extremes in hot breakfasts, and luncheons, and suppers, and in eating five or six times a day, usually do it in assertion or consideration of their rights and dignities more than in the indulgence of their appetites. There is ambition in the demand of a varied and luxurious table, as there is in the dandyism of men-servants, and the crinolines and flower-wreaths of ladies' maids. Where the affair of their table can be put into their own hands, a world of strife and jealousy, as well as of pernicious indulgence, is got rid of; but the trust reposed is so great that it is only in the best governed households that the arrangement can exist. The rate, however, at which board-wages are now paid, all the year round, is so much higher than formerly as to afford a curious measure of the advancing claims of the kitchen. In the dear days of war and corn-laws the board-wages paid in London were six shillings (a dollar and a half) per week for the women, and ten (two dollars and a half) for the men-servants, beer being included. Now we hear of ten or twelve shillings (two dollars and three dollars) for the women, and twelve or fourteen (three dollars and a half) for the men, besides one and sixpence (thirty-six cents) each for beer. We have ascertained that the average cost of the board of servants (men and women) in the great London Clubs, at the present time, is about twelve shillings (three dollars) a week.

It would be interesting to learn how this fund is usually managed; what proportion of the servants desire to save out of it; and how much less they care for eating and drinking when no controversy is inflamed by it. We believe, however, that wherever this plan has been tried, it is found to be popular with the servants themselves, and that they save money out of the allowance. The objection to it is that it throws considerable temptation in their way, especially in the case of the cook, who is responsible for the provisions of the family. If there are really many houses where no bit, or scrap, or drop from the upper table is ever touched below, we need no further evidence of the thorough respectability of a portion of the class of domestic servants, nor of their rise in proportion to the elevation of their position. Our grandmothers would certainly not have hazarded such an arrangement; and they had actually a rooted belief that no maid-servant could resist helping herself to tea and sugar, however plentifully the lower table was supplied. We all remember, probably, the device of those days, of putting into the caddy a card on which was written "Remember the commandment, 'Thou shalt not steal!'" We ourselves are reminded how a strong sensation was produced by a saucy boy, who deposited in the same place a drawing of an old housekeeper hanging, with the inscription, "This is what you'll come to." "Oh, Master Charles!" was reproachfully said to him next morning, "how could you say such a thing of me, that I should ever be hanged?"

In some of our larger establishments, and we are beginning with our increasing wealth to have them, this system of board-wages might be introduced with advantage, if their profuse and ostentatious proprietors should ever care for any thing so humble as economy. In smaller households with one, two, or three servants, of course it would not do, as these can be more cheaply fed from the remains and natural waste of the family table. By-the-by there is no more remarkable evidence of the growth of luxury among us than the increase in the number of servants. But a few years since it would have been rare to find the wealthiest housekeeper not satisfied with three or four. Now the ordinary citizen's wife, whose husband may enjoy a fair business income for the present, but whose future means of support depend on the fluctuating chances of trade, or the dubious prospects of a Mariposa dividend, can not do without a complete domestic establishment from butler to scullion. Laundresses, ladies' maids, and French bonnes, of whom our American grandmothers had only read of in the fashionable novels of the day, have become the necessities of their granddaughters. Judging from the complaints of these luxurious descendants of rude forefathers of the counter and anvil, we question whether they have diminished their cares by increasing the number of their servants. We commend to them the apophthegm of Franklin—"If you want to be well waited upon, wait upon yourself;" "if you want to be tolerably waited upon, have one servant;" "if you want to be badly waited upon, have two servants;" "if you don't want to be waited upon at all, have three."

If Bridget has vices in common with the rest of the wicked world, she has her virtues too. With the muscle and strength of an Amazon she is equal to any physical effort, and can not only perform with ease the most laborious functions of her place, but has force to spare for a tussle with an impudent butcher-boy or overbearing master. Her mistress would as soon stir up a female tiger as arouse her anger. Her strong arm and voluble tongue keep the most tyrannical housekeeper in such awe as to save her from all invasion of her prescriptive rights. Bridget, however, is not unamiable, provided her "Sunday out" and other privileges are not encroached upon, and that she is allowed pretty much to have her own way. She is industrious, and like most who have no other resource, is never so happy and good-natured as when her hands are busy, provided her mistress don't insist that they be put to any other work than she bargained for.

Bridget is as pious as a nun, and as great a stickler for her ecclesiastical privileges as the Pope of Rome. Though most of her employers don't agree with her in her religious tenets, and begrudge the time she devotes to matins, wakes, christenings, marriages, funerals, and other pious duties, and grumble, when fish is scarce and dear, about the provision to be made for those jours maigres—the Wednesday and Friday of each week—they are forced to confess that Bridget, though she does smell incense and indulge in other abominations (to the Protestant), is none the worse girl for being a good Catholic. Though experienced housekeepers will acknowledge that they have fared rather worse than better with professed Lutherans and Calvinists, there are still many fastidiously pious folks, who, seeing in every Catholic servant a Jesuit in disguise, believe that their own faith can only be secured by having their dinners cooked and beds made by Protestant hands.

There can be no stronger proof of the affectionate nature of Bridget than her generosity to her poor relatives she has left behind in the old country. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been annually sent by the servants in America to Ireland to mitigate the miseries of their kindred there, or to relieve them of them forever by bringing them to this paradise of Patrick and his numerous progeny.

Bridget, too, is of a decidedly social turn, and likes to entertain John the coachman from next door, or Patrick the livery-stable man from round the corner, or the Widow M'Guire with her nine small children and one at the breast. Housekeepers complain, it is true, of the hilarity of these happy visitors, and don't like to hear in the parlor the echo of the Irish howl, the loud Hibernian guffaw and rich brogue from the kitchen, and object to the daily entertainment of Bridget's hearty company at the expense of their larders.

Sobriety, though not the strong point of the Irish character, is rarely transgressed by our female servants, except on the occasion of a wake, or a funeral, or when the sideboard, with its contents of Bourbon and Cogniac, is too temptingly exposed.

Bridget is generally candid as a child but not always truthful, and to save herself the penalty will make the cat the scape-goat of her frequent sins of breakage and inordinate consumption.

For her chastity, Bridget has, in her homeliness, a natural safeguard, which has been strengthened by the good principles inculcated by her Church. The consequence is, that she and her sisters have done less to swell that frightful "social evil" of which so much has been said of late, than the females of their class in other countries.

In honesty, too, the Irish female domestic in America is much superior to the servants of Europe. Mark how rarely she appears on the prisoner's stand of our courts, and turn to a file of the London Times and see how often the English female servant is arraigned for crime. Most of the robberies of houses in Great Britain are believed to be committed by burglars in league with the domestics. When the Irish servant with us does take to picking and stealing it is comparatively of a trifling character, and, like a boy's robbery of an orchard, supposed from innocence to be less guilty than it is. At any rate it can not be said of our servants, as it is of a large portion of the English, that they are the daily associates and accomplices of thieves and burglars. Bridget has too much self-respect to keep other than honest company, and her sterling integrity should extenuate the many minor offenses grumbling housekeepers lay to her charge, and for which they themselves are in good part responsible.

When Washington Irving was presented at the Court of Dresden, His Saxon Majesty remarked: "You have no servants in America?" "Yes, Sire, we have, such as they are," was Irving's reply. The King's inference was not illogical, for his experience of the servile position of the domestic in Europe could not be reconciled in his mind with the declaration of human equality in America. His Majesty was not aware that our revolution was but partial; that while we severed ourselves politically, we remained socially in bondage to Great Britain. We rejected with scorn her political edicts, but clung with reverence to most of her social traditions. The relation of servant and master is very much the same in the Democratic United States as in Aristocratic England. The only difference is one of words. The English servant who answers the door-bell is asked, "Is your mistress at home?" and answers civilly, taking the appellation as a matter of course, for she constantly hears it used and uses it herself. The boldest would hardly venture to throw the words "your mistress" into the face of the most amiable Bridget, or if he did, he probably would be made to repent of his audacity.

This verbal concession to Bridget's vanity is about all she has gained over her English sisters. In all other respects she is treated as superciliously, if not more so. For example, "Thank you," and "If you please," so constantly uttered by a mistress of the most ordinary breeding in England, seldom pass the lips of our fine ladies when they command their humble servants. They would do well, however, if it were only for their own profit, to be a little more liberal of this cheap courtesy, for it is surprisingly grateful and provocative of good service.

It is this social distance between the employer and the employed, so repugnant to the spirit of our democratic institutions, which is the source of much of the bad domestic service complained of. The character of servants would be greatly elevated if they were treated more like fellow-creatures and less like beasts of burden. If the intercourse were more close—and this might easily be effected without intrenching upon the due subordination necessary to a well-ordered household—the mutual interest would be stronger. Ties of affection would be formed too strong to be broken by every angry word or passing caprice, and we might again see in our homes those who had grown gray in the service of father and son, mother and daughter, and so identified with the family as to be partakers not only of its joys and sorrows but of its fortunes. In past times it was not an uncommon occurrence, even in the United States, for the old servitor to be remembered generously in the will of his wealthy master. Who ever thinks of leaving Bridget a legacy?

Our democratic dames may learn a lesson in the treatment of servants from the great Countess of Pembroke. "As to her servants domestic she," it is said, "well knew that they were pars domus; and how necessary a part of the house servants are, and therefore to be kept tight, sustained, and carefully held up; if in decay to be repaired; and therefore this part of her house she was always building or repairing by the hand of her bounty, as well as by good and religious order in her family. Indeed she looked on some (and possibly on some of the meaner sort of her trusty-servants whose offices might occasion their nearer attendance) to be such as Seneca allows them to be, good servants and humble friends."

So far from our domestics being pars domus, members of the family, their masters and mistresses seldom know more than their Christian names, and in their rapid transition from house to house scarcely catch a sufficient impress of their faces to recognize them away from their own doors. If, however, our housekeepers would condescend to treat their servants even as their humblest friends, and strive to win their affections and promote their interests accordingly, they would be rewarded with a more contented and faithful service. Let our fine dames give up their gadding about, their pursuit of the frivolities of fashion, their indolent indifference to the welfare of their households, their contemptuous treatment and neglect of their domestic servants, and instead of grumbling about their worthlessness strive to improve them. Why should there not be friendly relations between kitchen and parlor? We are told that such have been occasionally established, and with the best effect. "We have witnessed," says a good authority, "with satisfaction the terms on which the young maid-of-all-work and her mistress were when the mistress was willing to provide little occasional pleasures for the girl; undertaking herself to boil the kettle and answer the door while her maid was enjoying a holiday walk, or a tea-drinking with a neighbor. It is the same spirit which we find in some great houses, fitting up a reading-room for the servants in the basement—a room nicely matted and well lighted, with a table for letter-writing, containing a drawer full of stationery, a table for newspapers, and a well-stocked book-case." This is an example from aristocratic England; can democratic America show the like?

Bridget, it is true, can seldom read or write, but why should not an effort be made to teach her? She can not have been long in this country of almost universal enlightenment without appreciating the advantages of ever so little learning, and she would doubtless be grateful if it were given to her. If she got no further than to be able to spell out a recipe in Soyer or Miss Beecher, the result would tell to the improvement of our present ill-cooked dinners. Her employers, with their tempers and stomachs no longer soured by underdone potatoes or overdone mutton, would be less disposed to fault-finding.

Schools of cookery, of laundry work, and of family sewing have been established in England, and even some provision made for teaching the duties of the nurse and housemaid. We can hardly see how any such experiment can be tried in this country unless we abate somewhat of that awful Republican pride, which, in its lofty aspirations, is fast unfitting us for all the humbler duties of life. Who so bold as to propose that a department for the training, we dare not say of servants but of housekeepers—for they are in no less need of it—be added to our public schools?

For the present our only help for the ignorance of Bridget is the rare chance she may have of falling in, in the course of her rapid revolutions, with some housekeeper who may be able to teach her. This is almost a forlorn hope; for how few of our modern mistresses of a household know much about, we will not say the graceful refinements, but plain utilities of service! There are thousands though of many years' experience to whom drawn-butter, a plain soup, not the oleaginous compound so called, the trussing of a fowl, the proper setting of a table, the arrangement of the courses of a dinner, and the regulation of the waiting, are still perplexing problems. Our dames, however, have plenty of leisure, and should, if they wish to add to the comfort and refinements of their homes, set about at once employing it in acquiring the necessary knowledge and imparting it to Bridget.

By elevating the character of domestic servants we shall not only promote the comfort and welfare of our households but do a national good. Think what influence for good or bad such a large class, probably not less than half a million in number,* are likely to exercise, not only upon our children, with whom they are brought into such close contact, but upon their own, the future voters of this republic! Thinking of this, can we doubt the importance, the absolute necessity in fact, of trying to make good citizens of them? If we do not do something toward civilizing Bridget and Patrick, Hans and his wife, we may continue to live in fear of having our houses pulled down over our heads, or our throats cut every time the foreign element of our large cities is stirred to fermentation by some malicious demagogue.

With the condition of domestic servants improved, which it is the duty as it is within the power of our housekeepers to effect, a better class of people would join their ranks. Poor native Americans, for such we have already and shall have more, as the natural consequence of this impoverishing war, would then probably be competitors for the places in our kitchens and nurseries with benefit not only to themselves but to our housekeepers. The former would be better cared for, and the latter more intelligently served. With the frightful knell of Hood's Song of the Shirt ringing in their ears, we are surprised that our American women will venture upon the hazardous experiment of trying to live upon the pittance of shop seamstresses, which so often leads to ruin or starvation, when by domestic service they can secure good compensation, abundant food, and freedom from care and temptation to vice.

Though service may be debased by the superciliousness and neglect of consequential and indolent housekeepers, it is not essentially degrading. The word "servant," so distasteful to the American tongue, is only, after all, the name of an occupation. But the use of it may be universally foregone, as it is frequently, to please fastidious American women; and they shall be welcome to the more acceptable term "help," if they will only come with their aid to sustain our falling households. They are apt to suppose that our houses would be to them a kind of conventual establishments where they must wither in a perpetual virginity; for no free-born American citizen, they think, would take a servant to wife. We venture to believe that any of our humble fellow-countrymen worth having are not to be scared away by the shadow of a name, when they can secure the useful substance of a helpmate, who, in a well-ordered establishment, has learned those duties essential to the comfort of the most simple household.

Cooke, the celebrated tragedian, married Mrs. Cooke for her skill in cooking a steak; but she, poor woman, as it turned out, had the worst of the bargain. Cobbett was first attracted to the girl whom he subsequently made his wife by her adroitness in twirling a mop, and her zeal in scouring a pot. The humble position of a servant is not necessarily a stop-gap to the flood of fortune. Rousseau was promoted from behind a master's chair to a seat at his table. Thurlow, or some other English big-wig, began life as a footman, and was so thoroughly imbued with a sense of the duties of his early occupation, that on one occasion, when crowned with the wig of a Lord Chancellor, he got behind instead of entering his own coach. Lady Hamilton, the wife of an ambassador, the mistress of the great Nelson, the model of art, the grace and disgrace of the Neapolitan Court, began life as a nursery-maid; but her career must be taken as a warning, not as an example.

Literature has dealt very kindly with the servant. The brightest of all Molière's dramatis personæ are his soubrettes. His Dorines, his Dame Claudes, his Claudines, his Nicoles, and his Toinettes are overflowing with good humor and good sense, while their masters and mistresses are dupes, fools, pretenders, misanthropes, and hypochondriacs. It is the clever suivante or servante who always proves in his comedies to be the deus ex machinâ to solve the perplexities in which the stupidity of her employer has placed the household.

So in Don Quixotte, Sancho Panza, though more or less a fool like his master, has quite the advantage of him, for he laughs and grows fat upon his folly. In the famous romance of Le Sage, Gil Blas, the hero and the most amusing characters are servants, who wear the clothes and play the parts of their debauched masters with a grace and an address equal to their own. The La Fleur of Sterne is the most joyous of beings, while his Corporal Trim is the most faithful and sympathetic of humble servants. "My Uncle Toby loved the man; and besides, as he ever looked upon a faithful servant as an humble friend, etc." Fielding's Joseph Andrews—that model of chastity and constancy—is a footman, and his virtuous Pamela a waiting-maid.

The immortal Samivel Veller of Dickens is the embodiment of good-humored shrewdness, and even the Jeames Yellowplush of the cynical Thackeray—for, say what his eulogists may, Thackeray is cynical, and does snarl over the raw-bones of society—is no more of a rogue and a good deal less of a fool than his masters. But why look in remote places for examples. They are to be found every where. Are we not all the humble servants of each other, whatever may be our characters and position?

* When Prince Albert delivered an address, on taking the chair at the Servants' Institute, in 1849, he declared that "the largest of all the classes of Her Majesty's subjects in England is the class of domestic servants;" and in the census of Great Britain of 1841, they were put down as numbering about 1,200,000.

THREE TROPHIES FROM THE WAR.

MY husband is Colonel of the Third Regiment in the Hit-or-Miss Brigade, United States Cavalry. Every one who reads the papers knows how gallantly the Hit-or-Miss have always behaved in active service, and that they are now stationed in Newbern, North Carolina. To be sure they have seen a good deal of inactive service, but that is not their fault. Winthrop (that is my husband, his name is Winthrop Quincy Gates) assures me that if certain persons had the steering of the ship of state, which certain other dunderheads unfortunately have in their own hands, things would go on more briskly. Of course he don't mean to say any thing against Mr. Lincoln, and he wouldn't discourage enlistments for the world; but, being a Massachusetts man, with the bluest of blood in his veins, which has come down to him from a long line of Puritan ancestors unmingled with any meaner tide, having lived very near the Hub of the Universe all his life, and belonging himself to the Mutual Admiration society, his opinion is worth something.

I am sure, when I saw the Hit-or-Miss marching through Boston with their colors flying, and the band playing "John Brown," I could not help thinking of the stern old Puritan of old who went to war

"Like a prophet of the Lord with his Bible and his sword." To be sure, Winthrop would never have thought of a Bible, if I had not tucked one into his trunk at the last moment, but he was emphatic enough about his sword; so with a little of what is called poetic license the line will apply. I was going to say that when I saw that gallant body of men, granite in their principles as well as their State, I thought that the back-bone of the rebellion would soon be broken; but I have come to the conclusion now, in spite of the many reports, that if the rebellion has any spinal vertebrae it is sound enough yet not to lay the body politic up with the back-ache, or else it must be like some kinds of snakes we have seen when children, which, when cut into pieces, each severed part grew livelier than the original, and wriggled about on its own separate hook in the most cheerful style.

I had a dreary time that winter without Winthrop. Of course New Englanders can not be as lonely as other people, for they have resources, you know. They have an intellectual life; a stir in the very air about them; the rush of the mighty giant Progress. Life is in the potential mood with them. Objectively, their world may be dun and desolate; subjectively, it is rich in untold wealth, grand in glorious possibilities. Somehow that winter the Ego and the "non Ego" were not as fascinating as usual. I found even Emerson dull, and I came to the conclusion that my favorite doll Carlyle was stuffed with saw-dust. My children had the measles, and my maid-of-all-work had an offer. The latter proved serious, and took her off in three days; so that my sister Lu and myself were obliged to descend from Heine to Soyer, and turn reluctantly from tender sonnets to tender chickens. Do people know, when they see those little innocents smoking and crisply brown on the table, by how many painful stages they are removed from the cackling denizens of the farm-yard? I'm sure I thought it would be the easiest thing in the world to have chickens for dinner; but I had rather crack the hardest nut of Jean Paul's German, or read the "Proverbial Philosophy," or do any other disagreeable thing, than to go through the ordeal again. We completely swamped on the gravy.

Suddenly the winter of my discontent was made glorious summer by a letter from Winthrop. He was coming home for a month. The barren desert of my life immediately blossomed into fragrance. "He's coming!" I joyously exclaimed; "and what do you think, Lu, he is going to bring me three trophies from the war!"

"I wish he'd bring a cook," answered Lu, dolefully looking down at a black streak, vulgarly called "smut," which darkened her pretty white hand. Lu had come to me on a visit to cheer me up. I was sorry to see her spoiling her satin-smooth hands in my cuisine; but what can one do with two young children clamorous for bread?

"What can the trophies be?" I mused, aloud; "it is just like Winthrop to leave me in suspense; but I can please myself with imagining all I want most."

"I've heard of scalps under that name," said Lu; "they are always the trophies of war with one class of people, and you know we have Indians in this war."

"Now, Lu," I said, indignantly, "to talk of scalps in this most civil of wars. Why, if we could have cushioned the bullets at first, I am sure we would have done so; for you know how kindly we felt then to our 'Wayward Sisters.' Even now the war is a friend to them; for it holds them back from perdition. Better to hold them back by chains, if need be, than to see them take the fatal plunge, which will shipwreck honor and virtue, and ruin them forever."

Lu smiled, skeptically. I noticed that she was not enthusiastic about the war; but there was some excuse for her, as she wasn't a government contractor; had no old hulks of boats, no fossil bread and pork to sell; and no husband displaying his epaulets and patriotism in the cause. Then the Southern beaux at Newport were so delightful.

It was May before Winthrop came after all. A native American, who wanted to see something of the world, had condescended to help me in the kitchen a while; so Lu and I were at liberty to dress in "gorgeous array," and to have the children in prime order to meet their papa. After the first rapture I cried—"And my trophies?"

"Coming," he answered, with a comical smile; "one of them is just behind me."

"Walking!" I exclaimed, a little puzzled to know whether it was some odd breed of dog, a pony, or—

"A 'contraband,'" interrupted Lu. "Oh, I hope it is a woman and cook."

"No; it is a man and a brother," answered Winthrop, laughing.

This was a decided cold douche to my enthusiasm. I was in the predicament of the Frenchman who drew the elephant in a lottery. What to do with him, was the question. Before I answered the question satisfactorily, the individual, once a chattel, appeared. He was a tall, slender fellow of about eighteen, "very dark complected" indeed. He rolled his eyes about on every side till the black part seemed cast away in an ocean of white. His hair was curled up into the wiriest of little knobs all over his head, and he brought every tooth to bear on the broad smile with which he regarded me. In his hand he carried a cage, which I divined in a moment held my second trophy.

"What is his name?" I asked, feeling the necessity of saying something.

"Name Joe," promptly replied the chattel.

"Where did you pick him up?" I said, drawing Winthrop into the parlor for consultation.

"He picked me up," answered my husband. "You see he had a wonderful hankering after freedom, and he wanted to see the land where it grows spontaneously."

"Well, I don't know what is to be done with him; for you see, Winthy, Melinda Jane is a lady of great sensibility, and I am sure would never—"

"Oh, well, I'll set him to sawing wood for the present, and after we shall see;" with which summary disposal of the difficulty I tried to be content. Winthrop left me a moment to give him the direction, and returned with the cage in his hand.

"This is a splendid mocking-bird," he cried. "I know you will be charmed with him. He was in one of the rebel houses. To be sure he has fallen off in his singing somewhat; but he'll soon get in tune again. And, by-the-way, it was in the same house that I found a sewing-machine. I knew your weakness for tucking Mayflower's white dresses, so I brought it along."

Now I had wanted a sewing-machine for some time, but then we had so many other wants. So when I saw Mrs. Grundy's children, who looked as if their mother had wasted her substance in riotous needle-work, I tried to say, bravely, "Not to desire or admire, if a man but knew it, is more than to walk all day like the Sultans of old in a garden of spices." But now, for some reason, the rapture which I expected disappointed me. I was ready for it, but it didn't come; and instead came thoughts of some sweet Southern matron, seated beside that household divinity, fashioning dainty little robes for lithe little forms; for I, too, knew what it was "to broider the long clothes and neat little coat—to dream and to dote." Certainly its click would sound as mournfully to me as the song of the ocean shell pining for its home.

I had no scruples about the other trophies. I had breathed New England air too long, and heard Wendell Phillips too often, to consider Joe as property, in any sense, and the mocking-bird, of course, was a trifle; but I felt that I could hardly be happy with a sewing-machine on my conscience. Yet it was rather a delicate matter to insinuate to my husband that my standard of morality was higher than his; and I approached the subject tenderly, as if I were treading on gouty toes. I knew well that he was touchy on points of honor, and though he was a little transcendental, and believed in the Dial as fervently as the Decalogue, I had always found him—not to put too fine a point upon it—honest. I just ventured to remark:

"You are sure it's right, Winthrop?"

"Oh yes, all right, or, it was in prime order when we started, I am sure; but it may be a little out of order now. However, you know the universal Yankee always understands something about machinery, and I can fix it up at once. I know you are aching to begin on seam and gusset and band. What a grand invention it is, to be sure!"

"No; but, Winthrop, I mean that it hardly seems right to go into other people's houses and carry off their sewing-machines, even if they are rebels. I know that war justifies many things, but—"

"Oh, it's all fair in war," he answered, carelessly; "you know the property's all confiscated."

"Yes; but I thought the Government claimed all."

"So it does, and so Uncle Sam's officers help themselves. 'Facit per alium, facit per se;' that's an old Latin motto, my dear, and means, 'What I do by another, I do myself.' That is clear, I hope, to the meanest capacity."

It was very dark to me, but I was silent. From the distance came Joe's voice, singing over the sawing:

"I takes my tex' in Mathue,
And by de Rebelations
I knows you by your garments,
Dere's a meetin' here to-night.
Dere's a meetin' here to-night, boys;
An' we's gwine to see some light, boys,
Before dey's done dis fight, boys,
Dere's a meetin' here to-night."

And I wondered vaguely whether Winthrop could find any text as apropos as the Latin motto.

One by one the golden hours slipped by us, as though love had indeed turned the hour-glass in his glowing hands. Who can stay the chariot wheels of Time, though they prove a very Juggernaut to all our hopes? In the mean time spring was flushing the earth with fragrant bloom; the crimson heart of the roses swelled against their prison bars, and dewy violets purpled the shady nooks in the garden. My mocking-bird, hung out in the sunniest spot, with a green bough over his cage to delude him into imaging himself in his native forest, only mocked our hopes. Perhaps he could not sing his song in a strange land, or he found the air too bracing for him, and preferred, soft Sybarite as he was, the languid "South wind rushing warm, and the magnolia's breath of balm." I thought he might have the dyspepsia from change of fare, and administered some homeopathic pills; but though he ate them with evident relish they did not put him in tune. Then Winthrop bought a bird-organ, and tried in vain to tempt him into imitation. I am sure that it would have been successful if we could only have played "Dixie" or "My Maryland" on it. I grew possessed with the idea that he was imbued with the spirit of his rebel owners; and the grim despair in his eye, and every lustreless feather, said as plainly as words could speak, "The tyrant's chain is on me now."

I bade Winthrop good-by in the garden, on one of the loveliest days of that sweet time "when hawthorns brighten, woodbines twine;" and, returning, met all my cares and perplexities on the threshold, a weird and dismal throng. First and greatest was Joe; behind him Melinda, flushed, irate, and eloquent. The chattel, suave, smooth, and oily in his manner, began:

"Berry sorry to say, Missis, dat de mockin'-bird done die dis mornin'; nebber gib de leas' warnin', but jes' turn up his legs a little while ago an' go dead widout 'formin' any body of his 'tentions."

"My stars! did any one ever hear the like? I've come to give you warnin', Miss Gates; as for 'sociatin' with niggers, I can't stand it."

Joe remained imperturbably polite. "Knows I's brack, ma'am; can't help it. I's mighty sorry I is a nigger, but I wasn't asked 'spectin' de color I preferred beforehand."

"Well, it ain't his color after all," said Melinda, "but his lyin'; he can help that, I guess. He hain't no more conscience nor a cat; he lies like blazes. I'm as sartin as I'm livin' that he killed that air mockin'-bird, for I seen him puttin' some stuff inter the cage before breakfast; but of course he'll deny it, and he pretendin' to be religious too, singin' about the 'good ship Zion.' I guess ef he put his foot in that air ship he'd sink her sure as Jonah."

Now it had dawned on me before that Joe was not to be blindly trusted—that truth to him was strange, stranger than fiction, so I did not attempt to defend him. He was prompt to defend himself, however, rolling up his eyes in a gently deprecating style, and speaking in his smooth, oily manner—so oily perhaps that the truth slipped away from his words.

"Lor', Missis, tink I pison a bird; I 'fess I done gib him a little dose to fotch him music back, but I preparated dat myself, and—"

"His life has gone after his music," I said; "I hope you will prepare no more such doses. I think, Joe, that if I were living South, and had not imbibed some troublesome dogmas about 'all men being born free and equal,' I should have you thrashed."

Joe opened his eyes still wider, and made a futile attempt at a smile. He did not quite take in the full meaning of my words; but the last one called up direful visions, I expect, for he slunk away, and left Melinda in full possession of the field.

"Gracious me!" exclaimed that damsel, who had lost a little of her fiery glow—"I thought I was an Abolitioner till that feller came; but now I don't go in fur it nohow, 'cept it was to 'bolish niggers off the face of the airth. I've heern of people what had a sweet tooth in their heads; but I declare for it every one of them pesky shinin' ivories of his'n must be that sort, for I can't keep nary a sweet-cake nor a bit of jell when he can git his hands onto 'em. Fact is, I can't make 'em fast enough for them grinders; so, as I was a sayin', Miss Gates, you'd better be a lookin' round. I don't feel no call to be made a martyr on yet, nohow." And the fair maiden was as good or as bad as her word, for in a week's time she was taking views of life from some other kitchen; and I was left to get closer views of my trophy, as I tried to make him of use about the house.

I would have been glad if they had been dissolving views, for I was growing more and more troubled about this dark shadow in our household. I tried to excuse him in my own mind by remembering the child's story of the crooked tree—"somebody trod on it when it was little." Through how many down-trodden generations had those crooked and perverted ideas descended to Joe? by what strange sacrilege to the holy and pure in human law, by what dread transgression of the divine law, had he inherited the outlawry of his nature, his utter obliviousness to any sin in lying or stealing, his religion of feeling and words which never influenced his actions? All this I could understand. Yet, like Melinda, I did not feel a call to be a martyr, especially a "martyr by the pang without the palm," and I meditated vainly over a way of escape. While I was pondering the vexed question I heard my bête noir entertaining my children under the elm-tree near the kitchen door. Shouts from the little ones, and a long liquid chuckle from Joe drew my attention. I looked out and saw Buster, my only son, standing in round-eyed and rapt attention, while Mayflower looked a little startled.

"Yes, Marse Bust, I'se seen de debbil."

"How big was he?" asked Buster, who is very precise and mathematical in his ideas.

"Well, I reckon 'bout as big as a woodchuck."

"Oh, Joe, I'm sure he's larger than that," returned the child. He had the true New England mind, and thought that the beginning of wisdom was to doubt. "I guess it was a woodchuck that you saw."

"Now, chile, you jes lef dis nigga alone for gumption. 'Spec I don' know de diffunce 'tween ole Sam an' a feddered fowl? Ya! ya! ya! Didn't say he looked like a woodchuck did I?—said he was 'bout as big. Now I tinks it over, honey, he was bigger; he swelled while I was a looken at him mighty big—I reckon he got as tall as dis yer tree.”

“Had he horns?” asked Buster.

“Horns! sure nuf, honey! Reckon he don’t leab his horns at home when he done go for a walk.”

“And how long were they?” inquired my boy.

“Well, I reckon dey was long as dem chimbleys, branchin’ an’ curly like.”

“But what did he want?” asked Mayflower, with intense interest lighting up her pretty blue eyes.

“Lors! I jes begin an’ tell you de hull story, Miss Mayflo’. You see, honey, anoder cullered pussin an’ I, we ’grees to run away when we heerd ’bout Linkum’s men comin’ down dar. I ’longed to fust-class folks, chile, de berry fust blood, but I tought I’d rudder ’long to myself. T’other nigger ’longed to poor white folks—her-rins.”

“What do you call them herrings for?” asked Buster, on the alert for useful information.

“I reckon cos herrins is a mighty mean fish,” said Joe. “Well, dis oder nigger did ’cordin’ to his fotchin’ up, and he gin me de slip and tote hisself off alone. ’Spect he was feerd de hoe-cake gin out or suthing. So you see, chilen, I was wrathy; I felt jes like a dog what’s been chained up all his life, an’ some one cum along an’ loose him an’ let him run a little way, but soon as he sniffs the free air jest hauls him back to the tarnal kennel agin. So I reckon I cussed mighty bad for a while, nuff to blast de corn whar I was worken, and den dat yer debbil ’peared to me.”

“Did he speak?” asked Buster.

“Yes, chile, he talked like a thunder-gust, an’ he looked chain lightnin’. Fact is, I could have put t’oder niggers, mean no account Massa, on his track, and dat’s what de debbil done tempt me mighty hard to do; but ye know de Scripture, ‘Desist de debbil, an’ he flees.’ I’s an hon’able nigga, an’ he couldn’t come it, but he went at me wid dem horns an’ hooves, nuff to make de fur fly. When it was over, bress you, I didn’t know which whopped till I saw him turn hisself inside out and go off in brimstun blaze.”

“Now, Joe,” said Buster, in a matter-of-fact tone, “you know that was impossible; nobody could turn themselves inside out.”

This disputed question was not settled, for I called the children in at that moment, and had the pleasure of spending that whole evening with Mayflower, who was in a state of terror respecting the individual with horns as “high as de chimbleys.” At last I soothed her to sleep, thankful that Buster was too skeptical to suffer, and went down stairs to give Joe a lecture on the subject of his revelations.

From that day Lu and I undertook to inform his mind and enlighten his understanding; but we found that the feeble rays of light which we succeeded in introducing into those benighted regions were as quickly extinguished as torches in a neglected mine. We constituted ourselves home-missionaries, and gave him sage advice and gospel truth with his daily bread; but our words fell on him as ineffectually as the bullets on an Ironside. I could never give full and pathetic utterance to all we suffered at the hands of our household heathen while waiting Winthrop’s answer to my letter containing a statement of grievances.

Lu came in one day looking radiant. I believe I have not stated before that my sister is a beauty—with the sunniest of hazel eyes, and golden brown hair, which she wears rippling down her neck in what is fashionably termed a waterfall; the prettiest little mouth, firm and resolute as well as sweet, as many a luckless youth has found to his sorrow when it opened only to reiterate one unwelcome word; and a slender, lithe figure, full of the poetry of motion, as though “it were modulated so to an unheard melody.” Her first words were, “Have you heard of the donation party to be given next Wednesday to Mr. Frome?”

I knew well enough that this had never so filled her eyes with soft shining light, and sent that pretty rosy flush over her face. So I said, coolly,

“Oh yes! I knew all about it, and you too, Lu, if you recollect, though you didn’t seem so enthused about it then.”

And I waited a few moments patiently, knowing that the cream of a woman’s thoughts, like other cream, does not come to the surface at once.

“Did you know that Mrs. Frome had Southern relations?” she asked, after a short silence.

“No,” I answered, “I hope they are pleasanter than my Southern relations,” with an expressive glance at Joe, who had just come in to set the table for tea.

A howl from Joe, nipped in the bud by the crash of my best cut-glass dish, diverted our minds for a time.

“Mighty sorry, Missis, for dat smash; but dat name done flustercate me for sure. Why, I ’longed to de Peytons; an’ I knowed Massa Cuss ’fore he knowed hisself.”

Lu looked at him with a new interest. “I believe Mr. Peyton is a Newbern man,” she said; “how did you like him, Joe?” “Oh! I liked Marse Cuss monstus,” Joe answered; “used to go to Bofurt wid him now and den, an’ I nebber seen such a mighty cute feller for takin’ stone-crab and mint-juleps as Marse Cuss—reckon he could beat at dat air bizness, could Marse Cuss.”

“Oh, do be still, Joe, it sounds exactly like swearing with your Marse Cuss,” said Lu, a little impatient at the unromantic visions called up by Joe’s words.

I recalled Custis Peyton without difficulty. A tall, handsome fellow, with a lordly air as one born to command; rather swarthy, but with fine, flashing eyes and glittering teeth, and a reverent air to ladies—a deep absorption in their pretty nothings that won their hearts.

"What can he be doing here?" I asked; "perhaps he's a spy."

"Nonsense," answered Lu; "he has just finished at Cambridge. He is a Union Southerner. His mother is North now somewhere with the rest of her children. She is a widow. His father was a North Carolinian, and of course he isn't quite so rabid for the war as some of our friends. He don't approve of every thing that Lincoln does, nor elevate him to the side of Washington, and he can't get over his prejudice in favor of slavery; but he's a sound Union man."

"Union in sound, I expect," I said, smiling.

Lu dropped that subject, and said, "Well, in regard to the donation. The ladies have decided to meet early in the afternoon to finish up Mrs. Frome's summer sewing; to which motion, I am sure, you will lend your approval, and your sewing-machine, for that is what they want. After doing up the useful in the afternoon we will do the agreeable in the evening, and the gentlemen will come in with the other refreshments."

"They are welcome to the machine," I said; "I am only sorry I can not go to work it; but of course there will be some one there able to do that. And we must study Miss Beecher, Lu. I think she is better adapted to our capacity than Soyer, so that we can send something delectable to our minister's wife."

Joe followed me out a few moments after with a solemn face. "Look a yer, Missis," he faltered; "does you reckon Marse Cuss done come for cotch me? 'Cos dis nigga cut and run den, for sure."

I felt inclined to dissimulate a little, I own, thinking of the keen pleasure I should feel at such a denouement; but truth is mighty, and it did prevail.

"Not at all, Joe; he is visiting Mrs. Frome, a family. He is a Union man, and the whole family are North."

Wednesday came, a golden day, full-sailed fleets of snowy clouds sailing over a deep blue sea; soft airs blowing from gardens that stood knee-deep in fragrant bloom; the cloudy poplars near the house showing their silver linings with an endless flutter of joy, while the river in the distance rolled on in many a glittering curve between its fringes of hemlock and tender birch. Lu came floating down like a rose-lit cloud, for she wore some kind of a fleecy thin dress, snowy-white, with rose-colored ribbons, and she looked as if the sunlight was prisoned in her air, so deftly did those mystic fingers of light transmute the brown to gold. I could not help saying, when I saw the eager light which kindled her eye, and the crimson flush on cheek and lip, "Take care, Lu; don't forget the principles you learned with your first prayers; remember Whittier—

"For dearer the blast round our mountains that raves
Than the soft summer zephyr that plays over slaves;
And know that the Yankee girl rather would be
In bondage with them than in freedom with thee."

She gave me such a bright glance in reply, so exultant, that I longed to be going with her instead of overseeing my culinary department; but to the latter duty sternly pointed.

I had there a raw recruit—a middle-aged woman of the Irish persuasion. I had heard fearful accounts of her violent temper, but upon questioning her she denied the soft impeachment.

"High timper, is it? Sorra a bit too high, barrin' jist enough iv that same to kape me out of the mud."

That she had not the degree requisite to keep her out of the dirt I saw plainly that afternoon; for there were other autographs on her face besides that left by old Father Time. A fragrant odor of warm bread filled the room, and to my gentle questioning about her "method" she returned, fiercely:

"Bake bread, is it? Begorra an' I've baked more thin the beggarly Yankees iver ate—enough to pave a way from here to Ballykeshla wid the bonny loaves."

The last-mentioned place, I suppose, rejoiced in having been her native spot. I concluded afterward that the said pavement would be the most appropriate use for her bread.

It was still early in the evening when I heard Lu come in. I was surprised to hear her run up stairs at once to her own room, and followed to question her of the party. She sat by the window, in the full tide of the pallid moonlight that seemed to have swept away the rosy flush from cheek and lip, and deadened to lustreless brown the golden glory of her hair. Some of the hopeful light, too, had died out of her hazel eyes, and I knew at once that something had happened.

"What is it, Lu?" I urged, with the tenderest sisterly affection.

"I expect I had better tell you all, Meg," she said, with a half-laugh, which was more pathetic than tears, "though it is rather hard to let you know that I have been so silly. You remember Custis Peyton that summer at Newport; how we walked, drove, and talked till—well, I believe I lost my heart. He talked Tennyson; and having just dipped far enough into German to enjoy it, he made love to me with the most charming of German diminutives; but the clearer, plainer language of proposal he did not speak."

For this last I was inwardly thankful, but said nothing.

"We parted with some slight disagreement. Perhaps my heart asked something more than 'Lieb liebchen,' or 'Meine Schatze,' and grew petulant over the trifles given in exchange for its lavish wealth. I never heard from him till the other day, and you may know how eagerly I looked forward to this night; for time had not dimmed the brightness of his image. Perhaps it lent a golden mist to glorify it still more."

"Well, Lu," I said, impatient for the end.

"I was in such spirits this afternoon. We worked away merrily, and finished innumerable garments for poor, pale little Mrs. Frome and those six Berserkers of hers, who look as if they should only wear sheet-iron suits. The tea was ready when we had finished. My heart began to throb; and somehow the pickles and cake, light biscuits and solid edibles, seemed floating before me like the airy phantoms of a dream, while the only reality, Custis Peyton, stood bowing above them with the most admiring look. I never knew whether I was eating pickles or cake, for every thing was flavored with him. But I must hasten to the end, only saying, by-the-way, that never in the old Newport flirtation had he been so absorbed, so full of tender flattery that bore such a delicious air of truth, so eloquent in words that just barely escaped the deepest meanings in life. We talked over the former days, of course, and he grew more and more entranced, till at last he asked me if I did not find the air oppressively warm. So we went into the sewing-room, where the piled-up work lay about, and the three sewing-machines, whose busy click had sounded all the afternoon, were taking a rest. On one of them—on yours, Meg—stood a candle, by whose light the ghostly garments and dark machines were visible. It was not a very romantic place," she said, laughing.

"A union of life's romance and realities," I answered. "You know, Lu, such things always will mar our ideal; we see it every day."

"Well, Custis talked a while, as people always have talked, I suppose, since the primal pair in the Garden of Eden, and then he took my hand to look at a little ring which he gave me once—this little pearl, you know, which you have asked so often about. I don't know what he was going to say as he raised my hand to the light; but he let it fall again, and, instead, took hold of your sewing-machine. He muttered something like 'Strange!' and then took the candle and surveyed it carefully. At last, pointing to something written beneath it, he said:

"Excuse me, Miss Lu; but just read that, if you please."

"I bent down to do so, and read, clearly, 'Peyton, Newbern, N. C.'"

"Is it not infamous?" he exclaimed, his dark face flushing, and his eyes glittering like steel. "Some Yankee Vandal has taken that from my mother's house. I bought it for her two years ago; but she wrote me that she had left Newbern in such haste that she had only saved the portable things. I expected to go down and look after them soon; but there is no need now, I expect. No doubt the valuable articles are distributed among the moral and religious Puritans, or elsewhere. I have heard of Yankee bargaining, but this is stealing. You will find that the standard of morality will soon be lowered if this thing goes on. A man who is accustomed to steal from his enemies will soon lose his horror at the crime."

"Meg, I was so bewildered that I had not the moral courage to avow that Winthrop was the thief; but I did falter something about 'confiscation.'"

"Then they steal from the Government, from friends instead of enemies, if you like that better," he rejoined, passionately. "Pardon me, Miss Lu, but this thing has brought back my lost home so painfully, so many pleasant scenes of home joy; I can see the desolate rooms with strange officers lounging about them, invading every cherished nook. You would find me a sad companion for the rest of the evening. I think I shall have to leave the gay revelers yonder. I will see you again, I hope."

"So saying, Meg, he led me tenderly back to the parlor—and there was the end."

Lu looked off again to where the moon poured its pale light over the garden; the clouds of rose and gold had softened to purest pearl and silvery sheen—cold neutral tints instead of lavish color and golden glow; and somehow her life seemed to have passed suddenly from the glorious sunlight of the day's hope to something chill and pallid as the night. I could not say much, for I secretly rejoiced that Mr. Peyton was not to be my brother-in-law, and hoped Lu would soon forget him.

"So you see, Meg," she concluded, laughing, "how unlucky one of your trophies has been—unraveling the web of my destiny, instead of of helping, as its true vocation intends."

"I shall send a note to Mr. Peyton to-morrow," I exclaimed, "begging him to send the machine to his mother; I never wish to see it again. Yet, do you know, Lu, he is half right about the stealing?"

"I thought him wholly right," answered Lu.

An answer came to my note, but the gentleman did not; most politely worded was the missive; his mother, doubtless, had already replaced the machine; hoped I would accept it, etc. It is needless to say that I declined the honor, and neither the machine nor master ever appeared in my humble abode.

A few days after Joe made me his confidante.

"If missis hadn't no manner of 'jection, was tinkin' 'bout marryin'."

"Not the slightest objection," I said; "but what in the world would you live on, Joe?"

"Oh, reckon I could git along. Hannah's mighty ambitious; you oughter see her flyin' 'round to Mrs. Frome's t'oder night to the darnation party. I seed her when I took them fixens o' yourn thar. She gin me a slapjack she done cook that minute, so luscious dat he was gone 'fore I taste him, but not 'fore I say, I'se boun' to make dat gal my wife."

So it seems the same evening that saw Lu's star of hope pale beheld that luminary shine on Joe, and he tasted the bliss of Love's young dream together with his slapjack.

So my last trophy departed, to my great joy.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE LOOK-OUT.

IN these times of ours, though concerning the exact year there is no need to be precise, a boat of dirty and disreputable appearance, with two figures in it, floated on the Thames, between Southwark Bridge which is of iron, and London Bridge which is of stone, as an autumn evening was closing in.

The figures in this boat were those of a strong man with ragged grizzled hair and a sun-browned face, and a dark girl of nineteen or twenty, sufficiently like him to be recognizable as his daughter. The girl rowed, pulling a pair of sculls very easily; the man, with the rudder-lines slack in his hands, and his hands loose in his waistband, kept an eager look-out. He had no net, hook, or line, and he could not be a fisherman; his boat had no cushion for a sitter, no paint, no inscription, no appliance beyond a rusty boat-hook and a coil of rope, and he could not be a waterman; his boat was too crazy and too small to take in cargo for delivery, and he could not be a lighterman or river-carrier; there was no clew to what he looked for, but he looked for something, with a most intent and searching gaze. The tide, which had turned an hour before, was running down, and his eyes watched every little race and eddy in its broad sweep, as the boat made slight headway against it, or drove stern foremost before it, according as he directed his daughter by a movement of his head. She watched his face as earnestly as he watched the river. But, in the intensity of her look there was a touch of dread or horror.

Allied to the bottom of the river rather than the surface, by reason of the slime and ooze with which it was covered, and its sodden state, this boat and the two figures in it obviously were doing something that they often did, and were seeking what they often sought. Half savage as the man showed, with no covering on his matted head, with his brown arms bare to between the elbow and the shoulder, with the loose knot of a looser kerchief lying low on his bare breast in a wilderness of beard and whisker, with such dress as he wore seeming to be made out of the mud that begrimed his boat, still there was business-like usage in his steady gaze. So with every lithe action of the girl, with every turn of her wrist, perhaps most of all with her look of dread or horror; they were things of usage.

"Keep her out, Lizzie. Tide runs strong here. Keep her well afore the sweep of it."

Trusting to the girl's skill and making no use of the rudder, he eyed the coming tide with an absorbed attention. So the girl eyed him. But, it happened now, that a slant of light from the setting sun glanced into the bottom of the boat, and, touching a rotten stain there which bore some resemblance to the outline of a muffled human form, colored it as though with diluted blood. This caught the girl's eye, and she shivered.

"What ails you?" said the man, immediately aware of it, though so intent on the advancing waters; "I see nothing afloat."

The red light was gone, the shudder was gone, and his gaze, which had come back to the boat for a moment, traveled away again. Wheresoever the strong tide met with an impediment, his gaze paused for an instant. At every mooring-chain and rope, at every stationary boat or barge that split the current into a broad arrow-head, at the offsets from the piers of Southwark Bridge, at the paddles of the river steamboats as they beat the filthy water, at the floating logs of timber lashed together lying off certain wharves, his shining eyes darted a hungry look. After a darkening hour or so, suddenly the rudder-lines tightened in his hold, and he steered hard toward the Surrey shore.

Always watching his face, the girl instantly answered to the action in her sculling; presently the boat swung round, quivered as from a sudden jerk, and the upper half of the man was stretched out over the stern.

The girl pulled the hood of a cloak she wore, over her head and over her face, and, looking backward so that the front folds of this hood were turned down the river, kept the boat in that direction going before the tide. Until now, the boat had barely held her own, and had hovered about one spot; but now, the banks changed swiftly, and the deepening shadows and the kindling lights of London Bridge were passed, and the tiers of shipping lay on either hand.

It was not until now that the upper half of the man came back into the boat. His arms were wet and dirty, and he washed them over the side. In his right hand he held something, and he washed that in the river too. It was money. He chinked it once, and he blew upon it once, and he spat upon it once—"for luck," he hoarsely said—before he put it in his pocket.

"Lizzie!"

The girl turned her face toward him with a start, and rowed in silence. Her face was very pale. He was a hook-nosed man, and with that and his bright eyes and his ruffled head, bore a certain likeness to a roused bird of prey.

"Take that thing off your face."

She put it back.

"Here! and give me hold of the sculls. I'll take the rest of the spell."

"No, no, father! No! I can't indeed. Father!—I can not sit so near it!"

He was moving toward her to change places, but her terrified expostulation stopped him and he resumed his seat.

"What hurt can it do you?"

"None, none. But I can not bear it."

"It's my belief you hate the sight of the very river."

"I—I do not like it, father."

"As if it wasn't your living! As if it wasn't meat and drink to you!"

At these latter words the girl shivered again, and for a moment paused in her rowing, seeming to turn deadly faint. It escaped his attention, for he was glancing over the stern at something the boat had in tow.

"How can you be so thankless to your best friend, Lizzie? The very fire that warmed you when you were a babby, was picked out of the river alongside the coal barges. The very basket that you slept in, the tide washed ashore. The very rockers that I put it upon to make a cradle of it, I cut out of a piece of wood that drifted from some ship or another."

Lizzie took her right hand from the scull it held, and touched her lips with it, and for a moment held it out lovingly toward him; then, without speaking, she resumed her rowing, as another boat of similar appearance, though in rather better trim, came out from a dark place and dropped softly alongside.

"In luck again, Gaffer?" said a man with a squinting leer, who sculled her and who was alone. "I know'd you was in luck again, by your wake as you come down."

"Ah!" replied the other, dryly. "So you're out, are you?"

"Yes, pardner."

There was now a tender yellow moonlight on the river, and the new-comer, keeping half his boat's length astern of the other boat, looked hard at its track.

"I says to myself," he went on, "directly you hove in view, Yonder's Gaffer, and in luck again, by George if he ain't! Scull it is, pardner—don't fret yourself—I didn't touch him." This was in answer to a quick impatient movement on the part of Gaffer: the speaker at the same time unshipping his scull on that side, and laying his hand on the gunwale of Gaffer's boat and holding to it.

"He's had touches enough not to want no more, as well as I make him out, Gaffer! Been a knocking about with a pretty many tides, ain't he pardner? Such is my out-of-luck ways, you see! He must have passed me when he went up last time, for I was on the look-out below bridge here. I a'most think you're like the wulturs, pardner, and scent 'em out."

He spoke in a dropped voice, and with more than one glance at Lizzie who had pulled on her hood again. Both men then looked with a weird unholy interest at the wake of Gaffer's boat.

"Easy does it, betwixt us. Shall I take him aboard, pardner?"

"No," said the other. In so surly a tone that the man, after a blank stare, acknowledged it with the retort:

"—Arn't been eating nothing as has disagreed with you, have you, pardner?"

"Why, yes, I have," said Gaffer. "I have been swallowing too much of that word, Pardner. I am no pardner of yours."

"Since when was you no pardner of mine, Gaffer Hexam, Esquire?"

"Since you was accused of robbing a man. Accused of robbing a live man!" said Gaffer, with great indignation.

"And what if I had been accused of robbing a dead man, Gaffer?"

"You COULDN'T do it."

"Couldn't you, Gaffer?"

"No. Has a dead man any use for money? Is it possible for a dead man to have money? What world does a dead man belong to? 'Tother world. What world does money belong to? This world. How can money be a corpse's? Can a corpse own it, want it, spend it, claim it, miss it? Don't try to go confounding the rights and wrongs of things in that way. But it's worthy of the sneaking spirit that robs a live man."

"I'll tell you what it is—"

"No you won't. I'll tell you what it is. You've got off with a short time of it for putting your hand in the pocket of a sailor, a live sailor. Make the most of it and think yourself lucky, but don't think after that to come over me with your pardners. We have worked together in time past, but we work together no more in time present nor yet future. Let go. Cast off!"

"Gaffer! If you think to get rid of me this way—"

"If I don't get rid of you this way, I'll try another, and chop you over the fingers with the stretcher, or take a pick at your head with the boat-hook. Cast off! Pull you, Lizzie. Pull home, since you won't let your father pull."

Lizzie shot ahead, and the other boat fell astern. Lizzie's father, composing himself into the easy attitude of one who had asserted the high moralities and taken an unassailable position, slowly lighted a pipe, and smoked, and took a survey of what he had in tow. What he had in tow, lunged itself at him sometimes in an awful manner when the boat was checked, and sometimes seemed to try to wrench itself away, though for the most part it followed submissively. A neophyte might have fancied that the ripples passing over it were dreadfully like faint changes of expression on a sightless face; but Gaffer was no neophyte and had no fancies.

CHAPTER II.

THE MAN FROM SOMEWHERE.

MR. and Mrs. Veneering were bran-new people in a bran-new house in a bran-new quarter of London. Every thing about the Veneerings was spick and span new. All their furniture was new, all their friends were new, all their servants were new, their plate was new, their carriage was new, their harness was new, their horses were new, their pictures were new, they themselves were new, they were as newly married as was lawfully compatible with their having a bran-new baby, and if they had set up a great-grandfather, he would have come home in matting from the Pantehnicon, without a scratch upon him, French polished to the crown of his head.

For, in the Veneering establishment, from the hall-chairs with the new coat of arms, to the grand piano-forte with the new action, and up stairs again to the new fire-escape, all things were in a state of high varnish and polish. And what was observable in the furniture, was observable in the Veneerings—the surface smelt a little too much of the work-shop and was a trifle sticky.

There was an innocent piece of dinner-furniture that went upon easy castors and was kept over a livery stable-yard in Duke Street, Saint James's, when not in use, to whom the Veneerings were a source of blind confusion. The name of this article was Twemlow. Being first cousin to Lord Snigsworth, he was in frequent requisition, and at many houses might be said to represent the dining-table in its normal state. Mr. and Mrs. Veneering, for example, arranging a dinner, habitually started with Twemlow, and then put leaves in him, or added guests to him. Sometimes, the table consisted of Twemlow and half a dozen leaves; sometimes, of Twemlow and a dozen leaves; sometimes, Twemlow was pulled out to his utmost extent of twenty leaves. Mr. and Mrs. Veneering on occasions of ceremony faced each other in the centre of the board, and thus the parallel still held; for, it always happened that the more Twemlow was pulled out, the further he found himself from the centre, and the nearer to the side-board at the one end of the room, or the window-curtains at the other.

But, it was not this which steeped the feeble soul of Twemlow in confusion. This he was used to, and could take soundings of. The abyss to which he could find no bottom, and from which started forth the engrossing and ever-swelling difficulty of his life, was the insoluble question whether he was Veneering's oldest friend or newest friend. To the excogitation of this problem, the harmless gentleman had devoted many anxious hours, both in his lodgings over the livery stable-yard, and in the cold gloom, favorable to meditation, of Saint James's Square. Thus, Twemlow had first known Veneering at his club, where Veneering then knew nobody but the man who made them known to one another, who seemed to be the most intimate friend he had in the world, and whom he had known two days—the bond of union between their souls, the nefarious conduct of the committee respecting the cookery of a fillet of veal, having been accidentally cemented at that date. Immediately upon this, Twemlow received an invitation to dine with Veneering, and dined: the man being of the party. Immediately upon that, Twemlow received an invitation to dine with the man, and dined: Veneering being of the party. At the man's were a Member, an Engineer, a Payer-off of the National Debt, a Poet, a Grievance, and a Public Office, who all seemed to be utter strangers to Veneering. And yet immediately after that, Twemlow received an invitation to dine at Veneerings, expressly to meet the Member, the Engineer, the Payer-off of the National Debt, the Poet, the Grievance, and the Public Office, and, dining, discovered that all of them were the most intimate friends Veneering had in the world, and that the wives of all of them (who were all there) were the objects of Mrs. Veneering's most devoted affection and tender confidence.

Thus it had come about, that Mr. Twemlow had said to himself in his lodgings, with his hand to his forehead: "I must not think of this. This is enough to soften any man's brain,"—and yet was always thinking of it, and could never form a conclusion.

This evening the Veneerings give a banquet. Eleven leaves in the Twemlow; fourteen in company all told. Four pigeon-breasted retainers in plain clothes standing in line in the hall. A fifth retainer, proceeding up the staircase with a mournful air—as who should say, "Here is another wretched creature come to dinner; such is life!" announces, "Mis-tress Twemlow!"

Mrs. Veneering welcomes her sweet Mr. Twemlow. Mr. Veneering welcomes his dear Twemlow. Mrs. Veneering does not expect that Mr. Twemlow can in nature care much for such insipid things as babies, but so old a friend must please to look at baby. "Ah! You will know the friend of your family better, Tootleums," says Mr. Veneering, nodding emotionally at that new article, "when you begin to take notice." He then begs to make his dear Twemlow known to his two friends, Mr. Boots and Mr. Brewer—and clearly has no distinct idea which is which.

But now a fearful circumstance occurs.

"Mis-ter and Mis-sis Podsnap!"

"My dear," says Mr. Veneering to Mrs. Veneering, with an air of much friendly interest, while the door stands open, "the Podsnaps."

A too, too smiling large man, with a fatal freshness on him, appearing with his wife, instantly deserts his wife and darts at Twemlow with:

"How do you do? So glad to know you. Charming house you have here. I hope we are not late. So glad of this opportunity, I am sure!"

When the first shock fell upon him, Twemlow twice skipped back in his neat little shoes and his neat little silk stockings of a by-gone fashion, as if impelled to leap over a sofa behind him; but the large man closed with him and proved too strong.

"Let me," says the large man, trying to attract the attention of his wife in the distance, "have the pleasure of presenting Mrs. Podsnap to her host. She will be," in his fatal freshness he seems to find perpetual verdure and eternal youth in the phrase, "she will be so glad of the opportunity, I am sure."

In the mean time Mrs. Podsnap, unable to originate a mistake on her own account, because Mrs. Veneering is the only other lady there, does her best in the way of handsomely supporting her husband's, by looking toward Mr. Twemlow with a plaintive countenance and remarking to Mrs. Veneering in a feeling manner, firstly, that she fears he has been rather bilious of late, and secondly, that the baby is already very like him.

It is questionable whether any man quite relishes being mistaken for any other man; but, Mr. Veneering having this very evening set up the shirt-front of the young Antinous (in new worked cambric just come home), is not at all complimented by being supposed to be Twemlow, who is dry and weazen and thirty-five years older. Mrs. Veneering equally resents the imputation of being the wife of Twemlow. As to Twemlow, he is so sensible of being a much better bred man than Veneering, that he considers the large man an offensive ass.

In this complicated dilemma, Mr. Veneering approaches the large man with extended hand, and smilingly assures that incorrigible personage that he is delighted to see him: who in his fatal freshness instantly replies:

"Thank you. I am ashamed to say that I can not at this moment recall where we met, but I am so glad of this opportunity, I am sure!"

Then pouncing upon Twemlow, who holds back with all his feeble might, he is haling him off to present him, as Veneering, to Mrs. Podsnap, when the arrival of more guests unravels the mistake. Whereupon, having re-shaken hands with Veneering as Veneering, he re-shakes hands with Twemlow as Twemlow, and winds it all up to his own perfect satisfaction by saying to the last-named, "Ridiculous opportunity—but so glad of it, I am sure!"

Now, Twemlow having undergone this terrific experience, having likewise noted the fusion of Boots and Brewer in Boots, and having further observed that of the remaining seven guests four discreet characters enter with wandering eyes and wholly decline to commit themselves as to which is Veneering, until Veneering has them in his grasp;—Twemlow having profited by these studies, finds his brain wholesomely hardening as he approaches the conclusion that he really is Veneering's oldest friend, when his brain softens again and all is lost, through his eyes encountering Veneering and the large man linked together as twin brothers in the back drawing-room near the conservatory door, and through his ears informing him in the tones of Mrs. Veneering that the same large man is to be baby's godfather.

"Dinner is on the table!"

Thus the melancholy retainer, as who should say, "Come down and be poisoned, ye unhappy children of men!"

Twemlow, having no lady assigned him, goes down in the rear, with his hand to his forehead. Boots and Brewer, thinking him indisposed, whisper, "Man faint. Had no lunch." But he is only stunned by the unvanquishable difficulty of his existence.

Revived by soup, Twemlow discourses mildly of the Court Circular with Boots and Brewer. Is appealed to, at the fish stage of the banquet, by Veneering, on the disputed question whether his cousin Lord Snigsworth is in or out of town? Gives it that his cousin is out of town. "At Snigsworthy Park?" Veneering inquires. "At Snigsworthy," Twemlow rejoins. Boots and Brewer regard this as a man to be cultivated; and Veneering is clear that he is a remunerative article. Meantime the retainer goes round, like a gloomy Analytical Chemist: always seeming to say, after "Chablis, Sir?"—"You wouldn't if you knew what it's made of."

The great looking-glass above the side-board reflects the table and the company. Reflects the new Veneering crest, in gold and eke in silver, frosted and also thawed, a camel of all work. The Heralds' College found out a Crusading ancestor for Veneering who bore a camel on his shield (or might have done it if he had thought of it), and a caravan of camels take charge of the fruits and flowers and candles, and kneel down to be loaded with the salt. Reflects Veneering; forty, wavy-haired, dark, tending to corpulence, sly, mysterious, filmy—a kind of sufficiently well-looking veiled-prophet, not prophesying. Reflects Mrs. Veneering, fair, aquiline-nosed and fingered, not so much light hair as she might have, gorgeous in raiment and jewels, enthusiastic, propitiatory, conscious that a corner of her husband's veil is over herself. Reflects Podsnap: prosperously feeding, two little light-colored wiry wings, one on either side of his else bald head, looking as like his hair-brushes as his hair, dissolving view of red beads on his forehead, large allowance of crumpled shirt-collar up behind. Reflects Mrs. Podsnap; fine woman for Professor Owen, quantity of bone, neck and nostrils like a rocking-horse, hard features, majestic head-dress in which Podsnap has hung golden offerings. Reflects Twemlow; gray, dry, polite, susceptible to east wind, First-Gentleman-in-Europe collar and cravat, cheeks drawn in as if he had made a great effort to retire into himself some years ago, and had got so far and had never got any farther. Reflects mature young lady; raven locks, and complexion that lights up well when well powdered—as it is—carrying on considerably in the captivation of mature young gentleman; with too much nose in his face, too much ginger in his whiskers, too much torso in his waistcoat, too much sparkle in his studs, his eyes, his buttons, his talk, and his teeth. Reflects charming old Lady Tippins on Veneering's right; with an immense obtuse drab oblong face, like a face in a table-spoon, and a dyed Long Walk up to the top of her head, as a convenient public approach to the bunch of false hair behind, pleased to patronize Mrs. Veneering opposite, who is pleased to be patronized. Reflects a certain "Mortimer," another of Veneering's oldest friends; who never was in the house before, and appears not to want to come again, who sits disconsolate on Mrs. Veneering's left, and who was inveigled by Lady Tippins (a friend of his boyhood) to come to these people's and talk, and who won't talk. Reflects Eugene, friend of Mortimer; buried alive in the back of his chair, behind a shoulder—with a powder-epaulet on it—of the mature young lady, and gloomily resorting to the Champagne chalice whenever proffered by the Analytical Chemist. Lastly, the looking-glass reflects Boots and Brewer, and two other stuffed Buffers interposed between the rest of the company and possible accidents.

The Veneering dinners are excellent dinners—or new people wouldn't come—and all goes well. Notably, Lady Tippins has made a series of experiments on her digestive functions, so extremely complicated and daring, that if they could be published with their results it might benefit the human race. Having taken in provisions from all parts of the world, this hardy old cruiser has last touched at the North Pole, when, as the ice-plates are being removed, the following words fall from her:

"I assure you, my dear Veneering—"

(Poor Twemlow's hand approaches his forehead, for it would seem now that Lady Tippins is going to be the oldest friend.)

"I assure you, my dear Veneering, that it is the oddest affair! Like the advertising people, I don't ask you to trust me without offering a respectable reference. Mortimer there, is my reference, and knows all about it."

Mortimer raises his drooping eyelids, and slightly opens his mouth. But a faint smile, expressive of "What's the use?" passes over his face, and he drops his eyelids and shuts his mouth.

"Now, Mortimer," says Lady Tippins, rapping the sticks of her closed green fan upon the knuckles of her left hand—which is particularly rich in knuckles, "I insist upon your telling all that is to be told about the man from Jamaica."

"Give you my honor I never heard of any man from Jamaica, except the man who was a brother," replies Mortimer.

"Tobago, then."

"Nor yet from Tobago."

"Except," Eugene strikes in: so unexpectedly that the mature young lady, who has forgotten all about him, with a start takes the epaulet out of his way: "except our friend who long lived on rice-pudding and isinglass, till at length to his something or other, his physician said something else, and a leg of mutton somehow ended in daygo."

A reviving impression goes round the table that Eugene is coming out. An unfulfilled impression, for he goes in again.

"Now, my dear Mrs. Veneering," quoth Lady Tippins, "I appeal to you whether this is not the basest conduct ever known in this world? I carry my lovers about, two or three at a time, on condition that they are very obedient and devoted; and here is my old lover-in-chief, the head of all my slaves, throwing off his allegiance before company. And here is another of my lovers, a rough Cymon at present certainly, but of whom I had most hopeful expectations as to his turning out well in course of time, pretending that he can't remember his nursery rhymes! On purpose to annoy me, for he knows how I dote upon them!"

A ghastly little fiction concerning her lovers is Lady Tippins's point. She is always attended by a lover or two, and she keeps a little list of her lovers, and she is always booking a new lover, or striking out an old over, or putting a lover in her black list, or promoting a lover to her blue list, or adding up her lovers, or otherwise posting her book. Mrs. Veneering is charmed by the humor, and so is Veneering. Perhaps it is enhanced by a certain yellow play in Lady Tippins's throat, like the legs of scratching poultry.

"I banish the false wretch from this moment, and I strike him out of my Cupidon (my name for my Ledger, my dear,) this very night. But I am resolved to have the account of the man from Somewhere, and I beg you to elicit it for me, my love," to Mrs. Veneering, "as I have lost my own influence. Oh, you perjured man!" This to Mortimer, with a rattle of her fan.

"We are all very much interested in the man from Somewhere," Veneering observes.

Then the four Buffers, taking heart of grace all four at once, say:

{ "Deeply interested!"
 { "Quite excited!"
 { "Dramatic!"
 { "Man from Nowhere, perhaps!"

And then Mrs. Veneering—for Lady Tippins's winning wiles are contagious—folds her hands in the manner of a supplicating child, turns to her left neighbor, and says, "Tease! Pay! Man from Tumwhere!" At which the four Buffers, again mysteriously moved all four at once, exclaim, "You can't resist!"

"Upon my life," says Mortimer languidly, "I find it immensely embarrassing to have the eyes of Europe upon me to this extent, and my only consolation is that you will all of you execrate Lady Tippins in your secret hearts when you find, as you inevitably will, the man from Somewhere a bore. Sorry to destroy romance by fixing him with a local habitation, but he comes from the place, the name of which escapes me, but will suggest itself to every body else here, where they make the wine."

Eugene suggests "Day and Martin's."

"No, not that place," returns the unmoved Mortimer, "that's where they make the Port.

My man comes from the country where they make the Cape Wine. But look here, old fellow; it's not at all statistical and it's rather odd."

It is always noticeable at the table of the Veneerings, that no man troubles himself much about the Veneerings themselves, and that any one who has any thing to tell, generally tells it to any body else in preference.

"The man," Mortimer goes on, addressing Eugene, "whose name is Harmon, was only son of a tremendous old rascal who made his money by Dust."

"Red velveteens and a bell?" the gloomy Eugene inquires.

"And a ladder and basket if you like. By which means, or by others, he grew rich as a Dust Contractor, and lived in a hollow in a hilly country entirely composed of Dust. On his own small estate the growling old vagabond threw up his own mountain range, like an old volcano, and its geological formation was Dust. Coal-Dust, vegetable-dust, bone-dust, crockery dust, rough dust and dust sifted—all manner of Dust."

A passing remembrance of Mrs. Veneering, here induces Mortimer to address his next half-dozen words to her; after which he wanders away again, tries Twemlow and finds he doesn't answer, ultimately takes up with the Buffers who receive him enthusiastically.

"The moral being—I believe that's the right expression—of this exemplary person, derived its highest gratification from anathematizing his nearest relations and turning them out of doors. Having begun (as was natural) by rendering these attentions to the wife of his bosom, he next found himself at leisure to bestow a similar recognition on the claims of his daughter. He chose a husband for her, entirely to his own satisfaction and not in the least to hers, and proceeded to settle upon her, as her marriage portion, I don't know how much Dust, but something immense. At this stage of the affair the poor girl respectfully intimated that she was secretly engaged to that popular character whom the novelists and versifiers call Another, and that such a marriage would make Dust of her heart and Dust of her life—in short, would set her up, on a very extensive scale, in her father's business. Immediately, the venerable parent—on a cold winter's night, it is said—anathematized and turned her out."

Here, the Analytical Chemist, (who has evidently formed a very low opinion of Mortimer's story) concedes a little claret to the Buffers; who, again mysteriously moved all four at once, screw it slowly into themselves with a peculiar twist of enjoyment, as they cry in chorus, "Pray go on."

"The pecuniary resources of Another were, as they usually are, of a very limited nature. I believe I am not using too strong an expression when I say that Another was very hard up. However, he married the young lady, and they lived in a humble dwelling, probably possessing a porch ornamented with honey-suckle and woodbine twining, until she died. I must refer you to the Registrar of the District in which the humble dwelling was situated, for the certified cause of death; but early sorrow and anxiety may have had to do with it, though they may not appear in the ruled pages and printed forms. Indisputably this was the case with Another, for he was so cut up by the loss of his young wife that if he outlived her a year it was as much as he did."

There is that in the indolent Mortimer, which seems to hint that if good society might on any account allow itself to be impressible, he, one of good society, might have the weakness to be impressed by what he here relates. It is hidden with great pains, but it is in him. The gloomy Eugene too, is not without some kindred touch; for when that appalling Lady Tippins declares that if Another had survived, he should have gone down at the head of her list of lovers—and also when the mature young lady shrugs her epaulets, and laughs at some private and confidential comment from the mature young gentleman—his gloom deepens to that degree that he trifles quite ferociously with his dessert-knife.

Mortimer proceeds.

"We must now return, as the novelists say, and as we all wish they wouldn't, to the man from Somewhere. Being a boy of fourteen, cheaply educated at Brussels when his sister's expulsion befell, it was some little time before he heard of it—probably from herself, for the mother was dead; but that I don't know. Instantly, he absconded, and came over here. He must have been a boy of spirit and resource, to get here on a stopped allowance of five sous a week; but he did it somehow, and he burst in on his father, and pleaded his sister's cause. Venerable parent promptly resorts to anathematization, and turns him out of doors. Shocked and terrified boy takes flight, seeks his fortune, gets aboard ship, ultimately, turns up on dry land among the Cape wine: a small proprietor, farmer, grower—whatever you like to call it."

At this juncture, shuffling is heard in the hall, and tapping is heard at the dining-room door. Analytical Chemist goes to the door, confers angrily with unseen tapper, appears to become mollified by descrying reason in the tapping, and goes out.

"So he was discovered, only the other day, after having almost doubled his age; that is to say, after having expatriated about fourteen years."

A Buffer, suddenly astounding the other three, by detaching himself, and asserting individuality, inquires: "How discovered, and why?"

"Ah! To be sure. Thank you for reminding me. Venerable parent dies."

The same Buffer, emboldened by success, says: "When?"

"The other day. Ten or twelve months ago."

The same Buffer inquires with smartness,

"What of?" But herein perishes a melancholy example; being regarded by the three other Buffers with a stony stare, and attracting no further attention from any mortal.

"Venerable parent," Mortimer repeats with a passing remembrance that there is a Veneering at table, and for the first time addressing him—"dies."

The gratified Veneering repeats, gravely, "dies;" and folds his arms, and composes his brow to hear it out in a judicial manner, when he finds himself again deserted in the bleak world.

"His will is found," says Mortimer, catching Mrs. Podsnap's rocking-horse's eye. "It is dated very soon after the son's flight. It leaves the lowest of the range of dust-mountains, with some sort of a dwelling-house at its foot, to an old servant who is sole executor, and all the rest of the property—which is very considerable—to the son. He directs himself to be buried with certain eccentric ceremonies and precautions against his coming to life, with which I need not bore you, and that's all—except—" and this ends the story.

The Analytical Chemist returning, every body looks at him. Not because any body wants to see him, but because of that subtle influence in nature which impels humanity to embrace the slightest opportunity of looking at any thing rather than the person who addresses it.

"—Except that the son's inheriting is made conditional on his marrying a girl, who at the date of the will was a child of four years old or so, and who is now a marriageable young woman. Advertisement and inquiry discovered the son in a man from Somewhere, and at the present moment he is on his way home from there—no doubt, in a state of great astonishment—to succeed to a very large fortune, and to take a wife."

Mrs. Podsnap inquires whether the young person is a young person of personal charms? Mortimer is unable to report.

Mr. Podsnap inquires what would become of the very large fortune, in the event of the marriage condition not being fulfilled? Mortimer replies, that by special testamentary clause it would then go to the old servant above mentioned, passing over and excluding the son; also, that if that son had not been living, the same old servant would have been sole residuary legatee.

Mrs. Veneering has just succeeded in waking Lady Tippins from a snore, by dextrously shunting a train of plates and dishes at her knuckles across the table; when every body but Mortimer himself becomes aware that the Analytical Chemist is, in a ghostly manner, offering him a folded paper. Curiosity detains Mrs. Veneering a few moments.

Mortimer, in spite of all the arts of the chemist, placidly refreshes himself with a glass of Madeira, and remains unconscious of the document which engrosses the general attention, until Lady Tippins (who has a habit of waking totally insensible), having remembered where she is, and recovered a perception of surrounding objects, says: "Falsar man than Don Juan; why don't you take the note from the Commendatore?" Upon which, the chemist advances it under the nose of Mortimer, who looks round at him, and says:

"What's this?"

Analytical Chemist bends and whispers.

"Who?" says Mortimer.

Analytical Chemist again bends and whispers.

Mortimer stares at him and unfolds the paper. Reads it, reads it twice, turns it over to look at the blank outside, reads it a third time.

"This arrives in an extraordinarily opportune manner," says Mortimer then, looking with an altered face round the table: "this is the conclusion of the story of the identical man."

"Already married?" one guesses.

"Declines to marry?" another guesses.

"Codicil among the dust?" another guesses.

"Why, no," says Mortimer; "remarkable thing, you are all wrong. The story is complete and rather more exciting than I supposed. Man's drowned!"

CHAPTER III.

ANOTHER MAN.

As the disappearing skirts of the ladies ascended the Veneering staircase, Mortimer, following them forth from the dining-room, turned into a back library of bran-new books, in bran-new bindings liberally gilded, and requested to see the messenger who had brought the paper. He was a boy of about fifteen. Mortimer looked at the boy, and the boy looked at the bran-new pilgrims on the wall, going to Canterbury in more gold frame than procession, and more carving than country.

"Whose writing is this?"

"Mine, Sir."

"Who told you to write it?"

"My father, Jesse Hexam."

"Is it he who found the body?"

"Yes, Sir."

"What is your father?"

The boy hesitated, looked reproachfully at the pilgrims as if they had involved him in a little difficulty, then said, folding a plait in the right leg of his trowsers, "He gets his living along-shore."

"Is it far?"

"Is which far?" asked the boy, upon his guard, and again upon the road to Canterbury.

"To your father's?"

"It's a goodish stretch, Sir. I came up in a cab, and the cab's waiting to be paid. We could go back in it before you paid it, if you liked. I went first to your office, according to the direction of the papers found in the pockets, and there I see nobody but a chap of about my age who sent me on here."

There was a curious mixture in the boy, of uncompleted savagery, and uncompleted civilization. His voice was hoarse and coarse, and his face was coarse, and his stunted figure was coarse; but he was cleaner than other boys of his type; and his writing, though large and round, was good; and he glanced at the backs of the books with an awakened curiosity that went below the binding. No one who can read ever looks at a book, even unopened on a shelf, like one who can not.

"Were any means taken, do you know, boy, to ascertain if it was possible to restore life?" Mortimer inquired, as he sought for his hat.

"You wouldn't ask, Sir, if you knew his state. Pharaoh's multitude that were drowned in the Red Sea, ain't more beyond restoring to life. If Lazarus was only half as far gone, that was the greatest of all the miracles."

"Halloa!" cried Mortimer, turning round with his hat upon his head, "you seem to be at home in the Red Sea, my young friend?"

"Read of it with teacher at the school," said the boy.

"And Lazarus?"

"Yes, and him too. But don't you tell my father! We should have no peace in our place if that got touched upon. It's my sister's contriving."

"You seem to have a good sister."

"She ain't half bad," said the boy; "but if she knows her letters it's the most she does—and them I learned her."

The gloomy Eugene, with his hands in his pockets, had strolled in and assisted at the latter part of the dialogue; when the boy spoke these words slightly of his sister, he took him roughly enough by the chin, and turned up his face to look at it.

"Well, I'm sure, Sir!" said the boy, resisting; "I hope you'll know me again."

Eugene vouchsafed no answer; but made the proposal to Mortimer, "I'll go with you, if you like?" So, they all three went away together in the vehicle that had brought the boy; the two friends (once boys together at a public school) inside, smoking cigars; the boy on the box beside the driver.

"Let me see," said Mortimer, as they went along; "I have been, Eugene, upon the honorable roll of solicitors of the High Court of Chancery, and attorneys at Common Law, five years; and—except gratuitously taking instructions on an average once a fortnight, for the will of Lady Tippins, who has nothing to leave—I have had no scrap of business but this romantic business."

"And I," said Eugene, "have been 'called' seven years, and have had no business at all, and never shall have any. And if I had, I shouldn't know how to do it."

"I am far from being clear as to the last particular," returned Mortimer, with great composure, "that I have much advantage over you."

"I hate," said Eugene, putting his legs up on the opposite seat, "I hate my profession."

"Shall I incommode you, if I put mine up too?" returned Mortimer. "Thank you. I hate mine."

"It was forced upon me," said the gloomy Eugene, "because it was understood that we wanted a barrister in the family. We have got a precious one."

"It was forced upon me," said Mortimer, "because it was understood that we wanted a solicitor in the family. And we have got a precious one."

"There are four of us, with our names painted on a door-post in right of one black hole called a set of chambers," said Eugene; "and each of us has the fourth of a clerk—Cassim Baba, in the robber's cave—and Cassim is the only respectable member of the party."

"I am one by myself, one," said Mortimer, "high up an awful staircase commanding a burial-ground; and I have a whole clerk to myself, and he has nothing to do but look at the burial-ground, and what he will turn out when arrived at maturity I can not conceive. Whether, in that shabby rook's nest, he is always plotting wisdom, or plotting murder; whether he will grow up, after so much solitary brooding, to enlighten his fellow-creatures, or to poison them; is the only speck of interest that presents itself to my professional view. Will you give me a light? Thank you."

"Then idiots talk," said Eugene, leaning back, folding his arms, smoking with his eyes shut, and speaking slightly through his nose, "of Energy. If there is a word in the dictionary under any letter from A to Z that I abominate, it is energy. It is such a conventional superstition, such parrot gabble! What the deuce! Am I to rush out into the street, collar the first man of a wealthy appearance that I meet, shake him, and say, 'Go to law upon the spot, you dog, and retain me, or I'll be the death of you?' Yet that would be energy."

"Precisely my view of the case, Eugene. But show me a good opportunity, show me something really worth being energetic about, and I'll show you energy."

"And so will I," said Eugene.

And it is likely enough that ten thousand other young men, within the limits of the London Post-office town delivery, made the same hopeful remark in the course of the same evening.

The wheels rolled on, and rolled down by the Monument and the Tower, and by the Docks; down by Ratcliffe, and by Rotherhithe; down by where accumulated scum of humanity seemed to be washed from higher grounds, like so much moral sewage, and to be pausing until its own weight forced it over the bank and sunk it in the river. In and out among ships that seemed to have got ashore, and houses that seemed to have got afloat—among bowsprits staring into windows, and windows staring into water—the wheels rolled on, until they stopped at a dark corner, river-washed and otherwise not washed at all, where the boy alighted and opened the door.

"You must walk the rest, Sir; it's not many yards." He spoke in the singular number, to the express exclusion of Eugene.

"This is a confoundedly out-of-the-way place," said Mortimer, slipping over the stones and refuse on the shore, as the boy turned the corner sharp.

"Here's my father's, Sir; where the light is."

The low building had the look of having once been a mill. There was a rotten wart of wood upon its forehead that seemed to indicate where the sails had been, but the whole was very indistinctly seen in the obscurity of the night. The boy lifted the latch of the door, and they passed at once into a low circular room, where a man stood before a red fire, looking down into it, and a girl sat engaged in needle-work. The fire was in a rusty brazier, not fitted to the hearth; and a common lamp, shaped like a hyacinth-root, smoked and flared in the neck of a stone bottle on the table. There was a wooden bunk or berth in a corner, and in another corner a wooden stair leading above—so clumsy and steep that it was little better than a ladder. Two or three old sculls and oars stood against the wall, and against another part of the wall was a small dresser, making a spare show of the commonest articles of crockery and cooking-vessels. The roof of the room was not plastered, but was formed of the flooring of the room above. This, being very old, knotted, seamed and beamed, gave a lowering aspect to the chamber; and roof, and walls, and floor, alike abounding in old smears of flour, red-lead (or some such stain which it had probably acquired in warehousing), and damp, alike had a look of decomposition.

"The gentleman, father."

The figure at the red fire turned, raised its ruffled head, and looked like a bird of prey.

"You're Mortimer Lightwood, esquire; are you, Sir?"

"Mortimer Lightwood is my name. What you found," said Mortimer, glancing rather shrinkingly toward the bunk; "is it here?"

"Tain't not to say here, but it's close by. I do every thing reg'lar. I've giv' notice of the circumstarnee to the police, and the police have took possession of it. No time ain't been lost, on any hand. The police have put it into print already, and here's what the print says of it."

Taking up the bottle with the lamp in it, he held it near a paper on the wall, with the police heading, FOUND DROWNED. The two friends read the hand-bill as it stuck against the wall, and Gaffer read them as he held the light.

"Only papers on the unfortunate man, I see," said Lightwood, glancing from the description of what was found, to the finder.

"Only papers."

Here the girl arose with her work in her hand, and went out at the door.

"No money," pursued Mortimer; "but three-pence in one of the skirt-pockets."

"Three. Penny. Pieces," said Gaffer Hexam, in as many sentences.

"The trowsers pockets empty, and turned inside out."

Gaffer Hexam nodded. "But that's common.

Whether it's the wash of the tide or no, I can't say. Now, here," moving the light to another Found Drowned placard, "his pockets was found empty, and turned inside out. And here," moving the light to another, "her pocket was found empty, and turned inside out. And so was this one's. And so was that one's. I can't read, nor I don't want to it, for I know 'em by their places on the wall. This one was a sailor, with two anchors and a flag and G. F. T. on his arm. Look and see if he warn't."

"Quite right."

"This one was the young woman in gray boots, and her linen marked with a cross. Look and see if she warn't."

"Quite right."

"This is him as had a nasty cut over the eye. This is them two young sisters what tied themselves together with a handkecher. This is the drunken old chap, in a pair of list slippers and a night-cap, wot had offered—it afterward come out—to make a hole in the water for a quartern of rum stood aforehand, and kept to his word for the first and last time in his life. They pretty well papers the room, you see; but I know 'em all. I'm scholar enough!"

He waved the light over the whole, as if to typify the light of his scholarly intelligence, and then put it down on the table and stood behind it looking intently at his visitors. He had the special peculiarity of some birds of prey, that when he knitted his brow his ruffled crest stood highest.

"You did not find all these yourself; did you?" asked Eugene.

To which the bird of prey slowly rejoined, "And what might your name be, now?"

"This is my friend," Mortimer Lightwood interposed; "Mr. Eugene Wrayburn."

"Mr. Eugene Wrayburn, is it? And what might Mr. Eugene Wrayburn have asked of me?"

"I asked you, simply, if you found all these yourself?"

"I answer you, simply, most on 'em."

"Do you suppose there has been much violence and robbery, beforehand, among these cases?"

"I don't suppose at all about it," returned Gaffer. "I ain't one of the supposing sort. If you'd got your living to haul out of the river every day of your life, you mightn't be much given to supposing. Am I to show the way?"

As he opened the door, in pursuance of a nod from Lightwood, an extremely pale and disturbed face appeared in the doorway—the face of a man much agitated.

"A body missing?" asked Gaffer Hexam, stopping short; "or a body found? Which?"

"I am lost," replied the man, in a hurried and an eager manner.

"Lost!"

"I—I—am a stranger, and don't know the way. I—I—want to find the place where I can see what is described here. It is possible I may know it." He was panting, and could hardly speak; but, he showed a copy of the newly-printed bill that was still wet upon the wall. Perhaps its newness, or perhaps the accuracy of his observation of its general look, guided Gaffer to a ready conclusion.

"This gentleman, Mr. Lightwood, is on that business."

"Mr. Lightwood?"

During a pause, Mortimer and the stranger confronted each other. Neither knew the other.

"I think, Sir," said Mortimer, breaking the awkward silence with his airy self-possession, "that you did me the honor to mention my name?"

"I repeated it, after this man."

"You said you were a stranger in London?"

"An utter stranger."

"Are you seeking a Mr. Harmon?"

"No."

"Then I believe I can assure you that you are on a fruitless errand, and will not find what you fear to find. Will you come with us?"

A little winding through some muddy alleys that might have been deposited by the last ill-savored tide, brought them to the wicket-gate and bright lamp of a Police Station; where they found the Night-Inspector, with a pen and ink, and ruler, posting up his books in a whitewashed office, as studiously as if he were in a monastery on the top of a mountain, and no howling fury of a drunken woman were banging herself against a cell-door in the back-yard at his elbow. With the same air of a recluse much given to study, he desisted from his books to bestow a distrustful nod of recognition upon Gaffer, plainly importing, "Ah! we know all about you, and you'll overdo it some day;" and to inform Mr. Mortimer Lightwood and friends, that he would attend them immediately. Then, he finished ruling the work he had in hand (it might have been illuminating a missal, he was so calm), in a very neat and methodical manner, showing not the slightest consciousness of the woman who was banging herself with increased violence, and shrieking most terrifically for some other woman's liver.

"A bull's-eye," said the Night-Inspector, taking up his keys. Which a deferential satellite produced. "Now, gentlemen."

With one of his keys he opened a cool grot at the end of the yard, and they all went in. They quickly came out again, no one speaking but Eugene: who remarked to Mortimer, in a whisper, "Not much worse than Lady Tippins."

So, back to the whitewashed library of the monastery—with that liver still in shrieking requisition, as it had been loudly, while they looked at the silent sight they came to see—and there through the merits of the case as summed up by the Abbot. No clew to how body came into river. Very often was no clew. Too late to know for certain, whether injuries received before or after death; one excellent surgical opinion said, before; other excellent surgical opinion said, after. Steward of ship in which gentleman came home passenger, had been round to view, and had no doubt of identity. Likewise could swear to clothes. And then, you see, you had the papers, too. How was it he had totally disappeared on leaving ship, 'till found in river? Well! Probably had been upon some little game. Probably thought it a harmless game, wasn't up to things, and it turned out a fatal game. Inquest to-morrow, and no doubt open verdict.

"It appears to have knocked your friend over—knocked him completely off his legs," Mr. Inspector remarked, when he had finished his summing up. "It has given him a bad turn to be sure!" This was said in a very low voice, and with a searching look (not the first he had cast) at the stranger.

Mr. Lightwood explained that it was no friend of his.

"Indeed?" said Mr. Inspector, with an attentive ear; "where did you pick him up?"

Mr. Lightwood explained further.

Mr. Inspector had delivered his summing up, and had added these words, with his elbows leaning on his desk, and the fingers and thumb of his right hand, fitting themselves to the fingers and thumb of his left. Mr. Inspector moved nothing but his eyes, as he now added, raising his voice:

"Turned you faint, Sir! Seems you're not accustomed to this kind of work?"

The stranger, who was leaning against the chimney-piece with drooping head, looked round and answered, "No. It's a horrible sight!"

"You expected to identify, I am told, Sir?"

"Yes."

"Have you identified?"

"No. It's a horrible sight. Oh! a horrible, horrible sight!"

"Who did you think it might have been?" asked Mr. Inspector. "Give us a description, Sir. Perhaps we can help you."

"No, no," said the stranger; "it would be quite useless. Good-night."

Mr. Inspector had not moved, and had given no order; but the satellite slipped his back against the wicket, and laid his left arm along the top of it, and with his right hand turned the bull's-eye he had taken from his chief—in quite a casual manner—toward the stranger.

"You missed a friend, you know; or you missed a foe, you know; or you wouldn't have come here, you know. Well, then; ain't it reasonable to ask, who was it?" Thus, Mr. Inspector.

"You must excuse my telling you. No class of man can understand better than you, that families may not choose to publish their disagreements and misfortunes, except upon the last necessity. I do not dispute that you discharge your duty in asking me the question; you will not dispute my right to withhold the answer. Good-night."

Again he turned toward the wicket, where the satellite, with his eye upon his chief, remained a dumb statue.

"At least," said Mr. Inspector, "you will not object to leave me your card, Sir?"

"I should not object, if I had one; but I have not." He reddened and was much confused as he gave the answer.

"At least," said Mr. Inspector, with no change of voice or manner, "you will not object to write down your name and address?"

"Not at all."

Mr. Inspector dipped a pen in his inkstand, and softly laid it on a piece of paper close beside him; then resumed his former attitude. The stranger stepped up to the desk, and wrote in a rather tremulous hand—Mr. Inspector taking sidelong note of every hair of his head when it was bent down for the purpose—"Mr. Julius Handford, Exchequer Coffee-House, Palace Yard, Westminster."

"Staying there, I presume, Sir?"

"Staying there."

"Consequently, from the country?"

"Eh? Yes—from the country."

"Good-night, Sir."

The satellite removed his arm and opened the wicket, and Mr. Julius Handford went out.

"Reserve!" said Mr. Inspector. "Take care of this piece of paper, keep him in view without giving offense, ascertain that he is staying there, and find out any thing you can about him."

The satellite was gone; and Mr. Inspector, becoming once again the quiet Abbot of that Monastery, dipped his pen in his ink and resumed his books. The two friends who had watched him, more amused by the professional manner than suspicious of Mr. Julius Handford, inquired before taking their departure too whether he believed there was any thing that really looked bad here?

The Abbot replied with reticence, "Couldn't say. If a murder, any body might have done it. Burglary or pocket-picking wanted 'prenticeship. Not so, murder. We were all of us up to that. Had seen scores of people come to identify, and never saw one person struck in that particular way. Might, however, have been Stomach, and not Mind. If so, rum stomach. But to be sure there were rum every things. Pity there was not a word of truth in that superstition about bodies bleeding when touched by the right hand; you never got a sign out of bodies. You got row enough out of such as her—she was good for all night now" (referring here to the banging demands for the liver), "but you got nothing out of bodies if it was ever so."

There being nothing more to be done until the Inquest was held next day, the friends went away together, and Gaffer Hexam and his son went their separate way. But, arriving at the last corner, Gaffer bade his boy go home while he turned into a red-curtained tavern, that stood dropsically bulging over the dirty causeway, "for a half-a-pint."

The boy lifted the latch he had lifted before, and found his sister again seated before the fire at her work. Who raised her head upon his coming in and asking:

"Where did you go, Liz?"

"I went out in the dark."

"There was no necessity for that. It was all right enough."

"One of the gentlemen, the one who didn't speak while I was there, looked hard at me. And I was afraid he might know what my face meant. But there! Don't mind me, Charley! I was all in a tremble of another sort when you owned to father you could write a little."

"Ah! But I made believe I wrote so badly, as that it was odds if any one could read it. And when I wrote slowest and smeared out with my finger most, father was best pleased, as he stood looking over me."

The girl put aside her work, and drawing her seat close to his seat by the fire, laid her arm gently on his shoulder.

"You'll make the most of your time, Charley; won't you?"

"Won't I? Come! I like that. Don't I?"

"Yes, Charley, yes. You work hard at your learning, I know. And I work a little, Charley, and plan and contrive a little (wake out of my sleep contriving sometimes), how to get together a shilling now, and a shilling then, that shall make father believe you are beginning to earn a stray living along shore."

"You are father's favorite, and can make him believe any thing."

"I wish I could, Charley! For if I could make him believe that learning was a good thing, and that we might lead better lives, I should be a most content to die."

"Don't talk stuff about dying, Liz."

She placed her hands in one another on his shoulder, and laying her rich brown cheek against them as she looked down at the fire, went on thoughtfully:

"Of an evening, Charley, when you are at the school, and father's—"

"At the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters," the boy struck in, with a backward nod of his head toward the public house.

"Yes. Then as I sit a-looking at the fire, I seem to see in the burning coal—like where that glow is now—"

"That's gas, that is," said the boy, "coming out of a bit of a forest that's been under the mud that was under the water in the days of Noah's Ark. Look here! When I take the poker—so—and give it a dig—"

"Don't disturb it, Charley, or it'll be all in a blaze. It's that dull glow near it, coming and going, that I mean. When I look at it of an evening, it comes like pictures to me, Charley."

"Show us a picture," said the boy. "Tell us where to look."

"Ah! It wants my eyes, Charley."

"Cut away then, and tell us what your eyes make of it."

"Why, there are you and me, Charley, when you were quite a baby that never knew a mother—"

"Don't go saying I never knew a mother," interposed the boy, "for I knew a little sister that was sister and mother both."

The girl laughed delightedly, and her eyes filled with pleasant tears, as he put both his arms round her waist and so held her.

"There are you and me, Charley, when father was away at work and locked us out, for fear we should set ourselves afire or fall out of window, sitting on the door-sill, sitting on other door-steps, sitting on the bank of the river, wandering about to get through the time. You are rather heavy to carry, Charley, and I am often obliged to rest. Sometimes we are sleepy and fall asleep together in a corner, sometimes we are very hungry, sometimes we are a little frightened, but what is oftenest hard upon us is the cold. You remember, Charley?"

"I remember," said the boy, pressing her to him twice or thrice, "that I snuggled under a little shawl, and it was warm there."

"Sometimes it rains, and we creep under a boat or the like of that; sometimes it's dark, and we get among the gaslights, sitting watching the people as they go along the streets. At last, up comes father and takes us home. And home seems such a shelter after out of doors! And father pulls my shoes off, and dries my feet at the fire, and has me to sit by him while he smokes his pipe long after you are abed, and I notice that father's is a large hand but never a heavy one when it touches me, and that father's is a rough voice but never an angry one when it speaks to me. So, I grow up, and little by little father trusts me, and makes me his companion, and, let him be put out as he may, never once strikes me."

The listening boy gave a grunt here, as much as to say "But he strikes me though!"

"Those are some of the pictures of what is past, Charley."

"Cut away again," said the boy, "and give us a fortune-telling one; a future one."

"Well! There am I, continuing with father and holding to father, because father loves me and I love father. I can't so much as read a book, because, if I had learned, father would have thought I was deserting him, and I should have lost my influence. I have not the influence I want to have, I can not stop some dreadful things I try to stop, but I go on in the hope and trust that the time will come. In the mean while I know that I am in some things a stay to father, and that if I was not faithful to him he would—in revenge-like, or in disappointment, or both—go wild and bad."

"Give us a touch of the fortune-telling pictures about me."

"I was passing on to them, Charley," said the girl, who had not changed her attitude since she began, and who now mournfully shook her head; "the others were all leading up. There are you—"

"Where am I, Liz?"

"Still in the hollow down by the flare."

"There seems to be the deuce-and-all in the hollow down by the flare," said the boy, glancing from her eyes to the brazier, which had a grisly skeleton look on its long thin legs.

"There are you, Charley, working your way, in secret from father, at the school; and you get prizes; and you go on better and better; and you come to be a—what was it you called it when you told me about that?"

"Ha, ha! Fortune-telling not know the name!" cried the boy, seeming to be rather relieved by this default on the part of the hollow down by the flare. "Pupil-teacher."

"You come to be a pupil-teacher, and you still go on better and better, and you rise to be a master full of learning and respect. But the secret has come to father's knowledge long before, and it has divided you from father, and from me."

"No it hasn't!"

"Yes it has, Charley. I see, as plain as plain can be, that your way is not ours, and that even if father could be got to forgive your taking it (which he never could be), that way of yours would be darkened by our way. But I see too, Charley—"

"Still as plain as plain can be, Liz?" asked the boy, playfully.

"Ah! Still. That it is a great work to have cut you away from father's life, and to have made a new and good beginning. So there am I, Charley, left alone with father, keeping him as straight as I can, watching for more influence than I have, and hoping that through some fortunate chance, or when he is ill, or when—I don't know what—I may turn him to wish to do better things."

"You said you couldn't read a book, Lizzie. Your library of books is the hollow down by the flare, I think."

"I should be very glad to be able to read real books. I feel my want of learning very much, Charley. But I should feel it much more, if I didn't know it to be a tie between me and father.—Hark! Father's tread!"

It being now past midnight, the bird of prey went straight to roost. At mid-day following he reappeared at the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters, in the character, not new to him, of a witness before a Coroner's Jury.

Mr. Mortimer Lightwood, besides sustaining the character of one of the witnesses, doubled the part with that of the eminent solicitor who watched the proceedings on behalf of the representatives of the deceased, as was duly recorded in the newspapers. Mr. Inspector watched the proceedings too, and kept his watching closely to himself. Mr. Julius Handford having given his right address, and being reported in solvent circumstances as to his bill, though nothing more was known of him at his hotel except that his way of life was very retired, had no summons to appear, and was merely present in the shades of Mr. Inspector's mind.

The case was made interesting to the public by Mr. Mortimer Lightwood giving evidence touching the circumstances under which the deceased, Mr. John Harmon, had returned to England; exclusive private proprietorship in which circumstances was set up at dinner-tables for several days, by Veneering, Twemlow, Podsnap, and all the Buffers: who all related them irreconcilably with one another, and contradicted themselves. It was also made interesting by the testimony of Job Potterson, the ship's steward, and one Mr. Jacob Kibble, a fellow-passenger, that the deceased Mr. John Harmon did bring over, in a hand-valise with which he did disembark, the sum he had realized by the forced sale of his little landed property, and that the sum exceeded, in ready money, seven hundred pounds. It was further made interesting by the remarkable experiences of Jesse Hexam in having rescued from the Thames so many dead bodies, and for whose behoof a rapturous admirer, subscribing himself "A friend to Burial" (perhaps an undertaker), sent eighteen postage-stamps, and five "Now Sir"s to the editor of the Times.

Upon the evidence adduced before them the Jury found, That the body of Mr. John Harmon had been discovered floating in the Thames, in an advanced state of decay, and much injured, and that the said Mr. John Harmon had come by his death under highly suspicious circumstances, though by whose act or in what precise manner there was no evidence before this Jury to show. And they appended to their verdict a recommendation to the Home Office (which Mr. Inspector appeared to think highly sensible), to offer a reward for the solution of the mystery. Within eight-and-forty hours a reward of One Hundred Pounds was proclaimed, together with a free pardon to any person or persons not the actual perpetrator or perpetrators, and so forth in due form.

This Proclamation rendered Mr. Inspector additionally studious, and caused him to stand meditating on river-stairs and causeways, and to go lurking about in boats, putting this and that together. But, according to the success with which you put this and that together, you get a woman and a fish apart, or a Mermaid in combination. And Mr. Inspector could turn out nothing better than a Mermaid, which no Judge and Jury would believe in.

Thus, like the tides on which it had been borne to the knowledge of men, the Harmon Murder—as it came to be popularly called—went up and down, and ebbed and flowed, now in the town, now in the country, now among palaces, now among hovels, now among lords and ladies and gentlefolks, now among laborers and hammerers and ballast-heavers, until at last, after a long interval of slack-water, it got out to sea and drifted away.

CHAPTER IV.

THE R. WILFER FAMILY.

REGINALD WILFER is a name with rather a grand sound, suggesting on first acquaintance brasses in country churches, scrolls in stained-glass windows, and generally the De Wilfers who came over with the Conqueror. For, it is a remarkable fact in genealogy that no De Any ones ever came over with Any body else.

But, the Reginald Wilfer family were of such commonplace extraction and pursuits that their forefathers had for generations modestly subsisted on the Docks, the Excise-Office, and the Custom-House, and the existing R. Wilfer was a poor clerk. So poor a clerk, though having a limited salary and an unlimited family, that he had never yet attained the modest object of his ambition: which was, to wear a complete new suit of clothes, hat and boots included, at one time. His black hat was brown before he could afford a coat, his pantaloons were white at the seams and knees before he could buy a pair of boots, his boots had worn out before he could treat himself to new pantaloons, and, by the time he worked round to the hat again, that shining modern article roofed-in an ancient ruin of various periods.

If the conventional Cherub could ever grow up and clothed, he might be photographed as a view of Wilfer. His chubby, smooth, innocent appearance was a reason for his being always treated with condescension when he was not put down. A stranger entering his own poor house at about ten o'clock P.M. might have been surprised to find him sitting up to supper. So boyish was he in his curves and proportions, that his old schoolmaster meeting him in Cheapside, might have been unable to withstand the temptation of caning him on the spot. In short, he was the conventional cherub, after the supposititious shoot just mentioned, rather gray, with signs of care on his expression, and in decidedly insolvent circumstances.

He was shy, and unwilling to own to the name of Reginald, as being too aspiring and self-assertive a name. In his signature he used only the initial R., and imparted what it really stood for to none but chosen friends, under the seal of confidence. Out of this, the facetious habit had arisen in the neighborhood surrounding Mincing Lane of making Christian names for him of adjectives and participles beginning with R. Some of these were more or less appropriate: as Rusty, Retiring, Ruddy, Round, Ripe, Ridiculous, Ruminative; others derived their point from their want of application—as Raging, Rattling, Roaring, Raffish. But his popular name was Rumty, which in a moment of inspiration had been bestowed upon him by a gentleman of convivial habits connected with the drug-market, as the beginning of a social chorus, his leading part in the execution of which had led this gentleman to the Temple of Fame, and of which the whole expressive burden ran:

"Rumty iddity, row dow dow,
Sing toodlely, teedlely, bow wow wow."

Thus he was constantly addressed, even in minor notes on business, as "Dear Rumty;" in answer to which, he sedately signed himself, "Yours truly, R. Wilfer."

He was clerk in the drug-house of Chicksey, Veneering, and Stobbles. Chicksey and Stobbles, his former masters, had both become absorbed in Veneering, once their traveler or commission agent: who had signalized his accession to supreme power by bringing into the business a quantity of plate-glass window and French-polished mahogany partition, and a gleaming and enormous door-plate.

R. Wilfer locked up his desk one evening, and, putting his bunch of keys in his pocket much as if it were his peg-top, made for home. His house was in the Holloway region north of London, and then divided from it by fields and trees. Between Battle Bridge and that part of the Holloway district in which he dwelt, was a tract of suburban Sahara, where tiles and bricks were burnt, bones were boiled, carpets were beat, rubbish was shot, dogs were fought, and dust was heaped by contractors. Skirting the border of this desert, by the way he took, when the light of its kiln-fires made lurid smears on the fog, R. Wilfer sighed and shook his head.

"Ah me!" said he, "what might have been is not what is!"

With which commentary on human life, indicating an experience of it not exclusively his own, he made the best of his way to the end of his journey.

Mrs. Wilfer was, of course, a tall woman and an angular. Her lord being cherubic, she was necessarily majestic, according to the principle which matrimonially unites contrasts. She was much given to tying up her head in a pocket-handkerchief, knotted under the chin. This head-gear, in conjunction with a pair of gloves worn within doors, she seemed to consider as at once a kind of armor against misfortune (invariably assuming it when in low spirits or difficulties), and as a species of full dress. It was therefore with some sinking of the spirit that her husband beheld her thus heroically attired, putting down her candle in the little hall, and coming down the door-steps through the little front court to open the gate for him.

Something had gone wrong with the house-door, for R. Wilfer stopped on the steps, staring at it, and cried: "Halloa?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Wilfer, "the man came himself with a pair of pincers, and took it off, and took it away. He said that as he had no expectation of ever being paid for it, and as he had an order for another LADIES' SCHOOL door-plate, it was better (burnished up) for the interests of all parties."

"Perhaps it was, my dear; what do you think?"

"You are master here, R. W.," returned his wife. "It is as you think; not as I do. Perhaps it might have been better if the man had taken the door too?"

"My dear, we couldn't have done without the door."

"Couldn't we?"

"Why, my dear! Could we?"

"It is as you think, R. W.; not as I do."

With those submissive words, the dutiful wife preceded him down a few stairs to a little basement front-room, half kitchen, half parlor, where a girl of about nineteen, with an exceedingly pretty figure and face but with an impatient and petulant expression both in her face and in her shoulders (which in her sex and at her age are very expressive of discontent), sat playing draughts with a younger girl, who was the youngest of the House of Wilfer. Not to encumber this page by telling off the Wilfers in detail and casting them up in the gross, it is enough for the present that the rest were what is called "out in the world," in various ways, and that they were Many. So many, that when one of his dutiful children called in to see him, R. Wilfer generally seemed to say to himself, after a little mental arithmetic, "Oh! here's another of 'em!" before adding aloud, "How de do, John," or Susan, as the case might be.

"Well, Piggywiggies," said R. W., "how de do to-night? What I was thinking of, my dear," to Mrs. Wilfer already seated in a corner with folded gloves, "was, that as we have let our first floor so well, and as we have now no place in which you could teach pupils, even if pupils—"

"The milkman said he knew of two young ladies of the highest respectability who were in search of a suitable establishment, and he took a card," interposed Mrs. Wilfer, with severe monotony, as if she were reading an Act of Parliament aloud. "Tell your father whether it was last Monday, Bella."

"But we never heard any more of it, ma," said Bella, the elder girl.

"In addition to which, my dear," her husband urged, "if you have no place to put two young persons into—"

"Pardon me," Mrs. Wilfer again interposed; "they were not young persons. Two young ladies of the highest respectability. Tell your father, Bella, whether the milkman said so."

"My dear, it is the same thing."

"No it is not," said Mrs. Wilfer, with the same impressive monotony. "Pardon me!"

"I mean, my dear, it is the same thing as to space. As to space. If you have no space in which to put two youthful fellow-creatures, however eminently respectable, which I do not doubt, where are those youthful fellow-creatures to be accommodated? I carry it no further than that. And solely looking at it," said her husband, making the stipulation at once in a conciliatory, complimentary, and argumentative tone—"as I am sure you will agree, my love—from a fellow-creature point of view, my dear."

"I have nothing more to say," returned Mrs. Wilfer, with a meek renunciatory action of her gloves. "It is as you think, R. W.; not as I do."

Here, the huffing of Miss Bella and the loss of three of her men at a swoop, aggravated by the coronation of an opponent, led to that young lady's jerking the draught-board and pieces off the table: which her sister went down on her knees to pick up.

"Poor Bella!" said Mrs. Wilfer.

"And poor Lavinia, perhaps, my dear?" suggested R. W.

"Pardon me," said Mrs. Wilfer, "no!"

It was one of the worthy woman's specialties that she had an amazing power of gratifying her splenetic or worldly-minded humors by extolling her own family: which she thus proceeded, in the present case, to do.

"No, R. W. Lavinia has not known the trial that Bella has known. The trial that your daughter Bella has undergone, is, perhaps, without a parallel, and has been borne, I will say, Nobly. When you see your daughter Bella in her black dress, which she alone of all the family wears, and when you remember the circumstances which have led to her wearing it, and when you know how those circumstances have been sustained, then, R. W., lay your head upon your pillow and say, 'Poor Lavinia!'"

Here, Miss Lavinia, from her kneeling situation under the table, put in that she didn't want to be "poored by pa," or any body else.

"I am sure you do not, my dear," returned her mother, "for you have a fine brave spirit. And your sister Cecilia has a fine brave spirit of another kind, a spirit of pure devotion, a beau-ti-ful spirit! The self-sacrifice of Cecilia reveals a pure and womanly character, very seldom equaled—never surpassed. I have now in my pocket a letter from your sister Cecilia, received this morning—received three months after her marriage, poor child!—in which she tells me that her husband must unexpectedly shelter under their roof his reduced aunt. 'But I will be true to him, mamma,' she touchingly writes, 'I will not leave him, I must not forget that he is my husband. Let his aunt come!' If this is not pathetic, if this is not woman's devotion—!" The good lady waved her gloves in a sense of the impossibility of saying more, and tied the pocket-handkerchief over her head in a tighter knot under her chin.

Bella, who was now seated on the rug to warm herself, with her brown eyes on the fire and a handful of her brown curls in her mouth, laughed at this, and then pouted and half cried.

"I am sure," said she, "though you have no feeling for me, pa, I am one of the most unfortunate girls that ever lived. You know how poor we are" (it is probable he did, having some reason to know it!), "and what a glimpse of wealth I had, and how it melted away, and how I am here in this ridiculous mourning—which I hate!—a kind of a widow who never was married. And yet you don't feel for me.—Yes you do, yes you do."

This abrupt change was occasioned by her father's face. She stopped to pull him down from his chair in an attitude highly favorable to strangulation, and to give him a kiss and a pat or two on the cheek.

"But you ought to feel for me, you know, pa."

"My dear, I do."

"Yes, and I say you ought to. If they had only left me alone and told me nothing about it, it would have mattered much less. But that nasty Mr. Lightwood feels it his duty, as he says, to write and tell me what is in reserve for me, and then I am obliged to get rid of George Sampson."

Here, Lavinia, rising to the surface with the last draughtman rescued, interposed, "You never cared for George Sampson, Bella."

"And did I say I did, miss?" Then, pouting again, with the curls in her mouth; "George Sampson was very fond of me, and admired me very much, and put up with every thing I did to him."

"You were rude enough to him," Lavinia again interposed.

"And did I say I wasn't, miss? I am not setting up to be sentimental about George Sampson. I only say George Sampson was better than nothing."

"You didn't show him that you thought even that," Lavinia again interposed.

"You are a chit and a little idiot," returned Bella, "or you wouldn't make such a dolly speech. What did you expect me to do? Wait till you are a woman, and don't talk about what you don't understand. You only show your ignorance!" Then, whimpering again, and at intervals biting the curls, and stopping to look how much was bitten off, "It's a shame! There never was such a hard case! I shouldn't care so much if it wasn't so ridiculous. It was ridiculous enough to have a stranger coming over to marry me, whether he liked it or not. It was ridiculous enough to know what an embarrassing meeting it would be, and how we never could pretend to have an inclination of our own, either of us. It was ridiculous enough to know I shouldn't like him—how could I like him, left to him in a will like a dozen of spoons, with every thing cut and dried beforehand, like orange chips. Talk of orange flowers indeed! I declare again it's a shame! Those ridiculous points would have been smoothed away by the money, for I love money, and want money—want it dreadfully. I hate to be poor, and we are degradingly poor, offensively poor, miserably poor, beastly poor. But here I am, left with all the ridiculous parts of the situation remaining, and, added to them all, this ridiculous dress! And if the truth was known, when the Harmon murder was all over the town, and people were speculating on its being suicide, I dare say those impudent wretches at the clubs and places made jokes about the miserable creature's having preferred a watery grave to me. It's likely enough they took such liberties; I shouldn't wonder! I declare it's a very hard case indeed, and I am a most unfortunate girl. The idea of being a kind of a widow, and never having been married! And the idea of being as poor as ever after all, and going into black, besides, for a man I never saw, and should have hated—as far as he was concerned—if I had seen!”

The young lady's lamentations were checked at this point by a knuckle, knocking at the half-open door of the room. The knuckle had knocked two or three times already, but had not been heard.

“Who is it?” said Mrs. Wilfer, in her Act-of-Parliament manner. “Enter!”

A gentleman coming in, Miss Bella, with a short and sharp exclamation, scrambled off the hearth-rug and massed the bitten curls together in their right place on her neck.

“The servant-girl had her key in the door as I came up, and directed me to this room, telling me I was expected. I am afraid I should have asked her to announce me.”

“Pardon me,” returned Mrs. Wilfer. “Not at all. Two of my daughters. R. W., this is the gentleman who has taken our first-floor. He was so good as to make an appointment for to-night, when you would be at home.”

A dark gentleman. Thirty at the most. An expressive, one might say handsome, face. A very bad manner. In the last degree constrained, reserved, diffident, troubled. His eyes were on Miss Bella for an instant, and then looked at the ground as he addressed the master of the house.

“Seeing that I am quite satisfied, Mr. Wilfer, with the rooms, and with their situation, and with their price, I suppose a memorandum between us of two or three lines, and a payment down, will bind the bargain? I wish to send in furniture without delay.”

Two or three times during this short address, the cherub addressed had made chubby motions towards a chair. The gentleman now took it, laying a hesitating hand on a corner of the table, and with another hesitating hand lifting the crown of his hat to his lips, and drawing it before his mouth.

“The gentleman, R. W.,” said Mrs. Wilfer, “proposes to take our apartments by the quarter. A quarter's notice on either side.”

“Shall I mention, Sir,” insinuated the landlord, expecting it to be received as a matter of course, “the form of a reference?”

“I think,” returned the gentleman, after a pause, “that a reference is not necessary; neither, to say the truth, is it convenient, for I am a stranger in London. I require no reference from you, and perhaps, therefore, you will require none from me. That will be fair on both sides. Indeed, I show the greater confidence of the two, for I will pay in advance whatever you please, and I am going to trust my furniture here. Whereas, if you were in embarrassed circumstances—this is merely supposititious—”

Conscience causing R. Wilfer to color, Mrs. Wilfer, from a corner (she always got into stately corners) came to the rescue with a deep-toned “Per-fectly.”

“—Why then I—I might lose it.”

“Do you think they are the best, pa?” asked Miss Bella, in a low voice, and without looking over her shoulder as she warmed her foot on the fender.

“Among the best, my dear.”

“I should have thought, myself, it was so easy to add the usual kind of one,” said Bella, with a toss of her curls.

The gentleman listened to her, with a face of marked attention, though he neither looked up nor changed his attitude. He sat, still and silent, until his future landlord accepted his proposals, and brought writing materials to complete the business. He sat, still and silent, while the landlord wrote.

When the agreement was ready in duplicate (the landlord having worked at it like some cherubic scribe, in what is conventionally called a doubtful, which means a not at all doubtful, Old Master), it was signed by the contracting parties, Bella looking on as scornful witness. The contracting parties were R. Wilfer, and John Rokesmith, Esquire.

When it came to Bella's turn to sign her name, Mr. Rokesmith, who was standing, as he had sat, with a hesitating hand upon the table, looked at her stealthily, but narrowly. He looked at the pretty figure bending down over the paper and saying, “Where am I to go, pa? Here, in this corner?” He looked at the beautiful brown hair, shading the coquettish face; he looked at the free dash of the signature, which was a bold one for a woman's; and then they looked at one another.

“Much obliged to you, Miss Wilfer.”

“Obliged?”

“I have given you so much trouble.”

“Signing my name? Yes, certainly. But I am your landlord's daughter, Sir.”

As there was nothing more to do but pay eight sovereigns in earnest of the bargain, pocket the agreement, appoint a time for the arrival of his furniture and himself, and go, Mr. Rokesmith did that as awkwardly as it might be done, and was escorted by his landlord to the outer air. When R. Wilfer returned, candlestick in hand, to the bosom of his family, he found the bosom agitated.

“Pa,” said Lavinia, “we have got a Robber.”

“To see him unable for his life to look any body in the face!” said Bella. “There never was such an exhibition.”

“My dears,” said their father, “he is a diffident gentleman, and I should say particularly so in the society of girls of your age.”

“Nonsense, our age!” cried Bella, impatiently. “What's that got to do with him?”

“Besides, we are not of the same age:—which age?” demanded Lavinia.

"Never you mind, Lavvy," retorted Bella; "you wait till you are of an age to ask such questions. Pa, mark my words! Between Mr. Rokesmith and me there is a natural antipathy and a deep distrust; and something will come of it!"

"My dear, and girls," said the cherub-patriarch, "between Mr. Rokesmith and me there is a matter of eight sovereigns, and something for supper shall come of it, if you'll agree upon the article."

This was a neat and happy turn to give the subject, treats being rare in the Wilfer household, where a monotonous appearance of Dutch-cheese at ten o'clock in the evening had been rather frequently commented on by the dimpled shoulders of Miss Bella. Indeed, the modest Dutchman himself seemed conscious of his want of variety, and generally came before the family in a state of apologetic perspiration. After some discussion on the relative merits of veal-cutlet, sweet-bread, and lobster, a decision was pronounced in favor of veal-cutlet. Mrs. Wilfer then solemnly divested herself of her handkerchief and gloves, as a preliminary sacrifice to preparing the frying-pan, and R. W. himself went out to purchase the viand. He soon returned, bearing the same in a fresh cabbage-leaf, where it coyly embraced a rasher of ham. Melodious sounds were not long in rising from the frying-pan on the fire, or in seeming, as the fire-light danced in the mellow halls of a couple of full bottles on the table, to play appropriate dance-music.

The cloth was laid by Lavvy. Bella, as the acknowledged ornament of the family, employed both her hands in giving her hair an additional wave while sitting in the easiest chair, and occasionally threw in a direction touching the supper: as, "Very brown, ma;" or, to her sister, "Put the salt-cellar straight, miss, and don't be a dowdy little puss."

Meantime her father, chinking Mr. Rokesmith's gold as he sat expectant between his knife and fork, remarked that six of those sovereigns came just in time for their landlord, and stood them in a little pile on the white table-cloth to look at.

"I hate our landlord!" said Bella.

But, observing a fall in her father's face, she went and sat down by him at the table, and began touching up his hair with the handle of a fork. It was one of the girl's spoiled ways to be always arranging the family's hair—perhaps because her own was so pretty, and occupied so much of her attention.

"You deserve to have a house of your own; don't you, poor pa?"

"I don't deserve it better than another, my dear."

"At any rate I, for one, want it more than another," said Bella, holding him by the chin, as she stuck his flaxen hair on end, "and I grudge this money going to the Monster that swallows up so much, when we all want—every thing. And if you say (as you want to say; I know you want to say so, pa) 'that's neither reasonable nor honest, Bella,' then I answer, 'May be not, pa—very likely—but it's one of the consequences of being poor, and of thoroughly hating and detesting to be poor, and that's my case.' Now, you look lovely, pa; why don't you always wear your hair like that? And here's the cutlet! If it isn't very brown, ma, I can't eat it, and must have a bit put back to be done expressly."

However, as it was brown, even to Bella's taste, the young lady graciously partook of it without reconsignment to the frying-pan, and also, in due course, of the contents of the two bottles: whereof one held Scotch ale and the other rum. The latter perfume, with the fostering aid of boiling water and lemon-peel, diffused itself throughout the room, and became so highly concentrated around the warm fireside, that the wind passing over the house roof must have rushed off charged with a delicious whiff of it, after buzzing like a great bee at that particular chimney-pot.

"Pa," said Bella, sipping the fragrant mixture and warming her favorite ankle; "when old Mr. Harmon made such a fool of me (not to mention himself, as he is dead), what do you suppose he did it for?"

"Impossible to say, my dear. As I have told you times out of number since his will was brought to light, I doubt if I ever exchanged a hundred words with the old gentleman. If it was his whim to surprise us, his whim succeeded. For he certainly did it."

"And I was stamping my foot and screaming, when he first took notice of me; was I?" said Bella, contemplating the ankle before mentioned.

"You were stamping your little foot, my dear, and screaming with your little voice, and laying into me with your little bonnet, which you had snatched off for the purpose," returned her father, as if the remembrance gave a relish to the rum; "you were doing this one Sunday morning when I took you out, because I didn't go the exact way you wanted, when the old gentleman, sitting on a seat near, said, 'That's a nice girl; that's a very nice girl; a promising girl!' And so you were, my dear."

"And then he asked my name, did he, pa?"

"Then he asked your name, my dear, and mine; and on other Sunday mornings, when we walked his way, we saw him again, and—and really that's all."

As that was all the rum and water too, or, in other words, as R. W. delicately signified that his glass was empty, by throwing back his head and standing the glass upside down on his nose and upper lip, it might have been charitable in Mrs. Wilfer to suggest replenishment. But that heroine briefly suggesting "Bedtime" instead, the bottles were put away, and the family retired; she cherubically escorted, like some severe saint in a painting, or merely human matron allegorically treated.

And by this time to-morrow," said Lavinia when the two girls were alone in their room, "we shall have Mr. Rokesmith here, and shall be expecting to have our throats cut."

"You needn't stand between me and the candle for all that," retorted Bella. "This is another of the consequences of being poor! The idea of a girl with a really fine head of hair, having to do it by one flat candle and a few inches of looking-glass!"

"You caught George Sampson with it, Bella, bad as your means of dressing it are."

"You low little thing. Caught George Sampson with it! Don't talk about catching people, miss, till your own time for catching—as you call it—comes."

"Perhaps it has come," muttered Lavvy, with a toss of her head.

"What did you say?" asked Bella, very sharply. "What did you say, miss?"

Lavvy declining equally to repeat or to explain, Bella gradually lapsed over her hair-dressing into a soliloquy on the miseries of being poor, as exemplified in having nothing to put on, nothing to go out in, nothing to dress by, only a nasty box to dress at instead of a commodious dressing-table, and being obliged to take in suspicious lodgers. On the last grievance as her climax she laid great stress—and might have laid greater, had she known that if Mr. Julius Handford had a twin brother upon earth Mr. John Rokesmith was the man.

[“The Committee on Revolutionary Pensions reported a resolution, tendering thanks to the surviving Soldiers of the Revolution, twelve in number, for their services in that war by which our Independence was achieved and our Liberty obtained, and sincerely rejoicing that their lives have been protracted beyond the period usually allotted to man: and that they receive a sum of money, as pensioners, which shall help to smooth the rugged path of life on their journey to the tomb: and that copies of this resolution be sent by the Speaker to each Revolutionary Pensioner:—Unanimously adopted.”—Journal of Congress, March 4, 1864.]

Only Twelve left:—Twelve worn and weary men,
 With the soft spray of age upon their locks,
 In white remembrance of the storm-time when
 To Freedom's haven they were outer rocks.

Only Twelve left:—How short has grown the roll;
 A nation calls it with suspended breath,
 Lest from its hand should pass the sacred scroll,
 To the last calling of the voice of death.

Only Twelve left:—The ranks are thin, and wide
 Apart in the dim armies of the past;
 Faint and afar they stand, who side by side
 Their steel-clamped columns on the foeman cast.

Only Twelve left:—In the still camps of death
 The comrades of their toils and triumphs lie;
 And marble sentries guard with noiseless breath
 Their green encampments of eternity.

Only Twelve left:—With slow and feeble tread
 Yet for a little time their march they keep,
 From the far fading fields of doubt and dread,
 To the near fortresses of rest and sleep.

Only Twelve left:—The sacred leaves to turn Back to the records of unvalued worth,
 And fix young Freedom's lineage at the urn
 Of his red baptism, who beheld his birth.

Only Twelve left:—The golden-fruited years
 Have dropped unheeded bounty on the sod,
 While a proud nation's feet 'mid wrongs and tears
 Have turned to paths these heroes never trod.

THE LETTER G.

"MADGE, you are an angel!"
 "Oh, Peter!" exclaimed the angel, blushing like the rosy dawn.

It was summer-time. The two were sitting in a honey-suckle-scented arbor, out of which they walked, engaged to be married.

How can I help it if my hero's name is Peter? I don't invent like other story-tellers; and this is an owre true tale.

Next day when Master Peter Brooks, sumptuously attired for the occasion, asked Mr. Bolton, with whom he was a great favorite, for the hand of his daughter, that old gentleman refused him plump.

It was a most touching condition of things. Two despairing lovers, a cruel step-mother, and a hard-hearted father, all en regle.

"Very well, my dear," the step-mother had observed to her husband the night previous—"very well. You have permitted that boy, not yet out of college and not worth a cent, to come here, day after day, hanging round Madge, the consequence of which is that he and she walk in from the bower last evening all joy and blushes, evidently having exchanged mutual vows of everlasting love."

"Bless my soul! you don't say so!"

"Yes, I do. They are two children, and don't know any better: at least Madge don't. As to that Brooks boy, you know he has only the eight hundred dollars which his grandfather left him, unless his uncle chooses to give him something—a very brilliant alliance for your heiress. Come to think of it, I dare say he does not love her; he is after your money."

"After my money!" A dart of indignation flamed out of the good man's eyes. "Not love my precious little girl! What if she loves him, and breaks her heart about him!"

"Break her heart! she won't break her little finger. She will sob and cry, lament and sigh for six hours, and forget all about him in six days."

And thus it came to pass that the next day Peter was received with tremendous stiffness, his hand and heart pooh-pooh'd, and his handsome person shown the door.

I shall not harrow up my reader's sensitive feelings with an account of the unspeakable anguish which the lovers endured for some days after this, because worse is coming. We will hasten on to the miserably blissful day, late in August, when Madge ran away to the city of New York, per railroad, with a carpet-bag and Peter. They arrived in the dusk of evening and made instant search for a clergyman. They found one who united them in five minutes, and wrote a certificate in two more; and behold "man and wife" walked forth in the sweet moonlit night, Peter strutting like a warlike bantam in his pride and happiness.

Love's young dream. For six weeks it was like a story out of an Annual. The regulation penitential letter had been written to the obdurate parents, and the regulation no answer had been returned; for Mrs. Bolton took precious good care to have an unfailing supply of caustic on the end of her tongue, which kept Mr. Bolton's rage up to burning heat.

Peter had engaged apartments in the Byron House, Fifth Avenue—not too expensive, you know, for we are going to be very economical as the ensuing conversation will show, which took place a week after the marriage. The two had written letters again—he to his uncle and guardian, for Peter was an orphan; and Madge to her father, giving their present address.

They were eating dinner—soup, a partridge, macaroni, salad, and meringues glacé—all perfectly plain, and of course cheap.

"Ah!" cried Peter, laying down his knife and fork to rub his hands gleefully, "ah! isn't it gorgeous! a cozy little parlor, a capital little dinner, and a lovely little wife. I would not change with the king on his throne."

"Nor I!—we shall get along so beautifully. We must be very practical, you know. Now, let's calculate expenses. How much did your grandpapa leave you?"

"Eight hundred dollars."

"Eight — hundred — dollars! Goodness! what an enormous sum! why papa never gave me more than twenty dollars at a time. Now let's count;" and she took a tiny gold pencil out of her pocket, and a scrap of paper from a little table. "How much do we pay here?"

"Fifty dollars a week—that's rent, you know."

"Yes, fifty dollars; four weeks one month; four times fifty, two hundred. Well, rooms two hundred dollars a month. There, I've got that down. Now what else, Peter?"

"Meals."

"Oh yes, meals. They will cost hardly any thing, we eat so little. I only want chicken, and meringue, and such things."

"Say fifty dollars a month."

"Yes. Oh how nicely we are getting on! Then my dress. Let me see—I saw mamma's bill at Stewart's last year. It was twenty-two hundred dollars. But, bless your dear heart, I sha'n't spend a cent hardly; say fifty dollars a month for me; and another for you. You don't have to give more than fifty dollars for a pair of pantaloons, do you?"

"No, you little goose! not half of fifty. My uncle did not allow me as much a month for my whole wardrobe."

"Well, then, that will do splendidly. And we must have some nice books."

"And go to the opera sometimes."

"And have a carriage to make visits."

"And a good cigar or two. George! what a long column!" ejaculated Peter, stopping short.

"I think we had better count up." He made a hasty calculation, and the result stood as follows:

Rent of room	$200*
Meals	50
Dress (Madge)	50
Dress (Peter)	50
Opera	20
Books	20
Carriage	20
Cigars	10
	$420

Madge looked perfectly blank at the sum total, and could not help a little tremble in her voice as she said—"But you know, dear, we can not do without these things, can we?"

"No, darling, though it makes my grandfather's bequest melt away like snow under the sun."

At this moment a servant entered and said, some trunks and a small parcel had come for Mrs. Brooks.

"For Mrs. Brooks?" repeated Peter; "send them up."

Two large trunks were brought into the room, and a package handed to Madge.

"Why how heavy it is! What can it be—a bracelet? Yes, it feels like one, and from dear papa! He has forgiven us! he has forgiven us!" and she gave a little skip and crow of joy.

Her color went and came, and she held the packet still sealed, a vague dread creeping through her joy.

"Open it, darling," said her husband.

Madge did so with trembling fingers, and took out the keys of her trunks and her last letter unopened.

The reaction and disappointment were so bitter that she burst into tears just as the servant had knocked, entered, and had handed a letter to Peter.

"Never mind, darling," he said, kissing her tenderly. "It is all the doings of that horrid old step-mother. Hallo! here is a letter from my uncle; he couldn't hold out any longer. I told you he was a regular brick; we're all right, never you fear."

He broke the seal. Inclosed was his own appeal unopened, and a short pithy note from his uncle, stating that as his hopeful nephew had chosen to go and make a donkey of himself before he was twenty years old, he might run through his little property as fast as he pleased, and break his wife's heart in the bargain; but he was not to expect any assistance by word or deed from, etc., etc.

"What a thundering old flint!" ejaculated Peter. "What a deuce of a fix!"

"Deuce of a fix? There's the eight hundred dollars dear, and we will be so very, very economical. I'll go and unpack my trunks; perhaps papa has put some money in them."

She ran into the next room, radiant with this hope, just as the servant entered and handed an open envelope to Peter.

It was a bill, and read thus:

BYRON HOUSE, August 31, 1863.

To rent of rooms No. — and No. —, one week	$50
Meals in private parlor and attendance "	35
Gas, one week	2
Sundries, one week	10
	$97

* They ignored the odd days in eleven of the months.

"Whew! George! Jupiter!—here goes nearly a hundred dollars for one week's board!" exclaimed Peter, the picture of dismay. "I had no idea it cost such a prodigious amount to live! How could we eat up thirty-five dollars in one week! We must be two regular ogres! Thunder, this is a fix and no mistake."

"My darling Peter, what are you saying all those dreadful words about? What is the matter?" cried Madge, running in from her trunks. "What has happened to give you such a terrible long face?" and she put up her mouth for a kiss.

"Only a cap sheaf," answered Peter, giving the kiss. "Our letters are sent back, and here is a bill for nearly a hundred dollars for one week's board."

"One hundred dollars? It's perfectly monstrous! Let's go somewhere else, dear; the Saint Romnald or the Coleridge. I'm sure they can't charge such wicked prices! We boarded at the Coleridge last winter. I don't know what papa paid, but we had a great big parlor with the loveliest curtains, and such a splendid mantle glass, and a perfectly elegant Wilton carpet; and I remember papa said the charge was very reasonable, considering."

"Was it, darling? Then we will go and try."

They set off in high glee to get cheaper accommodations at Saint Romnald Hotel, but found upon inquiry, to their unspeakable astonishment, that the same style of rooms would cost them just double.

This wouldn't do; the Coleridge was very little better; and our two children went back to the Byron, not knowing where else to go, and staid five weeks longer, to the tune of six hundred dollars more, counting incidental expenses; and then there was just two hundred left in the bank.

They had had such a delightful time! Peter, still all lover, could not resist bringing home, once in a while, a basket of fragrant flowers to his darling, in whose lap he would gladly have poured all Tiffany's treasures. They had given two little recherché dinners to friends of Peter's who had happened in town, and his friends had slapped him on the back and volubly envied him the possession of such an angel; and he loved her, if possible, a thousand times more than ever.

But now another guest came: a scarcely-defined shadow of Care began to sit at the table unbidden.

It was now the 1st of October. People were beginning to come into the city for winter-quarters. The proprietor of the hotel wished Peter to engage the rooms he occupied, at least until January—just such rooms, he said, were wanted "by the acre." It was plain that they must leave.

In the evening after this, as the poor boy looked at the beautiful, unconscious face of his wife, and thought how much curtains, chickens, and other bare necessities cost, and how very little money was left, and how soon they might come to utter destitution, he suddenly groaned aloud and wrung his hands.

"Darling, what is the matter?" cried Madge, running to him and kissing him. "Peter, what made you utter that dreadful groan?"

"We are beggars!" moaned Peter.

"What? You don't mean it! Can't we get some more money somewhere?"

"Yes; we can beg, borrow, or steal."

"Oh, Peter!"—and the little hands went up in dismay; two piteous eyes became dim with big tears;—then a soft arm went curling round his neck. "We have each other, darling!" said her loving, pleading voice. "We can work. I know how to crochet very well, and you write such heavenly poetry! I'm sure somebody will give you loads of money for it. Just think of that sweet thing you wrote about me! I'll tell you what," she continued, suddenly brightening up, "let's go to housekeeping!—not in a whole house, you know, but in two rooms, like Mrs. Jones, mamma's seamstress, did when she married the carpenter. That will be the very thing! I'll go to market, and cook. I know how to stir a pudding—I did it once for fun! Yes, I am certain I shall be a capital poor man's wife, and we shall get on famously. What fun! Will you, dear?"

Good little wife! precious little soul! sly little woman! cheating him out of his heart-ache to hide it with her own. Oh, what an artful witch every good wife must learn to be! And so this extra-designing one got her husband to do her bidding with tolerable philosophy; for in two days the last hotel bill was paid, and our young couple settled in three small, plainly-furnished rooms, in the third story of a shabby house in a retired street—where, with a little cooking-stove, a large cookery-book, just one hundred and fifty dollars, and undiminished affection for each other, they began this new phase of their married life.

Peter went vaguely about in search of employment, and Madge did the marketing. Such fun as it was! The first day she sallied forth with a small basket on her arm—bought a chicken, which she put in her basket; then went to a grocery-store which the butcher had recommended, and asked for butter. She must taste it, of course, for Peter was very particular indeed about butter—so she told the grocer.

"Yes, mum," he said, "I keeps the primeest butter in market; and this is only thirty-eight cents."

"Thirty-eight cents, is it? Well, it is excellent! You may send it home."

"Send the tub, mum?"

Madge thought an instant, and decided that, as he was so kind as to offer, the tub might be a good thing to have in the house; so she said,

"Oh, thank you! yes—send the tub, if you please; and I want some macaroni—Peter is so fond of it."

"Yes, mum. How much, mum?"

"How much do you usually sell to private families?"

"The genteelerest customers allays takes a box, mum."

"Oh, do they? Well, send it. If there is too much for once, you know—will it keep?"

"Lor' bless you, mum! keep a year," said the grocer, shaking with inward laughter.

"Well, then, send the butter and macaroni with the bill;" and she gave her address, and went joyfully home.

She busied herself making the little rooms look as inviting as she could; and just before Peter came home she had popped her chicken in the oven attached to the cooking-stove, and was clapping her tiny hands, and laughing, and declaring to herself that, "after all, lace curtains and Wilton carpets were no great things."

When Peter came in he was followed up the stairs and into the room by a man with a large, heavy tub on his shoulder. He set this down, went out, and returned with a box about two feet square, marked "Macaroni." This he also set down, and taking a bill out of his hat handed it to Peter.

"What the deuce is this?" he cried: "40 pounds of butter, at 38 cents a pound, $15 20; and 30 pounds of macaroni, at 20 cents a pound, $6 00! Who told you to bring this here?"

"Fifteen dollars for butter!" exclaimed Madge. "Why, the dreadful man told me it was only thirty-eight cents, and I didn't think there was more than two or three pounds."

"Forty pounds, ma'am, in the tub; forty times thirty-eight, fifteen twenty; all right, you see," said the man.

"Oh, Peter, what shall I do?" sobbed the poor child. "I was going to have every thing so nice; and there is such a lovely chicken cooking in the oven!"

"Never mind, darling; we must pay for these things, I suppose; they will last the rest of our lives; and we will have the chicken, if it is done, for I am as hungry as a hawk."

The bill was paid, and Madge dried her tears. Peter and she set the table together, and were soon screaming with laughter over their own awkwardness, as man and maid of all work. A loaf of bread was placed on one corner, and some of the butter on another. Then the chicken was taken out of the oven. It was brown enough, for one thing; and Peter, thrusting his fork on either side of the breast-bone, prepared to cut it. It was a momentous crisis. Madge's eyes grew wide with expectant pride and happiness in the success of this her first step in the majestic science of cooking. The knife fell, and rattle, rattle, rattle, like small shot, went about half a pint of corn all over the dish!

Madge grew ghastly pale: nothing of this kind was ever in the chickens at her papa's table. What sort of strange monster was it?

Peter gave one cut more, dropped his knife and fork, and fell back in his chair, the image of consternation and despair. Suddenly he darted up, clapped his hands, and tore round the room, screaming with laughter. "Oh, oh, hold me!" he cried. "I shall burst. She forgot to take the insides out—the dear little innocent kitten! She has cooked insides, crop, and all. Ha! ha! Oh, what a brute I am!”

With this sudden change of tune he ran to his wife, who sat, white and miserable, staring through fast-dropping tears at the unfortunate chicken. If she had bought it with the feathers on, it would have gone into the oven all the same, with undoubting faith that it would come out ready for the table; and now to be so laughed at, and to deserve it!—she was ready to die with distress.

But after a while her husband comforted her with the axiom that accidents would occur in the best-regulated families; and then he went out and bought some oysters, and they had a nice time after all. Poor things! they were devoted to each other. Grim, gaunt Poverty had not planted herself quite yet on their hearthstone, and Love bravely held his own.

But the time did come. In vain had Peter tried to sell his poetry, and his wife's crochet-work: the newspapers and fancy stores declined speculating in amateur performances. Then the poor fellow, unknown to his wife, had answered two advertisements, one of which directed the anxious inquirer to send four postage-stamps, and receive in return an infallible receipt for making a fortune—no capital required. Peter got liberal directions how to make waffles: pouring the mixture out of an oil-feeder, cooking, and afterward carrying them round for sale, kept hot on a portable stove. The other proved to be an invitation, if he was “small and spry,” to join a negro-minstrel band, in the capacity of female-dancer.

It was now November, and Mr. Bolton had come to the city with his wife. Madam had kept the whip hand over him in splendid style; for he had not dared to write to his little Madge, and forgive her, as he longed to do.

“Wait a while,” said the superior power. “Master Brooks's money will certainly last six months. After that, when it is gone, and they have felt the consequences of their disobedience, it will be time enough for forgiveness.”

And so the poor old man, with his gray hair a shade whiter, and one or two additional furrows in his kind, weak face, put his hands in his pockets, and went brooding up and down the house like a heavy old ghost.

He took rooms at the Coleridge, and the very next day went wandering, in an anxious, stupid way, all round the sidewalks of the Byron House, staring up at the windows, hoping to catch a glimpse of the sweet face he loved so dearly. Not succeeding, he took courage, buttoned up his coat tight, and gave a desperate ring at the bell.

“What? gone away?” he echoed after the servant. “Gone where?”

“Don't know, Sir.”

“Don't know, you scoundrel! You do know. Tell me instantly, instantly, you rascal!”

“You better ask at the office,” said the man.

The Office did not know either. They had been gone since the 1st of October; and the poor old chap went home with a big lump behind his left vest pocket, and a smaller one in his throat, which would not go away.

Some weeks after this Mr. Bolton heard a lady who sat next him at dinner telling her neighbor on the other side of such an interesting young person, who had applied at their Society for work. “She could bring no references,” the lady continued; “but her sweet face and modest, trembling manner moved my pity, and I gave her some coarse sewing. She brought it back this morning, spotted here and there with tiny red dots of blood, which had come from her poor little pricked fingers. She is evidently not used to needle-work, for the stitches are seven ways for Sunday, and by no means presentable; but I gave the poor thing more work, and shall unpick some of the first and sew it properly. She refused to tell me where she lived; but I am certain there are some romantic or sad circumstances attached to her present destitution.”

Mr. Bolton listened with his lips apart and a blanched face. He began counting on his fingers, “September, October, November: not quite three months. No, no,” he thought, “it can not be my darling! God forbid it! My wife said his money would last six months.”

That same evening he met the lady in the hall. “Madam,” he said, his voice trembling, “I heard you telling at the dinner-table to-day about a poor young creature who was trying to earn bread. Give her this, and God bless you!” He put a fifty-dollar note in her hand, and almost ran away. The lady looked extremely astonished, then extremely thankful; for she had taken a singular interest in this case.

But it was Madge who had come to this pitiful pass! Day after day had her husband rushed desperately out, determined to saw wood if he could do no better, while the weeping little wife sat alone brooding and brooding, thinking how to be beforehand with utter destitution. They owed for rent, and starvation with giant strides was close at hand.

Then she bethought herself of applying to her landlady. She seemed kind-hearted in her rough way, and the hapless girl went down, timidly knocked at her door, and, when bidden to enter, told her wishes.

“Not well, I am afraid,” answered Madge, sadly. “I would rather try some very plain sewing.”

“Why, can't you do fine sewing?” said the woman, with a shade of contempt in her voice. “I'll pit my Jane agin any sewing-machine in the world for nice even stitches. If you can't sew well why don't you get a machine? You can't help making nice work with that.”

She might as well have asked why she didn't leave this sorrowful world and fly up to the moon on a broomstick. Madge simply said she could not buy a sewing-machine; whereupon the good soul twisted her brows, and bit her thumb, and having thus refreshed her memory, said: "Well, I believe the ladies in Transfiguration Church gives out work to poor folks. You might try there, and to-day is the day."

Poor little Madge thanked her; and lest her courage should fail, hurried on her bonnet and shawl and almost ran to the church, with what success you have already learned.

Meanwhile Peter had got copying to do for a lawyer; and thus the two barely managed to keep the wolf from the door. More they could not do, except to love one another; and this love melted, like electricity, the iron chains of despair as fast as the cruel links were forged, and kept their hearts from breaking.

They began to look gaunt and hungry. They were wretchedly shabby in their dress, for the best of their wardrobe had gone, long since, to the pawnbroker's. Yes, they had learned the way to that dreadful tomb, where, laid away like corpses, were myriad tokens of better days, and with them unutterable anguish.

But they loved each other; and in their wildest misery they learned to trust in God; they learned to kneel together and pray to him at sunrise and nightfall, and were thus nerved to endure the daily presence of the sword which hung over their heads, not knowing when its bare and glittering blade would fall.

One day when Madge took back her work she looked so unusually wan, almost wild, that her kind friend, with delicate questioning, begged once more to know her history. It was the first time the Society had met after Mr. Bolton had given the fifty-dollar note, and Mrs. Easton was anxious to bestow it immediately; but at the first inquiry Madge's trembling lips closed, after one little deep sob, and she froze into a white statue.

Then Mrs. Easton tried pretended harshness. "Your sewing is very badly done, Mrs. King" (she had given this name); "it is always spotted with blood. I can help you, perhaps, in a better way. I can assist you with money, and—"

"Madame!" Up the blood rushed to her face, forth flashed a dart from her eyes, and trembling all over, she cried: "I do not want your money! I want work!" Then nature resenting the fierce struggle with her pride gave way suddenly, and she sank down, fainting; on the floor, one hand pressed against her crushed and bleeding heart, which that offer of money had torn like a barbed arrow.

Mrs. Easton hastened to call assistance and unloose the dress of the poor little creature. After a while a faint color came creeping back to her lips, and she made a feeble attempt to rise. But she was powerless, and she lay there fearing, hoping, that she should die; uttering half unconscious farewells to her husband, who would go back to his uncle and be forgiven. She was quite broken down; and so her friend and another lady putting their arms tenderly round her raised her to her feet, and assisted her into Mrs. Easton's own carriage at the door; and Madge was forced to whisper her address, and glad to lie with her head on the other's kind breast until they arrived at her poor home.

Then, when she had been gently laid upon her own bed, and Mrs. Easton had smoothed back her hair, and kissed her, Madge opened her heart, and, with stormy, scalding tears, told all her story, except her name.

"Sixteen and nineteen! two mere children, and struggling for bread!" murmured Mrs. Easton. "Something must be done, and instantly." She looked round the room. It was as neat as hands could make it, but cold, dreary, for the small fire in the little stove made poor resistance against a gloomy December day. She did not dare to buy food and send it to Madge, whose resolute words, "I want work!" still rang in her ears, and defied her to make a pensioner on charity of this young thing, at once so frail and so indomitable. Suddenly a thought struck her, and affectionately patting Madge's cheek, she said: "Take courage, dear—take hope to your heart. The worst has passed. Since you will not take money for your bitter needs, I will send you that which will make money for you this evening, if I can. Good-by. Keep up a brave heart, better times are coming."

She called up the woman who let the rooms and saw her replenish the fire, and then went away; while Madge, still too weak to rise, lay, with closed eyes, wondering over her friend's words, and soon after fell into a dreamless sleep.

Toward evening it grew stormy. Peter had written and written all day, until the characters danced on the page, and his brain felt idiotic; yet he had a thick roll of MSS. which must be copied that evening. Desolate and desperate, mortally tired, he fought his way against the sharp blinding sleet, which the sobbing gusts of wind drove into his face. Gaining his home, he paused a moment at his room-door to call into his haggard countenance a hopeful look, for these two loving hearts wore masks, when in each other's presence. Yes, they acted such white, white lies as God, in his mercy and compassion, will surely forgive.

He opened the door; he glanced at the bed; a great shudder shook his frame, and a black veil seemed to come down over his eyes. She lay there so still, her face so white in such a deathlike hush. Was it sheet or shroud which covered her?

"Madge!" How strange his voice sounded, like a far-away hoarse whisper. Mastering his awful terror with a strong effort he advanced to the bed; leaned over, straining his eyes blinded with fear, and saw the gentle rise and fall of her quiet breathing. "Thank God, it is not death but sleep!" he almost screamed. He broke down utterly; he flung himself on his knees at the foot of the bed, and buried his face in the clothes. Great sobs burst from his laboring, heaving breast; the veins in his temples stood out tense like cords; then a hot rain of tears poured from his eyes, and his cry was "My little wife! my little, little wife! I thought I had murdered her."

In vain Madge, who had started up in affright at his first exclamation, implored him to look at her; to speak to her; to stop those dreadful tears. His passionate anguish would have way, and remorse was tugging at his heart-strings; he had deliberately robbed his darling of every earthly comfort—so it seemed now to him; his selfish love confronted him, and, pointing at the wan face and emaciated figure of his wife, held him to the rack and kept him there.

"Madge, Madge!" he said, in a tone of such bitter sadness that it brought great wistful tears in her eyes—"I wonder you do not curse the day you ever saw my face. Let me take you back to your father and go my way alone. I will kneel to him! I will kiss his feet!" he cried, frantically; "but you shall no longer die by inches! I have been cruel! I am a wretch! O God! help me to save my darling, my little, little wife!"

"You don't love me, then; you want to send me away:" and her cheek grew livid, her breast heaved, and her woeful eyes grew more hollow and shadowy.

"Oh, Madge, you know better! You know how wholly, entirely, my heart is yours. It is because I have loved you so selfishly, and stolen from you all the bloom, and light, and bliss of youth that I wish to save you. Why were you lying in that deathlike sleep? Was it not exhaustion from overwork?"

"Why no, dear, nothing of the kind;" and with changing color she recounted the adventures of the morning, and the strange, hopeful language of her friend Mrs. Easton.

Then she rose, and steadying herself so her husband should not see how weak she still was, hastened to make a cup of tea, for they both sadly needed this innocent cheer. If she had dared she would have brought out two tiny mutton chops, put away for the next day's dinner; but there was "the next day" sitting on the chops, like a goblin keeping guard, and she shut the cupboard door with a sigh.

They had just sat down to the tea and some dry toast; for the last of the tub of butter had been eaten the day before. It had lasted three months, and had been a capital purchase after all; but to have any more of so great a luxury was not to be thought of. Madge had poured out one cup of tea, when some one knocked at the door. Being bidden to enter, a man came in with a small table on his shoulder. He set it down, went out, returned with a vast bundle, set that down, said there was nothing to pay, and vanished.

"Some amiable lunatic seems to have sent us a piece of furniture," said Peter.

"I haven't the slightest idea what it can mean, dear. What an odd little table, isn't it, with such a strange ornament in the middle of it? I declare it looks like a big letter G. How funny! What can that mean?"

"Being sent to you, it stands for little goose, darling," said Peter, getting up from his untasted tea, and going round to the mysterious table to examine it. "Don't you see what it is? It's a sewing-machine."

"No, it isn't, dear. I've seen one at Mrs. Jones's—mamma's seamstress—and it was not the least like this."

"I tell you it is," insisted Peter. "Here's the wheel, and here's the place for the foot. Listen."

He gently moved the treadle, and in a moment an almost imperceptible tiny "tick, tick" was heard, like the faint echo of a cheery little cricket on the hearth. Then Peter opened a small drawer: in it were three or four strange-looking little instruments, some needles, and a pamphlet. He took the last out and turned over the leaves. "Oh," he said, "those odd-looking steel customers are hemmers, fellers, wrench, etc., are they? And here are some jolly directions for using it. I tell you what, Madge, it will be just next to nothing to turn out a dress with twenty-nine flounces. Gorgeous letter G!"

But what was that foolish little Madge doing standing there so absorbed and silent?

Oh! was this blessed relief meant for her? With a pale face and clasped hands she listened to her husband, her gaze fastened on the magical letter which had power to bring such unutterable comfort to their home—debts paid, sufficient food, bright fires. All at once Mrs. Easton's words—"I will send you that which will make money for you"—flashed into her mind. She understood! Her heart beat loud and fast, and then tide upon tide of rosy color overspread her face and neck, until, at last sinking slowly upon her knees, the big tears bursting from her uplifted eyes, she sobbed out, "Thank God! oh, thank God! it is for me! Now we need not starve!"

The next instant she was raised and clasped in her husband's arms, and these two poor lonely children had a good cry together.

"You won't think now of sending me home, darling, will you?" murmured Madge, nestling close to his heart. "Here is my home." And she pressed her soft cheek against him—she was "just as high as his heart."

She got a tight hug for answer, and then they found out that they were very hungry, and the tea was stone cold. Madge flew round, and made more tea, although it was the very last drawing but one, declaring she didn't care a fig for the extravagance; and then, getting more excited, she whipped the mutton-chops out of the cupboard in a trice, and broiled them without the slightest compunction about next day's dinner, and made toast, brown, crisp, and hot as fire, and said, laughing, "Oh, never mind the butter!"

After tea Peter helped to wash the dishes, and the clever clumsy fellow broke a plate, and Madge laughed at it—yes, actually laughed, if you'll believe me—such a blithe little laugh!—and all because there stood in the room a small table ornamented with the letter G. They had quite forgotten the bundle all this time; but now Madge opened it, and found a note inside. It read thus:

"December 22.

"DEAR MRS. KING,—A kind old gentleman accidentally heard me tell a friend of your painful needs, and it was he who gave me the money for you, which you refused. I have therefore purchased and sent you the sewing-machine. In the drawer attached is every necessary implement, and a little pamphlet of 'simple and explicit' directions. With your superior cultivation and quickness, you will be able to understand and use the machine almost immediately; so I send a dozen fine white shirts from our Society. You will please make a hem and three small tucks on each, for which we shall pay you seventy-five cents apiece. I shall take good care to keep you well supplied with work, and am your sincere friend,

"MARY EASTON."

She very nearly got crying again over this note, thankful grateful tears, and not trusting herself to speak, she handed it to her husband and sat down at the machine with the little book of directions in her hand. It would almost go of itself! She adjusted her work, put her foot on the treadle and began. Absorbed, fascinated, now pale, now flushed, her lips apart, her eyes shining like stars, she watched the white seam gliding swiftly away. The letter G was a magical living thing to her, and its gentle little "tick, tick" was like the joyous song of the lark to her upward-lifted, praying, grateful heart.

One hour and a half, two, and the shirt was finished; with a radiant, glad smile Madge threw it to her husband, who had been watching the work with almost breathless interest.

"Oh, darling letter G!" cried Madge. "Seventy-five cents! It would have taken me three days to have earned this much money with my fingers; and here you sing a dear little song, and, presto! the seventy-five cents are mine!"

"It has brought back hope and life to my darling," said Peter; "and I say long life and happiness to the good old cove whose money bought it. Bless his spectacles, wig, and whiskers! he is worth an army of such as your cruel old father and my snarling old uncle."

"Don't say so. But really I think I ought to thank him."

"Do you? Well, write a pretty little note, and tell him he's a darling and you're another."

"I shall do no such thing; I shall thank him with all my heart for my letter G."

And so she did.

Before two days were over she had finished and taken to the Society rooms the dozen shirts, and nine dollars were handed to her. She sat as one tranced, believing that she must be a second Danae, with the golden shower falling round her.

She gave her note to Mrs. Easton with a blush and smile, and begged her to hand it to her kind unknown friend, and hurried home with a new supply of work.

At the door she met her landlady.

"Was it a sewing-machine, ma'am," she inquired, "which came to you the other night?"

"Yes," answered Madge.

"Lor', ma'am! my Jane's almost crazy with the work they want her to do for Christmas. She's got all of a dozen children's dresses to braid, which it ain't possible to do half. If you could help her, ma'am, of course you'd get the money for all you'd do. Is there a braider to your machine?"

"Come up and I'll see," said Madge.

The landlady only waited to run into her room and bring out a bundle when the two ascended the stairs. Madge hurried to the little drawer and took out her book of directions.

"Yes, yes!" she said, joyfully, "here it is! 'The braid is passed through a hole in the foot.' Yes, I can do it, and thank you a thousand times!"

"Well, here's a little merino dress, all stamped, and here is the braid; and that's the machine, is it? which it's an odd one any how," and off went the good soul, quite relieved.

In the afternoon, just before the sun set, Peter came in. She could hardly stop to give him welcome with a kiss. Her dress was nearly done.

"Madge, do you know it is Christmas-eve?" asked Peter.

"Yes, darling." And a little fluttering sigh escaped her.

"What an unkind, unforgiving, uncharitable old blunderbuss your father is!"

"Hush, dear! Poor papa! I'm sure he'll be lonesome to-night. I wish—oh, how I wish he could have forgiven me! I should be glad and thankful to live here just as we do if papa would forgive me and love me again."

Fast-coming tears blinded her. She had to stop working and hide her pale face on her husband's shoulder. They were so absorbed in each other that they had not heard the door open. They did not see standing there in the dusky gloom, as if transfixed, an old man, with remorse and grief convulsing every feature. His lips moved, but no sound came from them; it seemed as if this remorse and grief had swelled in his throat and closed it. His eyes were strained upon the wan, tear-stained face of the young girl. With a violent effort he raised his hands and pressed his head between them, as if to keep his brain from bursting, and uttered a hollow groan.

"What's that?"

With a piercing, sudden scream which rang through the room, Madge was in his arms, crying, sobbing, laughing, with her lips against his cheek, and murmuring, "Father, dear father! Thank God! thank God!"

"Oh, Madge, darling," he cried, "forgive me, try to forgive me! I know you do; but oh! say it, my little Madge, whom I have treated so cruelly. And you, my son, you will not refuse my hand? Oh! God bless you both and forgive me. She said I must wait six months; she said I must punish you for your disobedience. But oh, my darling, will God ever forgive me for bringing you to this?"

He held her tight, and great scalding tears fell from his eyes upon her face. His very heart was torn by the sight of that pale, patient face, so unlike his blooming, dimpled Madge.

"Never mind, papa," she said at last; "don't be so grieved; it is all right now; and I would not have had it different. We have had a hard struggle, but it has taught us a precious lesson; it has taught us to trust in and lean upon God, our Heavenly Father. But how did you find us out? Oh, I know; the note I wrote."

"Oh, my little Madge, when I handed that money to Mrs. Easton for the poor suffering creature, little did I dream it was for my own darling. As I sat down to dinner to-day Mrs. Easton handed me your precious note. Your handwriting! I jumped up with a loud cry, upsetting my chair, and rushed out of the room. I suppose they thought me mad. But I have you once more, my pet. You shall never leave me again. You and Peter must come away immediately. She shall give way. She shall forgive you. She ought to ask your forgiveness. And we shall all be happy again."

They told him of all that had happened. They softened the bitterest part of the sad narrative, for his poor old heart was so grieved and remorseful.

Then they made a little feast for him; for he had lost his dinner in the mingled joy and anguish of finding his child, and they two had appetites sharpened and quickened by their happiness. I told you in the beginning that my tale was neither made up nor silly; so do let my characters be flesh and blood, and eat when they are hungry, for patience' sake!

So Peter ran out and bought a capital porter-house steak and some Philadelphia ale. It took all his money, but we won't mention it; and when he returned he set the table, while Madge broiled, and turned, and tossed the steak in a manner to reflect undying honor on her skill as a cook; while her father first pulled the corners of his mouth down to cry, then suddenly twitched them up to laugh, winking very hard between misery and amusement that his little girl should have been brought to such a pass.

But oh! wasn't it jolly? wasn't it gorgeous?—these are Peter's vulgar expressions, not mine. If I were permitted to paint the scene I should say: "They sat down to partake of the refreshments, feeling as if all that was passing was but a bewildering, rapturous dream; Madge with her heavenly blue eyes fixed upon her 'venerable, but equally unexpected' parent—her husband with his adoring eyes fixed upon her—and the kind old father burying his face every other minute in his fine cambric pocket-handkerchief. Their bliss was far too great to permit of eating, and the meal passed almost untasted."

Stuff! No such thing! That beef-steak was the theme of universal admiration, and not an atom except the bone was left on the dish. It was worth double the money it cost, let me tell you! and Christmas-eve and Merry Christmas were drank in the foaming ale, and every body was forgiven, and all the sad past was forgotten; and a sweet, fresh look of joyous peace came into Madge's eyes, and you would have thanked your stars if you could have seen it—that's all.

They could not go away that night, though they had hard work to persuade Mr. Bolton to wait. But very early the next morning, the blessed Christmas morning, Peter went to that awful place, the pawnbroker's, and redeemed their wardrobe with some of the money which Mr. Bolton had given to his darling. Then he came, little suspecting that the dainty silk dress that Madge wore had just been brought from such a place. They would not tell him; for it would have renewed all his grief.

Then the good landlady was paid, and presented with such little articles of furniture as they had bought; and a half sad, half happy farewell look was taken of the poor, little rooms, which had witnessed so much suffering, so much trust in God, and so much happiness.

"Peter can you carry it?" asked Madge.

"Carry what, darling?"

"Why my precious letter G, dear. Do you think I shall ever part with it?"

Yes, it went with them, and the step-mother, ashamed and sorry, made much of it, and hid her face over it to hide the grief she felt when she saw and heard what those two young things had suffered. And old Mr. Bolton just put his arms round Mrs. Easton's neck, and hugged her as if she was a big doll, and he had got her in her stocking; and, furthermore, thanked her for helping his darling by a present of a pair of bracelets twice as big as any manacles you ever didn't see; for I hope my reader never saw one. I never did.

Madge did not dream of relinquishing her dearly-bought self-reliance, and becoming once more a useless fine lady. No indeed! She and her letter G, both singing, made almost every thing she wore, with no end of tucking and hemming; and many of her dresses sprouted out in "curly-cues and whirligigs" of the most intricate and beautiful patterns of braiding. Oh yes! and better than this, many another letter G made music in the wretched homes where, hitherto, Hood's "Song of the Shirt" had been sobbed out by fainting, starving souls. Madge picked her father's pocket with impunity for this purpose. With every gift of one his poor old heart grew lighter. It seemed like expiation for his unkindness to his darling, and soothed his bitter memory of her troubles.

And when, nearly a year after, little babe Madge came, and lay nestling soft on her happy young mother's breast, seeming like a tiny child-angel which had floated down to her out of heaven, the snow-white robes in which the wee thing was tenderly wrapped owed their dainty grace to the letter G.

A DEAD LOVE.

HER love, she said, in coldest tones, was dead;
 Her face seemed like a statue's carved in stone;
 She took, with trembling fingers, from her hands
 The rings I gave, and laid them in my own.
 I might have spoken many bitter words,
 For bitter thoughts were struggling in my heart,
 But forcing back the angry flood, I said,
 "If it be so, 'tis better that we part."

Does she remember? we had wandered where My lips first whispered love unto her ear;
 'Twas in October, and the maple's leaf
 Wore the rich crimson of the later year.
 The golden reed upon the uplands glowed
 And through the fields the narrow pathway lined;
 The painted sumac's swaying branches waved
 Their fiery tassels in the Autumn wind.

She gave me back my letters, and unclasped
 Upon her slender wrist the band of gold;
 And when her touch met mine it seemed to freeze
 The blood within my veins, it was so cold.
 And few and cold the parting words we spoke,
 So different from the lingering farewells—
 The sweet "good-by," in which I seemed to hear
 A distant music as of marriage bells.

Long years have passed since then; twin roses blush
 Beside the fragrant garden's graveled walk;
 The cream-white lily, with her heart aflame,
 Bends low upon her slender, tapering stalk—
 And still I keep the trinkets and the gems,
 As one might keep some relic of the dead,
 Shut close within a casket from all eyes,
 The hidden souvenirs of moments fled.

I sometimes lift the lid and look within,
 And sometimes read my letters o'er again,
 Seeming like one who has a pleasant dream,
 And, waking, feels a dull, vague sense of pain—
 Such dreams as linger on the edge of night
 And vanish with the morning's earliest beam,
 When, raising heavy eyelids to the light,
 We grieve to find it only was a dream.

Yet though our love is dead, like some poor flower
 Which never more by garden-paths shall blow,
 I sometimes wonder if in other worlds
 Dead love a resurrection may not know—
 For often when alone, in silent mood
 And from the careless crowd I sit apart,
 Its ghost will come with sad and pallid face
 To haunt the vacant chambers of my heart.

WHY I WROTE IT.

MESSRS. EDITORS,—A few weeks since I sent you a story, and yesterday it came back to me with "compliments and many thanks." Ah me! as if compliments and thanks, however numerous and however courteously expressed, could warm, and feed, and clothe baby and me. But I am not complaining. I didn't tell you that the story was written with the view of obtaining food and clothing for myself and baby. I can not expect you to feel personal sympathy with every person who sends you a contribution. Still I have thought that if I should tell you the circumstances under which that story was written, you might think them worth publishing.

In order to do that I must tell you something of my own history:

I am by birth a Tennessean. My father married a penniless girl. He had no profession, was unused to work, and possessed little idea of the value of money. Fabulous accounts of the beauty and productiveness of Texan lands were firing the imaginations of young and old. Leagues of fertile prairie land, rank with the finest pasturage, and needing only the plow-share to fit it for the culture of cotton and sugar, to be had for the asking, as it were! The very thought of vast bodies of unbroken land of which you can become master at a trifle is inspiring. Among Southern planters there seems a kind of mania for fresh lands. No sooner do their plantations begin to speak of the reckless drains upon them than the planters begin to think of new lands. They are haunted by visions of black loamy acres. Every poor red hill, with its dwarfish cotton-stalks, looking sickly and yellow, suggests by contrast valley-lands and plateaus where gigantic white pyramids stand in regal beauty, and where every acre cheerfully yields its bale.

So it was that parties of emigrants were daily leaving the neighboring States for the new Republic of Texas. My father attached himself to one of these emigrant companies, leaving his wife with the promise that she should join him as soon as possible.

"Should I never come back," he said, "and you should be forced to ask advice and assistance, go to John. He is cold and hard, I know, but he is just and reliable; he'll be honest with you."

My father's plan was to invest the little money he had in horses and cattle, and engage in stock-raising.

"It will cost me nothing to keep them," he said to my mother. "I shall need only to put my mark on them and turn them on the prairies, and in a few years I shall have a thousand head of cattle ready for market. Then as I have money to spare I shall invest it in land, and one of these days," he added, with a teasing smile, "we'll have a fortune for our boy."

Had my father lived—oh how many times have those words been wrung from me! How the might-have-been has haunted me! But he died without a chance to try his plans. He was attacked with inflammation of the lungs, which, from the absence of proper medical attention and nursing, proved fatal. He died at a settler's log-cabin, where his comrades had left him, and was buried on the prairie. The boy for whom my poor father was to make a fortune was born after his death and proved to be only a girl.

I shall endeavor to pass briefly over my childhood, for I do not love to linger on it. It was not such a childhood as—please God—my child shall have.

One of my earliest remembrances is of being taken from my bed one autumn night, and conveyed by my colored nurse to my mother's sick chamber. The scene which met me in that sick chamber rises at this moment as fresh as do the transactions of this morning, while months and years which followed are buried from memory. A high mahogany bedstead, with its white muslin curtains looped back to the carved posts by broad, green ribbons; the tall physician, with his white hair in curls on his shoulders; two neighboring women, Aunt Dinah with arms akimbo and head drooping, and the figure propped by pillows with haggard face and skeleton hands, and vacant, staring eyes—that is the tableau which memory has repeated a thousand times. My mother was dying. As her large sunken eyes rested on me and recollection slowly dawned a faint smile transfigured her face and she feebly held out her arms. I wonder that I did not shrink from her as from something unearthly. How glad am I that I did not! The sweet memory is mine of having nestled with a child's trust and love close to her dear bosom—of having passed my fingers tenderly over her brown hair, and of seeing her smile at the loved caress. I remember some brooding words of love which have ever since lain soothingly on my heart, and then of being taken from her and restored to my lonely bed.

From the mention my father had made of his brother John, the latter seemed to consider himself obliged to provide against my becoming a vagrant or the inmate of an orphan asylum. My father had given a correct summary of his brother's character—hard and stern, but reliable and just—just but never generous; a man of strong and obstinate will, deliberate in forming an opinion, stubborn in clinging to it. He had, years before my birth, buried, in one summer, his wife and four children. His affliction—so said his old acquaintances—did not soften his character; his sternness settled into hardness.

I have always believed that a place in my uncle's heart was worth possessing—that there was strength and endurance in his affections when once secured, but I never felt that I had secured a place there. "I will do my duty toward my dead brother's child," he seemed to say. I was provided with all necessities, and my uncle paid my bills; but he never made me a present. No toy or book came to me at my birthday or on Christmas to tell me that I was lovingly remembered. Yet by no word or act or look of my uncle's was I ever reminded of my dependence. Had I not learned it from others, I should never have known that he did any thing for me.

My uncle placed me with his wife's sister, one of the few women whom he condescended to esteem. And now let me guide my pen carefully, for 'tis of the dead I write. Mrs. Patterson—by this fictitious name I choose to designate the woman with whom the greater portion of my childhood was passed—was the wife of a wealthy planter and resided on a plantation. I half suspect that I was unreasonable, for surely cleanliness and order are commendable; yet I hated the system, and precision, and cold elegance of that establishment. A little dust or an occasional cobweb in the house—a weed or spray of grass on a flower-bed, a stray tendril or independent branch which dared to grow except after set rules, would have proved a relief. Mrs. Patterson never meant to be unkind; but my life with her was miserable. She was childless, and in that fact, since I became a mother, I have found the explanation of her failure and its excuse. There is nothing like maternity to call out the good and beautiful in woman. She rarely comprehends a child's nature and wants until she has studied them with a loving, deathless interest in her own darling. Spotless dress and apron; immaculate face and hands; hair smooth and braided; two hours devoted to knitting, ditto to sewing, ditto to studying, ditto to walking in the garden; elegant meals taken with silver fork and napkin; slumbers taken between snowy linen sheets. There is nothing, I allow, like hardship or misery in the picture. But take from childhood its dolls, and toys, and picture-books; its fairy stories and nursery rhymes; its Santa Claus, and Christmases, and New Years, and birthdays, and—ah me!—what is the remainder worth?

The result of Mrs. Patterson's training and tuition was that I learned to knit and sew neatly—a knowledge scarcely worth, in these days of sewing-machines and stocking-looms, what its acquisition cost me. I acquired at an early age considerable facility in reading, writing, and spelling, and before I was nine years old could recite all the rules in Murray's Grammar, and all the coarse print of Olney's Geography. Had the time been devoted to learning the story of Mother Hubbard and her wonderful dog would it not have been better improved?

Then until my fifteenth year my education was sacrificed to save a debt. I do not think my uncle intended it so—there was nothing nigardly in the provision he made for me. I believe he meant to deal kindly by his dead brother's child, but he erred gravely.

At fifteen I was sent to a boarding-school. My advantages here were not of the highest order, but they were fair. I made little advance in music or the languages, was above the average in composition, and pre-eminent in mathematics. If we had a difficult lesson I was called to enact the part of pioneer to the class, was the first to be sent to the board. If I confessed my inability to master a knotty point every member of the class was immediately set at ease; all took shelter behind my failure. If we had visitors I was called to the board, and the credit of the class thrown upon me; and at examinations the most difficult problems were somehow sure to come to me.

This sounds like egoism, but surely it is little I claim; a superiority over some twenty girls in a science where the female sex is proverbially weak. But I mention this superiority because it first drew to me the attention of one with whom my destiny must be forever linked.

Charles B—— was reading medicine in the village where I was at school. After a public examination in which I was conscious of having won honors, a gentleman asked my permission to present a friend, and soon after I found myself conversing with Charles B——. The acquaintance thus begun was prosecuted at rare intervals as opportunity offered, for we girls were subjected to the boarding-school espionage. So it came that in less than a year I was promised in marriage to Charles B——.

Then followed eighteen months of bliss, made up of stolen interviews, smuggled letters, and all those little nothings so dear to lovers. I don't know how it was discovered, but at the end of these eighteen months my uncle was in possession of all the facts of the case. I had never desired to conceal the matter from him; it was the vigilance of my boarding-school guardians I had wished to elude. I had never thought of my uncle's caring any thing one way or the other about the matter. But it seems he did care about it, for he took measures, of what nature he would never condescend to inform me, to interrupt the engagement. This I set down, perhaps too hastily, as an unwarrantable interference with a most sacred right. We quarreled; I should say rather that I expressed my mind quite freely. Charles B—— went from the village without seeing me or sending me a line, leaving no clew as to his destination, except such as might be gathered from a vague rumor that he had gone to Florida.

I was at just the age when such a disappointment is a blow, a blow square in the face, for I loved Charles. I accepted a home kindly proffered me by a friend, and secluded myself from society and every thing of a cheerful nature. Soon my health began to fail, and the following summer my physician pronounced me in a decline, and advised a trip North. I awaited my uncle's decision on this advice with deep anxiety, for I knew he hated every thing pertaining to the North with all the intensity of his strong nature. I shall never forget the feeling of refreshing relief with which I received the announcement that I was to spend a year in a Northern school. There was hope and promise in it. I believed that some opening would present itself by which I could achieve my independence. At the South a woman can not teach or engage in any work without losing caste; but at the North work is acknowledged. There was inspiration in the thought. A few weeks later I was steaming up the turbid Mississippi.

In a few days I had entered, in a Northern city, my last school year. My school duties were not heavy, leaving me a fair margin of unappropriated time. This was spent in discussing the ever-present question: What can I do? How can I earn a living? How can I achieve an independence of my uncle?

Two avenues invited me. Of course I thought of teaching, every educated woman seeking employment thinks of it. But this could not be entered upon for a year, and, in the mean time, my dependence must continue. I shrank, too, from applying for a teacher's situation, as such a step would have compelled an explanation, and started troublesome questions and surmises. I was aware that already my schoolmates wondered at the absence of style in my wardrobe—at my old-fashioned dresses; I knew they suspected me of a mean parsimony that I did not return some of their numerous kindnesses forced upon me in the way of suppers, fruits, rides, etc. Ah! those were days of heart-burnings, of impatient longings. It was hard when I was called on for a contribution for some picnic or festival, or for a present to a teacher, to say that I could give nothing. They didn't know that every penny I spent had to be taken from the hand of a man whom I sometimes feared that I hated.

The other road to independence of which I thought the oftener was the higher and more ambitious way which authors tread. I thought I should like my old friends and acquaintances, my uncle, and Charles to hear of me as famous. It would be pleasant to know that they were reading my articles, thinking and talking about me. I wrote some things which delighted me during the excitement and glow of writing and disgusted me two days after.

After reminding myself a great many times that I must make a beginning, I one afternoon started to the publishing-house of a daily newspaper with a MS. in my dress-pocket which had been re-written and re-read more than once. It was a short article of a humorous character on a local topic with a fictitious signature attached. When I left the Seminary I felt brave enough for almost any enterprise, but my courage diminished as my distance from the printing-office diminished, and by the time I had read the formidable sign in gilt letters over the door, and had caught sight, through the window, of a tall, pale, literary-looking youth I had no more courage. So I walked on by the office. But when those formidable gilt letters, and that pale, literary-looking youth were no longer in sight, I felt my courage rapidly reviving, and soon I had retraced my steps and was again at the door. On it was the word "Push," and by a desperate effort I obeyed the behest and found myself in the counting-room, face to face with the tall, pale youth. He stared at me, walked a few steps forward, and inquired by his looks my business.

"Are you the editor?" I asked.

He replied, waving me to a staircase, "No, I am not the editor; the editors' rooms are on the next floor."

I made my way up a dark, worn, dirty stairway, and came suddenly upon youth No. 2, who stood at a desk, pen in hand.

"Can I see the editor?" I inquired of him.

"Which editor do you wish to see?"

"I was puzzled by the question, for I was ignorant of the adjectives which distinguish the members of an editorial corps.

"The commercial editor?" he asked, suggestively.

It did not take me long to arrive at the conclusion that my article could have no bearing on the commerce of nations or cities, so I replied in the negative.

"The financial editor?" he again suggested, trying his pen on his left thumb nail, preparatory to using it.

I had no finances to arrange with any editor, that was certain, so I again answered, No.

"The local editor is in there," he said, pointing to a door, and then resuming his writing by way of dismissing me.

The local editor! My article pertained to a city matter. Yes, it must be that I wanted to see the local editor. "Thank you," I said, and moved to the door and rapped.

A small man with sandy hair, and sandier whiskers, and very light eyes, answered my knock. The room he occupied was lighted by a single window—the dirtiest and cobwebbiest I ever saw—and was a trifle larger than the very large bedstead which stood in my chamber at the Seminary. There were a couple of chairs and a writing-desk piled with newspapers in this editorial sanctum.

I was so embarrassed that a momentary dizziness and blindness came over me as I stood, for the first time in my life, face to face with a gentleman of the press. Could I have improvised an excuse for my appearance there, my real errand would never have been revealed to him. But my wits seemed paralyzed, so I stammered out something about having written a short article which he could publish if he should consider it worthy a place in his columns, and I drew the MS. from my pocket, and placed it in his hands.

"Have a seat, ma'am?" he said, placing a chair for me, and proceeding to read the MS.

My impulse was to snatch it from him, and run away and hide myself in my chamber. As he perused it I also read it from memory. I could judge from the direction of his eyes just what passage he was perusing, and my cheek tingled afresh at each well-remembered weak point. Alas, they all seemed weak points as I sat there!

"We shall be happy to give your article a place in our Saturday's paper," said the editor, when he had finished its perusal.

How long it seemed before Saturday arrived! I wondered how long my article would be; how it would look in print; and, above all, what people would say about it. Saturday at length arrived. I knew the paper never reached us earlier than three P.M., but at one o'clock I seated myself at the front window to watch for it, that I might have the first reading. It is needless to say that time moved slowly, but after looking at the clock for the twentieth time, perhaps, I descried the news-boy with his bundle of papers strapped over his shoulders. I was across the veranda and at the gate in a moment. He handed me a paper damp from the press. I opened it, and ran my eye eagerly from article to article. In a conspicuous place I found my contribution, and with a beating heart I ran over it. It was not as long as I had expected to see it; there were some half dozen typographical errors which spoiled some of my finest sentences; then there were several solecisms and two glaring grammatical errors—there they were, staring me impudently in the face, all very plain now that they were irrevocably given to the public. I read my article again and again, and decided that the signature—which I give here as "Fanny France," choosing to withhold my real nom de plume—looked well in print.

At the head of the local column I found a paragraph calling attention to a racy article from a new correspondent, "Fanny France," and inviting farther contributions.

The Principal of the Seminary, Dr. W——, entered as I was reading this notice for the third time.

"Would you like to see the evening paper?" I asked, handing it to him.

He sat down to reading, while I took up my knitting-work—a blue Sontag—purposing to ascertain if he read my article, and to mark the effect. I soon perceived that he was perusing it. At the second sentence his mouth began to twitch, then a quiet kind of a smile overspread his features. He finished it with a low laugh, and inquired if I had read the article? And when I had answered with flushing cheek in spite of my efforts at composure, he said, "Pretty well done, isn't it? Pretty well done," he continued, dwelling on the words as he turned the paper. "I wonder who Fanny France is!"

That evening I heard the article read by one of the teachers to the girls and the other teachers as they sat around the study-table, and found some difficulty in appearing unmoved amidst their comments and criticisms.

The next week I sent a second contribution to the paper through the Post-office, and the following Saturday had the satisfaction of seeing it in print. By the time a third contribution had appeared the school was alive with curiosity. A dozen times a day I had to evade the question, "Who is Fanny France?" I was alternately amused and vexed, elated and depressed, flattered and discouraged by the opinions of my school friends and of outsiders, as reported to me, or in my hearing. Soon the editor began to mail me letters left at the printing-office for Fanny France, and to send me papers into which my articles were copied.

One day on opening a paper I found an article headed "Fanny France." The editor said that he would state, in answer to the scores of letters of inquiry with which he was besieged, that Fanny France was a school-girl, a resident of the city. Of course this increased the people's interest—the school-girls' particularly. With a whole school of girls on my track I could not long escape detection. Then cards and invitations and calls began to pour in upon me. I was pointed at, stared at, talked about, and written about. Requests for autographs, letters complimentary, condemnatory, and advisory clogged my port-folio.

But my purse was no heavier for the laurels I was winning, and my wardrobe seemed poorer and more old-fashioned than ever, as I was brought in contact with the ton of the city. And here I must acknowledge a temptation which beset me, but which I had strength enough to combat. Had I yielded to it I should not, I fear, be so ready to publish it. I felt that a small sum judiciously expended would enable me to appear like a new creature, and I was tempted to draw on my uncle for the money; I knew it would be promptly furnished without a word of inquiry. But after an hour's contemplation of the advantage and pleasure which the money could procure, I invariably concluded to wear my old dresses rather than increase my indebtedness to him.

I went into the library one day, and my bills for board and tuition were handed me. They came earlier than I had expected. I was disappointed; for I had half hoped that by some means I should of myself be able to meet them—that I would be spared the humiliation of sending them to the man who had occasioned me the deepest sorrow I had ever known. I crushed the papers in my hand, and went up to my room. I sat down by the window, and looked out upon the night. It was in the autumn, and a cold rain, mixed with sleet, was falling. I looked through the waving, leafless branches to the lamp-lights beyond, and there came over me such a homesick, lonely feeling as I shall never forget. Why was I separated hundreds of miles from kindred, and friends, and every thing I had known or cared for? Why were all those weary leagues dividing me from him who should have been my protector and support? Of course I wept—woman's eyes are her heart's safety-valves—and I found relief in the act. Then my thoughts began to form themselves into a purpose; for my impatience at my dependence had grown with the hope of relief. I determined to see Mr. J——, the proprietor of the paper to which I had been contributing, frankly acquaint him with my situation, and ask of him employment and compensation. This resolution taken, I retired, but not to sleep. I went over and over what I intended to say to Mr. J——; but having thoroughly learned my lesson, doubts as to my ability to recite it when the moment of trial should arrive began to intrude. I felt brave enough being there in the dark, but I knew myself too well not to have some fears that I should prove the veriest coward at the moment when coolness and self-possession were necessary to a proper representation of my circumstances. At the best I was afraid that I should make a lame story, for I was never a fluent speaker. Concluding that my plea would be more effectually presented in writing, I wrote a letter, sealed and addressed it, and then went to sleep.

The next morning, which was Saturday, I mailed my letter, expecting to hear from it in the course of the following week. That evening I went to prayer-meeting. When I returned a card was handed me, and I was informed that the gentleman awaited me in the parlor. With a rising heart I read the name to which my letter of the previous evening had been addressed; he was giving it prompt attention.

The result of my interview with him was an agreement on his part to pay me one hundred dollars per year for my contributions, the number and length to be left to my choice.

"Here are twenty-five dollars," he said, as he rose to take his departure, "and remember, you are to send us an article as it suits your convenience. I am sorry I can't offer you more for your very acceptable articles, but a daily political paper can't very well sustain a literary department."

Twenty-five dollars! Here was a chance to take a breath; but a hundred dollars would not meet my tuition bills for the year, and there was my board, beside other expenses. I was not yet independent, but my success was encouraging.

My next step was to withdraw from the English department of the Seminary, and to pursue my English studies in my room without the aid of a teacher; then I made arrangements with the French teacher to give her English lessons in return for private tuition in French. By these retrenchments I should reduce my expenses some twenty-five dollars per term. Through my Latin recitations I continued my connection with the Seminary.

About this time our Principal spoke to me about taking charge of two classes, one in geometry, the other in spelling, for which it seemed no teacher in the Seminary could find time. Nothing was said by either of us in reference to compensation; I thought that perhaps my Latin tuition would be given me for my services. I devoted an hour and a half each day to these two classes, besides attending to my own studies. I did all my own sewing—I was not able to put out any—and prepared a weekly article for publication. It will be seen that I had little time for farther literary efforts.

So time passed, and the academic year drew to a close. I passed the examination, being the successful competitor for the composition prize, and was voted a diploma.

And now a serious disappointment awaited me; my bill was presented. Nothing was allowed me for my services in teaching the two classes before mentioned, and I was charged with English tuition. Ah! no eyes saw the bitter tears which I shed over that little scrap of paper. How I had worked to save that twenty dollars! and here I was unexpectedly called to pay it. I made several resolutions to speak of the matter, but postponed the unpleasant subject from time to time, and finally abandoned it. Two years later the mistake was discovered and rectified.

And now the vacation had arrived, I had my diploma, and I determined to seek a situation as teacher. I naturally thought of the Seminary in which I had passed the year. After some negotiating, I was placed in charge of a department of some twenty little girls from nine to thirteen years of age, with the vague promise in reference to compensation that they would do as well for me as they could. I acknowledge that my effort in this department was not a marked success.

As a pecuniary speculation, an estimate may be formed of it from the following facts, premising that my relation with Mr. J——, the publisher, remained unchanged: I purchased one spring dress for eight dollars; a bonnet for six dollars; a pair of gaiters for a dollar and a half; a pair of kid gloves for one dollar; gave three dollars to the missionary cause; and fifty cents toward a present for our Principal's wife. I did not spend during the year another penny, yet when my account with the Seminary was closed I was four dollars and seventy-eight cents in its debt.

Opportunities for teaching in other places offered, but I was chagrined at my failure in the Seminary, and anxious to vindicate myself. The next year I had charge of the composition department with a few classes in mathematics, at a fair salary. I think all acquainted with the facts will admit that my success in this second effort was unusual. The following year I held the same pleasant position with the same salary. For a third year it was at my disposal, but I chose a like situation in another city.

During those years of labor and trial I had heard nothing from Charles. Time, the skillful, kindly physician had done much to soothe, but there were memories associated with him which haunted and saddened all the days. At times I felt a glad sense of freedom in being removed from the scenes of my disappointment, but oftener I was possessed by an unutterable yearning to revisit the places consecrated by my intercourse with him.

As to my uncle, I received from him during the first year of my absence an occasional letter on business. At the end of that time there came a peremptory summons for my return South, with a remittance to defray expenses. I returned the money with a declaration of my independence, and the information of my purpose to engage in teaching.

My residence at the North had shown me how erroneous the opinions, and baseless the prejudices of the Southern people are in reference to their Northern brethren, and my convictions I endeavored in my letters to communicate to some of my Southern friends. As mildly and gently as possible—for I understood the depth of their prejudices and the bitterness of their hatred—I told them some truths, and endeavored to disabuse their minds of some errors.

During the three years in which I was engaged in teaching numerous efforts of various characters were made to procure my return to the South. In the mean time the rebellion was inaugurated at Sumter. We are none of us likely to forget the hurricane of denunciation from the loyal press and people which swept over the great North. It was purely sublime in its might and majesty so long as its fury was directed against the ambitious, informed politicians, with whom this fearful work originated. My heart gave its Amen and Amen. I said let them be Anathema maranatha. But after a time people and press began to indulge in a wholesale, indiscriminate denunciation of every thing pertaining to the South. It was Nazareth, and no good could come out of it. I frequently heard this said in so many words. Ah! I knew better. In answer to these things, honest faces, lives beautiful and noble, and characters fair as the morning—the generous, the chivalrous, the brave; appealed to me to speak. There were times when it seemed that to keep silence was to be false to my absent friends. I used to remain silent until my heart was ready to burst with its scorn and indignation at the injustice and ignorance which the speakers betrayed; then I would pour out some vehement words of refutation or apology, and, when opportunity offered, seek relief in tears. Yet in my calm moments I could scarcely find it in my heart to censure the most violent. Theirs was but a most righteous indignation going beyond bounds. As far as I was personally concerned there was no abatement of the affectionate courtesy which every where met me, and assurances of sympathy were frequent and repeated.

In the summer of 1862 I received intelligence that a party of Southern friends were in Canada just across the frontier, and desired a visit from me. As they sent the money to defray my expenses there was nothing to prevent my joining them, and I gladly did so. There was in the party a well-known Confederate official, whose name has figured in the papers. From the fact that all the party were wearing false names and hailing from Northern localities, and that my own arrival was registered under a fictitious name, and from various suspicious movements and remarks, I was persuaded that they were not in Canada simply to avoid the inconveniences of war, or to escape the hardships of a beleaguered people. I have since learned, what I then suspected, that the gentlemen were on business for the Southern Confederacy. One of them, with his wife, was en route for Europe, and offered to defray my expenses if I would accompany them. This I declined, not wishing to incur so heavy a debt of obligation.

Those of the party who contemplated a return to the South exerted their powers of persuasion to induce me to return with them. It was not without some effort that I resisted the pressure which was brought to bear upon me; many times, half ashamed of turning my back upon the South, almost persuaded that I was mean and false in so doing, I was on the eve of yielding—of casting my lot with the South, for better for worse. But however my heart vacillated my intellect was clear enough. I knew the right was not with the South. Yet I returned from my visit to my Southern friends homesick, my heart yearning over the South. I loved her—loved her in her pride and wickedness and suffering more, it seemed to me, than ever before. In my calm, unprejudiced moments I wished for the triumph of the Northern cause. I know I did. Yet when the news came of a success of the Federal arms, and I heard the booming of cannon and the ringing of bells, saw the waving of flags, and witnessed the rejoicings of the multitudes, I thought of my people shamed, and defeated, and sorrowing, and then I doubted where my sympathies were. I knew not whether to rejoice or weep. But I must not linger here.

Shortly after the visit to my friends above mentioned I received a letter from one of the number whose husband had been suddenly called to return South, stating that she had just learned that my uncle was sinking with consumption; that he could not possibly live through another winter, and was in need of my care. Would I go to him? If so, meet her and husband on Monday afternoon at N—.

I had but an hour in which to make my decision, for it was necessary if I accompanied them that I should take the next train. I saw a lonely old man dying with, perhaps, none to minister to him, and in a moment after reading the letter, even as I read it, my heart pronounced his forgiveness. I remembered how he had through all the helpless years of my childhood provided for me, and perhaps, I argued with myself, he consulted what he considered my good in breaking my engagement with Charles. It did not take me many minutes to decide that I would go to him.

Some little matters were arranged, and shortly after I was on my way to my old home. How the journey was accomplished, by what means the obstacles in our way were surmounted, I might, could I speak with definiteness, consider myself in honor bound to preserve in secrecy. But these things are a profound mystery to me. After some strange movements, but without any annoying adventure, I found myself amidst familiar scenes. No, I recall that phrase. I should never have recognized the once familiar spots, they were so changed.

The country had been ravaged by two armies, wasted by fires and guerrillas, and scourged as by a sirocco. Twenty-three engagements, of more or less importance, had taken place within a circuit of twenty miles of the plantation where my childhood had been passed, and one not two miles removed. The country with its deserted plantations, its tenantless negro cabins falling to decay, its fenceless gardens and fields overrun with rank weeds, all proclaimed some unusual state of affairs. Go where I would I met no young men, except an occasional soldier on furlough. And the old men were organized into Home Guards, with their drills and regular military duties. No young woman or child over six years was found who was not a member of some military company.

I had heard much of the Union sentiment at the South. I found no evidence of its existence in this locality; an unmitigated hatred of Northerners, and a determination to endure all things before surrender, was the universal sentiment. "Fighting to repel invasion," "Defending our hearth-stones," was the language of every lip.

Our homes and our firesides! Nothing will rouse and fire a people like that cry. The watchword of our flag and the Union are fireless in comparison. There are multitudes who comprehend nothing of the nature of our Government, to whom the Union was but a sounding word, and the flag but a patchwork of bunting. But when leaders cry "Our homes are in danger: the invader is upon us!" all understand the call.

If my heart had burned because of the ignorance and injustice of the Northern people concerning the South, the ignorance and injustice of Southerners toward the North was enough to make the very stones cry out. And in this mutual misunderstanding between the sections may, in my opinion, be found the cause of all our troubles. The Southern people would never have sustained their leaders in the secession movement had they not been misled as to the feeling of the North concerning them. A single example will give some idea of the delusion prevalent among the people.

I was conversing carefully and cautiously—for I knew that in their excited state an imprudent word would be like a spark on their freshly-ginned cotton—on the all-absorbing topic with a company of intelligent ladies, when one of them asserted that before Fort Sumter had been fired upon the churches of New York, and Mr. Beecher's church in Brooklyn, had flaming placards above the pulpits headed, "Beauty and Booty," containing a call for men to go South—that the officiating ministers took their texts from the placards, and gave flaming harangues, which, eliminated and reduced, meant that the South was to be sacked and pillaged, and Southern women given up to outrage. To my indignant denial of this she replied that Mr. G—— was in New York at the time and saw and heard these things. The said Mr. G—— is a New Englander by birth and education. His story had received universal credence in the place. As I looked into this woman's honest blue eyes my heart sank. Not until that day when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed will the masses of the Southern people be convinced.

We have received at the North conflicting statements relative to the condition of the Southern people, some accounts reporting an abundance of all necessities, while others would lead us to believe that the people are on quarter rations. I can speak from observation of a single locality as I found it in the autumn of 1862. If the North, with its wealth and its numerous laborers and artisans, its open ports and unrestricted commerce, feels the pressure of the iron hand of war, how must it be with a people whose fields and plantations are deserted, whose soil is invaded, and whose ports are blockaded? A few cases of which I was cognizant may give some idea of the condition of affairs.

Mr. F——, one of the wealthiest men in that section of the State, whose property has been estimated at nearly two millions some twelve years since, had a daughter born unto him. Two hours after her birth he had two hundred bottles of wine buried to be used at her marriage supper. Last spring he had it unearthed and sent every bottle of it to the hospitals for the sick and wounded soldiers. During my stay at the South I dined at this gentleman's house by invitation. We sat down to a dinner of chicken, corn-dodgers, and sweet potatoes. No desert and no drink, except cold water.

When I was at boarding-school one of my classmates had become enamored of a black-eyed, mustached clerk in a shoe-store. He had a small, delicate hand, and wore the daintiest of boots—"the cunningest things in the world," she used to say. On the contrary she wore gaiters number five; but once in five weeks she would purchase of her clerk a pair of number one gaiters. Arrived at the Seminary, not being able to wear them, she would present them to some girl who was fortunate in possessing a smaller foot. Yet this girl, who could afford to give away twenty-five dollars' worth of gaiters per year for the sake of creating the impression in a single mind that she had a small foot, I saw wearing a pair of shoes of her own manufacture made of her brother's old coat, and put to soles cut from the legs of his cast-off boots.

The last case I shall mention is that of a gentleman, who, it was said with his little daughter, was living on a plantation with nothing to eat except ash-cakes, as the negroes call them. These are made of Indian meal solely, and wet into a dough with water. This is moulded into a cake about the circumference of a tea-plate, a spot in the fire-place is cleared of ashes, on which the little mound of dough is deposited, its greatest elevation being some three inches. This is then covered with warm ashes, coals are heaped on the top, and it is left to bake or roast some forty minutes. It is then taken from its bed, the ashes brushed off as thoroughly as possible, when it is well washed in clean hot water. The result is a cake of delicious flavor and sweetness, a piece of which, surreptitiously conveyed to me by some colored sympathizer, used to delight my childish heart more than Mrs. Patterson's most delicate pastry. This man lost his right arm in some engagement, and was discharged from the rebel service. During his absence his slaves had run away en masse. There were over a thousand acres of land in his plantation, yet the only living he could afford was as above mentioned. The following anecdote is told of this man. At seventeen he enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian for the Mexican campaign. He wrote to his mother, a wealthy widow, for money. She sent him three hundred dollars a few days previous to his departure for the seat of war. Indignant at the small amount, with childish impatience and spitefulness he chewed up the bills and spit them as far as his indignant lips and tongue could send the mass.

I could multiply such cases as the above, but I must return to my story.

I found that the story of my uncle's illness was much exaggerated; indeed, that it was but little better than a ruse to procure my return. He had a cough, it is true; but I found him Captain of a company of Home Guards, and working day and night for "the Cause." The rebellion seemed to have waked him from his selfish repose. I was chagrined at the imposition which had been practiced upon me; but I did not regret the opportunity of revisiting my friends, and of ascertaining for myself, amidst the contradictory accounts, something of the feeling among the people.

By one of those inexplicable coincidences which transpire in almost every life, and which startle and awe, Charles B——, on furlough from the rebel army, was visiting for the first time, since his unexplained departure, the home where I had first known him. I knew nothing of his presence in the place until I accidentally met him at the house of a friend. I pass over the manner of our meeting as well as other particulars of this unexpected interview after a separation covering five years. I was then made acquainted with the measures which my uncle had taken to separate two loving hearts. I was surprised at the revelation; his course was such as I should never have anticipated from my knowledge of his character.

When Charles asked me to marry him I did not hesitate a moment. I was of age, there was no one then to interpose. I remembered that he was a rebel; but I couldn't make it cause any difference in my feeling for him. I listened to my heart alone, and that called for him. He wished to have our union consummated at the earliest practicable moment before my uncle should learn of his presence in the village. So the very next day I stood up with him, though he wore the rebel uniform, and promised to love and honor him till death should us part. Thank God that I did so.

A period of happiness for fifty days, despite my uncle's displeasure, followed our marriage; and then, my husband's furlough having expired, he bade me farewell and rejoined his regiment. Then came months of anxiety relieved by frequent letters breathing the deepest love to me, and for the South a zeal as unfaltering and as unquestioning as that which animated Marion and his men. Of course I read with avidity all the war news that came within my reach; Northern papers frequently fell into my hands. I had occasion to remark that in most engagements both sides claimed a victory more or less decided.

One day the dispatches brought the tidings of a desperate battle having been fought, in which my husband's regiment was engaged. I was locked in my room all that day, with my heart torn and divided in its desires. I did not wish the Southern cause to triumph. I had no question now as to where my sympathies lay. But that day I could scarcely bear to think of my husband as among the defeated. In my hopeful nature it did not occur to me that any thing worse than defeat could overtake him.

After a few days of anxious waiting we had some reliable intelligence in reference to the battle. I had gone out to the gate and stood leaning on the fence, waiting for the news-boy. I was thinking that when the Union should be restored—as I had no doubt it would be some day—I should persuade Charles to go North, or, if he should be forced to leave his country, I thought of Canada; that we would settle just across the lines, where I could sometimes see my Northern friends. They would love him, for he was noble; and he, cured of his errors and prejudices against the North, would love those who had honored and fostered his wife.

My reverie was interrupted by the news-boy's whistling "Away down South in Dixie." He handed me a paper over the palings, and went on. I remember looking after him, and thinking that he probably had a father or "big brother" in the army, whose old soldier-clothes he was wearing; for his pants were very long in the seat and very short in the legs, and both they and his coat were very baggy. Then I opened the paper and turned, of course, to the telegrams. The Confederates had been driven from the field, leaving their slain and wounded in the hands of the Federals. Then came that dark and bloody record, which the stranger can run over so carelessly, but which women who have loved ones in the ranks read with a fearful dread. I ran over it, thinking I might find a familiar name; it met me in my husband's—"Killed."

I do not know just what I did and said when this thunder-bolt burst upon me. I should not write it here for the public eye could I recall every particular. Let the writers of fiction display their skill at dissecting the human heart and in analyzing a sorrow. I choose to be forever silent concerning those days of anguish.

I found numerous comforters, the burden of whose condolence was that my husband had fallen in a holy cause. "Miserable comforters are ye all!" was the answer of my heart. One day my scorn burst forth. "It is not true!" I exclaimed, with passionate impatience. "It is not a holy cause to which he has been sacrificed. My husband was honest, but he was deceived. The South is duped, and will be brought to shame. Your leaders—" I checked myself, remembering too late that such language there was treason.

From that time I was conscious of being the object of distrust, and felt a relentless espionage pursuing and overshadowing me. My warmest friends cut me to the heart with their coldness. If I went out it was to feel that the finger of scorn was leveled at me, and that the eyes of persecutors were upon me. There can be nothing worse than the desolation I felt then. I should have wished to die but for the sweet hope of solace and love which centred in my unborn babe. In that was my comfort. I counted the days which must elapse before the desired event, and each morning jealously deducted the past day.

The time was at length accomplished, and a winsome, helpless baby lay in my bosom. I had wished for a boy, whom I could call Charlie; but they brought me instead a baby-girl, with dainty limbs and a noble head, and eyes so like her father's that I cried until I thought I should never cease crying. I teased them to let me keep the baby in my arms the first night, for I was not very sick; so, while all the others slept, I waked and watched with my darling with a deeper happiness in my heart than had ever been there before. There was a love in my bosom which I knew to be deathless for my orphaned girl. I said then—oh! so honestly and so believingly—that I could never have a feeling of impatience, or anger, or weariness toward my baby; that I should always be good for her sake; that I would strive to eradicate every thing from my nature that was not noble and beautiful; that I would consecrate every hour of my life to her. As soon as I was able I should begin to bathe and dress her. No menial hands should rob me of the sweet labor. From me she should learn to walk and talk; and when the time came there was a world of happiness for me in the training of her mind and character. I thought it all out that night as I lay there with my baby softly sleeping in my arms. That was, despite my loneliness and helplessness, the sweetest, happiest night I ever spent.

I had received the necessary attention during my sickness, because a woman in child-birth is an appeal to every other woman. But when I grew convalescent I was conscious of the old coldness, and I felt that I must get away from the stifling atmosphere. As before, the star of hope and promise hovered in the North. So, when we were able, baby and I, I went to a friend who had influence in high Government circles, and through his assistance succeeded in reaching Wilmington, North Carolina. The English steamer, the G—, was lying in port, and the rumor was prevalent that she was taking in a cargo preparatory to running the blockade. I consulted a tried Confederate official, and by his advice and through his agency I found myself a passenger on the G—, a long, low, side-wheel steamer of great power. I found some thirty passengers on board, three of whom were bound for Europe, the others for the Northern States and Bermuda. It was currently believed on board that one of the three above mentioned was a courier bearing dispatches. The steamer had a cargo of 450 bales of cotton, several boxes of tobacco, and a few barrels of turpentine.

I felt lonely enough amidst the strange faces which met me on every side; then, too, I was naturally anxious for the result of this new movement. The utmost cheerfulness and apparent freedom from apprehension prevailed among crew and passengers. If our captain had expected to get to sea without attracting the attention of the blockaders he was doomed to disappointment. We had scarcely got under way when the heavy boom! boom! boom! of the Federal guns smote to our hearts the presence of danger.

"No damage done yet; the firing is too high; shots go over her masts," were the words which were soon passing from mouth to mouth. Even as they were on our lips the thunder of cannon was again in our ears, and the steamer quivered from bow to stern.

"Three men are knocked down, the windlass is broken, and the bulwarks are torn away!" was now the information which anxious men retailed.

Boom! boom! boom! The firing was thick and fast; our steamer bellowed and shrieked like some wounded monster, but moved straight onward, piling the waters right and left. Boom! boom! again, and a shot came whizzing directly through the cabin, two feet above water-mark, creating a commotion among crockery and chandeliers. I hugged my baby closer. It seemed as though wings had been lent our steamer, so arrow-like were her movements. "We are gaining on our pursuers; the distance between us is steadily widening; the shot fall far in our wake!" was the welcome intelligence which was being rapidly telegraphed from one to another; when suddenly the welkin rang with a shout of triumph from our victorious steamer. We had successfully run the blockade!

We made the voyage from Wilmington to Halifax in four days and twenty hours. As we came in sight of the latter place the G— ran up the Confederate flag amidst the shouts of the passengers. She rode gallantly into port, greeted by the huzzas of the multitude that thronged the wharf.

Eager for a re-union with my friends at an early day, I took passage on the C—, which cleared for Boston. There were some English gentlemen and several Canadians on board, among whom the American war, the acts of the Administration, and kindred topics, were frequently discussed. Military arrests, the restrictions upon the press and upon the speech of the people, the excited feeling at the North, were dwelt upon at large. From these things doubts began to enter my mind as to the reception I should meet from my Northern friends and acquaintances. What welcome could I expect from them when I was weeping behind my sable veil for a rebel? How did I dare go to those who had given their dear ones to crush the rebellion, while their graves were yet fresh, and ask them to countenance and aid the widow and child of a rebel? Would they believe me when I should tell them that my love for the old flag is stronger than ever, and that my prayers follow the Federal arms? And even if those who know me best should trust and sustain me, will not others be found ready with the cry of "traitor" and "spy?" All the intolerant are not of the South.

So the questionings and doubts grew until, to my lonely and dispirited heart, the world not only appeared cold and without a friendly face, but arrest and imprisonment for myself and destitution for my child seemed imminent.

The nearer I approached my destination the more I doubted, and the greater was my shrinking from a meeting with my former friends; and when the cars stopped at —, I stepped off, many miles short of my original destination. Estranged friends I did not wish again to encounter. I could not settle down in idleness. Economize as I would, my slender purse would soon be empty unless replenished. How could this be accomplished? My baby was at such an age that I could not go into the school-room even if I could have obtained a teacher's situation in a strange place. I naturally thought of my pen. I was soon at work on a story—a very quiet, simple story about a young soldier who died at Fortress Monroe. I wrote at odd moments while my baby slept, or as she lay on the bed looking at her little hands, and softly cooing her admiration of her dainty pink fingers. I used to watch the clock, and I don't think I ever secured fifteen consecutive minutes for my writing, except when baby slept, and she seldom in the day slept half an hour. Every few moments I was obliged to throw aside my pen—in the middle of a sentence, perhaps, and just as I was becoming engaged with my thought, and felt that I was expressing it with some felicity. There would be an interruption of an hour or two; and when I returned to my writing, cold and weary, I felt that all warmth and enthusiasm were gone. Often I had lost the word or illustration, and sometimes the thought itself had escaped me.

But the story was at length completed. Then I borrowed a little carriage from a neighbor, and having tucked baby in it, she and I went to the post-office. When we arrived there she was asleep, so I left the carriage on the sidewalk while I ran in and got the MS. weighed. Twenty-three cents was the postage on it, and a very large sum it seemed, as I took it from my scanty purse. I hadn't learned the new postal regulation concerning MSS. passing between publishers and authors. I mailed the story to the editor of a Philadelphia magazine.

Every few days I drew baby to the Post-office. It was ten days before I heard from my story. At the end of that time, as I inquired at the little square office-window, I saw the clerk, as he ran over the letters, pause at a huge document in a yellow envelope. My heart sank; I felt that my story had been returned.

"Where are you expecting letters from?" he asked.

"From Philadelphia," I replied, remembering, with a lonely kind of feeling, that I had no correspondents elsewhere. He handed me the package; I put it in my dress-pocket and left the office.

"Little darling!" I murmured, as I stopped to tuck the shawls around baby before starting home with her; "we must look somewhere else."

When I reached an obscure street I drew the carriage to one side, and taking the rejected MS. from my pocket, with a feeling of pity for the poor slighted thing, I broke the seal. I found a kind, courteous letter from the editor, which brought the quick tears to my eyes. The story was written with feeling and ability, he said; but, owing to the stringency of the times, he was restricted by the publishers in his purchase of MSS., and was compelled to return my story.

Being ignorant, as I have said, of the new postal bill, and feeling that I could not afford to throw away postage-stamps, my next move was to address a letter to the editors of a New York paper, inquiring if they had room for new contributions, provided, of course, there was merit in them. In a few days I received a printed reply, to the effect that they had all the matter on hand which they could possibly use (I do not believe they said through all time), and concluding with, "We herewith return your MS."—not quite applicable in my case, it seemed to me, since I had sent no MS.

A few days after I mailed the story to another Philadelphia magazine, with a note stating that the editor of so and so had been pleased to express a favorable opinion of the story. A few days brought me a letter from some member of the editorial corps, acknowledging receipt of MS., complaining of the deluge of contributions with which they were afflicted, and concluding with the question, "Why did not Mr. — accept it?" By the next mail I sent stamps to pay return postage.

Somewhat discouraged by these repeated failures, a few days of irresolution succeeded. During this time I met with the statement that, owing to the hard times, many of the best writers in America were out of employment. If this was true, it was, I decided, most ridiculous for me, who had no name, perhaps deserved none, to expect success. It was folly for me to attempt to live by my pen: I had no gift, no talent; my vanity had led me astray. So I went to work one day, and prepared a package for the flames. I put into it all my published articles, and all MSS. prepared for publication; all those delightful complimentary notices I had so carefully cut from the papers publishing or copying my articles; all the letters I had received encouraging or commending my efforts—all so dear to me once. I had condemned them to be burned as a meet punishment for the deception they had so long practiced upon me; but their familiar, loved faces made such an appeal that I commuted their punishment to imprisonment. So I deposited them at the very bottom of an old trunk, under books and boxes, etc.

That night my baby was attacked with inflammation of the brain. Then came weary days and nights of watching and agonizing suspense. With medicines, and the doctor's bill, and fuel, and lights, there was a fearful drain on my purse. Every few days I would steal off and count over its pitiful contents; for I thought I should probably lose my baby, and I could not endure that her little grave should be in the Potters' Field.

But my baby was spared me, and I felt strong again for work. I began to think of asking for work at the shops, for something which I could do at home; for I would not listen to the suggestion of leaving my baby to the care of others.

A few weeks since an old number of Harper's Magazine fell into my hands, in which the editor invited contributions, and promised to read and pronounce upon them. I somehow felt encouraged by the kindly tone to make another effort. I resurrected my story, and re-read it, pen in hand, now dotting an i or crossing a t, and now making some change in the punctuation, or altering the structure of a sentence. The three introductory pages I rewrote; they were fictitious, and seemed cold and formal as I read them with a secret fear that the editor might condemn the story before getting through with them. At the earliest opportunity I mailed the story to Harper's Magazine. I stated in the beginning that it was returned.

I thought I would tell you why I wrote that story; that I would like to have you know that I was writing that I might live, and that I might keep my baby with me. I fear that I have made my story too long, and that it teems with faults. But think how it has been written: a line at one time, a half-dozen lines at another. I have never been able to get off more than a half-page of MS. without an interruption. I have sometimes written with my baby on one knee, reaching for my pen and paper. I used to think that if I could dress her up, and lay her away on a shelf, as I used to do with my doll, for a single morning, so that I could give all my mind to my writing, that I might accomplish something worthy your acceptance.

You may say that, circumstanced as I am, I should not attempt the part of an author; that I should seek a livelihood by other means. What means? I ask beseechingly. What can I do?

HOMŒOPATHY,

IN ONE OR MORE CHAPTERS AND SEVERAL SUB-CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.—WASHINGTON.

"THANK Heaven, there's no particular way to spell in Scotch!" So said Davie Tait, in writing from "Auld chuckie Reekie," Edinburgh, to his douce wife in the "kintra," as he nearly foundered on the ugly snag of an English polysyllable. Thank Heaven, say I, that a chapter has no particular length. It may fill half a volume, or it may consist of half a dozen lines. Nay, I remember that Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in his "What will he do with It?" has a chapter (Book III., Chapter III.) which, title and all, contains only two words, viz.:

"Dénouement. POODLE."

And who that has read Southey's delightful "Doctor" can forget his famous one-word chapter, and that word,

"Ballibooribanginorribo?"

But an ingenious Yankee has excelled both Southey and Bulwer in both wit and "brevity, which is the soul of wit."

While the annexation of Texas to the United States was still an open question a wealthy Abolitionist offered a handsome prize for the best essay, of moderate size, against annexation. Some wag, and I think it was my old friend Elizur Wright, then editor of the Boston Chrono- type newspaper, but better known in the literary republic as the translator of La Fontaine's fables, announced that the prize had been awarded to an essay which consisted, as this article of mine is to consist, of two chapters, but which, very unlike this article of mine, was composed of but two words, viz.:

Chapter I. Tex-as.

Chapter II. Tax-es.

I am resolved that my article on Homœopathy shall consist of two chapters—two doses would, perhaps, be the more appropriate term, considering the nature of the subject; but what will be the length of either I will hazard no prophecy. One may be long—a sort of Allopathic dose—and the other short and sweet, like a Homœopathic pellet; or, as Artemus Ward might say, vice versa. One thing, however, is fixed "as firm as Ailsa rock," and that is, that my first chapter shall begin in Salem, proceed to Boston, and conclude in Washington. Like the parson who took for his text "the flesh, the world, and the devil," and informed his astonished audience that he should "dwell briefly in the flesh, pass rapidly over the world, and hasten as fast as he could to the devil," I announce this threefold division of Chapter I.

In his witty way the poet Burns asserts of something true that it's

"As sure's the deil's in hell Or Dublin city."

That Washington resembles Dublin in at least one particular, I think that no expert, be he Homœopath or Allopath, will venture to deny.

With this brief "doch an' dorrach" I begin my narrative excursion, starting from SALEM.

In Salem, then, and in the counting-room of that honest man, "merchant prince," and true Christian, the late Michael Shepard, let this history commence. Mr. Shepard was largely engaged in East India commerce, particularly with that other "merchant prince," the Imaum of Muscat, royal in rank, and almost as royal in character as his Salem compeer. It was he who sent, through Mr. Shepard, to President Van Buren, certain Arabian horses of the highest nobility of equine blood; and to Mr. Shepard himself he was ever transmitting the pleasantest testimonials of his regard—sometimes in the shape of Mocha coffee that my mouth waters over as I remember its rare flavor and savor; sometimes in the form of dates so delicious that even "ladies of uncertain age," to whom all common dates are dreadful, might love to hear them named. In short, the Imaum, "may his shadow never be less!" was a very clever fellow.

Prosperity did not harden Mr. Shepard's heart. He always took a personal and affectionate interest in every officer who sailed his ships, and in every man whom those officers commanded. Those who served him faithfully served him long; the best the longest. Be he captain, with Caucasian fairness of complexion, or cook, with the burned skin of Ethiopia, Mr. Shepard watched over his welfare with paternal vigilance, remembering the far-off sailor, and not forgetting the dear ones whom he left behind.

Among these objects of Mr. Shepard's regard was an old negro, who had sailed for many years and many voyages in his employment as cook and steward. We will call him Cato; Scipio, Cæsar, or Cato, it makes no difference which. I beg his pardon, with all my heart, for having forgotten his real name; and among the classic pseudonyms I have no choice:

"Tros, Tyriusve, nullo mihi discrimine habeo."

And so we will call this Ethiop Cato.

Is it not odd that the old Greeks and Romans, from Homer to Ovid, should have fancied that the negro complexion was occasioned by that rash boy Phaeton's driving the Chariot of the Sun too near the Equinoctial, and thus roasting the natives into perpetual blackness?

"Sanguine tunc credunt in corpore summa vocato Æthiopum populos nigrum traxisse colorem!"

Let no hasty reader imagine from my seemingly vagrant course of narrative that I, like Phaeton, have lost my way, or can not guide the frisky steeds of my memory or imagination. I know the path and whither it leads, and will now return to the highway of my story.

In an hour of weakness Cato was tempted to smuggle, and attempted to smuggle homeward a bale of brilliant Madras handkerchiefs; and a baleful speculation did they prove to him. The custom-house officials at Salem were too vigilant for the success of Cato's enterprise. The handkerchiefs were seized, and so was he. Greatly to his surprise, Cato found himself raised to the dignity of defendant in the District Court, and held to bail in the sum of six thousand dollars. Mr. Shepard and another Salem merchant became his sureties.

My late lamented friend, Robert Rantoul, Jun., of Beverly, was then the United States District Attorney; a man whom I knew well and loved much, and whose sudden death I mourned with such tears as men seldom shed over any but their own flesh and blood; a man of rare natural endowments, and of acquisitions still more rare; one of the illustrious Essex County THREE—Choate, Cushing, Rantoul; and by no means the least of the three—brave, honest, true, and, like Bayard himself, "sans peur, et sans reproche;" and who was struck down in the midst of a brilliant career, at an hour when the country seemed most to need his services, by one of those mysterious providential dispensations which overwhelm all hearts with grief, set at naught all our philosophy, and subject our faith to the most trying ordeal.

His career as a politician was successful; but although he was learned in the law, and, when he threw himself into a case, tried it with consummate ability, he had not what is called a legal mind; and, as Judge Wilde, of the Massachusetts Supreme Bench, once said of him to me, "Although he tried a case well, he tried it like a layman, not like a lawyer." His practice, therefore, was never very large, and he owed his appointment as District Attorney to his political standing rather than to his position at the bar. His integrity was beyond question; but a want of method sometimes involved himself and others in perplexity and embarrassment.

In Cato's case Mr. Rantoul, being satisfied that it was the first, and would be the last offense, agreed to discharge the defendant on easy terms—the payment of costs and a penalty of three hundred dollars. The money was paid, a simple receipt given for it, and satisfaction of the claim ought to have been entered on the records of the court. But this entry Mr. Rantoul forgot to make, and the case stood open, and was continued from term to term, and year to year, until Mr. Rantoul's death.

A new District Attorney succeeded, longo intervallo, to Mr. Rantoul's office and docket in the person of Benjamin F. Hallett, another remarkable man, of whom, as well as of Mr. Rantoul, I have a hundred interesting reminiscences, which I will, God willing and editors consenting, embody some time in a chapter, or series of chapters, for Harper.

Under Mr. Hallett's administration the case of United States vs. Cato was reached and put upon the trial list, and one day called; but, though the crier of the Court could, like Glendower, "call spirits from the vasty deep," yet in his case, as in that of the choleric Welshman, they "would not come when he did call." Cato was called, but as he happened at that moment to be drinking a whisky toddy just under the lee of the island of Perim, in the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, he neither heard nor answered the call, and was thereupon defaulted. In due course of time the Bail, who had for years forgotten the suit, well knowing it had been adjusted, were astonished by a notice from the new District Attorney, informing them that they were liable to be sued for six thousand dollars. Mr. Shepard, not at all comprehending the reason of this notice, came at once to and placed the matter in my hands for investigation.

I soon ascertained to my own satisfaction, and that of Mr. Hallett, that the money agreed upon had been paid to Mr. Rantoul, but that not a tittle of evidence existed to prove that Mr. Rantoul had accounted for it to the Government.

Under these circumstances, with my client's approval, I offered to pay once more the sum of three hundred dollars to the United States, together with costs to Mr. Hallett, to be taxed at fifty dollars, and have the satisfaction of judgment "entered of record." Mr. Hallett, who was essentially a good-natured man, felt all the hardship of this case, and was inclined to accept my proposition. But he hesitated to take the responsibility, and desired that I should first obtain the sanction of the Solicitor of the Treasury at Washington, to whom he gave me a letter requesting the desired authority.

The Solicitor was a young Western lawyer with whom I had no acquaintance. But the Attorney-General, Hon. Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts (another of "the Essex Three"), was a gentleman whom I knew well. Mr. Shepard was also acquainted with Mr. Cushing, and fancied that, instead of writing to him or to the Solicitor, it would be well for me to visit the Federal capital, and obtain a personal interview with those gentlemen; thus hastening the decision, and perhaps determining its character. I agreed to go at my earliest leisure; and to insure tolerable quarters in that then crowded institution, "Chargehigh House," I telegraphed the hotel clerk to secure me a comfortable apartment, and was promised one to my "entire satisfaction." His rascality cost me a fever, but I have long since forgiven him. If, however, his own conscience forgives him without at least two barrels of penitential tears, it must be one of those consciences, "easy as old Tilly," which smart under no affront, and take offense at no outrage. It is said that a well-fattened porker may pass unharmed through a den of rattlesnakes, grunting with undisturbed serenity while a dozen of those crotaline monsters are striking their fangs, with idle rage, into the adipose matter with which he is armed "in panoply complete." The conscience of that clerk, if it stung him not for his imposition on me, might safely venture upon a similar excursion to Rattlesnake Hill.

WASHINGTON.

I reached Washington late on Saturday night, drove wearily to the "Chargehigh Hotel," and was shown directly to my "reserved room" on the second floor. The night was cold and blustering, the worst weather of the latter end of March. The room was small. No fire-place or stove offered its grateful welcome. The one solitary window was wide open. I closed the window, and being too tired and sleepy to make complaint that night, I went to bed. Before I slept, however, I again opened the window, nor did I dare to shut it again that night. I will not infect or incense my readers by dwelling on the annoyances of that long night of horrors. Years afterward, when I read of the poison epidemic that decimated the "National," I recalled the mephitic atmosphere of the cell I occupied that night in the "Chargehigh House."

I rose early, and rose with a full consciousness of poison and fever in every drop of blood in my veins. The hours dragged heavily along. I had no appetite, and breakfast disgusted me. My head ached. I had a sense of weariness and pain, "Zerschlagenheitsschmerz," as our German polyglots so well call it, in every joint and limb. At times my heart seemed too big for my breast, and the blood galloped through my veins with pulsations that smote on my brain like the footfalls of a squadron of horse at full charge.

In this feverish condition I remembered that my former friend and college classmate, the Rev. Stephen A. G. Collis ("stat nominis umbra"), was pastor of one of the metropolitan churches, and my heart warmed toward him with a return of the old, boyish, college affection. I recollected him as one of the finest writers and declaimers in the University. He had gained the reputation of a pulpit orator of uncommon merit. I had often longed to hear him preach; and so I yielded to my wish. I ought to have sent for a physician; I went for a parson. I ought to have gone to bed; I went to church. Had I sent for a doctor, it would have been Dr. Lyndesay, the allopathic practitioner, whom I had known some fifteen years before as the partner of Dr. Sewall; and in that case this article on Homœopathy would never have been written, and I should have lost some of the pleasantest scenes of my life.

The bell had nearly done tolling as I reached the church, and took my seat, under the sexton's pilotage, in the pastor's pew. The Rev. Stephen—"Saint Stephen" we used to call him at "old Brown"—Saint Stephen, as I sat down, was occupied in arranging the lessons of the morning, and did not see me come in; nor indeed did he once look up until I had had full five minutes' opportunity to study his honest and pleasant face. I had not seen him for fifteen years, and time and trial had written their touching records in many a line around the mouth and eyes, had thinned the hair upon his temples, and stolen the morning glow of youth from his cheeks. As I gazed on the countenance thus changed, yet still familiar, Saint Stephen looked up and cast his eyes slowly around upon the congregation. I watched the progress of his glance until it rested upon me. No sun-flash ever lit up a morning cloud with a sweeter radiance than that which now glorified the face of my friend. He sprang instantly to his feet, hurried down the pulpit stairs, and approaching me with rapid steps, to the manifest astonishment of his entire congregation, seized me by both hands, and gave me a welcome as loud, hearty, and demonstrative as though we were standing by his own hearth. This greeting was very delightful, but somewhat embarrassing, and I felt considerably relieved when, at the end of some two minutes, during which time, as one of my country neighbors used to say, we had been "the centre of a focus," the enthusiasm of my friend subsided, and he returned to his pulpit.

My attention and the regards of the whole assembly were soon concentrated on the appropriate exercises of the morning service, every part of which was "beautiful exceedingly." The sermon was rich with thought, brilliant with illustration, and full of tender pathos. Its subject was "the Baptism of our Lord." The preacher, with exquisite grace, described and reproduced the scene. The waters of Jordan flowed before our eyes; we saw ten thousand men, women, and children clustered on its banks beneath that glorious sky of Palestine, and underneath the shadows of tree and vine of Oriental strangeness. We saw our Lord descending into the watery grave of baptism; and, as he rose with radiant face from Jordan, the celestial dove fluttered around his head, and a voice from heaven was heard declaring, "This is my beloved Son!" How my blood thrilled as he closed this description by the eloquent exclamation: "Here, for the first time in the history of man, did God in each of the three persons of his Godhead make himself manifest to human sense—the Son incarnate, the Holy Ghost resting visibly on his head, and the voice of the Father Almighty sounding aloud from the sky above!"

After church Stephen and I again met and opened our hearts to each other; lived o'er the past, and were again young and joyous colleagues. He found that I was ill, and insisted, with an earnestness that could not be resisted, on my coming at once, "bag and baggage," to his house. "My wife," said he, "will be delighted to see you; she is a warm-hearted Southern woman, and makes my friends her own." I yielded, not unwillingly, to his hospitable entreaties, and in another hour had transferred myself and "traps" from the mephitic den of "mine inn," to a well warmed and spacious chamber in the admirably appointed establishment of my old friend.

My reception there was most hearty and delightful. Husband, and wife, and three pretty children, and a demure young lady, a niece, from New England, "Miss Lizzie," seemed to emulate and outvie each other in their endeavors to make me feel at home.

It is, at best, a sad and dismal thing to be sick away from one's real home, and from the family who cherish his life and health as their own. But here, with Stephen and his loving circle of friends, the affliction was rendered as light as possible, and I felt, in the language of Scripture, that "my lines had fallen to me in pleasant places."

I struggled hard with my illness, and would not be sick; at least I would not succumb to my fever until I had called on the Attorney-General and put my business in such a train that all anxiety on that score should be removed from my feverish mind. Mr. Cushing I knew to be a business man in the best New England sense of the term; at his office early and late, devoting himself to its duties with an incumbent application and enthusiasm of industry which have always characterized this extraordinary man as scholar, lawyer, politician, judge, and statesman.

I called at his office at 9 o'clock Monday morning and inquired for "General Cushing." "Are you a member of Congress, Sir?" asked the door-keeper. "No." "Then you can not see him until after 12 o'clock," replied the man. "I think I can," said I, "as I have come from Massachusetts for that very purpose. Show him my card."

The next minute Mr. Cushing had me by the hand, and greeted me in such fashion that to this day my pulse quickens at the recollection. "My dear fellow"—those were his first and very words—"My dear fellow, you ought not to be here, you are in a raging fever; you ought to be in bed, and under a doctor's care."

"I can not afford to be sick, General," said I, "until you know my errand here." In less than three minutes I told him Mr. Shepard's story, and had this generous answer, "Give me Mr. Hallett's letter to the Solicitor; by 12 o'clock the whole thing shall be arranged; and do you go directly home to your excellent classmate's; go to bed, and send for a doctor. You shall hear from me this afternoon." I obeyed him. He is a man to be obeyed always; but when, as in this case, his imperial eye was bright with kindness, and the sweet authority of friendly solicitude spoke in every tone, obedience was the pleasantest of duties. I obeyed him, and he kept his promise. He attended at once to my case, and within the specified time a note from him informed me that my business was all arranged, and that I had only to "get well as fast as possible."

I went to bed. My Southern hostess had spread the bed with linen sheets—fine, soft, and snowy. But Miss Lizzie, with shrewd sagacity, foreseeing that in my feverish state the touch of linen would produce "a chill"—one of those horrid premonitory typhoidal agues which are so near akin to death—interposed gently in my behalf, and substituted cotton. In that one little act I recognized not merely a thoughtful and kindly character, but that instinctive clearness of perception and promptness of action which make the true Sister of Mercy or Charity—the native-born nurse, and genius of the sick chamber.

And now came the question of a doctor. Mrs. Collis informed me that her own "family physician" would call within the hour, to see one of the children whose sickness, "the measles," had kept the mother away from church the day before, and that she would send him in to me.

He came; a tall young man, not polished and gentle, but rough and rather noisy; "frosty but kindly." He touched my pulse; "fever, 120 beats!" He looked at my tongue: "coat, overcoat, and shawl!" He then produced from a little pocket a little case, and from the little case some little bottles, six to a mouthful, filled with little pellets, "grains of mustard seed," in which I had then no "faith;" Liliputian canister-shot; and to my utter horror and dismay, I—I, an allopathic disciple, and believer in huge doses, in what good old Dr. Shattuck, of Boston, my family physician, used to call his "wringers and twisters," I found that I was now in the hands of a "HOMŒOPATHIC DOCTOR!"

My pulse ran up at once to a hundred and thirty. But I resolved, heroically, to submit to fate for one day at least, to hide from the kind eyes of my kind entertainers all my distrust and skepticism, and make a twenty-four hours' experiment with aconite of the forty millionth dilution. And the next day I renewed my resolution for another day's experiment; and on the day following—extremely weak, and feeling as though I had been confined a month—my pulse, however, indicating less than eighty. I forgot all about resolutions, pellets, homœopathy, "and a' that," and only knew that I was getting well.

Now I defy mortal man, or "the immortal gods" of Olympus, to furnish one pleasure in this world, of a merely bodily and sensuous kind, that can, for a moment, compare with this—the delicious sense of getting well.

I got well rapidly; and as rapidly became acquainted with, and attached to, the several members of this charming family. With Stephen, or to him rather, I talked and read Shakspeare, and opened to him, in that divine genius, a world of delight till then to him unknown. With Mrs. Collis I discussed a hundred graceful, womanly topics, and heard her Southern chat on Southern themes, with now and then an allusion to Miss Lizzie's flirtations with a certain Doctor Weeden. With Miss Lizzie I talked Boston, of course, as she lived in the vicinity of that "hub of the universe"—the Delphic Omphalos, whence come all "Boston notions," and all oracles worthy of credence!

And so passed several happy, convalescent days. God bless the dear friends who helped to make them so bright and happy! The first of April found me sitting up. About noon that day, after a noisy ringing of the door-bell, one of the servants came in "to tell Massa Noel what a white lady—a lady—white lady—from Bob-bob-Boston have called to see Mass' Noel!" Gracious, how my heart leaped to my mouth as the strange, glad thought, "my wife has come!" rushed into my mind! "Is it my wife, Sallie?" asked I.

"Oh no, Mass'," said the grinning girl, "'spect not—it's very young lady from Bo-bo-Boston."

"Well, Sallie, whoever it is, show her in." The lady approached with bonnet on and her veil down, the room obscure with a sort of "dim, religious light," and my ears disturbed by a strange movement of feet, and a queer sound of whisper and giggle, in the entry. The lady came in and sat down, and just as a hysteric, choked sort of laugh from outside suggested to my stupid soul the idea of April 1, she lifted her veil, and lo, Miss Lizzie herself! She had "fooled" me completely.

An hour afterward the bell rang furiously again, and the servant brought in to "Miss Lizzie" a very large letter in a strange hand, whose contents made Lizzie both laugh and blush as she read them. She read it more than once, and then handed the letter to me to read. I read it aloud, and with an emphasis and fluent facility that betrayed the authorship to quick-witted Lizzie. Here it is:

DR. WEEDEN.

The Doctor was a prudent man,
Who ne'er forgot his coat,
Who always his umbrella took,
And muffled up his throat.

The Doctor was methodical,
A gentleman discreet,
And over-shoes he always wore
Upon his tender feet.

He loved his patients like himself,
And for their sakes took care
On every cold and windy night
His over-coat to wear.

But Cupid shakes the calmest man,
Breaks all his habits down,
Unsettles the philosopher
As surely as the clown.

One flash from Lizzie's laughing eyes
Capsized good Doctor Weeden,
Reduced to chaos his ideas,
And almost spoilt his breeding.

The Doctor is an altered man,
His once pale face is flushed,
His toilet now neglected is,
And his dark curls unbrushed.

He wanders off—I know not where,
And stays—Heaven knows how long;
A hundred funny things he says,
And does some I deem wrong.

One blust'ring night, not long ago,
In spite of wind and rain,
Kind Lizzie at the Doctor's called
To see his sister Jane.

She called, with cousin Ned, at eight,
And lingered until ten;
Alas, for Lizzie's saddened heart,
He came not even then!

At ten o'clock she started up,
And grasped her shawl to go,
But on the door-step met a man!
"The Doctor?"—Even so.

With hearty haste he clasped her hand,
Escort her home he would,
While cousin Edward lagged behind,
As younger cousins should.

Heedless of cold, of rain, of wind,
The lovers stroll'd until eleven,
Their shoes obstructed by the mud,
But all their souls in heaven.

At home at last! The door-bell rings,
"Won't uncle Stephen scold?"
Just then poor Weeden shook as if
The night or he were cold.

Opens the door—"Oh, naughty girl!"
So does the impatient speech begin:
But uncle then the Doctor spies,
And softly adds—"Come in!"

Within the hall now Lizzie sees
With strange surprise and care
That Weeden has nor cloak nor shawl
Upon his shoulders bare.

Her heart sinks—far below her belt:
Her sweet eyes fill with tears;
A while one word she can not speak,
But sighs, and looks, and fears.

"You careless man!" at last she cries;
And, casting off her shawl,
Throws it around the stalwart form
Of Doctor Weeden tall.

Each end she tightened, and each fold
Her gentle touch caressed,
While feelings very new and nice
Warmed Weeden's manly breast.

With tender touch our Lizzie drew
That shawl about his waist,
And as the Doctor watched her mouth
I vow he took one taste.

But here the curtain drops, and I Must hasten to repose,
And who wears now that sacred shawl
My rhymes shall ne'er disclose.

As I stopped reading, Lizzie exclaimed, "I don't believe but what you wrote it yourself! But—how—did you—know he—kissed me?"

"Ah, Lizzie, I didn't know it until now!"

A day, or two, or three, after this incident I was on my way to Boston, where I arrived without accident, having fully accomplished my errand at Washington, and became also far less fearful than before of the perils of Homœopathy.

TOWARD SUNSET.

THOSE of us who live in cities are hardly aware of the changes of the hours as they appear on the dial, and are noted by country people who live in close relations with sunshine. We can readily, indeed, tell what o'clock it is; and the clocks that look upon us, and anon speak to us from so many towers, imply that we have lost the primitive calendar of the hours, and need the cunning hand of art to make up for the loss. In the fields, under the open heavens, among the flowers, and trees, and birds, and beasts, we find constant signals of the passing time; and an expert eye might perhaps tell the hour of the day, not only by the shadows cast by the sun, but by the sights and sounds of the landscape, from the aspect or fragrance of the flowers, or the note of birds and insects, or the turn of the cattle. Each hour has not only its external signs, but also its interior marks, and the mood of the life keeps step with the march of the day. Morning is what it pretends to be in the country, and not a sleepy appendage to the night, as it is apt to be with us in cities. It insists upon opening our eyes, and does not allow us to hide behind brick walls, or forests of chimneys, or close curtains and shutters. It comes upon us in a blaze of glory, and encounters no rivalry from gas-lights in the street or the chamber. Its rays in themselves are highly stimulating, real arrows of Apollo, with points not rusted by city vapors, nor blunted by contact with city brick and stone. The morning light itself in the open country is the best of tonics, and braces the will to its work. Labor begins with its dawning, and continues with its continuance, and closes with its closing. Sunrise and sunset are the natural limits of the farmer's day, and although city habits may urge upon him the need of the ten-hour system with good reason, the result will probably be to deduct the surplus time from the burning mid-day, and to keep the old system of beginning with sunrise and ending with sunset.

The intellectual life in the country shares considerably in the influence of natural conditions. The student there more readily works at his books and pen in the morning, and catches the habit of the early bird. Hard study he does cheerfully before his city friends are stirring, and continues at his task until the sun nears the meridian, and the heat in summer abates his vigor. As evening comes on his mind is moved in a different vein, and tends to such reading and meditation as rather entertains than tasks the faculties, more fond of being the guest than the host, or of yielding to genial companionship than providing for others' nurture by painstaking care. Or, if he is moved to play the host, it is rather to such guests as bring their own welcome than to such as need any anxious attention. We there with him keep open house to the thoughts, fancies, and remembrances that come to us of themselves, and easily make themselves at home. The sunset hour is especially fruitful in such companions, and it is not easy to face the pavilion whose gorgeous curtains are receiving the parting day without feeling our own hearts opening in fellowship to receive and entertain all friends, scenes, and visions that have ever passed from our sight.

The old religion made great account of this sunset hour, and the vespers of the ancient church evidently belong to its pensive and solemn inspiration. The vesper hymn ought to be sung while the sun is sinking from sight; and the simple and beautiful prayer of the old English Even Song, beginning, "Lighten our darkness, we beseech thee, O Lord, and by thy great mercy defend us from all perils and dangers of this night!" has great Nature herself for the intoning priest at this mystic time. We, indeed, who live in cities may hardly be able to tell when it is sunset, for we may be wholly in the shadow in our parlor or our pew, while the sunlight may be blazing upon the church-spire or the house-top. In fact, within the city walls the sun rises and sets to most people unannounced, and the day and the night fail to utter to our ears their most eloquent speech. We can, indeed, make up for the loss by especial helps of art and companionship. We may have our witching twilight hour of charmed fellowship, and hardly miss the glow of the evening red in the sky, while faces are lit up with hallowed recollections, and friendly eyes shine upon us with the light of other days; or we can rebel against our exile, and, like the Orientals, we can go to the house-top to muse or pray. He is a happy man whose house stands well not only with the social world, where no pests annoy, but also with the elements of nature, so as to give free play to the air and the light. Commend us to a position that allows the evening sunlight to pour into our window, and tell us its witching story of all that we have ever loved, whether lost or kept. We prize a good western exposure more than an eastern, because it is so full of poetry, and because, moreover, we are more sure of being awake to its charms than to the charms of the morning ray. For a man to be sure of seeing the sunset from his own home as long as he lives is happiness rare indeed, and ought to be a great element in his education and comfort. The world in the city is so restless and troubled that we need constant soothing, and if we can not keep a chaplain or poet to cheer or calm us, we may thus keep the most practiced and efficient of comforters, who has been doing God's blessed work since the first day closed in the bowers of Paradise.

In the city it is not easy, however, to choose our prospect, and a poet or devotee may find himself fixed between inexorable walls that present nothing more varied and animating than rows of windows or stacks of chimneys. In the country we may do very much what we choose with nature, and look to all quarters of the heavens as freely as the weather-cock that follows the veering breezes to all points of the compass. I confess to having paid some attention to the points of the compass in the fitting up as well as the laying out of our little domain; and our pet Waldstein makes me fancy sometimes that the whole globe is ours, and north, south, east, and west are waiting our bidding, and a few steps can transport us from the morning land to the evening land, or from the pole to the tropics. The last enlargement of our range of vision is given by clearing up a wild tangle of cat-brier and brush that shut in a charming little grove, which crowns a hillock that looks toward the setting sun. The work was thoroughly done, the ground grubbed and graded to allow sweet honey-suckle and green grass to carpet the earth before covered with weeds. At the foot of the stately cedars the clematis or virgin's bower was freely planted, to furnish an awning fairer than the tent-maker can provide. A belt of evergreens—the Norway spruce, the Scotch fir, and Austrian pine—was set out to encircle the whole as a kind of rural Pantheon. A rustic seat is placed on the tuft of the hillock so as to face the west, and a winding path of some hundred yards connects this pleasant haunt with our cottage. I call the place Vesper Knoll, and the seat Vesper Seat. If there seems to be affectation or conceit in this arrangement, so let it be. We all have our hobbies, why should not I have mine? One man fancies horses, another dogs, another yachts, another tends most to wine, or cigars, or to some other or to all forms of dainty living; while the ladies are free to set their affections on all things below, from puppies in pantaloons to poodles in collars, from parrots in caps and curls to parrots in cages. I have a fancy for books and nature, and especially for such combinations of the two as brings the life of literature into play with the life of nature. This pretty evening haunt does this; and all the Muses are generally to be found there about sunset, with their mystic mother Mnemosyne, ready to soothe and cheer you so far as you are willing to open your heart to them at that witching hour. Come and see me sometime, and we will talk over this matter together under influences less prosy than my poor pen can bestow.

But why dwell on individual tastes and especial instances? We all know very well that there is an evening tone that speaks in nature, human life, and in religion. The sounds of nature are then in a sympathetic, plaintive strain, and the minor key prevails in the notes of birds and insects. If there be music in colors, they may be said to speak the same language and sing the same songs with the sparrow, the whippoorwill, and the nightingale. Some of the sunset tints are glaring and gorgeous indeed, but the gentler and more pensive shadings prevail, and the violets and kindred hues, that are like the sweet tones of the soprano, are sure to lead on the coming night, and give their pensive cadence to the vesper hymn of nature, as chanted by the notes of her prismatic scale. The rays of the sun themselves seem to have a different quality from that which marks their morning glow. They are less stimulating and more soothing, as if vacated of the electric force that sends them fresh at dawn from Apollo's new-strung bow. We are not sure what the physical fact is, but to us the evening ray has a peculiarly soothing influence, and it seems to stir less the vital powers of plant and animal. It may be, indeed, that the change is in the objects acted upon, not in the agent, and that the weary earth, after yielding for the day to the call of her lord in the sky, no longer heeds the spur as in the morning, and the slanting solar beam abates its noonday directness, and falls upon tired and exhausted nature. The sun himself is apparently never weary and never rests, yet his virtue comes out variously as he is differently touched, and his evening quality to his subjects differs from that of the morning and the noon.

The nervous system of animals and men, and perhaps of plants, if they have any, appears to have its evening mood. It is more sensitive and less active, more ready to be acted upon than to act, more prone to play than work, to muse than to reason. Some of the flowers evidently have their twilight sensibility, and send forth a rare fragrance that made Linnæus call them melancholy flowers. The cattle are in a mild, genial temper, as the poet noted when he said:

We of human kind are in the tone of nature, and the more mystical functions of our being come into play. Our senses, sensibilities, thoughts, and fancies seem to move of themselves, and to be possessed by peculiar visitants. The night side opens upon us in harmony with the night side of nature. The eye has its visions and the ear its voices without any straining of the powers of attention. The eye, if fixed on vacancy, is not vacant; and the ear, though arrested by no engrossing sound, yet is in a hearing spirit; and the senses wait upon inward powers, ready to serve such spirits as may rise from the deep or come down from the heavens. The memory is wonderfully moved, and opens her great theatre of her own accord, lights her lamps, and passes before us her manifold scenes, and rehearses the life-drama, that she is always working upon and never finishing. She often shows us facts and faces that we had forgotten and could never recall by any act of our own will. This spontaneous function of memory is too little appreciated in our usual estimate of this faculty, and we have absurdly given over to the routine of dunces and book-worms a power that is full of inspiration, and capable of informing past and present with the light and humanity of God. A great artist is this very memory, and in a manner the mother of all arts, reproducing the materials and images of the past with new features, combinations, and powers, and not only re-collecting but remembering the rich treasures in her store-house.

That action or passion of the mind, or both action and passion, that we call Meditation, opens itself to us most readily as the evening draws on, and we find ourselves thinking unawares, and that unconscious movement of the mind from which the best thoughts spring appears. If we have been thinking all day upon some perplexing subject or knotty problem, without making much progress, we may find, as we sit at sunset, without any effort of forced attention, that the difficulty is cleared away at once, and the subject opens itself to us in full proportion and light. Especially in all subjects of higher interest, or such as call for the affections and fancy, and are capable of inspiration, is this mood of spontaneous meditation effective. Genius—which every soul has undoubtedly to some extent, and enables us all in some way to have inspirations, and to be possessed by superior powers—generally loves the sunset hour, and joins its wizard spell to the witchery of nature, Goethe, as quoted by Eckermann, spoke profoundly of this experience when he said, "Every production of highest art, every significant insight, every invention, every great thought, which bears fruits and has consequences, stands in no man's power, and is raised above all earthly might. Such things man has to regard as unlooked-for gifts from above, as pure children of God, which he is to receive and honor with grateful joy. In such cases man is to be considered as the instrument of a higher Providence—as a fitting vessel for the reception of divine influence."

We believe that we all have something of this receptive power, that is open to Heaven's best gifts. Yet our habits of life and methods of culture make too little of it, and spur us on to too much mere will-work, as if we were forced to do every thing, or almost every thing, for ourselves, and as if God and Nature would do little or nothing for us. It may be that the human will tends westward, and we who live on this side of the Atlantic lack the receptive spirit that so marks the Orientals, and that having all the world before us, a new country to make, we bear ourselves as if nothing were finished and to be enjoyed, and every thing were still to be done. The evening hour, fitly used, helps us correct this folly, and gives us something of the Oriental's quiet contemplation and receptive sentiment. The sunset tells us that the day is done, and the solemn light of history looks upon us from its parting rays, and shows us an image of the great past in this one passing day as emphatically as if it were a thousand years. We find our impatience checked, our feverish haste soothed, as we behold the earth sinking into her repose after toil; and nature, before so anxious and striving, is now peaceful, and moves retrospection instead of care. It is well to keep open soul to this tranquil vision, and let it do as it will with us. We find then that we are prepared to receive that majestic guest, and that we are born of Him who made the universe, and our better acquaintance is constantly bringing out the closeness of the relation. All the senses, especially the master-senses, the eye and ear, unveil their curtains to welcome the visitation. The breeze, the ripple or dash of the waters, the insects, the birds, the cattle, the evening tones of home and village, the shadows of the earth, the colors of the sky, the light of the stars—all touch answering chords within us, and the harmony is greater the less we try to force it, and the more we leave the elements within and without to their own free communion. Each sense is a mystic under such inspiration, and even the palate and the nostrils rise into priestly dignity, as some stray fragrance of a flower seems a delicious dream, and each sip of the cheering cup or taste of luscious fruit interprets the dogma of transubstantiation, and tells us that it is not wholly absurd to believe that matter may rise into spirit, or spirit may descend into matter.

We are yet to learn how great a grace and indeed a virtue is geniality, or openness to all good influences and true fellowship, and that life would not be nearly as poor and hard as it is if we would only take the gifts that God and Nature are so ready to give us. If we were more genial we must be not only more cheerful and calm, but also more earnest and original; and nothing more saddens and impoverishes us than the idea that we must be always exhausting ourselves, and never filling up—always on the go, and never in perfect rest. We are nearly all overworked, and what we call our pleasure is often our hardest work, and keeps us forever on the drive. Society goes with a rush as much as business, and tongues and plates clatter at night after the clink of dollars and the din of hammers cease with the going down of the sun. As soon as day ends we try to quarrel with God's law, and force night into an unnatural day at our presumptuous bidding, reversing instead of perfecting the true economy of the hours. We will not quarrel with art for trying to seize and continue the spell of nature, and prolong the witchery of twilight by music and conversation, paintings and the drama, and the other devices that refresh the genial soul, and entertain without exhausting the waiting intellect, sensibility, and fancy. The longer we live in the great city the more are we convinced that art is one of the most rational and healthful of influences among us, and is doing much to carry out the work of nature, and save us from the follies of artificial society. An evening hour or two in a picture-gallery or at the opera prolongs the charm of sunset, and deepens its delight without of necessity destroying its tranquillity. There is something in all true art that is in the evening tone, and suggests the finished day, and knocks at the door of the genial soul. Each picture or song is, in its way, a rounded whole, and asks to be taken into our hospitality as a ready guest to soothe and cheer, not to fret and fever us. The work of art is of itself something done already, and even a picture of sunrise or the morning chorus of the hunters is a finished composition, and thus bears with it something of the expression of the parting day. But society, as it generally prevails, is unfinished, restless, striving, uncomfortable, and adds the glare and hurry of the morning to the borrowed vexations, the chills and heats, the crowds and blaze of the artificial evening. We would give more for an hour at sunset with a friend or two, under genial sky, than for all the midnight magnificence of our crowded and heated drawing-rooms. It is one of the growing charms of our city life that we are not forced to go far from home to enjoy this solace, and nature is now opening her Eden in the very midst of our rising homes. Our great Park is reclaiming the very hour by many most of all neglected; and the jeweled clasp that binds the mantle of night upon the bosom of day, that sunset hour which is so often lost at the dinner-table or in the after-dinner nap, is becoming a favorite hour with multitudes to revel in the charms of our public gardens, groves, and waters. Art, too, is helping out the spell, and combining her voices and visions with the concerts and galleries of nature. God crown the union until the whole city enjoys the delight, and pleasure rises into refinement, and society becomes a school of education!

We remarked lately in an essay in these pages that the Christian church has reversed the order of the natural year, and made the autumn and winter of nature the spring and summer of the soul, beginning her spring-time at Advent, which generally opens with December, and fixing the two great festivals of Christmas and Easter at seasons when among us the earth withholds her bloom. We do not quarrel at this arrangement, and are glad to have the inward life genial as the outward world is cold and dreary. The heart, too, enjoys the contrast, and the Christmas carol and Yule-tide log meet the craving for social joy and godly mirth when snow and ices bind the landscape. It is wise to follow the same principle in the order of the day, and not reverse, but rather interpret and complete the meaning of the hours by a just method. Night is the winter of the day in its darkness and coldness, and we need therefore to do what we can to cheer it into a summer of the soul, instead of yielding passively to its humors. Probably, if left to ourselves, we would go to sleep soon after sundown with the beasts and birds; and not so much our individual inclinations as the habits of society keep us awake, and secure to us our round of pleasures and occupations. What we ought to seek in the round of the day, as of the year, is such adaptations as carry out instead of annulling the laws of God and nature. In winter we wisely follow the reaction of the heart from the chill of nature, and try to make life genial and spiritual without vainly forcing the season into an unnatural summer; so we should make the evening social and thoughtful, without trying to bring back the cares and worry and glare of the day. The true evening tone of life is a matter that we are to study as never before—to make it genial without dissipation, intellectual without straining, refining without affectation, and devout without pretension.

It would be well if our higher education as well as our social accomplishments paid more regard to what may be called the evening tone of thought and fellowship. Surely as a people we greatly need geniality; and as we put away convivial excesses we ought to cherish the convivial virtues, and have hearty companionship without relying upon the decanter or the beer-mug. Our leading men ought to help us, and we ought to help them, live more at ease and on terms of greater social simplicity, and look upon communion as quite as essential as originality. We ought to be willing to come together more quietly and happily, without demanding the zest of some great excitement or the novelty of some great demonstration, whether of numbers or talent. In our homes, schools, conventions, churches, we should have calm fellowship, allow an hour at least for quiet communion, as under the setting sun or the evening star, and not insist upon being forever under the spur of some popular agitation or impassioned appeal, or even original thought. We exhaust ourselves and our leaders by the constant demand for excitement, and err as much as if we insisted that the sun should never set, and life should always be in the noonday blaze.

If we have a brilliant man we insist upon his always shining, without remembering that his lamp must rest and be filled that it may duly shine, and that even genius keeps its original force only by due fellowship with other minds; and geniality is the receptive side of originality, the mother heart of that masculine head. We ask the day always to continue, the flower always to bloom, the vine always to bear. In fact, there is something tragic in the possession of genius, as of beauty, and they who worship it cruelly insist upon having its light and joy always. Few brilliant men live long and bear constant fruit, partly, perhaps, because such rare gifts are too costly and exhaustive to last long, but frequently because they are not allowed to rest and lie fallow. In no one respect is the prevailing error more conspicuously shown than in our church methods. We generally exhaust or kill our best preachers by insisting that they shall shine always and be one perpetual day. We ask them to shine not a few times in the year, but every week, if not every day; and not once, but twice or three times the same day we exact of them the rare and costly fruits of original thought and composition. Our people do this, not meaning any harm, but ignorant of the first principles of mental economy; and they often quietly set down the original gifts of their minister as part of the fixed social and spiritual capital upon which they and their children are to live and make a figure in this world and in the next. The result is that our ablest preachers die young, or are driven from the pulpit hopeless invalids before the time when men of other professions have matured their gifts and fame. The secret of this appalling fact lies in the exhausting nature of original thinking and composition, and in the incessant call for brilliancy and fire, and the refusal of ample quiet and communion.

The whole country has lately rung with the name of one of our most gifted orators and writers, who died before completing his fortieth year. We will not undertake to fathom the secret purpose of Divine Providence in removing from the world so soon a mind so rare and a temper so genial and fascinating. But it seems to us rather a marvel that he lived so long than that he lives no longer. We hear of monthly, and even perpetual roses, and ever-bearing berries, that keep their promise for a few years during the summer-time; but who has heard of a vine or tree in perpetual bloom, or fruitage without respite? As well ask the vine or apple to put forth fresh leaves and fruit forever, as expect the human brain to be forever originating thought. Starr King died from the effect of disease upon a constitution overwrought by the work of original composition and exciting utterance. In his case this may have been, and probably was, well, for the especial need demanded especial effort, and the pen and voice call for heroes and martyrs as well as the sword. He evidently was aware of the excessive demands made upon his strength in the pulpit, and in the arrangements for his new church in California he expressly guarded against the prevailing error of making the preacher's brain the principal and almost the sole fountain of light and life, and he introduced an order of devotional service that secures communion, instead of depending always upon originality. He read wisely the lesson of the evening hour far away on that Pacific shore, and instituted a form of vespers very much upon the idea of the ancient church, with modifications suited to our own age and country. The progress of a similar service among our people so generally is one of the noteworthy signs of the times; and it is a remarkable fact that its calming influence is more craved by the popular taste than the old sensation preaching; and crowds throng to church to hear the old hymn and chants and scriptures, more comforted by the brief exhortation or exposition than by the usual elaborate and lengthy sermon.

Without going into any ecclesiastic antiquities, it might interest readers to know the temper and usage of the ancient church as to the evening hours, and have a glimpse of the forms of devotion and treasures of literature that have gathered around the vesper service. The tone of the service is eminently affectionate and homelike. The Magnificat, or Hymn of Mary of Nazareth, is the favorite melody that has been sung for ages immemorial, even in Protestant England, as evening comes on and the lengthening shadows move thoughts of home on earth or heavenward. As the cultus of the Virgin Mother grew into the creed of Christendom the Catholic vespers were more given to Mariolatry, and probably most of the hymns of this class were inspired by the romance of this season. It is hard to believe that this belief has prompted so much of the lyrical literature of Catholicism. The modern reader is astounded in looking over the grand collection of Latin hymns issued in Germany to find that so many of them are in honor of Mary. Of the three volumes of hymns, the second is wholly filled with lyrics of this class, and is larger than the first volume, that is devoted to the hymns in praise of God and his angels. If there is sad superstition in this, there is also something of our better nature; and we will not wholly scorn the human heart for seeking refuge from a hard and monkish theology at the feet of that lovely vision of faith, the Blessed Mother, who was thought to be first of God's creatures and Queen of Heaven.

Even our great iconoclast, Theodore Parker, does not escape this tendency to run for shelter to a divine Mother's arms; and he constantly preached of and prayed to the mother God, whom he regarded as coeternal and coessential with the Eternal Father. To him God was both Mother and Father; and his life would have been longer, and his ministry more edifying, if he had held more of his service in the motherly key, and spared the public much of his self-will and antagonism. He had a kind heart in private relations; but his ministry was not always kind, but struck rudely at the Mother Church, and mother faith and love of the greater part even of tolerant Christians. His voice sometimes, indeed, calls us home to God, but deals more with battle-cries than household words. His divine Mother is presented more as an idea than as a power, and he had little love for the great house, the Church Universal, where maternal love for ages has nursed her children and guarded them from harm, and to which she calls all poor prodigals back as to their native home. He held no evening service generally, and his morning utterances were more frequently a war-cry than a homily, and not even his devout prayer could always secure the hearer's edification. The gentler spirit was in him, and few felt more than he the spell of the evening, or could have given in his better hours a richer book of vesper meditations to the world. He felt the maternal pulses in the heart of nature and humanity, and undoubtedly a considerable part of his evident worry and dissatisfaction with himself came from the conviction that he was often at sword's-points with himself; and his sharp invective belied the tenderness of his affections, and his hand brandished the sword and his head planned the campaign, while the dove of peace was nestling in his heart.

The day must come when such unquiet spirits find rest, and cease to make us restless. Why should not the large humanity, and bold convictions, and progressive faith of our advanced thinkers conquer for us and for them a peace, and give us peaceful evening contemplations after their day of toil, and storm, and strife is over? They ought to help us to a home affection deeper and broader than that which seeks the family hearth-stone; they ought to make us feel at home with the master-minds of our race, or domesticate us in the great family of humankind. They should help us, as the day wanes and the night comes, to see in majestic vision the great day's work of the children of God through continuous ages, and hear the ascription that rises from them all as they salute each other before the eternal throne. Something of this great brotherhood we are already feeling, and at twilight not only do the faces of lost kindred and friends come back to us, but the forms of the great thinkers, heroes, and saints, who have made us all brothers, come to mind, and we are no longer alone, but with the great family that the Eternal Father has been gathering together throughout the ages. Every book, picture, wall, garden, house, church, then, has a monumental character, and opens to us the things that have been, and makes the mighty past smile upon us and speak to us as a familiar friend. Looking out from our quiet vesper seat, I see the spire on the western hills, and the stones in the grave-yard near looming up in the evening shadows, and with the setting sun come thoughts of home that do not end with earthly habitations, nor merely dream of some bower of bliss within those gorgeous curtains that veil that pavilion of gold that seems to welcome the vanishing day. It is good at such times to muse and chat, as mind and tongue will have it, and we have taken you, kind reader, into our confidence, and seated you by our side. Good-evening, and then good-night!

NORTHWARD.

UNDER the high, unclouded sun
That makes the ship and shadow one,
I sail away as from the fort
Booms sullenly the noonday gun.

The odorous airs blow thin and fine,
The sparkling waves like emeralds shine,
The lustre of the coral reefs
Gleams whitely through the tepid brine.

And glitters o'er the liquid miles
The jeweled ring of verdant isles,
Where generous Nature hold her court
Of ripened bloom and sunny smiles.

Encinctured by the faithful seas
Inviolate gardens load the breeze,
Where flaunt, like giant warders' plumes,
The pennants of the cocoa-trees.

Enthroned in light and bathed in balm,
In lonely majesty the Palm
Blesses the isles with waving hands—
High Priest of the eternal Calm.

Yet northward with an equal mind
I steer my course, and leave behind
The rapture of the Southern skies,
The wooing of the Southern wind.

For here o'er Nature's wanton bloom
Falls far and near the shade of gloom,
Cast from the hovering vulture-wings
Of one dark thought of woe and doom.

I know that in the snow-white pines
The brave Norse fire of freedom shines,
And fain for this I leave the land
Where endless summer pranks the vines.

Oh strong, free North, so wise and brave!
Oh South, too lovely for a slave!
Why read ye not the changeless truth—
The free can conquer but to save?

May God upon these shining sands
Send Love and Victory clasping hands,
And Freedom's banners wave in peace
Forever o'er the rescued lands!

And here in that triumphant hour
Shall yielding Beauty wed with Power;
And blushing earth and smiling sea
In dalliance deck the bridal bower.

THE "POOR WHITES" OF THE SOUTH.

PROFESSOR CAIRNES, of Dublin, in his very valuable and generally accurate work on the "Slave Power," says :

"In the Southern States no less than five millions of human beings are now said to exist in a condition little removed from savage life, eking out a wretched subsistence by hunting, by fishing, by hiring themselves out for occasional jobs, and by plunder. Combining the restlessness and contempt for regular industry peculiar to the savage, with the vices of the prolétaire of civilized communities, these people make up a class at once degraded and dangerous; and constantly reinforced, as they are, by all that is idle, worthless, and lawless among the population of the neighboring States, form an inexhaustible preserve of ruffianism, ready at hand for all the worst purposes of Southern ambition. . . . Such are the 'mean whites' or 'white trash'. . . . This class comprises, as I have said, five millions of human beings—about seven-tenths of the whole white population of the South."

This opinion of Professor Cairnes is no doubt shared by a large portion of the people of the Northern States and of England. But it is a great error. Having read of, or seen, the wretched specimens of humanity who loiter about the railway stations, or hover around the large plantations on the great Southern thoroughfares, they have inferred that they represent "seven-tenths of the whole white population" of the South! The idea is preposterous, for, if it were true, one half of the Southern people would be paupers, while no community could support that proportion of non-producers. But it is not true. The great mass of "poor whites" are superior (and I say this with due deliberation, and after sixteen years' acquaintance with them) to any other class of uncultivated men, save our Northern farmers, on the globe.

The eight millions of Southern whites may be divided into three general classes :

First, The ruling class, which includes the planters, and the higher grades of professional men, and numbers about one million. Second, The middle or laboring class, which includes the small traders, mechanics, farmers, and farm and other laborers, and numbers about six and a half millions; and, third, The mean white class, which includes all who are appropriately called "poor trash," who glean a sorry subsistence from hunting, fishing, and poaching on the grounds of the planters. This class numbers about half a million, and to it only does Professor Cairnes's description apply.

The two latter classes are of very marked and decidedly opposite characteristics. One labors; is industrious, hardy, enterprising; a law-abiding and useful citizen: the other does not labor; is thieving, vicious, law-breaking, and of "no sort of account" to his family or to society.

The mean whites do combine "the restlessness and contempt for regular industry peculiar to the savage, with the vices of the prolétaire of civilized communities." Their houses are often the pole wigwams of the Indian, shaped like a sugar-loaf, with merely a hole at the top to let the smoke out and the rain in; but generally they are small huts of rough logs, through the crevices of which the wind in winter whistles a most melancholy tune. The one room of these huts is floored with nothing but the ground—hardened with mauls, and hollowed at the centre, as if to hold the rain that comes in at the roof—and it is furnished with a few rickety chairs, a pine log—hewn smooth on the upper side, and made to serve as a sofa—a cracked skillet, a dirty frying-pan, an old-fashioned rifle, two or three sleepy dogs, and a baker's dozen of half-clad children, with skins and hair colored like a tallow-candle dipped in tobacco-juice. In one corner there may be a mud oven, half crumbled back to its original earth, and in the others, two or three low beds, with corn-shuck mattresses and tattered furnishings. The character of the inmates is suited to their surroundings. They are given to whisky-drinking, snuff-dipping, clay-eating, and all manner of social vices.

The costume of these people is of the most meagre and mean description. The women go with bare heads and feet, and their only garment is a coarse cottonade gown, falling straight from the neck to just below the knees. The men wear slouched hats, and linsey trowsers, and hunting shirts, so begrimed with filth, and so torn and patched in a thousand places, that scarcely a vestige of the original material is left visible to the naked eye. Many of them—owing, no doubt, to their custom of intermarrying—are deformed and apparently idiotic, and they all have stunted, ague-distorted frames, dull, heavy eyes, saffron-hued skins, small, bullet-shaped heads, and coarse, wiry hair, which looks like oakum shreds bound into mops and dyed with lampblack.

They answer, in their general characteristics, to the "scum" of our Northern cities, and to the vile denizens of the back slums of London and other large European towns; but it may be questioned whether there is any where a class of whites quite so degraded and so utterly useless as they are. Every where but in the Slave States the poor man labors, produces something toward the support of himself and of others, but the "mean white" of the South does not know how to labor; he produces nothing; he is a fungous growth on the body of society, absorbing the life and strength of the other parts.

As I have said, the laboring poor whites are a very different people. They comprise fully three-fourths of the free population of the South. The census shows that on the first of June, 1860, there were in the fourteen Slave States, exclusive of Delaware, 1,359,655 white males engaged in agricultural and other outdoor employments. Of this number, 901,102 are classed as "farmers"—men who till their own land: 230,146 are classed as "farm-laborers"—men who till the land of others: and 228,407 are classed as "laborers"—men engaged in outdoor work other than the tillage of land. The "farmers" are not to be confounded with the planters—men who work large tracts of land and large bodies of slaves, but do not work themselves—for the census takes distinct account of the latter. They number only 85,558, but—such has been the working of the peculiar institution—they own nearly three-fourths of the negroes and landed property of the South. These one million three hundred and odd thousand laboring white men represent a population of about six millions; and if we add to them the four hundred thousand represented by the planters, and the one million represented by men in trade, manufactures, and the professions, there can hardly remain, in a total population of less than eight millions, "five millions of human being who eke out a wretched subsistence by hunting, by fishing, by hiring themselves out for occasional jobs, and by plunder." Half a million—the number I have stated—is vastly nearer the truth.

Little is known at the North of this large farming population, for the reason that they live remote from the great thoroughfares, and have been seldom seen by travelers. They are settled generally in the "up-country" and "backwoods," and there lead industrious and plodding lives. From them have sprung such men as Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, Alexander H. Stephens, Andrew Johnson, Parson Brownlow, President Lincoln, and nearly all the representative men of the Slave States. In fact they are the bone and sinew of the South, the strength of its armies, the men who are now so patiently fighting and enduring in the cause of Secession; and they will be, when the Union is restored, the ruling class, the real political South of the future.

To illustrate the habits and characteristics of the farmer class of "poor whites"—(this name is a misnomer, for a man can hardly be called "poor" who owns his own house and farm, and enjoys all the necessities and many of the luxuries of life)—I will introduce to the reader one of its representative men, whom I met at his home in Tennessee, about thirteen years ago, and again encountered at Murfreesboro, in the month of May, 1863; and I will let him "speak for himself," in his vernacular dialect, as I may thereby give a more correct idea of the peculiarities of his class than by a more general description.

Late in November, 1850, while journeying on horseback from Tuscaloosa, Alabama, to Louisville, Kentucky, I was overtaken by a storm one day, just at nightfall, and forced to ask shelter at a small farm-house near the little town of Richmond, in Bedford County, Tennessee. The house stood in a small clearing a short distance from the highway, and was one story high, of hewn logs nicely chinked and whitewashed, with a projecting roof, a broad, open piazza, and an enormous brick chimney-stack protruding at either gable. As I rode up to it the farmer came out to meet me. He was dressed in homespun, and had a wiry, athletic frame; a dark, sun-browned complexion; an open, manly face; and a frank, cordial manner that won my confidence in a moment. He bade me "good evenin'" as I approached him, and returning his salutation, I asked him for shelter for myself and horse.

"Sartin, Stranger," he replied; "I nuver turned away one o' God's images yit, ef they wus a Yankee—an' some o' them is drefful pore likenesses, ye mought bet a pile on thet."

"Why do you think I am a Yankee?" I asked, smiling.

"I sees it all over ye. But come, alight; ye's welcome ter all I hes, an' ef ye kin spin a yarn or tell a lie any bigger'n I kin, I'll 'low a Yankee ar smarter'n a Tennesseean—an' I nuver know'd one as war yit."

Dismounting, I requested him to give my horse some oats, remarking that I made free with him, because I expected to pay for what I had.

"Pay!" he exclaimed; "nuver ye tork uv pay, Stranger, 'tween two sich men as ye an' me is, or ye'll make me fight another duel. It's agin my principles, but I fit one onst, an' it mought be ye wouldn't loike ter hev me fit another."

"Not with me, I assure you. I'd take free quarters with you for a month rather than fight a duel."

"Yer a sensible man; fur I shud, fur shore, sarve ye jest as I done Clingman—thet famous North Car'lina chap. P'raps ye nuver yered how I fit him?"

"No, I never did."

"Wall, I'll tell ye on it. But yere, Jake" (to a stout, cheerful negro, who just then appeared at the corner of the house)—"yere, Jake, tuck the gen'leman's nag, rub him down, an' guv him some oats, an' mind, doan't ye guv no parson's measure wuth the oats."

"Nuver you far, Massa. Jake'll gub it ter 'im chock-heapin'—loike you gub's ebery ting, Massa," rejoined the negro, bounding nimbly into the saddle, and riding off to the barn-yard.

The farmer then turned and led the way into the house. At the door of the sitting-room we were met by his wife—a comely, dark-eyed woman of about thirty, neatly clad in a calico gown, and a spotless lace cap perching cozily on the back of her head.

"Sally," said my host, as we entered the room, "yere'r a stranger; so tuck him in; guv him fritters an' apple-jack fur supper, fur he'm a Yankee, an' thar's no tellin' but ye mought save the kentry ef ye made him fall in love wuth ye."

The good woman laughed, gave me a cordial greeting, asked me to a seat by the fire, and went about preparing supper. As I seated myself with her husband by the broad hearth-stone I glanced around the apartment. It occupied one half of the building, and had a most cozy and comfortable appearance. On the floor was a tidy rag carpet, and the plastered walls were covered with a modest paper, and ornamented with a half dozen neatly-framed engravings. A gilded looking-glass, festooned with sprigs of evergreen, hung between the front windows, and opposite to it stood a huge piece of mahogany, half a side-board, half a bureau, which in its day had graced some statelier mansion. A dozen rustic arm-chairs, covered with untanned deer-skin, a small stand in the corner piled high with such books as the Bible, the "Pilgrim's Progress," and "Doddridge's Expositor," and a large pine table, on which my hostess was arranging the tea-things, completed the furniture of the room. A little boy of five and a little girl of seven were helping the good-wife set the tea-table, and through an open door at the rear I saw an older child, with her mother's dark-brown hair and her father's expressive features, busily frying the fritters over the kitchen fire.

After asking me where I "come from," where I "mought be moseyin' ter," and other similar questions, my host said:

"So ye niver yered how I fit Clingman—thet big Whig chap over thar ter North Car'lina?"

"No," I replied, "I never did, but I would like to, for I know Clingman."

"Wall, ye sees, it war jest afore the last 'lection, when ye put in ole Zack fur President. The Whigs they had a big barbacue down ter Richmond, an' Clingman an' a hull lot uv 'em went inter speechifying ter kill. Wall, in the coorse uv Clingman's speech he said thet Cass, our canderdate, was a nigger-trader down thar ter Newbern way, an' wus in jail fur passin' counterfit money, an' ef we 'lected him, we'd hev ter bail him out ter 'naugerate him. Now, I couldn't stand thet, no how, so I telled Clingman he lied loike blazes. Wall, he stopped short ter onst, an' axed me fur my redress."

"Address," said his wife, pausing in her work, and looking pleasantly at me.

"Thet's so, Sally," replied the farmer. "Stranger, Sally hes all the larnin' uv the fambly. She's a quality 'ooman—she is! Wall, I guv Clingman my name, an' whar I hung out, an', shore 'nuff, jest arter dark, a feller rid up yere wuth a challenge, all writ out in Clingman's own hand—an' ye knows he's a right smart scholar, an' a durned clever feller ter boot, ef he ar a Whig. I couldn't read the thing—I hain't got no funder nur prent yit—so I guv it ter Sally. Sally she screeched out when she seed whot it war 'bout, but I telled har ter stand up, an' die loike a man, an' so she sot down, an' 'cepted the challenge. Now, ye knows, the challenged 'un alers hes the chise o' weapons, so I said I'd hev swords, mounted."

"Then you are familiar with sword practice?" I remarked.

"Furmilye wuth it! I niver seed more'n one sword in all my borned days, an' thet war so durned rusty a ox-team couldn't dror it. It hung over dad's front door when I war a young 'un. Dad said he fit wuth it ter Cowpens, but I know'd he didn't, 'case he couldn't ha' been more'n two y'ar old at thet writin'.

"Wall, I said swords, mounted, at sun-up the next mornin', over agin my r'ar pinery. Now, I hes a drefful smart ox-brute thet I'se a raised up fur my privat' ridin'. The brute he doan't loike a spur, an' when ye puts one inter 'im, he'll pitch, head-foremose, inter the fust thing he comes ter, be it man or beast. Wall, in the mornin' I tuck out the cow-horn (ye'd think Gabriel war a soundin' the last trump when I blows it), cut a right smart stick fur a sword, put it inter a yaller bag thet lucked loike a scabbard, got out the ox-brute, tied a red rag ter his horns, put on him my wife's best kiverlet—Sally hed it agin we got morried; it hes more colors nur Joseph's coat, but red an' yaller dominates. Wall, I put on the kiverlet fur a saddle, an' moseyed off ter the dueling ground.

"Clingman, he war thar, wuth two seconds, a doctor, an' a hull 'pothecary store uv cuttin' instruments, all waitin' an' ready ter make mince-meat uv my carcass. Soon as he seed how I war 'coutered, he up an' 'jected ter fightin', but I counted out the terms uv the duel—swords, mounted—an' I telled him ef he didn't stand an' fight loike a man I'd post him all over the State o' North Car'lina fur a coward. Wall, finarly he 'cluded ter do it. So, we tuck our stands, the seconds they guv the word, Clingman he put spurs inter his hoss, an' I put spurs inter mine, an', Stranger, ye'd better b'lieve when my ox moseyed down onter his mar, wuth horn a blowin', an' kiverlet a flyin', the mar she piked out quicker'n a whirlygust chasin' a streak o' lightnin', an' she niver helt up till she got clean inter North Car'lina. I'se allers telled Sally sense thet thet kiverlet ar the flag I means ter live under, ter sleep under, an' ter die under."*

When I had somewhat recovered from the immoderate fit of laughter which expressed my appreciation of the farmer's story, his comely wife said to me:

"Fotch up yer cheer, Stranger. We hain't nothin' 'cept common doin's, but we's 'nuff o' them."

And there was "'nuff o' them." The table was loaded down with bacon, venison, wild-fowl, hominy, corn-pone, fritters, tea, cider, and apple-jack, all heaped upon it in promiscuous confusion. I had ridden far, and eaten nothing since the morning, but I might have relished the viands had my appetite been much daintier than it was.

A desultory conversation followed till the close of the meal. When it was over, again seating myself with the farmer before the blazing light-wood fire, while his wife and elder daughter went about clearing away the tea-things, I said to him:

"Now I want to ask you how you live, what you raise, how many negroes you have—all about yourself, for I've already fallen in love with you and your wife."

"Fall'n in love wuth me! ha! ha!" echoed

* Subsequent inquiry satisfied me that the farmer's account of this singular duel was substantially true.

the farmer. "Stranger, I nuver fell in love wuth nary man 'cept Sally, but I fell inter it so deep wuth she thet I'se willin' all creation shud love har jest loike I does—an' they wud, ef they only know'd har so wall as me."

"I have no doubt of it. Does she do all her own housework?"

"Uvery thing—she an' the little gal. She woan't hev no lazy nigger wimmin round. They make more wuck nur they does."

"Do yer wife wuck, Stranger?" asked the lady. "They say wimmin all wucks ter the North."

"Nearly all do—except my wife. She don't, because I have none. But I intend to have one. I shall probably wait till your husband breaks his neck, and then pop the question to you."

"Wall, I reckon I'd hev ye, fur I'se sort o' tuck ter ye. 'Pears loike ye Northern gentlemen hain't stuck up, an' doan't 'count tharselves no better nur wuckin' folk, like the 'ristocracts does round yere."

"The heart, not the wealth or the intellect, Madam, makes the true aristocracy," I replied, gravely.

"Thet's whot our parson sez; an' in heaven, he sez, them as gits the highest hes hearts jest loike little childerin—thet loves uvery thing, an' uvery body, an' hain't no larnin' at all. Ef thet's so, Bible'll be one on the biggest on 'em, fur he's got nigh ter no larnin'—he kin only jest make out ter spell—an' his heart ar big 'nuff ter holt all o' creation."

"Doan't ye say thet, Sally," said the farmer looking at his wife with a tender light in his eyes, and a beautiful smile on his rough features: "The Lord moughtn't be uv yer 'pinion."

"Yas, He ar, fur He knows ye jest loike I does."

The farmer made no reply, and a short silence followed. I broke it by saying:

"Come, Bible, if that is your name, answer my questions—tell me all about yourself."

"Thet hain't my name, Stranger, though it'r whot I goes by. Ye sees my name ar Smith, an' dad chrisund me Jehoshaphat*—ter 'stin-guish me frum the t'other Smiths, but, somehow, I got shortened ter Bible, an' it'r been Bible unter this day. I wuck'd 'long uv dad till I war twenty-one, for the ole 'un he said he'd a fotched me up when I war a young 'un, an' he war bound ter git his pay out o' me agin I war grow'd, an' he done it.

"Wall, the day I war uv age dad axed me out ter the barn, an' totin' out a mule-brute as hed been in the fambly uver sense Adam warn't no higher'n lettle Sally, he sez ter me, sez he: 'Thar, Bible, thar's my last wull an' testamunt; tuck it, an' gwo an' seek yer fortun'.' I hadn't nary chise, so I tuck the mule-brute an' moseyed out ter seek my fortun'. I squatted down right squar onter this dead'nin', hired my nig Jake

(I owns him now), an' me, an' Jake, an' the mule-brute went ter wuck loike blazes—all but the mule-brute—he war too tarnal lazy ter wuck; he war so lazy I hed ter git my ox ter help him dror his last breath. Wall, Jake an' me added acre ter acre, an' mule-brute ter mule-brute, as the Scriptur' sez, till finarly I got ter be right wall forehanded. Then, one day, I sez ter Jake: 'Jake,' sez I, 'ye's got a wife, an' ye knows whot durmestic furlicity is—ter be shore ye hes ter keep it seven mile away; but whot's thet when I guvs ye Saturday arternoons an' Sundays all ter yerself. Now I hain't nary furlicity at all. Whot shill I do?'

"'Git a wife, Massa,' sez Jake; 'git a wife, Massa. Saddle de mar, Massa, an' gwo out on a 'splorin' expedition. Jake'll luck arter de fixin's while you'm away.'

"Now thet nig ar allers right; he's got a head longer'n the moral law; so I saddled the mar an' sallied out arter Sally. I hed ter scour nigh 'bout all o' eration, an' it tuck me four hull months ter do it, but—I found har. Soon as I sot eyes on har I know'd it war she, an' I telled har so; but she say, 'Ye must ax Par.' (Sally hes book-breedin', ye sees, so she sez par instead o' dad, which ar the nat'ral way.) Wall, I axed 'par'; he's one on yer quality folk, been ter Congress, an' only missed bein' Guv'nor by —not gittin' the nomuration. I axed him, an' he shuck his head; but I guv him jest a week ter think on it, an' moseyed out ter git ready agin the weddin'. I know'd he'd come round, an' he done it. So I sez ter Sally: 'Sally,' sez I, 'we'll be morried ter-morrer.'

"'Ter-morrer!' screeched Sally, holtin' up har hands an' openin' har eyes; 'why, I hain't a ready. I hain't no cloes!'

"'Cloes!' sez I; 'nuver mind yer cloes; I doan't morry ye fur them.'

"So Sally she consented, an' I piked out fur a parson. Now thar warn't none nigher'n over a branch, an' it so happin'd it rained loike blazes thet night, an' toted off all the bridges; so when the parson an' me got down ter the run jest arter noon the next day—we wus ter a been morried at 'levin—thar warn't no way o' crossin'; but thar war Sally, on the t'other side uv the run, in har sun-bunnet an' a big umbrell', onpatiently waitin' fur us. Thar warn't no other how, so I sez ter the parson: 'Parson,' sez I, 'say over the Prayer-book—Sally's got the hull uv it by heart agin this time—we'll be morried ter onst right yere.' So the parson he said over the Prayer-book, Sally she made the 'sponses—all 'bout the 'beyin' an' so on—an' we's been man an' wife uver sense; an' Stranger, I doan't keer whar the t'other 'ooman ar', thar hain't nary one livin' quite up ter Sally."

"An' does ye b'lieve thet story, Stranger?" asked Sally, who, having finished clearing away the tea-things, had, with the older daughter and the younger children, taken a seat near me in the chimney-corner.

"I can't say that I do. Not altogether," I replied.

* His name according to the army rolls is WILLIAM J. SMITH.

"I'm glad on it; fur we wus morried in a house, loike Christun people—we wus."

"Is Jake your only slave?" I asked the farmer after a while.

"Yas," he'r my only 'un, but he's as good as any two ye uver know'd on. Ye sees, I raises nigh on ter no craps 'cept mule-brutes an' horned critters, an' them, ye knows, browse in the woods, and doan't make much wuck."

If space allowed I would tell the reader more of this farmer's family; how every thing about the house and outbuildings was the model of neatness; how the comely housewife strove, with grace and cheerfulness, to do honor to a stranger guest; how tidily she kept her handsome brood, all clad in homespun of her own weaving, and her own making; how the younger children climbed their father's knee, pulled his beard, and laughed at his stories, as if they had never heard them before; how nimbly the elder daughter sprang to do her mother's bidding, how she fetched the apples from the loft, and the apple-jack from the pantry, and, between times, helped to lull the sleepy little ones to sleep, or to keep them, wakeful, out of mischief; how when we parted for the night, Sally read a chapter from the big Bible, and then, all kneeling down, made such a prayer as the Good All-Father loves to hear; how when I bade them "good-by" in the morning all had to kiss me, from the mother to the youngest; and how Bible, giving me a parting grasp of the hand, said as I mounted to ride away,

"Come out an' settle yere, Stranger; we'll send ye ter Congress—the man as hes cheek enuff ter kiss a man's wife afore his vury face kin git any office in this part o' the kentry!"

For nearly thirteen years I saw nothing of my Tennessee friend; but one day, last spring, as I alighted from the cars at Murfreesboro, a heavy hand was laid on my shoulder, and a strangely familiar voice accosted me with,

"I know'd it wus ye. I know'd ye the minnit I sot eyes on ye."

Turning on the speaker I saw a spare, squarely-built, loose-jointed man, above six feet high, with a strongly-marked face, a long, grizzly beard, and silvery black hair hanging loosely over his shoulders like a woman's. He wore an officer's undress coat, and the boots of the cavalry service, but the rest of his costume was of the common "butternut" homespun. Taking his extended hand, and trying hard to recall his features, I said to him:

"I know your voice, but I don't remember your face."

"Doan't remember me! me, Bible—Bible Smith! Why I'd a know'd ye ef yer face hed been blacker'n yer Whig principles."

The name brought him to my remembrance. Again grasping his hand, and shaking it this time with a right good-will, I exclaimed:

"I'm delighted to see you, Bible; and to see you here—true to the old flag."

"Ye mought hev know'd thet."

He accompanied me to my lodgings, and there, seated on the piazza after dinner, told me the story of his life since we parted. As it illustrates traits of character which are common to all of his class, I will give it, in part, to the reader.

The world had gone well with him till the breaking out of the rebellion. That event found him the owner of fifteen likely negroes, a fine plantation of nine hundred and thirty acres, and a comfortable framed dwelling and outbuildings. His elder daughter had married a young farmer of the district, and his younger—little Sally, whom I remembered as a rosy-cheeked, meek-eyed wee thing of only seven years—had grown up a woman.

In the spring of 1861, when there were no Union troops south of the Ohio, and the secession fever was raging furiously all over his county, he organized one hundred and six of his neighbors into a company of Home Guards, and was elected their captain. They were pledged to resist all attacks on the person or property of any of their number, and met frequently in the woods in the vicinity of their homes. This organization secured Bible safety and free expression of opinion till long after Tennessee went out of the Union. In fact, he felt so secure that, in 1862—a year after the State seceded—under the protection of his band of Home Guards he inaugurated and carried through a celebration of the Fourth of July at Richmond, Tennessee, under the very guns of a rebel regiment then forming in the town.

An act of so much temerity naturally attracted the attention of the Confederate authorities, and not long afterward he was roused from his bed one morning before daybreak by three hundred armed men, who told him that he was a prisoner, and that all his property was confiscated to the Government. They at once enforced the "confiscation act;" "and this," he said, taking from his wallet a piece of soiled paper, "ar' whot I hed ter 'tribute ter the dingnation consarn. It'r Sally's own handwrite, an' I knows ye loikes har, so, ye kin hev it, fur it'll nuver be uv no manner uv account ter me."

The schedule is now before me, and I copy it verbatim: "14 men and wimmin" [Jake eluded the soldiers and escaped to the woods], "1600 barrils corn, 130 sheeps, 700 bushls wheat, 440 barley, 100 rye, 27 mules, 5 cow-brutes, 105 head hogs, 17 horses and mars, and all they cud tote beside."

"Wall, they tied me, hand an' fut," he continued; "an' toted me off ter the Military Commission sittin' ter Chattanooga. I know'd whot thet meant—a short prayer, a long rope, an' a break-down danced on the top o' nothin'. Better men nur me hed gone thet way ter the Kingdom—sevin on 'em wuthin a month—but I detarmined I wouldn't go ef I could help it; not thet I 'jected ter the journey, only ter goin' afore uv Sally. Ye sees, I hedn't been nigh so good a man as I'd orter be, an' I reckoned Sally—who, ye knows, ar the best 'ooman thet uver lived—I reckoned she, ef she got thar a leetle afore o' me, could sort o' put in a good word wuth the Lord, an' git Him ter shot His eyes ter a heap o' my doin's; an' sides, I know'd I should feel a mighty strange loike up thar without har. Wall, I detarmined not ter go, so thet night, as we war camped out on the ground, I slid the coil, stole a nag, an' moseyed off. Howsumuver, I hedn't got more'n a hun'ed rods 'fore the durned Seecesh yered me, an' the bullets fell round me thicker'n tar in January. They hit the hoss, winged me a trifle, an' in less nur ten minnits, hed me tighter'n uver. They swore a streak uv blue brimstun', an' said they'd string me up ter onst, but I telled 'em they wouldn't, 'case I know'd I war a gwine ter live ter help do thet ar' same turn fur Jeff Davis. Wall, I s'pose my impudence hed suthin' ter do wuth it, fur they didn't hang me—ye mought know thet, fur, ye sees, I hes a good neck fur stretchin' yit.

"Wall, we got ter Chattanooga jest arter noon. The Commission they hed too many on hand thet day ter 'tend ter my case, an' the jail wus chock-heapin', so they put me inter a tent under guard uv a hull Georgy regiment. Wall, I didn't know whot ter do, but thinkin' the Lord did, I kneeled down an' prayed right smart. I telled Him I hedn't no face ter meet Him afore I'd a done suthin' fur the kentry, an' thet Sally's heart would be clean broke ef I went afore har, but, howsumuver, I said, He know'd best, an' ef it war His will, I hed jest nothin' ter say agin it. Thet's all I said, but I said it over an' over, a heap o' times, an' it war right dark when I got off uv my knees. The Lord yered me, thet's sartin, 'case I hedn't more'n got up fore a dirty gray-back, drunker'n a member uv Congress, staggered inter the tent. I reckon he thort he war ter home, fur he drapped down onter the ground an' went ter sleep wuthout so much as axin' ef I wus willin'.

"Then it come inter my head, all ter onst, whot ter do. Ye sees, the critters hed tied me hand an' fut an' teddered me wuth a coil ter one o' the tent-stakes, so I couldn't move only jest so fur; but the Lord He made the drunken feller lop down jest inside uv reachin'. Wall, when I war shore he war dead asleep, I rolled over thar, drawed out the bowie-knife in his belt wuth my teeth an' sawed off my wristlets in no time. Ye kin reckon it didn't take long ter undo the 'tother coils, an' ter 'propriate his weapons, tie 'im hand an' fut loike I war, strip off his coat, put mine onter 'im, swap hats, an' pull the one I guv him down onter his eyes loike as ef he nuver wanted ter see the sun agin. When I'd a done thet, I stopped ter breathe, an' luckin' up I seed a light a comin'. I spicioned it war ter 'xamine arter me, so I slunk down inter a crack o' the tent jest aside the door. They wus a leftenant an' three privits makin' the rounds, an' the light showed me nigh onter a army uv sentinels all about thar. Thet warn't no way encouragin', but sez I ter myself: 'Bible,' sez I, 'be cool an' outdacious an' ye'll git out o' this yit;' so when the leftenant luck'd in, an' sayin', 'All right,' put out agin, I riz up an' jined the fellers as wus a follerin' on him. I kept in the shadder, an' they, s'posin' I war one on 'em, tuck no kind uv notice uv me. We'd luck'd arter three or four pore prisoners loike I war, when I thort I'd better be a moseyin', so I drapped ahind an' arter a while dodged out beyont the second line o' pickets. I'd got nigh onter a patch uv woods half a mile off, when all ter onst a feller sprung up from a clump uv bushes, yelled 'Halt!' an' pinted his musket stret at me. I mought hev eended 'im, but I reckoned others wus nigh, an' sides, I nuver takes humin life ef I kin help it; so I sez ter 'im: 'Why, Lord bless me, cumrad', I didn't seed ye.' 'I s'pose ye didn't. Whot is ye doin' yere?' sez he. 'Only pursuin' a jug o' blue ruin I'se out thar hid under a log,' sez I. 'Ye knows it'r agin rule ter tote it inside, but a feller must lick.' 'Wall, lick up ter-morrer,' sez he. 'We's got 'ticklar orders ter let no 'un out ter-night.' 'Blast the orders,' sez I. 'Ye'd loike a swig yerself.' 'Wall, I would,' sez he. 'Wull ye go snacks?' 'Yas,' sez I; 'an' guv ye chock-heapin' measure, fur I must hev some o' thet afore mornin'.' Thet brung him, an' I piked off for the ruin. (It warn't thar, ye knows—I nuver totch the dingnation stuff.) Ye'd better b'lieve the grass didn't grow under my feet when onst I got inter the woods. I plumbed my coorse by the stars an' made ten right smart miles in no time.

"I'd got ter be right wall tuckered out by thet time. So I put fur a piece uv timber, lay down under a tree, an' went ter sleep. I must hev slept mighty sound till 'long 'bout mornin', when I woke up. Then I luck'd all round an' seed nuthin', but I yered—not a mile off—the hounds a bayin' away loike a young thunder-gust. I luck'd at the 'volver I'd stole from the soger, seed it war all right, an' then clumb a tree. 'Bout so quick as it takes ter tell it the hounds—two 'mazin' fine critters, wuth a hun'ed an' fifty apiece—wus on me. I run my eye 'long the pistol-barr'l an' let drive. It tuck jest two shots ter kill 'em. I know'd the Seecesh wus a follerin' the dogs, so ye'd better b'lieve I made purty tall racin' time till I got ter the eend uv the timber.

"Jest at night I run agin some darkeys, who guv me suthin ter eat, an' nothin' more happin'd 'fore the next night, when I come in sight o' home. I got ter the edge uv the woods, on the hill jest ahind uv my barn, 'bout a hour by sun; but I darn't go down, fur, ye knows, the house stood in a clarin', an' some uv the varmunts mought be a watchin' fur me. I lay thar till it war thick dark, an' then I crept ter the r'ar door. I listened; an' whot d'ye s'pose I yered? Sally a prayin'—an' prayin' fur me, so 'arnest an' so tender loike, thet I sot down on the doorstep an' cried loike a child—I did.

"She telled the Lord how much I war to har; how she'd a loved me uver sense she'd a fust seed me; how 'fore har father, or mother, or even the chillen, she loved me; how she'd tried ter make me love Him; how she know'd thet, way down in my heart, I did love Him, though I didn't say so, 'case men doan't speak out 'bout sech things loike wimmin does. An' she telled Him how she hed tried ter do His will; tried ter be one on His raal chillen; an' she telled Him He hed promised not ter lay onter His chillen no more'n they could b'ar, an' she couldn't b'ar ter hev me hung up as ef I war a traitor: thet she could part wuth me if it war best; thet she could see me die, an' not weep a tear, ef I could only die loike a man, wuth a musket in my hand, a doin' suthin' for my kentry. Then she prayed Him ter send me back ter har fur jest one day, so she mought ax me once more ter love Him—an' she know'd I would love Him ef she axed me agin—an' she said ef He'd only do thet, she'd—much as she loved me—she'd send me away, an' guv me all up ter Him an' the kentry fur uver!

"I couldn't stand no more, so I opened the door, drapped onter my knees, tuck har inter my arms, lay my head on har shoulder, an' sobbed out: 'The Lord hes yered ye, Sally! I wull love Him! I wull be worthy of sech love as ye's guv'n me, Sally!'"

He paused for a moment, and covered his face with his hands. When he spoke again there was a softness and tenderness in his tone that I never heard in the voice of but one other man.

"Sense thet minnit this yerth hes been another yerth ter me; an' though I'se lost uvery thin', though I hes no home, though night arter night I sleeps out in the cold an' the wet, a scout-in', though my wife an' chillen is scattered, though nigh uvery day I'se in danger uv the gallus, though I'se been roped ter a tree ter die loike a dog, though a thousand bullets hes yelled death in my yeres, though I'se seed my only boy shot down afore my vury eyes, an' I not able ter speak ter him, ter guv him a mossel uv comfort, or ter yere his last word, I'se hed suthin allers yere (laying his hand on his heart) thet hes helt me up, an' made me luck death in the face as ef I loved it. An' ef ye hain't got thet, no matter whot else ye's got, no matter whot money, or larnin', or friends, ye's pore—porer nur I ar!"

I made no reply, and after a short silence he resumed his story.

"Jake—thet war my boy—ye remember him, ye hed him on yer knee—he war eighteen an' a man grow'd then: wall, Jake an' me made up our minds ter pike fur the Union lines ter onst. Sally war all night a cookin' fur us, an' we a gittin' the arms an' fixin's a ready—we hed lots o' them b'longin' ter the Guards, hid away in a panel uv the wall—an' the next day, meanin' ter start jest arter sunset, we laid down fur some sleepin'. Nigh onter dark, Black Jake, who war a watchin', come rushin' inter the house, sayin' the Secesh was a comin'. Thar was only twenty on 'em, he said, an' one was drunk an' didn't count fur nuthin', so we detarmined ter meet 'em. We tuck our stands nigh the door, each on us men—Black Jake, the boy, an' me

—wuth a Derringer in his pocket, two 'volvers in his belt, an' a bowie-knife in the breast uv his waiscoat, an' the wimmin wuth a 'volver in each hand, an' waited fur 'em. Half a dozen on 'em went round ter the r'ar, an' the rest come at the front door, yellin' out:

"'We doan't want ter 'sturb ye, Miss Smith, but we reckons yer husban' are yere, an' we must sarch the house. We hes orders ter take him.'

"I opened the door stret off, an' steppin' down onter the piazzer—Black Jake an' the boy ter my back, an' the wimmin' ter the winder—I sez ter 'em,

"'Wall, I'se yere. Take me ef ye kin!'

"They was fourteen on 'em, uvery man wuth a musket, but they darn't lift a leg! They wus cowards. It'r nuthin' but a good cause thet guvs a man courage—makes him luck death in the face as ef he loved it.

"Wall, they begun ter parley. 'We doan't want ter shed no blood,' said the leftenant; 'bnt we's orders ter take ye, Mister Smith, an' ye'd better go wuth us, peaceable loike.'

"'I sha'n't go wuth ye peaceable loike, nur no other how,' sez I; 'fur ye's a pack o' howlin' thieves an' traitors as no decent man 'ud be seed in company uv. Ye disgraces the green yerth ye walks on, an' ef ye doan't git off uv my sheer uv it, in less nur no time, I'll send ye—though it'r agin my principles ter take humin life—whar ye'll git yer desarts, sartin.'

"Then the leftenant he begun ter parley agin, but I pinted my 'volver at him, an' telled him he'd better be a moseyin' sudden. Sayin' he'd 'port ter his cunnel, he done it.

"We know'd a hun'ed on 'em 'ud be thar in no time, so, soon as they was out o' sight, the boy an' me, leavin' Black Jake ter luck arter the wimmin, struck a stret line fur the timber. We hedn't got more'n four mile—ter the top uv the tall summit ter the r'ar uv Richmond—afore, luckin' back, we seed my house an' barns all a blazin'! The Heaven defyin' villuns hed come back—shot Jake down in cold blood, druv my wife an' darter out o' doors, an' burnt all I hed ter the ground! We seed the fire, but not knowin' whot else hed happin'd, an' not bein' able ter do nothin', we piked on inter the woods.

"We traviled all thet night through the timber, an' jest at sundown uv the next day come ter a clarin'. We wus mighty tired, but 'twouldn't do ter sleep thar, fur the trees wus nigh a rod asunder; so we luck'd round, an' on t'other side uv the road, not half a mile off, seed 'bout a acre uv laurel bush—ye knows whot them is, some on 'em so thick a dog karn't git through 'em. Jake war tireder nur I war, an' he said ter me, 'Dad,' sez he, 'let us git under kiver ter onst. I feels loike I couldn't stand up no longer.' It wus fool-hardy loike, fur the sun warn't clar down, but I couldn't b'ar ter see the boy so, an', agin my judgment, we went down the road ter the laurels. We lay thar till mornin', an' slep' so sound thet I reckon ef forty yerthquakes hed shuck the yerth they wouldn't hev woked us. Soon as sun-up Jake riz an' went ter the edge uv the thicket ter rekonoitter. He hedn't stood thar five minnits—right in plain sight, an' not more'n two hun'ed rods frum me—afore I yered a shot, an' seed the pore boy throw up his arms an' fall ter the ground. In less nur no time fifty Secesh wus on him. I war springin' up ter go ter him, when suthin' tuck me by the shoulder, helt me back, an' said ter me, 'Ye karn't do nothin' fur him. Leave 'im ter the Lord. Save yerself fur the kentry.' It went agin natur', but it 'peared the Lord's voice, so I crouched down agin 'mong the bushes. I niver know'd whot it war thet saved me till nigh a y'ar arterwuds. Then I tuck thet leftenant pris'ner—I could hev shot him, but I guv him his life ter repent in, an' he done it: he's a decent man now, b'longin' ter Cunnel Johnson's rigiment. Wall, I tuck him, an' he said ter me, 'I wus aside uv thet pore boy when he war dyin'. He turned his eyes onter me jest as he war goin', an' he said, "Ye karn't kotch him! He's out o' the bush! Ha! ha!"' He said thet, and died. Ter save me, died wuth a lie on his lips! Does ye b'lieve the Lord laid thet agin him?"

"No, no! I am sure not. It was a noble action."

"It 'pears so ter me, but it war loike the boy. He war allers furgettin' himself, an' thinkin' uv other folk. He war all—all the pride uv my life—him an' Sally—but it pleased the Lord ter tuck him afore me—but only fur a time—only fur a time—'fore long I shill hev him agin—agin—up thar—up thar!"

His emotion choked his utterance for a while. When he resumed, he said,

"At the eend uv a fortnit, trav'lin' by night an' sleepin' by day, an' livin' on the darkeys when my fixin's guv out, I got inter the Union lines 'bove Nashville."

"And what became of your wife and daughter?" I asked.

"Lettie Sally went ter har sister. My wife walked eighty mile ter har father's. He's one on yer quality folk, an' a durned old Secesh, but he's got humin natur' in him, an' Sally's safe thar. I'se seed har twice ter his house. The old 'un he's know'd ont't, but he hain't niver said a word."

Bible's intimate knowledge of the country, and acquaintance with the loyal men of the district, induced General Rosecrans to make him a scout, and he has performed more actual service to the Union cause than a regiment of men in the ranks. Hiding in the woods, or secret-ing himself in the houses of his friends by day, he sallies forth by night, and, penetrating far into the rebel lines, frequently gathers information of great importance to our army. Often days without food, sleeping out in the cold and the rain, hunted down with blood-hounds, betrayed by pretended friends, waylaid by whole regiments, the mark for a thousand rifles, and with the gallows ever before him, he goes on in his perilous work with a single-hearted devotion to his country, and an earnest, child-like reliance on God, that would do honor to the best names in history. His scouting adventures would fill a volume, and read more like a romance of the Middle Ages than a matter-of-fact history of the present time. I will narrate but one, mostly in his own words.

On one occasion, when about five miles outside of our lines, he came, late at night, upon a party of officers making merry at the house of a wealthy Secessionist. Riding coolly up to the mounted orderly on guard before the doorway, he pinioned his arms, thrust a handkerchief into his mouth, and led him quietly out of hearing. Then bidding him dismount, and tying him to a tree, he interrogated his prisoner, and learned that the party consisted of nine officers; that their arms were piled in the hall, and that only one of them, a surgeon, had a revolver.

Fastening his horse in "the timber," and creeping up to the house, he then reconnoitred the kitchen premises. The old man—a stout, stalwart negro of about fifty—sat dozing in the corner, and his wife, a young mulatto woman, was cooking wild-fowl over the fire. Opening the door, and placing his finger on his lips to enjoin silence, Bible beckoned to the woman. She came to him, and, looking her full in the eye for a moment, he said to her; "I kin trust ye. Wud ye an' yer old 'un loike ter git out o' the claws uv these durned Secesh?"

"Yas, yas, Massa," she replied, "we wud. We's Union! We'd loike ter git 'way, Massa!"

Then awakening her husband, Bible said to him: "Uncle, wud ye risk yer life fur yer freedom?"

"Ef dar's a chance, Massa, a right smart chance. Dis dark'y tinks a heap ob his life, he does, Massa. It 'm 'bout all hem got, but I loikes a chance, Massa, a right smart chance."

Bible soon convinced the negro that he would have a "right smart chance," and he consented to make the hazardous strike for his freedom. Entering the house, he returned in a few moments to the scout, confirming the sentinel's report: the weapons were reposing quietly in the hall, near the doorway, and the officers, very much the worse for liquor, were carousing with his master in the dining-room. Selecting two of the best horses from the stables, Bible directed the yellow woman to lead them into the road, and to bring his own from where it was fastened in the woods. Then, with his sooty ally, he entered the mansion. Removing the arms from the hall, he walked boldly into the dining-room.

"Gentlemen," he said, pointing his pistols—one in each hand—at the rebel officers, "ye is my pris'ners. Surrender yer shootin' irons, or ye's dade men."

"Who are you?" exclaimed one of them, as they all sprang to their feet.

"Cunnel Smith, uv the Fust Tennessee Nigger Regiment—one old black man an' a yaller 'ooman," coolly replied the scout.

"Go to —," shouted the surgeon, quickly drawing his revolver, and discharging it directly at Bible's face. The ball grazed the scout's head, cut off a lock of hair just above his ear, and lodged in the wall at his back. The report was still sounding through the apartment when the surgeon uttered a wild cry, sprang a few feet into the air, and fell lifeless to the floor! The negro had shot him.

"Come, gentlemen, none o' t'et," said Bible, as coolly as if nothing had happened, "guv me the shootin' iron, and surrender."

Without more hesitation the colonel handed the scout the fallen man's pistol, and then they all, followed by the scout and the negro, marched quietly out of the front door. The mulatto woman, holding the horses, was standing in the highway.

"Hitch the nags, my purty gal," said the scout, "an' git a coil. An' ye, gentlemen, sot down, an' say nothin'—'cept it mought be yer prayers; but them, I reckon, ye hain't larned yit."

The negress soon returned with the rope, and while Bible and her husband covered them with their revolvers, she tied the arms of the prisoners. When this was done, the scout affixed a long rope to the waist of the officer on either flank of the column, and, taking one in his own hand, and giving the other to the negro, cried out:

"Sogers uv the Fust Tennessee! Mount!"

The regiment bounded into the saddle, and in that plight—the planter and the eight captive officers marching on before, the self-appointed "cunnel" and his chief officer bringing up the rear, and the rest of his command—the yellow woman—a straddle of a horse between them, they entered the Union lines.

I could fill this article with Bible's scouting adventures, but it is my purpose to say only enough of him to give an idea of his character. If I have outlined that distinctly the reader has perceived that he is brave, simple-hearted, outspoken, hospitable, enterprising, industrious, loyal to liberty, earnest in his convictions—though ignorantly confounding names with things—a good husband and father, with a talent for bragging, and that quiet humor which flavors character as Worcester sauce flavors a good dinner. In all these particulars he is a representative of his class; and his stories and conversation illustrate that disposition to magnify every thing—even himself—and that intensity of nature which leads the Southerner to do nothing by halves; to throw his whole soul into every thing he undertakes; to be, like Jeremiah's figs, "if good, very good; if bad, not fit to feed the pigs."

At the outset of Bible's career he had but one slave—poor Jake, who was "faithful unto death"—and the farmers of his class seldom own more than one, and generally they have none at all. In rare instances, however, the more industrious acquire five or ten; but whether they have many or few they work side by side with them in the fields, and treat them very much as the Northern farmer treats his hired workmen.

Before the war the traveler in the interior of North Carolina would have heard the axe of master and man falling with alternate strokes in the depths of the evergreen forest, or he would have seen the two "camped out" together in the same tent or pine-pole cabin, drinking from the same gourd—the darkey always after his master—eating from the same rude table, and sharing the same bed—the cabin floor—in common. So, too, in Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Western Virginia, and Middle and Upper Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, he would have seen the white and the black plowing side by side, or, bared to the waist, swinging the old-fashioned seythe, in good-natured rivalry as to which could cut the broadest swath of yellow wheat or waving timothy, or tote the biggest bundle of corn to the evening husking-bee. And when the evening had come he would have found them gathered in the old log-barn, husking, and singing, and shouting, and dancing in company, to the tune of "Ole Virginny," or "Rose, Rose, de coal brack Rose," played by "old Uncle Ned," who "had no wool on de top ob his head," but whose skinny fingers, with handy blow, could rap the music out of "de ole banjo."

Bible had got "no furdur nur prent yit," and fully one half of his class never get so far as that, though the more wealthy, like the father of Sally, sometimes give their children what might be called "a fair common-school education."

The reason of this is, there are no schools for the common people at the South. In a village, ten or twenty miles distant, there may be a pretentious "Female College," or "Institute of Learning for Young Men," where "a little Latin and less Greek" is dispensed to the young idea at the rate of four or five hundred dollars per annum, but these prices place their "stores of knowledge" far above the reach of the hard-toiling farmer. Only in Tennessee, so far as I know, are there any free schools, and the scanty State allowance which formerly supported them was dealt out with a most parsimonious hand. How much light those institutions gave the people may be guessed at from the fact that any one was qualified to instruct in them who could "read, write, and do sums in addition."

But the fact that a large proportion of the Southern farmers have no "book-larnin'" is no evidence against their intelligence. At the North if a man has not been to school he knows nothing. The South is more like Greece and Rome, where one might be really educated and yet not know how to read and write. Reading and writing at the South is considered something like playing on the piano at the North—an accomplishment rather than a necessary. The men of this class, of the better order, however (as in the case of Bible Smith and the father of Thomas Jefferson), almost always marry above them, so that not unfrequently the wife reads while the husband can not; of course the children have the advantage of the mother's education, and, therefore, the class is constantly rising. They have also a sort of innate faculty for culture and gentlemanliness, and this makes a little "book-breedin'" go a long ways.

But as the Southern farmer can not read, he is forced to derive his knowledge of current events and political affairs from his wealthier neighbor who can read, and who is sure to be a slave-owner. At a political barbecue, or a court-day gathering, he may hear, once or twice in the year, the two sides of every national question but the, to him, all-important one of slavery. If that subject is at all touched upon on such occasions, it is shown to be of divine origin—dating back to the time when Ham first cast a black shadow across his looking-glass, and only to end when the skins of his descendants no longer wear mourning for their forefather's sin. Thus instructed, is it strange the Southern farmer deems slavery altogether lovelier than freedom? What does he know of real freedom? What does he know of what it has done for the poor man at the North? Nothing. He never saw a Northern man in all his life, except, it may be, a Yankee peddler. If the Southern workingman knew what freedom is; if he knew how it has built a free school at every Northern cross-road; how the Northern laborer is comparatively rich, while he is wretchedly poor; how the Northern farmer has a comfortable house for himself and outbuildings for his cattle, while he lodges in a mud-chinked hovel, and stables his cows in the woods; how the Northern farmer is respected and honored because he labors, while he is looked down upon and despised for doing the same thing; if he knew all this, would he not crush slavery and end the rebellion in a day? He would. And slavery will not be effectually crushed, or the rebellion ended, until he does know it. We may overrun the South, we may make its fields a desolation, and its cities heaps of ruin, but until we reach the reason and the hearts of these men, we shall stand ever on the crater of a volcano, whose red-hot lava may at any hour again burst forth and deluge the land with blood and fire!

But how—while every able-bodied Southern man is in the army—can we reach these people? By fighting them with a sword in one hand and a Union newspaper in the other—by giving them ideas as well as bullets. By scattering loyal publications broadcast over the conquered districts, and by starting a free press wherever we hold a foot of Southern soil. If the men are away in the army, the women will be at home, and will read these things, and that will be enough. If we convert them, the country is saved. Woman, in this century, is every where that "power behind the throne" which is mightier than the throne itself, and the Southern women have been, and are, the mainspring of this rebellion. Every dollar thus planted in the South would spring up a man, in tattered hat and ragged butternuts, it might be, but still a man, hardy, earnest, brave—who for what he thought was right would march straight up to the cannon's mouth, and meet death "as if he loved it."

I have failed of my purpose in writing this article if I have not shown that the great body of "poor Southern whites" are an honest, industrious, enterprising, brave, and liberty-loving people, who need only to know the true issues of this contest to become the firm friends and supporters of the Union. Henceforth they must be the real South. We must enlighten and elevate them. Only in that way can we uproot the despotic power of the aristocracy, and plant in the South a loyal element which will make it one with the North in interest and in feeling. Only in that way can we secure lasting peace, and freedom, and Union, to our distracted country.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 20th of April.—The proceedings in Congress have not possessed special interest. Much of the time has been spent in debate concerning the general policy of the Government, and the measures proper to be employed in suppressing the rebellion. On April 8th the Senate passed the joint resolution amending the Constitution, as follows: "ART. XIII. Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, of which the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.—Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this Article by appropriate legislation." This must be passed by the House, signed by the President, and ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, when it will become a part of the Constitution. On April 12th Mr. Sumner introduced a bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen, with a commissioner and clerks, the bureau to guard the interests of freedmen against loss or failure from cupidity, cruelty, or accidental causes. On the 16th the Senate passed a bill prohibiting gold-gambling, and designed especially to put an end to time-sales, under a penalty of $1000 for each offense. This action was induced by the course of speculators in forcing gold to the enormous figure of 190, and depressing Government securities.—Other general bills passed by the Senate were the following: The Naval Appropriation bill, with an amendment restoring the Naval Academy to Annapolis, Maryland; to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Company; giving the Revolutionary soldiers an additional bounty of $100; to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, with a section allowing all persons, of whatever color, to vote, to which the House subsequently disagreed.—On April 4 the House unanimously adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the republic of Mexico; Therefore they think it fit to declare that it does not accord with the people of the United States to acknowledge a Monarchical Government erected on the ruins of any Republican Government in America under the auspices of any European Power." On the 8th, in the course of debate, Alexander Long, a representative in Congress from the Second District of Ohio, declared himself in favor of recognizing the independent nationality of the Confederates, avowing other sentiments regarded as offensive to the loyal sentiment of the country. On the 9th, Speaker Colfax offered a resolution for the expulsion of Mr. Long. This led to a debate extending over five days, during which the greatest excitement prevailed. Finally, on the 14th, the resolution was modified so as to declare Mr. Long "an unworthy member of the House," and in that form was passed; 80 to 70. During the debate Mr. Harris, of Maryland, expressed approval of Mr. Long's sentiments, and was also censured by a vote of 92 to 18. Mr. Fernando Wood, during the same debate, said that he agreed perfectly with Mr. Long, that he would prefer recognition as an alternative rather than that the people of the South should be subjugated and exterminated.—Among the bills passed by the House are the following: to establish an ocean mail-steamship line between the United States and Brazil; to establish a postal money-order system; to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge over the falls of the Ohio, near Louisville, Kentucky. The National Bank act, after mature consideration, was also passed. The bill confines the entire notes for circulation issued under this act to $300,000,000; every association may charge on any loan or discount seven per cent. interest; and no association shall have a less capital than $100,000, nor less than $200,000 if in a city of more than 50,000 inhabitants.

Military operations have continued with some activity during the month. The Red River Campaign has not been attended with entire success. On the 26th of March a fight took place at Cane River, thirty miles above Alexandria, where the armies of Generals Banks and Smith united, between some of General Smith's forces, consisting of 6000 infantry and one brigade of cavalry, and General Dick Taylor's Confederate army, estimated at 12,000, posted in an advantageous position. The fight lasted three hours, when the enemy gave way, with a loss of 200 in killed and wounded and 500 prisoners. The Federal loss was 18 killed and 60 wounded. General Smith at once pushed forward in pursuit. Meanwhile Confederate deserters have come into our lines in large numbers, and within a fortnight after our occupation of Alexandria 900 negroes entered the place and claimed the protection of the Federal flag. Some five hundred citizens have taken the oath under the Amnesty proclamation, and on the 4th of April a large Union meeting was held, at which strong anti-slavery sentiments were avowed. On the 6th of April the army left Grand Ecore, a point sixty miles above Alexandria, the cavalry in the advance. On the 8th, after driving the enemy two days, the cavalry were confronted by an overwhelming Confederate Force at Pleasant Hill, fifty miles east of Shreveport, and a large body of infantry hurrying forward a stubborn battle ensued, resulting in the defeat of our entire force, the cavalry being seized with panic and sweeping the infantry with them from the field. Finally, however, the Nineteenth Army Corps, with 7000 men, came up, and succeeded in checking the enemy, enabling all our trains except those of the cavalry to escape. Our total loss was from 1200 to 1500; that of the enemy was over 1500. General Stone, of General Banks's staff, had direction of the battle. On the 9th General A. J. Smith, with the Nineteenth Army Corps, again engaged the enemy, and defeated them, capturing 2000 prisoners and 20 cannon. The Confederate Generals Morton and Parsons were killed. After the first day's fight General Banks, being short of rations, sent word to Admiral Porter to return with the fleet, which had advanced to within eighty miles of Shreveport, and was preparing to blow up the steamer at New-Falls City which the Confederates had sunk in the Channel. On the way down the fleet was attacked by large numbers of the enemy on both sides of the river, who attempted to capture the transports. A fight ensued between the gun-boats and Confederates, in which the latter were repulsed, with 500 or 600 killed and a large number wounded, while none on the gun-boats were injured. General Greene, commanding the enemy in this action, had his head blown off by a shell.

In Texas there have been some movements of importance. Indianola was evacuated on the 13th of March, the troops taking the land route and crossing the bayous by pontoon ferries. In doing so 34 men were drowned by the swamping of boats. Subsequently to this evacuation a force of 4000 Federal cavalry occupied Eagle Pass, 400 miles above Brownsville, and the outlet of a Confederate highway, by which cotton and other articles have been run into Mexico. About the same time Corpus Christi, at the mouth of Nueces Bay, was reoccupied by our troops, who captured 1000 Confederates stationed at that point, together with immense quantities of cotton. The movements in the Red River, in connection with those of General Steele, who has advanced beyond Arkadelphia, in South-western Arkansas, with a force of 30,000 men, must have an important bearing not only on the Confederate occupation of Texas, but on the entire situation in the Trans-Mississippi Department. The enemy will find it impossible long to hold out against the heavy columns moving against them. General Steele, in his advance, fought two considerable engagements with the enemy, in both of which they were defeated with loss.

Active preparations for the opening of the campaign are still going on in the Army of the Potomac. The Eleventh and Twelfth Corps have been consolidated under the title of the Twentieth Corps, and Major-General Hooker assigned to the command; Major-General Howard has taken command of the Fourth, relieving General Gordon Granger; and General Slocum is to report to General Sherman. On the 8th of April an order was issued by General Grant ordering all civilians, sutlers, and their employés to the rear, with all property for which there was no transportation. By the same order furloughs were stopped. During the month Lieutenant-General Grant visited Fortress Monroe, Annapolis, and other points, and by personal observation informed himself of the condition of the several departments. General William F. Smith has been assigned to General Butler's department, and will direct military movements on the Peninsula, which will probably be made simultaneously with the advance of the Army of the Potomac, which has been largely reinforced for the spring campaign.

On the 26th of March a small Federal force marched from Pine Bluff, Arkansas, to Mount Elba and Longview, on the Washita River, destroying at the latter place several pontoon bridges, a train of thirty-five wagons loaded with camp and garrison equipments, ammunition, stores, etc., and capturing 320 prisoners. On the 30th the same force engaged 1200 Confederates at Monticello, routing them, and capturing a large quantity of small-arms, many wagons, and over 300 horses and mules. Our loss was but fifteen, and that of the enemy over one hundred. The Confederates are still roving about some parts of Kentucky and Western Tennessee. On the 13th of April the Confederate General Buford appeared before Columbus, Kentucky, and demanded the surrender of Fort Halleck, giving five hours for the removal of women and children, and promising protection to white soldiers (in case of surrender), but none to colored troops found in arms. Just at that time a steamer arrived from New Orleans with 3000 veterans, on their way home on furlough. These were landed with a battery, and fighting immediately commenced, Colonel Laurence, the Union commander, refusing to listen to the summons to surrender. Subsequently the enemy retired, but threatened for some days to renew the attack.

On the 12th of April the Confederate General Forrest appeared before Fort Pillow, on the Mississippi River, some seventy miles above Memphis, and sent a flag of truce demanding its surrender. This, as was a second demand, was refused by Major Booth, the Federal commander, when a vigorous attack was made by the Confederates, which resulted in the surrender of the fort, after several hours' fighting. Major Booth was killed, together with several other officers. Upon taking possession of the fort, which had only a garrison of 600, the Confederates commenced an indiscriminate butchery, not only of the soldiers—black and white—but of the women and children, killing in all some 400 persons, mutilating the dead, cruelly bayoneting the wounded on the field, and shooting some of them in the hospitals. The negroes, against whom the Confederates cherish a deep animosity, were treated with particular indignity. Five were buried alive. Six guns were captured by the Confederates and carried off, including two 10-pounder Parrots and two 12-pounder howitzers. A large amount of stores was destroyed or carried away. In other parts of the field operations have been without importance. Both sides appear to be preparing for the grand struggle of the summer, in which the vital question of the time is to be finally decided.

The spring elections in Connecticut, Rhode Island, Missouri, New Jersey, and other States, show heavy Union gains. In Maryland and Louisiana the elections for delegates to State Constitutional Conventions were carried by the friends of unconditional emancipation; and in both States slavery will soon be abolished by constitutional amendments. The Louisiana Convention met in New Orleans on the 6th of April.

EUROPE.

The Schleswig-Holstein question remains without material change. Hostilities have been continued during the month, but without any definite result. The siege of Düppel has been persisted in by the Prussians, who have, however, been several times repulsed—once in a grand assault all along the line. Their progress toward the reduction of the place amounted, at the latest dates, merely to the opening of the first siege parallel. It was said an effort would be made to flank the position. The town of Sonderburg has been bombarded and partly destroyed by the Prussians. In the siege of Fredericia the Austrians, failing to accomplish any satisfactory results, for a time suspended active operations, but were preparing at the close of March to renew them. The strength of the Prussian army at Düppel, at the last accounts, was 40,000 men; the Austro-Prussian corps, which has invested Fredericia, consisted of 16,000 men; and about 8000 were in the northern part of Jutland. The repulses sustained by the Germans at Düppel and Fredericia are represented to have given fresh encouragement to the Danes, who display the most robust confidence in their cause and themselves. The King maintains his original resolute attitude, declaring that, while he desires peace, he will never submit to humiliation. The negotiations for a Conference in London were still going on, but doubts are entertained whether any solution of the complication will be reached. All the Powers, however, will probably participate. At the close of the Norwegian Storthing the King, in his speech, said that Sweden, jointly with the other Powers, would endeavor to obtain peace, but, at the same time, was prepared to render assistance to Denmark against an overpowering force.

The Poland troubles continue, and several engagements between the insurgents and the Russians have taken place. The Polish peasants have issued a manifesto against the Czar. The paper contains a programme of organization for the raising of a peasant army of a million of men, from the ages of sixteen to sixty, who are to assault Warsaw and the other Polish cities held by the Russians.

Hungary is also excited by renewed revolutionary agitation. A military organization is said to be forming on the basis of a former regimental list of the National Guards.

Garibaldi has arrived in England, and been received with great enthusiasm.

In the English House of Lords, on the 5th of April, the Marquis of Clanricarde moved for the correspondence with the Confederate States in reference to the removal of the British consuls from Southern ports and the enlistment of English subjects in the rebel army. Earl Russell agreed to the motion, the words "so-called" being inserted before "Confederate States," lest it should be imagined that Parliament had recognized the Confederacy. The House of Lords has decided against the crown in the Alexandra case, and the vessel would be restored to her owners. Mr. Stansfeld, M.P., has resigned his seat in the British Cabinet, in consequence of the French official repetition of his complicity with Mazzini and Greco in the conspiracy against Napoleon's life. Lord Palmerston, speaking on the subject, said that the "personal" and "dynastic safety" of Napoleon were essential to the best interests of Europe.

JAPAN.

A new Embassy from Japan has arrived at Suez. The embassy will visit Paris, and apologize to the Emperor for the misdeeds of the Tycoon; and will then proceed to London, Vienna, and also to Switzerland. It is noteworthy that while European Powers are constantly involved in difficulties of some sort with the Japanese, the American Government, without any sacrifice of principle or interest, maintains perfectly peaceful relations. During the present year Mr. Pruyn, the United States Minister, has negotiated a treaty with the Japanese Government which considerably enlarges the facilities for commerce between the two countries. It was signed at Yeddo on the 28th of January, and provides that the articles used in the preparation and packing of teas shall be free of duty; that the following articles shall be admitted at the reduced duty of five per cent: Machines and machinery, drugs and medicines [except opium], iron, in pigs or bars; sheet-iron and iron wire, tin plate, white sugars, in loaves or crushed; glass and glass-ware, clocks and watches, watch-chains, wines, malted and spirituous liquors; and that the citizens of the United States importing or exporting goods shall always pay the duty fixed thereon, whether such goods are intended for their own use or not.

MEXICO.

Maximilian has not yet been declared Emperor of Mexico at the close of this Record. After adjusting a treaty with Napoleon by which the interests of France were secured, a difficulty arose in the Imperial family of Austria respecting the presumptive right of Maximilian to the Austrian crown. This difficulty, however, after some negotiation, in which a French General who was sent to Vienna for the purpose participated, was adjusted, and the final announcement of the Archduke's acceptance of the throne of Mexico was daily expected.

Literary Notices.

Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile, by JOHN HANNING SPEKE. We have already spoken at length of this the latest and one of the most valuable of the contributions which have within ten years been made to our knowledge of the African continent. We refer to the work here mainly for the purpose of giving a brief outline of the results of modern explorations in Africa. Barth, starting in 1849 from Tunis, after some preliminary travels in the northern portion, struck due southward, passing through the northern desert, and reaching the fertile region around Lake Tsad and the country drained by the Niger. Southward he went to about the latitude of ten degrees north of the equator, westward to Timbuctoo in about longitude five degrees west of Greenwich. The region over which his researches extend is about thirty degrees from east to west, and the same number north and south, embracing one-third of the territory of the continent. Though written in a somewhat hard and dry manner, his three large volumes abound with minute information as to the geography, productions, ethnology, and history of what, for the want of a better term, may be styled the civilized part of Africa. It will probably be long before any notable additions will be made to his work, which for the present is the great store-house of material for our knowledge of that portion of Central Africa down to about four degrees north of the equator. Livingstone, about the same time, after a long residence in the great southern desert, set out on his great expedition across the continent. He describes mainly the central portion lying between the parallels of ten and twenty degrees south latitude; though his inquiries extended to within four degrees of the equator. The inhabitants of the region described by Livingstone differ widely from those with whom Barth came in contact.

Between the region traversed by Barth and that gone over by Livingstone lies a tract of about eight degrees in breadth—four on each side of the equator—which, with the exception of a narrow line on each coast, eastern and western, has until recently been wholly unknown. On the eastern belt the population has a large infusion of Arab blood. Slavery prevails; but few slaves from this shore have ever reached America. The western shore is the great hive from which the American population "of African descent" have involuntarily swarmed. Here are Ashanti, Dahomey, and Congo; here are the "Grain Coast," the "Ivory Coast," and the "Slave Coast." The books relating to this region are numerous. The best, by all odds, is that of the Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, whose modest volume is pronounced by Livingstone to be the best volume which he had ever seen relating to the West Coast of Africa. There are but three books of any value upon the interior of this equatorial belt. Paul du Chaillu, a naturalist of no inconsiderable acquirements, who had established himself in trade upon the West Coast, made several excursions into the interior, almost on the line of the equator. He went about three hundred miles eastward, which brought him somewhere about a quarter across the continent from west to east; a hundred miles on each side of the equator would comprise the northern and southern limits of his explorations; but within these limits he traveled, always on foot, nearly 8000 miles through a region wholly unexplored. He is the first traveler who professes to give from his own observation any accounts of the gorilla or of the cannibal tribes of the interior. His narrative has been the subject of much discussion, many writers considering it almost wholly fabulous; but those best qualified to judge are fully convinced of its entire truthfulness. The nearer subsequent travelers approach to the scene of his explorations the nearer are the character and habits of the people found to correspond with Du Chaillu's descriptions. Burton, starting from Zanzibar, on the eastern coast, went a third of the distance across the Continent. The line of his journey was, however, mainly south of the fifth parallel of latitude, and therefore only on the edge of the equatorial belt. Still, from the accounts of native traders, he was able to gather much new and valuable information respecting the Lake Region of Central Africa.

Speke, who had accompanied Burton on this expedition, and had discovered the great Lake N'yanza, in which he at once concluded must be found the source of the Nile, set out on an independent expedition in order to verify the truth of his theory. He followed his old route due west nearly a thousand miles, then turned directly north, skirting the western and northern sides of the lake to its outlet, which he ascertained to be a large, and in all probability the main, branch of the Nile. This journey northward led him for a full thousand miles in a straight line through a region never before visited by a white man, until he reached Gondokoro, in latitude five degrees north, the farthest southern limit of previous explorers. From thence, following the Nile another thousand miles, he reached Khartoom, at the junction of the Blue Nile and the White, fifteen hundred miles from the mouth of the river. This journey of Speke's is probably the longest one of pure exploration ever accomplished by any private expedition. It has, we think, made more positive additions to our stock of knowledge than any other single expedition. Some English critics have endeavored to discredit Speke's claim to having discovered the true source of the Nile. There seems little reason to doubt that this river receives one, and probably several, large affluents from a direction still further West. But, as far as our present meagre knowledge of the topography of the country enables us to judge, none of these can drain a tract sufficiently extensive to give rise to a stream so considerable as that which forms the outlet of Lake N'yanza. At all events, no future explorations can deprive Speke of the honor of having discovered the source of a great, and probably the greatest, affluent of the Nile. Apart from the geographical and ethnological information which it contains, Speke's Journal is one of the most clear and interesting narratives of personal adventure ever written.

The Southern portion of the African continent, from the 35th to the 15th parallels, is of special interest to the ethnologist and student of natural history. With the exception of a few tracts of limited extent, which have been seized upon by English and Dutch colonists, the whole region is unfitted for a residence for civilized man. In the centre is an arid desert, as barren as that of Sahara, shading off toward each coast into a region which affords admirable retreats for wild beasts. The inhabitants of this whole region are among the lowest of the human family. They vary greatly in physical character, but mentally and morally bear a close affinity. They lead a miserable life, alternating between gluttony and starvation, and are engaged in continual wars, the main object of which is to steal each other's cattle, extermination of the owners coming in as an inevitable though accidental adjunct. Their country is, however, the paradise of hunters; and the best, in fact the only good books upon it, have been written by men who have gone thither primarily in the capacity of Nimrods, though some of these were men of no inconsiderable acquirements. Gordon Cumming led the way in this direction some fifteen years ago. His book, however, is wholly one of personal adventure, adding almost nothing to the amount of knowledge of the region. His range was on the east side of the great Kalahari Desert. Andersson comes next: his ground was on the west side. His two books, "Lake Ngami" and the "Okovango River," while they abound in personal adventure, embody also much information respecting the country and its inhabitants. His discovery of a great river, flowing from toward the coast directly into the interior of the continent, is of special significance in its bearings upon some disputed points of African geography. The last writer upon our list of those who describe the southern part of Africa is Baldwin, whose hunting adventures in the whole region from Natal to the Zambesi are excelled by nothing of the kind in any language. The incidental information given by Baldwin is of considerable scientific value.

When the great equatorial belt shall have been explored, so that we can know the physical character of the water-shed which divides the streams which ultimately find their way into the Atlantic, the Indian Ocean, and the Mediterranean; whether there is really any mountain range answering es-entially to that known on our maps as the Mountains of the Moon, dividing the continent of Africa, nearly on the line of the equator; and when the region lying west of Speke's route, between the basins of Lakes Tsad and N'yanza has been laid open, the remaining problems of African geography will have been solved.

Life of Edward Livingston, by CHARLES HAVENS HUNT. Livingston's fame rests mainly upon his labors as a jurist. The code which he prepared for the State of Louisiana is acknowledged to be a model of simplicity, clearness, and humanity, and is the source to which may be traced the leading ameliorations which have been made in our penal codes. His career as a politician and statesman was also distinguished and honorable. At two periods, a generation apart, he exerted as powerful an influence as any other man for the preservation of the Union. When, almost at the beginning of the Administration of the elder Adams, the largest State in the Union seemed on the point of adopting the heresy of "State Sovereignty," Livingston, then in his early manhood, was one of the most able and earnest of the men through whose exertions the maintenance of the Union was the paramount consideration, was recognized as the fundamental article in the creed of the Democratic party. Forty years later, when the doctrine of Nullification again threatened the national life, it was to Livingston, next after Jackson, that we owe the defeat of the attempt. He was the trusted adviser and counselor of the President, and the author of the famous proclamation in which the duty of the Government was laid down in terms that no man could mistake. "For what would you exchange your share in the advantages and honor of the Union?" said Jackson, in the words of Livingston; "for the dream of separate independence—a dream interrupted by bloody conflicts with your neighbors, and a vile dependence on a foreign power.... But the dictates of a high duty oblige me solemnly to announce to you that you can not succeed. The laws of the United States must be executed. I have no discretionary power on the subject. My duty is emphatically pronounced in the Constitution. Those who told you that you might peaceably prevent their execution deceived you. They knew that a forcible opposition could alone prevent the execution of the laws; and they knew that such opposition must be repelled. Their object is disunion; disunion by armed force is treason." To great ability and high culture Livingston added the highest personal worth. Mr. Hunt in this work has made a welcome addition to American biography. (Published by D. Appleton and Company.)

The Veil Partly Lifted, by W. H. FURNESS. From the title of this work one would naturally be led to expect a series of very orthodox essays, having for their object the more complete revelation of the Saviour. The author takes as his principle the following; namely, that it is not giving such extraordinary power to man to suppose him capable of detecting the fabulous as it would be to suppose him capable of producing fables bearing so far the semblance of facts as to be incapable of detection. He then proceeds on the hypothesis that the atonement, as it is understood among orthodox Christians, is a human fabrication. To support this ground more fully he adduces the fact that the ancients had likewise their doctrine of the atonement. Now the author must admit that both among the ancients and among Christians the atonement, so far as it has been believed in at all, has so far worn the semblance of a veritable fact to the believer; and these, by his own showing, have been the overwhelming majority of the human race. Well, there are some who do not believe. To them it does not wear the semblance of truth. What follows from these premises? Plainly that man has both the power of fabricating a fable which has the semblance of truth, and, in addition to this, a certain intellectual power which can tear away this semblance. Mr. Furness looks upon the atonement as a fable; Christians generally credit it as a veritable fact. The former can no more demonstrate his position than the latter. Mr. Furness sees something which Christians generally do not see; and they also see something which he does not. Is the veil then lifted? We think not, except to the author and those whose visual organs are in sympathy with his. We do not mean that these books have no effect. This work and Renan's "Life of Jesus" are calculated to influence men, and they do: they help on a skeptical tendency prevalent in the intellectual world; but they can not affect the stronger current of nature. We look therefore upon works of this class with this feeling—that they are characteristic of special tendencies and movements that have their course, their eddying maelstroms, and sometimes their sad shipwrecks, but they are not the wide ocean-current that sways the tides of humanity. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.)

A Popular Hand-Book of the New Testament, by GEORGE CUMMING McWHORTER. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) In a brief compass this volume contains a resumé of the main results of the labors of those who have critically investigated the subject of the canon of the New Testament. The stand-point of the author is that the Scriptures are an expression of the mind and will of the Holy Ghost, containing or implying all that He deemed necessary for man to know, and wholly free from error in faith and practice. In what manner the Divine Author guided the human instruments through whom the revelation was made, "has not," in the words of the book, "been revealed, and therefore can not be defined; yet it may be confidently affirmed that the inspiration is plenary, is sufficient, rendering the Scriptures the word of God." Starting from this point of the inspiration of some Scripture, the author gives a condensed statement of the reasons which have led to the reception by the Christian world of the various books which form the canon of the New Testament, as that Scripture given by the inspiration of God. Mr. McWhorter has performed with judgment and discretion the task which he undertook.—He has also (D. Appleton and Company, publishers) put forth a volume of Church Essays upon various matters of Christian faith, characterized by a tone of reverent feeling, and expressed in a pure and graceful style which will commend them to every devout reader.

Daleth: the Homestead of Nations, by EDWARD L. CLARK. (Ticknor and Fields, Boston.) This beautiful volume of Egyptian travel embodies a selection from all the results which time has accumulated—a selection in which history is blended with modern discovery: Herodotus shaking hands familiarly with Belzoni and Champollion. The work is not a critical one, nor is it designed to present any new material. It is not, however, by any means a mere compilation; the taste of the author, and the spirit of enthusiasm which animates him throughout, gives the book at the same time an air of freshness and elegance. The style is popular, and the interest of the reader is not disturbed by burdensome details or technicalities. The vague spirit of poetry, which leads the writer to conceits bordering on phantasy, will harm no one, while to a large class of readers it will prove a great fascination.

Private Miles O'Reilly: His Book. Under the fantastic garb of poems, speeches, and reflections of a mythical private of the Hibernian persuasion, are embodied more sound sense, keen suggestions, and trenchant satire than can be found in the debates in Congress for a session. The poem on "Sambo's Right to be Kilt," which is to be sung to the rollicking tune of the "Low-backed Car," contains in three stanzas the whole argument for the employment of colored troops in our army, which has been so laboriously and wearily inflicted upon Congress, and spread out on the pages of the Congressional Globe—which luckily nobody is obliged to read. Underlying the apparently reckless humors of the mythical Private Miles—who, however, wears the well-won shoulder-straps of a Major in the army of the Union—is a vein of tender pathos, which elevates his book into the realm of true poetry.—Different from this, and yet somewhat akin, is a volume of poems entitled Lyrics of a Day. The audience, "fit" though perhaps "few," who call to mind a volume of poems issued some fifteen years ago by HENRY H. BROWNELL, will know who it is that in this volume styles himself simply a "Volunteer in the U. S. Service." Reproduced from the earlier volume are a few admirable poems, among which is what we think the very best out of a score of good versions of the wonderful "Dies Iræ," and a wild poem, "Obed the Skipper," than which a poorer has made many a literary reputation. Besides these reproductions there are in this little volume quite a score of the most stirring lyrics for which the war has given occasion. They were flung by the author upon the pages of a dozen periodicals. He has done well in reclaiming his fugitive offspring. (Published by George H. Carleton.)

The National Almanac and Annual Record for the Year 1864. For completeness of topics, carefulness of arrangement, and accuracy of statement, this volume comes nearer to perfection than any book of its class which we have occasion to consult. It will be found absolutely indispensable for any man who wishes to have at hand, ready for consultation, a condensed and reliable statement of the material facts in the history of the past year. (Published by George W. Childs.)

The Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1864, edited by DAVID A. WELLS, presents a resumé of the most important discoveries and improvements in the various departments of Science, Industry, and Arts. The book is in every way valuable as a work for reference and consultation. (Published by Gould and Lincoln.)

Villas and Cottages, by CALVERT VAUX. Mr. Vaux was the associate of the late A. J. Downing, to whom, more than to any other man, is owing the advance which has been made in the rural architecture of the Northern States. Mr. Vaux has wrought in the spirit of his friend, and his admirable work contains several designs which are their joint production. In this enlarged edition will be found several new designs completely worked out, besides a great number of illustrations of architectural details. The designs range from a simple log-cottage, which will cost only the labor of the settler, to a splendid villa costing $60,000. The majority of the designs are for buildings costing from $1500 to $5000, and thus within the means of ordinary farmers, mechanics, and tradesmen. A great proportion of them have been carried into execution in different parts of the country, and in these cases the actual cost of building is given. The general design and the plans for the interior are so carefully given that they may be satisfactorily carried out by any clever mason and carpenter. The book should be introduced into every school library; for those who now fill the benches in our district schools are they who will soon build for themselves, and they should be taught in time that, by the exercise of taste and judgment, they can put up a dwelling which shall combine all the requirements of a home at an expense scarcely exceeding that of a mere shelter. In fact, one of the most suggestive designs in the book is that of a simple log-cottage. It contains nothing which an expert woodman could not execute with his axe, by a week's labor beyond that which would be required to erect a mere cabin of a single room, in which a whole family of men, women, and children eat, drink, sleep, wash, dress and undress all together. Some of the cottages which have actually been built for from $1500 to $3000 are, though upon a small scale, as graceful in exterior and convenient in interior arrangements as though they had cost five times as much. Many of the designs are so arranged that they can be enlarged from time to time, as the increasing family and means of the owner render it desirable and practicable. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Illustrated Horse Management, by EDWARD MAYHEW. This volume should be in the hands of every man who owns or expects to own a horse, and he should insist that his groom should read a chapter, or at least look at the illustrations, every morning. The book shows what an amount of wrong is inflicted, sometimes through brutality, oftener, we hope, through ignorance, upon the noblest conquest which man has made from the animal kingdom. It contains full remarks upon almost every point connected with the management, training, and treatment of horses, illustrated to the eye in a series of drawings quite as effective as the text. (Published by J. B. Lippincott and Company.)

Christian Memorials of the War, by HORATIO B. HACKETT, D.D. A collection of some hundred and fifty anecdotes illustrating the intelligence, earnestness, Christian principle, and heroism of a large class of the soldiers who have gone forth to fight the battles of our country. It is safe to say that no army ever contained so large a proportion of men of virtue and intelligence as that which is now enlisted under the flag of the Union. While it can not be denied that military life tends, in one direction, to loosen the bonds of social life and principle, it is equally true that it has also a strong tendency—quite as strong, and we think stronger, in the opposite direction. Our own army is composed almost wholly of volunteers. Some have undoubtedly volunteered from recklessness or in ignorance; but the great majority, we are persuaded, have entered the army from motives as exalted as those which have led others to missionary service. We believe that our army, officers and privates, is, as a whole, a fair representative of the virtue and intelligence of the nation. We believe, moreover, that the men who went into the army good men will, nine times out of ten, leave it better men. If any thing were needed to confirm this opinion it would be such a collection of anecdotes as this of Professor Hackett. We trust that the number of them will be multiplied. (Published by Gould and Lincoln.)

Woman and her Era, by ELIZA W. FARNHAM. The idea of this work, as is pompously announced by the author, is to demonstrate "the Superiority of Woman:" not simply, as appears in the course of the argument, that she is superior in certain respects and for certain ends, but that she is absolutely superior. We say in the outset that in our judgment the book is every way a bad one: bad in purpose, bad in tendency, and bad in execution. To justify our opinion we proceed briefly to lay down its leading points, usually in the words of the author. The leading argument is thus stated in syllogistic form: "Life is exalted in proportion to its Organic and Functional Complexity; Woman's Organism is more Complex and her Totality of Function larger than those of any other being inhabiting our earth; Therefore her position in the Scale of Life is the most exalted—the Sovereign one." The arguments by which the minor proposition is supported belong rather to the lecture-room of the anatomist than to the library of the non-professional reader. Michelet should have pondered it before writing his "L'Amour;" perhaps, in that case, one bad theory might have neutralized a worse one. The "Organic Argument" having been presented, the "Religious Argument" follows. From a mass of obscure utterances upon this point we extract the following, which we present as the best summary of the scope of the whole: "Organic Superiority is in itself proof positive of Super-organic Superiority. . . . Life is the most advanced which employs, in the service of the greatest number of powers, the most complex mechanism for the End of Use. We are therefore prepared to find in it" [the feminine structure] "the embodiment of a larger number of powers and higher aims in its Use, . . . a deeper feeling for the Ends of Use, a more abiding faith in and loyalty to Development, as the one aim that makes life worthy of acceptance, and sweet in its passing taste, and on the other hand to see that its failure herein is more fatal and destructive than it is in the masculine life. . . . The feminine includes the masculine, transcending it in both directions." Herein lies the argument of the book, which is spread over two volumes of cloudy phrases. The final conclusion is reached near the close of the second volume. Here it is: "The question of Rights settles itself in the true statement of Capacities. Rights are narrowest where Capacities are fewest—broadest where they are the most numerous. . . . It is plain, then, as between masculine and feminine, where the most expanded circle of Rights will be found; and equally plain the absurdity of man, the narrower in capacities, assuming to define the sphere of Rights for Woman, the broader." Such is Mrs. Farnham's idea of "Woman and her Era." We trust that it will be long before Woman adopts it. (Published by A. J. Davis and Company.)

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE great Fair was the great interest of the early Spring. It was proper that the general movement for the benefit of the national charity known as the Sanitary Commission should culminate in the Fair of the city of New York, which is our chief city, if not a true metropolis; and coming as it did in the midst of the elections, which were prodigious indications of the tenacity of the national purpose, it served but to make that purpose visible in its humanest form. For the feeling whence the Commission springs, and the true charm of all these noble efforts to help it, is sympathy with the soldiers who are fighting the great battle in the field. As Mr. Choate well said in his speech at the formal opening of the Fair in New York, the soldiers, as they turn their eyes homeward, will see in this vast combination of industry, and this general and generous emulation in heaping up money for their assistance, the most signal proof of the care and love and interest which follow them to the field, and cherish them in perpetual remembrance.

It seemed to be the imposing success of the Fairs in Chicago and Boston which immediately inspired the movement in New York. It began rather languidly. The prospectus was large and imposing, but the response was not at first so promising. It was not that sympathy or interest had flagged, but that there was a general shyness in giving to them the precise form which was suggested, and which, to be of real service, must be of truly metropolitan proportions. But as the time approached all doubt vanished. Gradually every body was drawn into the grand conspiracy. The brains, the fingers, and the purses of faithful men and women throughout the city, neighborhood, and State, as well as those of our countrymen in foreign lands, were all busy with the one object of preparing for a demonstration which should be equally worthy of the city and the cause. And when the opening day arrived, and, under the auspices of the Commanding General of the Department, a military parade took place to signalize the occasion, its success was already secured, and the imposing spectacle of the parade was but emblematic of the triumph.

Within the last few years there have been many remarkable military processions in Broadway. The march of the Massachusetts Sixth Regiment on the 17th of April, 1861, was perhaps the most truly interesting. That of the Seventh New York Regiment on the 19th of the same month was the most exciting. That of the Twentieth Regiment of United States colored troops in the early spring of this year was the most significant. But among them all the parade of the 4th of April, 1864, was not the least memorable; for the three years since the Massachusetts regiment passed one Wednesday morning, amidst the doubt and wonder and dismay of the spectators, had transformed a parade of our citizen soldiers from a curious and pretty pageant into a spectacle full of reality and meaning. The thousands of men who marched, with waving banners and melodious bands, in honor of the opening Fair, through the long street packed with people, and under the houses and windows and doors and balconies swarming with spectators, looked no longer like holiday militia, but like soldiers in the midst of a tremendous war, who knew that their next march might be to the battle-field. The distinction between regulars and volunteers had vanished. The soldiers of that day were a corps of the great actual army of the people.

By five o'clock the parade was over, and at six the doors of the Fair were opened. A prayer; Dr. Holmes's Army Hymn, nobly sung; a patriotic speech by General Dix, and an admirable response by Mr. Joseph H. Choate, were all the immediate opening ceremonies. That evening, and for many days following, the Fair was the great event of the city. Every morning its daily history was published, and enormous as the success was, it was well deserved. Each department was wonderfully complete. There was the finest collection of pictures ever gathered in the city. There was the most interesting and copious museum of military trophies of the country. There was a curiosity shop unsurpassed as a museum of things quaint and rare. There was a children's hall—a vast nursery—of profuse and delightful attraction. There were living reproductions of the ancient days in the Knickerbocker Gallery and the Cockloft Summer House. There were war-dances by Indians from the Rocky Mountains; and as the chief substance and business of the Fair, there were booths, tables, and counters, at which every useful trade was represented, and every article of luxury or necessity could be purchased: while a lofty floral temple, blooming with flowers and blithe with birds, rose in the centre of the great hall. The finest orchestras filled the air with music: and a spacious restaurant, occupying two floors of a temporary building erected for the purpose, were so incessantly thronged by an eager and merry company that, as a wit suggested, its walls should have been appropriately tapestried with Gobbins'.

The episodic attractions were endless. The mind of a certain kind of piety could not but see with satisfaction that the unspeakable crime of raffling was not tolerated; while the generous charitable human soul was glad to know that "subscriptions" were possible for albums and caskets of exquisite sketches by our best artists, which few single purses could afford. The expenditure was noble and profuse. The prices of wares were not exorbitant, and the hours and fairies did not hesitate to give change. The gossip that floated through the Fair and beyond took a golden magnificence of tone, as when it was whispered that one rich man said that he would give as much as any body, and another rich man hearing it, drew his check for a hundred thousand dollars. But these rumors in the air were unavoidable. They arose naturally out of the dazzling profusion and wild elegance of the scene. It was a Saturnalia of charity and good-feeling. How could it be too opulent, too extravagant? This surpassing flower of sympathy sprung from the red battle-field, from the hushed dimness of military hospitals, from the pain of wounded brothers. Drop, little child, your penny in this box. Give, kind Sir, five dollars for this subscription. Pay, dear Madame, a hundred, a thousand, for this shawl. They shall soothe the aching brow. They shall prop the dying head. Listen! through all the music and the murmur and the various splendor, there is one refrain that continues its ceaseless song; but the greatest of these is charity.

New York will yet have many a striking spectacle. Some happy day her bells will ring in a Fourth of July which shall dawn over a reunited, free, and prosperous people. Many a new anniversary will arise from the great struggle, and each return be hailed with joy. But hardly shall she see a nobler sight than this spring saw: when, in the midst of the huge struggle for Union, Liberty, and Peace, she stretched her hand still wider and farther to smooth the sick bed of the soldiers.

LAST April we were talking about the removal of Mr. Verplanck from the presidency of the Century Club in this city, on the ground of his openly expressed sympathy with the enemies of the country. Whoever will take the trouble to turn to our pages for April will perceive the manner in which we discussed the subject, and the grounds upon which we justified it. It seems that there are those who do not agree with our view. Indeed, one gentleman very plainly says that to assert that those who do not sympathize with the Government in its struggle against the rebellion should be proscribed in all organizations of whatever character is but another method for asserting that Democrats are traitors. Heaven save the mark! It is no more another method of saying that than it is of saying that all Englishmen are cannibals.

For let this gentle Sir consider his own words. He says as plainly as words can that Democrats do not sympathize with the Government. But by what right does he confound Democrats with a class of men distinctively known as Copperheads? The new president of the Club is quite as good and eminent a Democrat as the old. General Dix and General Butler are quite as good Democrats as can be found, or as ever were found, in the country. If the gentleman who makes this extraordinary statement is serious, and means to call himself a Democrat because he does not sympathize with the Government, and by necessary implication does sympathize with the rebellion, he misunderstands entirely the position which the leading Democrats of the country hold, and merely ranks himself with the national enemies. That such a gentle Sir should think it eminently unfair to remove Mr. Verplanck from his representative position in a social and literary club of men who do sympathize with the Government is no more surprising than that Mr. Valandigham should commend the old club facetiously called "Union" for not expelling Judah Benjamin.

The Century Club is not a political body. True. Neither is the war a political debate. It is something very different. It is the mighty military effort of the Government against a desperate conspiracy, which began and continues its work in blood. It is an effort in which all faithful citizens are terribly in earnest. But how can any body believe them—how can they believe themselves to be in earnest, if in a club for their social relaxation their president, or representative man, openly declares that the war is a crime upon the part of the Government, and that we are all gone to the deuce. The sons, friends, brothers of these men are laying down their lives. Their homes are desolate; their hearts are pierced and broken; but they believe in the cause and in the war. Does any body suppose that they are going to tolerate as their president a man who, by sneering and scoffing on the one side, and open words of sympathy upon the other, is really sustaining the slaughter of their brethren and friends, and that it is to be done under the plea of a difference of opinion?

Pray, if a club is established for social relaxation, and in the heat of a civil war, the Easy Chair, as a member, comes in on some pleasant evening bringing an English Fauteuil or a French Camp-stool; in a word, introducing a stranger—and hears his brother called a fool, and his son a simpleton, and his government knavish or imbecile, and its enemies right, and its cause contemptible, and its course unjustifiable—how much social relaxation does he derive from his Club? His friends, the strangers, naturally and properly estimate the general sentiment of society by what they hear said and see to be quietly assented to. Obviously one of two things will happen; either the Easy Chair and all who agree with him will be driven from the Club, or those who cherish and defend the men who are massacring their friends will be compelled to cease to represent the Club.

This is all that has happened. The Club is not so childish as to call sympathy with public enemies in arms a political difference of opinion; nor is it so exquisitely absurd as to consider that sympathy the distinctive sign of a Democrat. Indeed the Easy Chair's attention was drawn to this disagreement with its views by "a Democrat of thirty years' standing," living five hundred miles west of Chicago.

When the Plague devastated Florence eight centuries ago, a party of young friends fled from the city to the sunny gardens of Fiesole, and there told stories to beguile the time, and to win their minds from the sorrow of the city. Perhaps there are some who believe that garden to be the ideal of an American social club in the midst of this war. But not so think the Centurions. They neither forget, nor wish to forget, the tremendous struggle in which their hearts are invested, and their future welfare, with their children's, is involved. If an old Revolutionary patriot could not comfortably worship in a church where the minister prayed for King George, how can an American citizen to-day comfortably frequent a club in which the President justifies the Rebellion?

"DORINDA'S name is legion. The Easy Chair's comments upon the occasional rudeness of women in the cars have drawn forth a volley of replies, all courteous, all interesting, and all flattering, as showing that his words were considered worthy a reply. As many of the incidents narrated in them are really illustrative of manners, let us consider some of them. One Doriṇda says:

"I had been paying a visit to some relatives in — County, and my husband not being able to come after me, I was obliged to return home alone. My friends accompanied me to the station, where we met the morning train to P—, and one of them had barely time to see me safe in the lady's car, when the whistle blew and he rushed to the door leaving me 'alone in crowds to wander on' and find a seat for myself.

"We had traversed the length of the car when we entered, and every seat seemed to be occupied—but I made no remark about it. I said I was alone. I was, in one sense of the word, but not in another. I had with me a babe of nine months old, and the encumbrance of a small basket, an extra shawl, and an umbrella. The cars began to move, and I rushed into the first vacant place I saw. It was a single seat just inside the door, and so placed that I had to ride backward, which always gives me the headache.

"Opposite me sat a young lady, with her crinoline spread over a double seat, who eyed me, baby and bundles, as though I had just dropped from the moon, but made no offer of assistance. Every time the door was opened, which was frequently, the wind blew furiously right on my baby's head. I didn't despair, however, thinking when we next stopped I would try again. When the conductor came around I asked him to get me another seat as soon as he saw one vacant. He said he would, and that was all of it, for he never bothered himself about it. So I sat there, cooped up, with my basket under my feet, my shawl in a huge bundle stuck between me and the wall, the baby jumping and crowing in my lap, requiring all my strength and presence of mind to keep him out of danger for more than half the way home. I can assure you I was now in a very bad humor, and determined, when the cars stopped at the next station, to make a bold push for a seat. The young lady in front of me, who, after the first stare, had persistently looked out of the window, utterly oblivious of me and my surroundings, now leaned forward and said: 'I'll hand you your things if you want to change seats.' As if she didn't know that two hours ago! Well, at last, with this tardy assistance, I succeeded in getting a better seat; with the slight drawback of seeing baby's hat, the strings of which were untied, brushed off his head by a passer-by, trampled under foot, and, I thought, carried out of the car by the trailing garments of the ladies. I was mistaken in this, however, for a lady picked it up and gave it to me. It was a knit cap, luckily, or it would have been utterly ruined.

"Now, Monsieur, don't you think I was victimized? There were plenty of gentlemen occupying double seats, and, as I am neither old nor ugly, I really think it would not have been so disagreeable to them 'to do the polite.' And the baby wasn't old enough to eat candy, and thus soil their clothing in any way. In fact, he was an extremely well-behaved baby, as well as a handsome one (of course). He did not cry once the whole journey through. I am sure I was an 'object of interest!' Do not you think so? The conductor was, undoubtedly, to blame; but, as churlishness is his characteristic, nothing better is to be expected of him. And as for the young lady, I hope, if she ever arrives at the dignity of maturity, and should be similarly situated, she may meet with better luck than I did.

"Now, Sir, you may keep this for your own private perusal, or publish it for the edification and improvement of Sister 'Dorindas' and uncivil gentlemen. I will say, however, to the credit of the latter, the above instance is the only one in my personal experience. I once went from Philadelphia to Weldon, North Carolina, alone, and met with courtesy and attention the whole way through."

Another Dorinda pleasantly chides the Easy Chair for growing churlish; then slides into sarcasm, and says that it is never surprising when women are reminded that they are not properly grateful for the nameless incessant courtesies they receive from men. But we can fearlessly ask this Dorinda whether the Easy Chair's remarks justified such a thrust as that. She also tells a story:

"While the stage was waiting at the hotel for passengers a tired, travel-worn woman, with her traveling-bag on one arm, a baby on the other, and another little toddling child that could scarcely walk unsupported, came to get in. She had just reached the high steps when a tall, and, had I seen him under other circumstances, I should have said gentlemanly-looking man, came from the hotel, and, stupidly blind to the woman and her children, strided past them, and took his seat next the door, which remained open, and before which stood the poor creature with her babies and bundles, the high steps of the stage looming up like Mont Blanc, and for her, possibly, equally as accessible of ascent. Poor thing! she did not possess but two arms—how, then, was that little toddler, when both of those were full, to be helped up those steps, which, after two or three ineffectual attempts, she found it was unable to climb alone? And there, meanwhile, sat my Lord Lofty with the child and woman at his very feet, probably concocting his next editorial—for he is both minister and editor. Immediately opposite him, and equally indifferent to the demands on their gallantry, sat two well-dressed young gentlemen volubly discussing the chances of a horse-race which they were intending to attend, and for which purpose they had taken the stage, as it was to come off a few miles from the city on the stage route. At last a young lady, who had sat at the far end of the stage quietly reading until this scene attracted her attention, with burning cheeks and indignant face sprang forward with, 'Here, Sir, let me help you; I see there is no one else.' And taking the child by the arms, with the woman's satchel also, helped her to a seat. In my opinion that young lady rebuked an outrage of 'the fine laws of behavior,' to say nothing of common kindness. Possibly it may be asked what business had the woman to travel in so helpless and friendless a condition? The answer is ready. Her errand might have been a most important one, and she doubtless relied on the courtesy and kindness of American gentlemen upon which our brothers felicitate themselves so gracefully."

Still another says, after likewise regretting that the Easy Chair should have been so severe:

"I was once traveling with a lady, a confirmed invalid. It was an intensely hot day, so we opened the coach windows, and she, to avoid the cinders that would fly in, rode backward. Before we took our seats I carefully surveyed the premises, and saw neither satchel, shawl, nor umbrella—not as much as a walking-stick, to show that the seat had been occupied. After we had ridden four or five miles a gentleman came in from another coach, walked toward my friend, and with a refreshing coolness, considering the heat of the day, said, 'Madam, you have my seat; I want it.' It is needless to add it was given him. Another experience. I was coming home alone from a short journey. In Syracuse we changed cars, and looking after my baggage made me late in getting a seat. I walked through three coaches, and could find no vacant place, but in the fourth there were several with only one gentleman in each; and as not a seat was offered me, I leaned against the door, feeling à la Mungo Park before the black woman gave him shelter, until fatigue, combined with the headache, obliged me to ask for a seat. If I were an old woman, reverence for age should have given me a seat; if I were a spinster of very certain years, pity for my forlorn condition should have given me at least half a seat; and if I were young and pretty, gallantry should have said, 'Miss, may I offer you a seat?' I don't live in the metropolis or in the hub of the universe, still I have ridden in street cars—en passant, I detest them—and I am very sure I have seen half a dozen ladies standing, while more than that number of gentlemen were sitting. Now, don't imagine I think less of American gentlemen than you do. I only write to give my experience; and isn't the rudeness of sexes exceptional?"

Another Dorinda says that she "agrees with the Easy Chair exactly," and asks "what can make a woman more disagreeable than to claim as her right those little civil attentions which she ought to receive with graceful kindness?"

The Easy Chair accepts all the raps over his knuckles administered by almost all his correspondents, because even what he has now printed will go far and be read often, and many a traveler will bless the day when he asked counsel of Dorinda. He only wishes to exculpate himself so far as to say that he did not in his words, any more than in his heart, throw more, or insinuate that more should be thrown, upon the gentler sex than their own responsibility. When one of the Dorindas asks "Isn't the rudeness of the sexes exceptional?" she certainly strikes near the truth. And it would be much more exceptional if we only reflected that an innumerable cloud of witnesses holds us in full survey every time that we are tried, and some one of them is watching with peculiar interest and sympathy to see how we emerge.

You, for instance, who as you roll along are sitting alone and skimming this page may presently be tried. The pair of ladies will enter; there will be no seat; you must decide. Now at least one pair of eyes in the car is watching you, whether it seems so or not. If your courtesy fails, what says vanity? Do you declare that you will do nothing upon compulsion? Jack Falstaff said the same. Do you say that courtesy ought to be pure and not constrained? Very well, what ought selfishness to be? Isn't courtesy, even a little mixed in motive, better than unadulterated self-indulgence? Come, good friend, you will make nothing of it by delay or excuse. You know that you ought to get up. She may be blunt, uncourteous, even surly. You may insist upon her thanking you if you will. But there is only one course for you. You must get up!

IN June, when these leaves will put out, the poor little Emperor Maximilian ought to have arrived at his imperial seat of Mexico. We say poor, not because he is a Prince of mean ability, for report most highly praises his capacity. But it is a word by which we mean to express the profound doubt which overhangs his fate. His coming marks an era in the history of this continent. The hand of the Old World upon the New had been relaxed. Taking advantage of our troubles the hold has been renewed. Is that hold to endure or to be shaken off? Can it endure without peril to this country? Can it be shaken off without a menace, and probably a war, for which we are ill prepared?

These are the questions that play persistent around the ship that brings the young Emperor to his throne. And who is the Emperor, and what is the throne? The throne is Mexican, the Emperor is Austrian; and he comes because the Frenchman has sent an army to clear the way and hold the door open. Would an Austrian be seating himself upon a Mexican throne if the Frenchman had staid at home?

The scope of the question has been vaguely glimmering before the mind of this country ever since the war began, but we have only lately felt how pressing and critical the movement was becoming. Occasionally, during the last three years, the Easy Chair has remarked some aspect of the case, but we are optimists, we Americans, and we were satisfied because France helped us in the Revolution, forgetting that it was hatred of England, not love of America, which inspired her action. Perhaps, at last, we are more thoroughly roused. At least one point must be clear to every man; namely, that a division of this Union into two or more powers, each of which could be played off against the other, is the cardinal necessity of any French-Austrian empire in Mexico which expects to endure. And since France, or Louis Napoleon, who is France for the nonce, is the strength of the enterprise, it is interesting to remember that he has spoken no word of sympathy for us since the war began, and has unquestionably urged England to interfere; while we, good innocent souls! have doubled up our fists and sworn like the whole Flanders army at John Bull, Jean Crapeau slyly stroking his mustache in the mean while.

From the quiet precincts of the Chair we look out upon these huge events heralded by tremendous portents. In the midst of our own war, for instance, every member of our House of Representatives, of every party, who is present when the vote is taken, records his name against the French scheme; and those who are absent, on the next day obtain leave to add their names to those of their associates. This unanimity undoubtedly represents that of the country, and it certainly does not indicate either inaction or acquiescence.

THE city has been excited during the spring by the sudden rise of omnibus fares. From ancient times New Yorkers have been trundled from their homes to their offices for sixpence, until the city cars intervened with discomfort and fivepence. From the old Brouer four-horse stages, with a seat for the conductor by the side of the door, down to the present carriage, which is facetiously supposed to convey twelve passengers, and where there is a constant struggle to thrust the fare through the roof (and not out of the door, Dorinda!), the uniform charge has been six cents. And that time-honored institution has now fallen! That beacon, pointing to what orators rhetorically call "the better days of the republic," has departed in their company. One of the "landmarks" has disappeared, and New York must pay ten cents for its journey up and down Broadway.

It will be curious to watch the effect of this audacious innovation. Our own impression is that it is only a sign of insanity. It is the madness which precedes sure destruction. It is Cæsar's wrapping of the mantle around his form that he may fall with dignity. Because it is clear that the one thing which must now strike the eye interested in omnibuses is the presence of rails at the Battery—the great terminus of streets branching off in every direction; rails in Union Square; rails in Broom Street and Barclay; rails across Broadway at Bleecker; rails every where; a universal railyery, foreboding the decline of the whole Broadway omnibus system. The Legislature would not, indeed, listen to the project of the tunnel or underground railroad; but nevertheless the rails are every where closing in upon the old stage routes. New York will soon be rail-ridden and ridden upon a rail; and where then will be the time-honored, traditional landmark, monument, beacon, and institution, the Broadway omnibus?

These are the reflections which have doubtless absorbed the mind devoted to omnibuses as it has contemplated Broadway; and to make what little hay may be possible during the small sunshine that remains is undoubtedly the intention of this movement. For while this price is raised to exactly double that of the cars, the latter are by charter restricted to their original fare of five cents. What will be the result? It is a foregone conclusion. Many will walk, and be better for it, and the abominable crowding of the cars will be—increased and continued. For that is one of the things which triumphantly defies, cowers, and tramples under foot the pride and power of the empire city. It can not help itself. It shrieks, and sneers, and protests, and preaches, and the sublime inconvenience of the cars silently overbears all. How it is to be helped is difficult to say, unless the number of passengers in each car be limited by law. That is certainly easy enough and just enough. For the companies make great profits, and treat passengers like cattle. But to cook your hare, first catch him. To make your law, first secure your legislators. And who does that? Ah me!—or ah us! in this case—why is it, and how, that certain persons in the city always secure certain ends at Albany? Meanwhile let us make up our minds to it. If we wish to ride up and down town we must henceforth do so in crowded cars, until that Phoenix of a Legislature appears which will consult the interest of the public instead of the monopolies. For so long as the power of the people of New York in their Assembly can not make street cars carry only a certain number of passengers, so long it is the Company that triumphs over the people, with the consent of the legislators.

THERE was a large meeting of "working men" during the past month, to protest against legislative prohibition of trades'-unions or combinations proceeding by force. Now the right of men to combine and fix prices for their labor is not only patent, but it is patented. It is affirmed and protected by law. But the right of other Easy Chairs to insist that the present Easy Chair shall not receive less than a hundred thousand dollars monthly for its services is—to make a bull—not a right, but a wrong. The utmost freedom in the adjustment of wages ought to be a fundamental principle with all who live by them. Combinations to keep wages high follow the eternal law. When wages are high the increase of workmen presently lowers them. The old rule of demand and supply is as active and as efficient here as every where. Impatience seizes a club which presently falls back upon its own head.

The history of such efforts in other countries is full of sadness and instruction. Many of the most interesting English novels of later years have turned upon some aspect of the struggle. The selfishness of capital, the desperation of labor, is one of the oldest tragedies. But such means as forcibly preventing a starving man, for instance, from selling his labor for what it will bring, are not less tragical. Men may combine, of course, and say that they will work only for certain wages, and that when less are offered they will refuse to work, and will meanwhile support each other out of a reserved fund. But if they go further, and declare that if any man who has not agreed with them shall work for less wages they will forcibly compel him to desist, they invade one of the most sacred and precious rights of every man, namely, the right to dispose of his own labor; a right which they themselves fully enjoy.

It is no more necessary to invite our friends to read Dickens's new story than to exhort them to eat the fresh strawberries. They will be very sure to do both; and in both cases they will find the old flavor unimpaired. Dickens begins "Our Mutual Friend" with a buoyancy which shows all the vitality and opulence of his genius—just as Thackeray's "Denis Duval" reveals the unshaken and ripper power of Thackeray. Had the latter only lived we should have renewed the old delightful days of Pendennis and Bleak House, when the two great athletes contended, and every generous reader wished each combatant to win. Only one remains, but the other still speaks to us. In the pages of our next Number will be found both Thackeray's "Denis Duval" and Dickens's "Our Mutual Friend;" and rich as all other Magazines may be, we are modestly content with our own.

Editor's Drawer.

ONE of the most curious phases of human nature is that which presents itself when something ludicrous happens in the midst of a sermon, a funeral, or any other solemn time. Then, like a bent bow that flies suddenly back to its place, the mind that was strained to its utmost tension before rebounds, and he who was ready to weep is now more than ever disposed to laugh.

Farmer B—— was sitting in a country church. He had been working hard in the harvest-field; hands were scarce and Farmer B—— was dozing. The loud tones of the minister failed to arouse the farmer, until at length the good man closed the lids of the Bible and concluded as follows: "Indeed, my hearers, the harvest is plenteous, and the laborers are few." "Yes," exclaimed Farmer B——, "I've offered two dollars a day for cradlers, and can't get them at that."

In the "Old White Meeting-House" the reverend editor of the New York Observer tells even a more remarkable story of sermon interruption than this. He says that the Rev. Dr. Rodgers was preaching on the destruction of Jerusalem. Describing the horrors of the famine to which the wretched citizens were reduced, he cited from Josephus the fact that the Roman soldiers were attracted by the smell of meat to enter a house, and demanding it, a woman brought out the remains of her own child, which she had cooked for food. In the congregation sat an elderly maiden, slightly cracked in the head-piece, who became greatly excited as the preacher proceeded with the harrowing description; and when the baked baby came out she flew off the handle. She sprang up and caught an old man in front of her by the hair, and shrieked out in her madness, "You're the man that's got my child!" It may well be believed that this startled the house; and two of the deacons, stepping forward, disentangled her talons from the poor man's hair, and led the crazed woman out of doors.

BUT the Drawer has heard of another case that takes the wrinkles out of all before it.

In the old Bay State, and in a county that shall be nameless, the Rev. Mr. Paine went to the parish of Hayfield to preach by exchange with a brother minister, who lived some twenty miles off. He went on Saturday, and put up himself and his horse with one of the congregation. The morning of Sunday came, and it was found that his horse had left the pasture in which he had been put overnight, and was gone no one knew where. Inquiries were made, but all in vain. As in duty bound, he let the horse go and went to church, determined to preach as well as he could that day, and get home as well as he could the next day. When time for sermon came he announced his text, with no thought of its relation to his recent loss: "O that I knew where I might find him!" "This," said he, "is an expression of sorrow—'O that I knew!' It is of sorrow over one that has been lost—'O that I knew where I might find him!'" Just at this moment a green, red-haired Yankee lad cried out, "Mr. Paine, Mr. Paine, you needn't be worryin' about that hoss; he's over in Deacon Jones's back pastur." This was too much. It relieved the preacher's anxiety for his lost "hoss;" but alas for his sermon! it was worse than spoiled.

In all creation is there a stupider man than he who figures in a late London police report? Read and wonder:

Of all the matter-of-fact men we have heard or read of commend us to the "middle-aged man, dressed in the garb of an engineer," who, as the police report tells us, entered the Southwark Police Court "in rather a flurried manner," and begged his worship's assistance with regard to a letter sent to his son, bearing on the envelope the words "On Her Majesty's service." The letter fell not into the son's hands but the father's, and threw the simple man at once into a state of bewildered agitation. When he opened it he found to his horror it was a summons, and bearing in mind the words on the outside, probably his idea, if he was able to form one, was that his son had been guilty of high treason. True, it was headed "Court of Hymen;" but not having had the advantage of a classical education, this only made the matter worse, and plunged him into still deeper terror and perplexity. Reading on, he was dismayed to find his son summoned to "appear on the 14th at the Court of Hymen to answer the charge of stealing the heart of Amelia Smart," the summoning officer signing himself "J. Lovewell." Flat burglary! "I have read it," said the terrified father, "and can't make out what it means. I don't know any such place as the Court of Hymen. I know this police court, therefore I thought it advisable to come here about it." "But can't you see," said the clerk, "what it is? It is a valentine. I suppose it has been sent to your son by some young woman he knows." Even then the knot was not solved for him. "It does not look like a valentine," said he, "and I think something ought to be done to stop their circulation, as they are liable to frighten some people." Then it came out that the son has "a young woman" who "comes after him;" and his father, not yet awake to the joke, wishes to know if he could not prosecute her for sending "such a summons," and left the court "very dissatisfied" when he found he could not. No explanation could convince him that the Court of Hymen and Amelia Smart were compatible with his peace of mind.

A WISCONSIN correspondent is fairly into us. He says: You have given us some stories about Western "notisses" and Western courts for which I feel under obligation to furnish one that occurred in your city. I left New York January 9, 1849, in the good schooner Olivia, Captain Paulsen, for California. The vessel and cargo were owned by a company of ten residents of New York City, who had joined their fortunes and bought the vessel. The Captain went into the office of the company the day before sailing and said to the owners, "I must have a chronometer." They took a blank stare at each other all around, when one, more venturesome than the rest, broke out, "Well, Captain, haven't you got enough to eat already?" The Captain explained to them the difference between a chronometer and an oyster, after which they got the "costly thing."

On the banks of the noble Susquehanna, among the mountains of the interior of Pennsylvania, stands the pleasant village of Clearfield. Like all places of its kind it has its merchants and its banker, and naturally enough the merchant deposits his funds in bank until his necessities require them. An instance of sharp practice in this connection occurred there a short time ago, which I consider worthy a mention in the Drawer. Mr. M——, a merchant, being on the eve of starting to Philadelphia to purchase goods, called upon Mr. F——, his banker, for a large amount of funds which he had from time to time deposited, and which he now would have occasion to use. Having to travel some distance by stage, Mr. M—— was advised by Mr. F—— not to risk carrying the money, but to purchase a draft on a banker in the city. Although exchange was worth one per cent., yet F—— kindly agreed to charge him only five-eighths, whereupon the draft was accepted. The next morning, as M—— was taking his place in the stage, he was hailed by F—— with "I say, M——, I have a small package I wish you would carry to Philadelphia for me." M—— willingly took charge of the package, and finding it addressed to the same party upon whom the draft was drawn, made no delay in delivering it upon his arrival in the Quaker City. Great was his surprise, however, when the gentlemanly banker proceeded to cash his draft by coolly opening the package he had himself carried, taking from thence the amount of his deposits at home less five-eighths per cent., and handing it to him with a polite "Good-morning, Sir!" M—— thinks Clearfield great on banking, and F—— "some" on exchange.

THE worthy chief editor of a popular newspaper published in this city is extremely forgetful, rather irascible sometimes, and prone to indiscriminate—well, call it reproach, though that is very mild. On looking over the compositors' book of proofs one fine morning he saw an article which attracted his attention, and drawing it out, sat down to criticise it. His pen went through sentence after sentence, until at length, getting out of patience, he called his assistant and said,

"Mr. Scriblerus, I am sorry to see that you have written this so carelessly. It is inexcusable, I must say it is disgraceful, Sir, that a man of your ability should permit himself to use such slovenly expressions. Look here; and here" (pointing to the errors). "Do you think I can admit such matter to the columns of this journal? You must be more careful in future, Sir."

During this little oration the astonished subordinate opened not his mouth, but, as the best defense he could offer, went out, brought in the "copy," and laying it before the chief departed again, silent but elated.

Unhappy chief! It was his own copy.

ONCE, on an emergency, I successfully made use of the services of an old lady who, as a "yarb doctor," was deemed to be equal to those possessed of "book larning;" and I subsequently drew on her great experience in relation to a very sore finger. After prescribing certain "yarb" poultices, she recommended that the finger be first washed with warm water and Castile soap—and departed. She had not been gone long before she bustled back to warn me to be "very cautious when getting the Castile soap to ask for the old, as the kind made nowadays was not made of the best steel!"

HERE is one from the Eighth Minnesota, doing duty on the Northwest frontier of Minnesota:

On a bitter cold night, which only Minnesota knows how to appreciate, there arrived at a post on the frontier line of defenses, mid-way between Fort Abercrombie and St. Cloud, a small Government train, in one of the sleds of which was a box containing the body of a soldier, well packed for transmission to his friends below. The teams having been driven within the stockade and put up, the Corporal in charge reported the fact to the Acting Assistant Quarter-Master, a Teutonic gentleman of the olden school, who immediately went to the Orderly Sergeant, who had retired for the night, and, after arousing that functionary of details, thus made known his business:

"Otterly Sagent, I an' te Captin, we been speaking togedder, an' dere be a tead man standin' out dere in te pox, an' we want to watch him. You will detail an extra guard, an' put him on right away!"

The Orderly, who obeys all orders, promptly detailed and placed the guard as indicated, and reported the facts to the Captain, who for the first time heard of the circumstance. That officer, though surprised that a "tead man should be standin' out dere in te pox," after reconnoitring thought that the regular guard was sufficient to keep the "tead man" from running away during the night, and relieved the extra from further watching.

IN the summer of '62 the Twelfth Massachusetts Volunteers were in General Abercromby's Brigade. On the march from Winchester to Warrington they sorely tried the General's patience by straggling and "foraging on their own hook," oftentimes getting miles ahead of the marching column. One day the General, finding himself some few miles ahead of his column, entered a house on the roadside to get a hasty breakfast. Scarcely was he seated when he saw half a dozen soldiers pass by toward the front. He halted them at once with the interrogatory,

"What regiment do you belong to?"

"Twelfth Massachusetts," was the answer.

"The Twelfth. Ha! I know you, boys; you're always ahead of me. Go back to your regiment; I intend to lead the brigade myself this morning!"

THE following is confided to the Drawer, with full consent to publish:

At the opening of the Senatorial contest, several years ago, in California, when the lamented Broderick first appeared as a candidate for the United States Senate, in opposition to Senator Gwin, the following correspondence passed, which has two merits—first, that of being terse and pointed; and, second, wonderfully illustrative of the "filthy pool" of politics:

"CONFIDENTIAL.

"DEAR SIR,—If you will consent to withdraw your name as a candidate for the United States Senate, I will use my influence—and you know its value—to have you nominated for Governor. The nomination is equivalent to an election. Your obedient servant, WM. M. GWIN.

"MR. D. C. BRODERICK."

"CONFIDENTIAL.

"MR. D. C. BRODERICK presents his compliments to Senator Gwin, and begs to inform him that Mr. Broderick is in the habit of making the Governor of California himself.

"Hon. WM. M. GWIN."

COLONEL T——, at present occupying a high Federal office in California, found himself some time since in Yreka, a mining town in the north of California. An immensely heavy losing at "poker" one night left him without money to pay his bills or get away, and he remained in bed late in great disgust. During the morning a man came to the landlord of the hotel and told him he needed a first-rate lawyer to conduct an important case for him. The landlord told him that a celebrated San Francisco lawyer was up stairs, and showed him up to Colonel T——, who listened with great eagerness to the man's story. His case was this: A neighbor had a pet rattlesnake which had escaped from his cage and bitten the complainant's horse. The horse died, and he wanted to prosecute for damages, and a first-class lawyer to bring suit.

"How much was your horse worth?" asked Colonel T——.

"Five dollars," was the reply.

"I am very sorry," said Colonel T——, "that I can't serve you. I am retained for the snake!"

WHEN the oil regions of Pennsylvania began to be famous, our neighbor Jones, being of a speculative turn, was seized with the petroleum fever, and immediately emigrated to this land flowing with oil and money. Having rented an eligible site for operations, he began fighting his way to fortune. Yet it proved every thing but the smooth and oily way he had dreamed of. He bored and bored, day in and day out, but, alas! failed to "strike ile." His despondency grew apace, and was very much aggravated by frequent visits from his immediate and more successful neighbors, who lost no opportunity of boring our hero with all manner of impertinent questions and criticisms as to his plans and success in boring. Jones bore their taunts and his reverses with true Christian fortitude, until one morning, in a fit of desperation, he painted in flaming capitals, and erected at the mouth of his well, this cabalistic sign:

"OIL, OR CHINA!"

By that sign he conquered; for on that very day his terrestrial penetrations were crowned with success, and he was spared the necessity of forcing a passage into regions celestial. He struck a vein which gushed forth what proved to his desponding soul the veritable "oil of joy." Verily "all's well that ends well"—even an oil well.

LIEUTENANT B. F. CLARK, of the Seventeenth Michigan Infantry (that regiment of raw recruits which gained such notoriety for courage and noble daring on the battle-fields of South Mountain and Antietam before it had been three months in the service), called on me a few days since, and during his stay related many interesting incidents of those battles, one of which I think will do for the Drawer:

As our army moved from the latter field of blood and carnage, it passed among heaps of rebel slain slightly covered with earth. From one of those heaps an arm protruded, with palm opening upward, toward the passing column; at the sight of which an Irish soldier exclaimed, "Jazez! Lieutenant, an' see the rebel; he is after raching out his hand to git his land-warrant!"

A WESTERNER writes as follows:

A few months ago I had occasion to visit a friend, a Mr. E——, who is a great admirer of pictures and pictorial papers, such as Harper's Weekly and the London Illustrated News, with which the walls of his house were papered, thus making them useful as well as ornamental. Among other illustrations was that of "The Murder of the Princes in the Tower," upon which I made some passing remark. Mrs. E—— inquired if I understood the piece, stating that she could not find an explanation of it in the paper. I was about to reply when Mr. E—— (commonly known as WHIT) turned toward his wife in great surprise, and said, "Why, Ange, hein't you seen that and read about it lots o' times?"

"No, Whit, I have not," answered his better-half.

"Well, now, you bet I have," said Whit. "That's in the Bible!"

In the well-known village of Whisky Diggings lives one of its "oldest inhabitants" who keeps a hotel, and is a Dutchman. One fine day last spring a miner, with a pack of blankets and "prospecting tools" on his back entered the town, and passed all other houses and called on the Dutchman, stating that he was "straped," and wished to remain for a few days, and seek employment, and "mak a raise." "Vell," said the Dutchman, "there pe now blenty work; I dink you get soon some monish, an it pe all right." The fellow remained two weeks, and of course failed to "get work;" so he shouldered his pack to leave, when the landlord accosted him with, "Vell, I guess you owns me somedigs; petter you pay first." His boarder looked at him for a moment, and then reminded him of his statement on his first appearance, as well as his disappointment and inability to pay, whereupon the landlord swore a few; said it was a "mean dricks to shtop in mine house a couple of weeks an' den gleer out." Our miner very deliberately unbuckled his pack, laid it down, and turning coolly to the Dutchman, said, "Well, old man, if it is any accommodation to you, I'll stay a week or two longer!"

A WELL-KNOWN clergyman sends to the Drawer an anecdote of Dr. Bethune:

Several years ago, according to invitation, the late Rev. Dr. Bethune delivered an address before one of the societies at the anniversary of the Theological Seminary at Andover. It was my fortune to light him up to bed that night at my father's house. Taking his bulky manuscript, written only upon one side, out his pocket, he laid it upon the bureau with a sigh. "Ah, poor thing!" said he, as he turned over the leaves, "my pen ran on till it was too long, and there are several things that I was obliged to omit that I would have liked to read. Ah! here is one that in my hurry I overlooked," pointing to a page written in his clear hand, and reading aloud from it a most humorous description of the condition of the modern minister, "going around from place to place, like Diogenes with his tub, not unlike which many of our modern pulpits are constructed!"

THE same reverend correspondent adds a specimen of an incorrigible joker:

A short time ago there was a young man boarding for a while in our county jail, who found his unoccupied time hanging too heavily on his hands, and was constantly on the alert to improve it by practical jokes upon his fellow-boarders, or upon outside luckless travelers. One very rainy Sunday, in mid-winter, he spied a gentleman driving by in a buggy, well cloaked up, with an umbrella over him, and instantly shouted vociferously to him from the jail window that "something was the matter with his wheel!" The gentleman stopped, got out, and went all around his buggy, looking for the trouble in vain, and said that he "didn't see any thing the matter with his wheel." "Oh, I thought there was," was the gracious reply; "it kept going around!"

ONE of our faithful army chaplains writes to the Drawer:

Not long ago one of our sergeants was recruiting for the Corps d'Afrique, and brought a squad of fine-looking fellows to the Adjutant to have them sworn into the service. As their names, etc., were being entered on the enlistment-roll, one, on being asked where he was born, replied that he did not know; at which a comrade reminded him, quite confidently, that he was born in Arkansas. The Adjutant at once proposed to so enter it on the roll.

"Well, I doesn't know, Sah. De fac is, Sah," scratching his head in apologetic perplexity, "I's so young den dat I disremember!"

I AM indebted to the Captain of H Company for the following two:

One of our new recruits was a few days ago posted on camp-guard for the first time. Rebel cavalry was known to be in our vicinity, and as there was some expectation of an attack he was instructed, if there was any firing on the picket-line, to report it instantly. In the course of the evening he observed a fire in the direction of the pickets, which the "reserve" had built for their personal comfort. Supposing this to be the very thing he was cautioned about, he dropped his gun and started through camp yelling at the top of his voice,

"Fire on the pickets! fire on the pickets!"

In a twinkling every man was in line, ready for the expected foe. But when the cause of the alarm was explained, the yells and shouts that greeted our new soldier can only be understood by those who have heard a battalion of veterans cheer.

ANOTHER of our new recruits being notified by the Sergeant of his Company that he was detailed for "fatigue duty," very innocently replied, that he couldn't go, as he was writing a letter!

I RECOLLECT when a boy attending a celebration of the anniversary of the Battle of Bennington, on the old battle-ground, and a Hoosic Dutchman offered a toast that seems peculiarly appropriate to the present time. It was this:

"Domestic traitors; may da hang by de edge of de moon wid dare fingers greased!"

DEAR DRAWER,—This revenue business brings out the human hugely. The incomes are beginning to come in, and I send you a specimen brick:

"My profets to the Bes of my noleg From one doller to to dollers pur day Thet is oneday with the other. Rent to Pay By th Mont 19 dollers i hef to Pay now And les yer i pad 16 dollers pur mont"

I HEARD, years ago, the late Rev. James B. Finley, of Ohio—the Old Chief, as we called him—relate the following:

He was a wild boy, and took a full part in all the fun, frolic, and "devilment" which was so prominent a feature of our Western life in its earlier days. There was a practice in vogue in those days of parties stealing into melon-patches at night, eating the luscious fruit to their utmost capacity, and then making a general smash-up of the balance. This was certainly rather rough and malicious fun; but as few except "close-fisted" farmers were visited, who were stingy of melons, the practice was rather popular than otherwise.

There was a German in the neighborhood who had received some slight from one of his nearest neighbors, and meditated revenge. One day, in the melon-season, he came to young Finley and proposed that they should have a good time in a melon-patch that night. The matter was soon arranged, the time and place of rendezvous appointed. The night was dark, and proved chilly for the season, and when the Dutchman appeared he brought a bottle of apple-brandy—or apple-jack, as it was generally called—of which he had already imbibed freely. Long before daylight the parties returned to their homes, the Dutchman elated and chuckling over the consternation with which his neighbor would be filled in the morning. Finley, however, was in more than usually pleasant mood, and certainly had no compunctions of conscience for the part he had in the "trick." He was at work near the house in the afternoon when he saw his Teutonic friend approaching, with a countenance in which sorrow and anger were about equally combined. Finley started to meet him, saluting him,

"How are you, Jonny? Didn't we have a big time last night?"

"Oh! Shim (Jim), dem was mine own melons dat we proke last night! What fool we is!" burst out the agonizing Dutchman.

Finley consoled him as best he could; and his friend never suspected that the sad mistake was only the trick of a sober rogue played off on a drunken one.

THIS comes from Chester County, in the Keystone State:

It is a common system of cultivating land in some parts of the country for the owner to take from the tenant one-half the crop in kind for his rent—called, in our old-fashioned neighborhood, "farming on the shears." Captain A—— had a nice lot near the county town, and Davy R——, who passed among people who never tried to drive a bargain with him as a little "daft," proposed to the Captain to raise a crop of potatoes from it on the shares, the Captain furnishing the potatoes to be planted. The bargain was made; Davy put in the crop and worked it faithfully; but it was a light one, the season having been an unfavorable one that year in our region. About gathering time the Captain was busy with other things and forgot the potatoes, until one day passing his lot he discovered that they had all been removed. Still he waited on Davy for some word or message about the potatoes; but neither came. At last, concluding that it was time he had the matter adjusted, he sought Davy, and finding him, the following colloquy ensued:

CAPTAIN. "Well, Davy, I see you've gathered the potatoes."

DAVY. "Ya-as, I've got 'em in."

CAPTAIN. "When shall I send for my half?"

DAVY. "Wa'al, Cap'n—no 'casion to send—there was but half a crop."

The Captain saw the point, and uttered no complaints; but Davy never planted for the Captain again "on the shears."

THE following occurred in Iowa, and is truly recorded for the Drawer:

Josh Gibson is a powerful man, and, though he is civil, he is proud of his reputation as the "best man in the county." Bill Stiles is a notorious braggart, and is always telling of his having drubbed this or that individual, naming some one who is proverbially large, stout, brave, or active. One day Bill was at the hotel when the conversation turned on his favorite topic.

"You all know Josh Gibson," says Bill.

"Yes," was answered by three or four at once.

"Well, I met Josh last Saturday, and he refused to give half the road. I got out and took him off his wagon and mauled him till he begged for mercy."

One of the listeners was a particular friend of Josh, who, on his return, told Josh what Bill said. Josh, on hearing the news, pondered a minute, then said,

"Did he own to it, though? and will you go before Squire Broadhead and swear that he said so?"

"Yes."

"Well," says Josh, "you go to the Squire's and make the affidavit and get a warrant for Bill Stiles for assault and battery, and I'll show him how to abuse people on the highway."

The friend did as Josh told him, and began to think sure enough Bill had thrashed Josh. Bill was brought before the Squire and pleaded guilty, whereupon the Squire fined him ten dollars and costs, which he paid without hesitation, evidently flattering himself that he had bought fame at a bargain. As Bill left the Squire's office Josh accosted him with,

"Well, Bill, you have just paid ten dollars for thrashing me in my absence, and now I am going to see what they charge for flailing a lying puppy when he is present."

Bill took the hint and began to make excuses, but Josh cut him short by a smart rap below the eye, followed by two or three others that brought him to the pavement.

Bill Stiles staid thereabout two years afterward, and, although he went by the name of "Fighting Bill," he was never afterward known to brag of his exploits in that line of business; in fact Bill was never quarrelsome, and it is believed that the only fight he ever had was the one in which Josh Gibson struck the first blow.

THE sheriff of — County, California, writes to the Drawer, and tells this of his own knowledge:

A few years ago, when Judge Goodman administered the law to the honest miners of Gibsonville, it happened on a certain day when a case was being tried that one Myers, a Dutchman, appeared in Court and demanded an attachment "for to ketch" one Causper, a fellow-countryman, on the charge of assault "mit a putcher-knife" and threatening to kill the plaintiff. The Judge made out the necessary affidavit, issued a warrant, and sent an officer in pursuit of C., who in due time was arrested and taken into Court, just as the jury in the first case was about to retire to the jury-room for deliberation. Causper, who knew nothing of the other case, became alarmed, supposing from the appearance of things that his case was on trial, and addressed the Court:

"Mishter Goort, Mishter Schquire, I like to shtop mit dish dings. I wants un lawyer; I like to zettle mit Myer."

"Very well," said the Court, "you can get a lawyer as soon as this jury retires; there are two of them here."

"Mine Got!" said Causper, "dosh Myer have two?"

Myer stepped forward and declared that he had not yet employed one, upon hearing which Causper proposed that they each employ "un lawyer to zettle mit the Schquire," which was accordingly done. The two limbs of the law withdrew to a corner "to settle," and decided that each party pay his own attorney's fees, and that plaintiff withdraw the suit on payment of costs by defendant. To this the defendant agreed, and stated to the Court that he was "glat dish dings pe zettle," for, said he, "fen Myer not run so fasht I gills him sure; but I dose not so any more agin." Then turning to Myers he asked for the loan of $10, "to pay the Schquire," which sum was advanced by the plaintiff, and both left Court and directed their steps to a lager beer shop.

A LADY in Missouri writes to the Drawer and tells a good story that she knows to be true.

The following shows that Jeff Davis's negroes were taught to pronounce chairs "cheers." During the siege of Vicksburg some of the Sixth Missouri cavalry visited the former residence of "President Davis," and found the blacks all very much alarmed at the near approach of General Grant, whom they believed would immediately devour them. The frightened creatures asked numberless questions of the boys as to what they should do to appease him if he should visit them. The boys told them the General was not very frightful, and if they would assemble in the yard on his approach and give him three cheers they would be safe. They were very much amused on returning to find the darkeys had nicely swept a place under the trees in the yard and had set out three of the best chairs the mansion afforded.

MR. WHITE is the most diffident of young men. He belongs to our "Literary Circle," where the ladies and gentlemen entertain themselves with flashes of genius, sometimes at the expense of each other. But one of the brightest of our fair friends has rescued Mr. White from his retirement by having the following "original" read at our last meeting:

"The rainbow shows a varied hue,
Of yellow, crimson, green, and blue;
Oh could those hues thus arched unite,
We then might have a beau of White!"

DEAR DRAWER,—I have been a reader, but not a contributor. If the following waifs are worthy of a more enduring record, please make a note of them.

A few days since, while passing over the Brooklyn Fulton Ferry, two young men were admiring the beautiful iron ferry-house recently constructed. One said to the other:

"I do not see the policy of building an iron house upon wooden piles."

"Oh," said his companion, "there is no policy on it; you see it is fire-proof."

AGAIN, a young legal friend of mine, in company with "One" of the Herald, went up to the Harlem dépôt to see the arrival of the members of the Legislature, who had probably some of them been "seen" before. The Herald man, with seeming surprise, exclaimed, "What a lot of dead-heads!"—say about one hundred. "Yes," replied my legal friend, "as Harlem passes the Legislature, I think the Legislature ought to pass the Harlem."

AND yet again. Our same legal friend, on his way down town (having read, probably, Harper's Weekly, wherein it is proven that two and two do not always make 4, to wit, when they are twenty-two, with the ready genius of his ancestry, thought he could prove that two-fourths were greater than two-thirds. Meeting a young littérateur vending the Express, he asked for two copies of the fourth edition. The youth had not the fourth, but offered the third. "No," says our friend, "I am sure two fourths contain more than two thirds."

A CORRESPONDENT in Trenton, New Jersey, says:

Rev. Dr. H—, while making an address to the urchins at the Children's Home in this city, asked them, "How old was Methuselah?" No one was able to tell; so he informed them that Methuselah was nine hundred and sixty-nine years old; and then, to impress upon their minds the length of this period, asked them, "How old do you suppose I am?" Dead silence ensued for a space of a minute, when a bright-eyed little fellow sang out, "About one hundred and fifty years;" and the rest, agreeing with the first, all sang out, "About one hundred and fifty years." The Reverend Doctor enjoyed it greatly, and took another tack.

COLONEL TODD, of Egremont, Berkshire County, Massachusetts, in years gone by, run a cider-mill and distillery for making cider and cider brandy. Mr. Burton, a man of property and good standing who was not above doing his own work, and who lived in Hillsdale, Columbia County, New York, the adjoining town, was known by reputation, but not personally, to Colonel Todd. One day he brought a load of apples to the mill. Mr. Burton was dressed rather shabbily, as was his wont, and the Colonel mistook him for one of his hired men, and inquired,

"Whose apples are those?"

The reply was, "They belong to old Burton."

"What! old Burton of Hillsdale?"

"Yes."

"Well, you go home and tell old Burton you will not work for him any longer if he don't clothe you better."

LITTLE Nannie is a close student of the Bible, but not very clear as to some points.

"Ma," said she one Sunday evening, after having sat like a "good child" all day in the house, "have I honored you to-day?"

"I do not know, Nannie; why do you ask?" said her mother.

"Because," said little Nan, shaking her curls sadly, "the Bible says, 'Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long;' and this has been, oh, the longest day I ever saw!"

GERMANTOWN is close by the city of Philadelphia, whence we have this:

Our little "five-year-old," a few days since, made an observation which we consider quite "good enough for Harper's." She had been attending Sunday-school during the day, and seemed for a long time much exercised in mind. Finally, she went to her mother and asked, "Mamma, do you believe that Methuselah lived to be nine hundred and sixty-nine years old?" "Certainly, my dear," was the reply, "for the Bible tells us so." This did not appear to relieve her; for after a while she asked her brother, "Harry, do you believe Methuselah lived to be nine hundred and sixty-nine years old?" "Of course," said Harry, "for we read it in the Bible." Still she was not satisfied; so, on going to bed, she asked her nurse the same question, and on receiving the same reply, she burst out, "Well, I don't; I just believe it's some more of that Germantown gossip!"

AN Officer in the Army, now at New Orleans, writes to the Drawer, and says:

The incident from North Carolina, in the September number of the Magazine, reminds me of a like occurrence that happened at Cumberland Gap in the summer of '62. A great number of refugees would come into our lines from East Tennessee, and they were being rapidly organized into regiments, both of infantry and cavalry, for service in the Union army. One sultry afternoon in July an infantry captain belonging to one of the Tennessee regiments was drilling his company. He had his men in two ranks, and wished to change them from that into four ranks. Either not knowing, or forgetting the usual command, he called out, much to the amusement of the by-standers, "Company, from two strings to four strings—git!"

THIS comes from Salt Lake City, Utah Territory :

During a fight with the Indians at Provo, in the fall of 1859, a Dutchman named Jacob Hoffhines was captain of a squad of artillery who were industriously, though harmlessly, working an old smooth-bore 12-pounder. The gun was quickly got into position, and a few rounds of canister sent in among the willows, where the Red Skins were supposed to be lurking. Failing, however, to "draw the enemy's fire," Jacob, with great pomposity, gave the following very lucid command : "Sergeant, helevate that gun a little lower, so as to rake the vicke-ups."

A FRIEND in the army writes :

In looking over Harper for September, 1856, I saw the picture of "Uncle Alic" in Porte Crayon's "Dismal Swamp." Whether it is a good likeness or not the following will show. I was stationed at Suffolk, Virginia, in November, 1862, and heard Uncle Alic was still alive. Once, being field-officer of the day, I had in my grand rounds to visit the picket stationed on the railroad a short distance beyond Alic's hut. I stopped to see the old darkey. He came out on being called, in his shirt-sleeves and a very ragged pair of pantaloons. It was Sunday, and after a little conversation he commenced to expound the Scriptures (I suppose he thought we needed a sermon). With some difficulty I got him to stop long enough to ask him if he remembered the visit of Porte Crayon (now Colonel S——). He said : "Yes, massa, I do dat. One day I was sitting down dare reading my Bible, and Massa S—— [Porte Crayon], Massa Riddick, and some more ob dem come long dis way and sing out, 'Come up here, you old rascal!' I supposed dey must mean me, so I come out. Massa S—— he tell me to stand in front of him. I do so. 'Now sit down.' I sit down. 'Now stand dis way.' 'Now stand dat way.' I do so just as he tell me. He keep scribble scribble all de time; and bime-by he get off de log and give me de paper and tell me look at it, and Lor bress your soul, massa, I thought he had done gone stolen dis nigger!"

AN old reader of the Drawer sends the following fact :

a tour to Lake George and the high waters of the Hudson River. One day we were trolling among the islands of that beautiful lake, and with rather bad luck. We espied a little fellow in a red shirt and old straw-hat, dangling a line over the side of his boat. As we passed him, Mr. D——y, by way of salutation, said,

"Halloo, my boy! What are you doing?"

"Fishin'," came in answer.

"Well, of course. What do you catch?"

"Fish, you fool!—what do you s'pose?"

SEVERAL years ago, writes a clever friend, the good people of Schenectady elected old Squire D—— to the Legislature. During the winter the bill for the enlargement of the Erie Canal was discussed thoroughly, and the member from Schenectady was bitterly opposed to it, for he thought his taxes would be increased, and that was enough to make him oppose it. On the day the bill was up for a third reading Squire D—— jumped up and cried out,

"Mr. Speaker, there is no use of passing this bill, for it is utterly impossible to widen this canal, for Charlie Voorhies's store stands right on the bank!"

THE DRUMMER-BOY'S BURIAL.

ALL day long the storm of battle through the startled valley swept;
All night long the stars in heaven o'er the slain sad vigils kept.

Oh the ghastly, upturned faces gleaming whitely through the night!
Oh the heaps of mangled corpses in that dim sepulchral light!

One by one the pale stars faded, and at length the morning broke;
But not one of all the sleepers on that field of death awoke.

Slowly passed the golden hours of that long bright summer day,
And upon that field of carnage still the dead unburied lay:

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1864, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXIX.—No. 170.—K

Lay there stark and cold, but pleading with a dumb, unceasing prayer,
For a little dust to hide them from the staring sun and air.

But the foemen held possession of that hard-won battle plain,
In unholy wrath denying even burial to our slain.

Once again the night dropped round them—night so holy and so calm
That the moonbeams hushed the spirit, like the sound of prayer or psalm.

On a couch of trampled grasses, just apart from all the rest,
Lay a fair young boy, with small hands meekly folded on his breast.

Death had touched him very gently, and he lay as if in sleep;
Even his mother scarce had shuddered at that slumber calm and deep.

For a smile of wondrous sweetness lent a radiance to the face,
And the hand of cunning sculptor could have added naught of grace

To the marble limbs so perfect in their passionless repose, Robbed of all save matchless purity by hard, un pitying foes.

And the broken drum beside him all his life's short story told:
How he did his duty bravely till the death-tide o'er him rolled.

Midnight came with ebon garments and a diadem of stars,
While right upward in the zenith hung the fiery planet Mars.

Hark! a sound of stealthy footsteps and of voices whispering low—
Was it nothing but the young leaves, or the brooklet's murmuring flow?

Clinging closely to each other, striving never to look round
As they passed with silent shudder the pale corpses on the ground,

Came two little maidens—sisters—with a light and hasty tread,
And a look upon their faces, half of sorrow, half of dread.

And they did not pause nor falter till, with throbbing hearts, they stood
Where the Drummer-Boy was lying in that partial solitude.

They had brought some simple garments from their wardrobe's scanty store,
And two heavy iron shovels in their slender hands they bore.

Then they quickly knelt beside him, crushing back the pitying tears,
For they had no time for weeping, nor for any girlish fears.

And they robed the icy body, while no glow of maiden shame Changed the pallor of their foreheads to a flush of lambent flame.

For their saintly hearts yearned o'er it in that hour of sorest need,
And they felt that Death was holy and it sanctified the deed.

But they smiled and kissed each other when their new, strange task was o'er,
And the form that lay before them its unwonted garments wore.

Then with slow and weary labor a small grave they hollowed out,
And they lined it with the withered grass and leaves that lay about.

But the day was slowly breaking ere their holy work was done,
And in crimson pomp the morning again heralded the sun.

And then those little maidens—they were children of our foes—
Laid the body of our Drummer-Boy to undisturbed repose.

SCENE OF THE BATTLE ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.

X.—LAKE CHAMPLAIN AND THE NEW ENGLAND COAST.

WE are at midsummer, 1814. Since the opening of the spring campaign a great change has occurred in the aspect of foreign affairs. After his disaster at Leipsic, the sun of Napoleon's glory rapidly declined. His operations were confined chiefly to the soil of France by bayonets too numerous for him, and a moral force in public opinion outside of that domain still stronger than bayonets. Gradually the allied armies drew toward and around Paris, and hemmed the Emperor and his legions almost within the walls of his capital. There was no chance for escape; and on the 31st of March, 1814, the Emperor Alexander of Russia and the Duke of Wellington entered the city as conquerors amidst the acclamations of the people. The French Senate declared that "by arbitrary acts and violations of the Constitution" the Emperor had forfeited his right to the throne. In May he abdicated, and all that was left of his overshadowing political power was the sovereignty of the large Tuscan island of Elba between his native Corsica and the main. There for ten months he lived in retirement but not in inaction, for he was continually preparing for that bursting of the bars of his prison-house which afterward made Europe turn pale with terror.

The plan of the British campaign in 1814, on the northern frontier of New York, had features similar to that laid down for Burgoyne's guidance in 1777. The State was to be invaded; the possession of Lake Champlain secured; the country penetrated to Albany and below, while a land and naval force should attempt the capture of New York City; and by holding the Hudson River, separate, by military posts, the New England States from the remainder of the Union. As the downfall of Napoleon might release large bodies of British troops then on the Continent, and allow them to be sent over the Atlantic to assist in the subjugation of the Americans, that event gave joy to the enemy and their friends who composed the disloyal "Peace Party" of that day. The latter flaunted their shame at convivial parties and elsewhere quite as insanely as do their few imitators in our day.

The retirement of Napoleon to Elba did release from Continental service a large body of English troops, and several thousands of them were immediately dispatched to Canada to reinforce the little army there under the Governor-General, Sir George Prevost. They were sent from the Garonne, in Spain, and many of them were Wellington's veterans, hardy and skillful. They arrived at Quebec late in July and in August, and were rapidly pushed up to Montreal. In the mean time the force under Prevost had been very busy in preparations for the invasion of New York, and a flotilla of small war-vessels in the Richelieu or Sorel River had been greatly augmented in numbers and strength during the winter and spring.

On the 9th of May, General George Izard of South Carolina, who had superseded the incompetent Hampton in command of the right wing of the grand Army of the North, was informed that the enemy was in motion below. Captain Pring, the commander of the British flotilla, was moving up the Richelieu with a little squadron; and from behind Providence Island, in Lake Champlain, he proceeded on the 13th to attack an American flotilla under Lieutenant THOMAS MACDONOUGH, then at Vergennes, Vermont, at the head of the navigation of Otter Creek. Macdonough was early apprised of the movement, and sent a party to reinforce a detachment of light artillery in the manning and working of a small battery at the mouth of the creek. Governor Chittenden also ordered out some Vermont militia to repel the threatened invasion; and when, on the morning of the 14th, Pring's galleys and a bomb-sloop anchored off the mouth of the creek, they found ample preparations for their reception. A brisk fire was opened from the battery. It was answered from the water; and for more than an hour a cannonade was kept up, when the British vessels were driven off. They then entered the Boquet River for the purpose of destroying flour at the falls of that stream. On their return they were compelled to run the gauntlet of a shower of bullets from some militia who had hastily assembled. Many of the British were killed and wounded. Foiled and disheartened, Pring returned to the Richelieu a wiser man; for he had learned that even in Vermont, whose Governor was a zealous opponent of the war, the people were ready to fight the common enemy any where. A few days afterward Macdonough sailed out of Otter Creek with his flotilla, and anchored it in Cumberland or Plattsburg Bay, off Plattsburg.

Both parties—Americans and British—now prepared for a struggle for supremacy on Lake Champlain. Both parties were also reinforced during the remainder of May; and General Izard caused a battery of four 18-pounders to be planted on Cumberland Head instead of at Rouse's Point at the entrance to the Richelieu or Sorel, as directed by the Secretary of War, and urged by Major Totten, his chief engineer.

At the middle of June Izard disposed his troops for a movement into Canada. He sent Brigadier-General Thomas A. Smith, with a light brigade of about fourteen hundred men, to occupy the village of Champlain, five miles below the Canada line. Eight hundred men were at Chazy under Colonel Pearce; and about twelve hundred men occupied the cantonment at Plattsburg on the peninsula between the lake and the Saranac River, the works on Cumberland Head, and a position on Dead Creek, about two miles below Plattsburg. Macdonough with his flotilla was below Cumberland Head watching the little British squadron which lay at the Isle aux Tetes. The British had thirty-six hundred troops at La Colle; a Swiss regiment, a thousand strong, at L'Acadia; and two brigades of artillery and three hundred cavalry were at Chambly—making a total of five thousand five hundred and fifty men. There was also a reserve of two thousand regulars at Montreal.

A feverishness was continually manifested among the soldiery and the people along the Canada border. The armed belligerents were eager for a trial of prowess. Finally, on the 22d of June, Lieutenant-Colonel Forsyth, the commander of a corps of riflemen, leading seventy sharp-shooters, crossed the frontier line, and at the little hamlet of Odelltown he was attacked by two hundred of the enemy's light troops. Forsyth beat them off, and retired in good order to Champlain, with the loss of one man killed and five wounded. A few days afterward he was again sent in that direction for the purpose of drawing the enemy across the lines. He formed an ambuscade, and then sent a few men forward as a decoy. They met the enemy, fell back, and were eagerly followed by Captain Mahew and one hundred and fifty Canadians and Indians. When the pursuers were near the ambush Forsyth stepped upon a log to watch the movement, and was shot by one of the savages. His followers immediately arose, poured a deadly fire upon the foe, and drove him across the line with such slaughter that he left seventeen dead on the field. Incensed because of the employment of Indians by the British, the riflemen resolved to avenge the death of their beloved leader. A few days afterward some of them crossed the line, and shot Mathews, the leader of the savages. He was taken to the house of Judge Moore, in Champlain, which was used by the officers of both nations as head-quarters, where he died.

Skirmishing along the borders was a frequent occurrence, but no movement of importance took place until the close of July, when General Macomb's brigade embarked in boats from Cumberland Head for Chazy Landing, at the mouth of the Chazy Creek. On the same day Bissell's brigade started for Chazy village, by land. A competent corps of effective men and invalids were left to complete the works on Cumberland Head; and a fatigue party, four hundred strong, were left in command of Colonel Fenwick to complete three redoubts on the peninsula between the lake and the Saranac River, at Plattsburg. There were now four thousand five hundred effective American troops at Champlain, within five miles of the Canada border. But these were few compared to the number of the enemy in the field and reserved, which was constantly augmenting. During the months of July and August, not less than fifteen thousand armed men, chiefly veterans from Wellington's armies, arrived at Montreal. Only one brigade was sent westward, and the remainder were kept in reserve for the contemplated invasion of New York in such overwhelming numbers as to overbear all opposition. These newly-arrived troops were encamped in the level country between La Prairie on the St. Lawrence and Chambly on the Sorel.

Very soon after the advance of the Americans to Chazy and Champlain, Sir George Prevost arrived at Isle aux Noix, where he had concentrated a considerable body of veterans, and took chief command in person; and strong detachments of seamen were sent from Quebec to strengthen the naval power at the same place. It was evident that a speedy invasion of Northern New York was in contemplation; and yet, with full information on the subject, the United States Government, as if fearful of a conquest of Canada when a spirited general was in command near assailable points, ordered Izard, at that critical moment, to march a larger part of his force westward to co-operate with the Army of Niagara. It was an open invitation to invasion; and the order astonished the army and the people. The disappointed Izard could scarcely restrain his indignation within the bounds of a soldier's privilege, and he wrote to the Secretary of War, saying, "I will make the movement you direct, if possible; but I shall do it with the apprehension of risking the force under my command, and with the certainty that every thing in this vicinity but the lately erected works at Plattsburg and Cumberland Head will, in less than three days after my departure, be in possession of the enemy." He continued to protest against the movement, but, like a true soldier, he obeyed orders. Although his means for transportation were limited, he soon set four thousand men in motion by the way of Lake George, Schenectady, and the Mohawk Valley, and arrived with them at Sackett's Harbor at the middle of September. He left all his sick and convalescents, and about twelve hundred effective men, to garrison the unfinished works at Plattsburg and on Cumberland Head, and made a requisition on Major-General Mooers of the militia of that district for the assembling of infantry and light dragoons at Chazy. Brigadier-General Alexander Macomb, of the regular army, was left in chief command, with his head-quarters at Plattsburg.

Macomb was vigilant and active. At the close of August he found himself in command of about three thousand four hundred troops; but they were in a weak condition, there being but one organized battalion among them. Full fourteen hundred of them were invalids or non-combatants. The garrisons at different points were composed chiefly of convalescents and new recruits; the condition of the ordnance and stores was chaotic; and the defensive works were all unfinished. Macomb concentrated all his troops at Plattsburg, and worked vigorously in preparations for defense.

On the day when Izard left his camp at Champlain [August 29], General Brisbane crossed the frontier with a considerable body of troops, and occupied that village; and on the 3d of September full fourteen thousand British soldiers were assembled in that vicinity under the general command of Prevost, assisted by General De Rottenburgh as his second. Prevost issued a proclamation, avowing his intention to take possession of the country, and inviting the inhabitants to cast off their allegiance to their Government, and furnish him with supplies. On the following day they moved forward to Chazy, and on the 5th they encamped at Sampson's, about eight miles north of Plattsburg. Captain Pring, with the British squadron, moved up the Sorel at the same time, anchored off Isle la Motte, and on the west side of that island erected a battery of three long 18-pounders to cover the landing of supplies for Prevost's army. Macomb, at the same time, was straining every muscle at his command for the completion of his defensive works. His soldiers labored day and night; and by great exertion three redoubts, named respectively Fort Moreau, Brown, and Scott, and two block-houses, were completed on the peninsula. Fort Brown was on the high bank of the Saranac, and commanded the village; Fort Moreau, the principal work, was half-way between the river and the lake; and Fort Scott was near the bank of the lake. The remains of these forts, on a curved line across the neck of the peninsula, are still very prominent. Two bridges spanned the Saranac; one at the village, known as the Lower Bridge, and the other about a mile above, on the road to Salmon River. Between the Lower Bridge and some distance above Fort Brown, the right bank of the Saranac is steep, and from fifty to sixty feet in height; and about sixty rods above the Lower Bridge it is cleft by a deep ravine that extends from the river almost to the lake. Near this ravine a block-house was erected; and on the point overlooking the present steamboat-landing was another. At the mouth of the river, near the Lower Bridge, stood (and still stands) a heavy stone mill which served an excellent defensive purpose.

To create a spirit of emulation, Macomb divided his army into detachments, and held each responsible for its particular work; declaring that each detachment was the garrison of its own fort or block-house, bound to finish it, and to defend it to the last extremity. Fort Moreau was placed in command of Colonel Melancthon Smith. Lieutenant-Colonel Storrs was intrusted with the command of Fort Brown; and Major Vinson was made the leader at Fort Scott. Captain Smith of the Rifles, with a part of his company and some convalescents, occupied the block-house near the ravine; and Lieutenant Fowler, with a detachment of artillery, held the one on the Point. The light artillery, under Captain Leonard, were directed to annoy the enemy whenever and wherever an opportunity should offer. The main body of Macomb's army lay within the triangular portion of the peninsula formed by the river, the ravine, and the lake.

When the British advanced to Chazy Macomb did not simply await an attack, but sent out troops to confront them. One party was stationed at Dead Creek Bridge, on the lake road, to watch and annoy the enemy, and obstruct his march by felling trees. General Mooers, with seven hundred militia, was sent four miles northward on the Beekmantown or interior road, on the evening of the 4th, on an errand similar to that intrusted to the occupants of Dead Creek Bridge. On the morning of the 5th he went still further northward, and that night bivouacked near the Stone Church in Beekmantown. Early the next morning Major John E. Wool, ever ready for a daring enterprise, volunteered to lead some regulars to the support of the militia and oppose the advance of the foe, which, it was ascertained, would commence at early dawn. He moved from Plattsburg at about the time when the British broke camp at Sampson's, and at the head of two hundred and fifty regulars and about thirty volunteers he hastened toward the front with orders to set the militia a good example. This was done. He reached Beekmantown before the enemy appeared, and took position near the house of Ira Howe. There the first collision took place, the initial skirmish of the battle of Plattsburg. The enemy in full force was there met and checked by Wool's little band; while the militia, alarmed by the overwhelming numbers of the British and the rattle of musketry, broke and fled toward Plattsburg. Wool fell slowly back toward Culver's Hill, disputing the invaders' march inch by inch, and there made a stand. Some of the militia had been rallied. Steadily the British host, filling the entire road, moved sullenly up the northern slope of Culver's Hill. Their advance was driven back upon the main body by a furious attack by Wool; and their leader, Lieutenant-Colonel Willington of the Third Regiment of Buffs, with an Ensign of the same regiment, was killed. Other officers were severely wounded. The fight was sharp but short. Wool could not long withstand the heavy pressure of the great column of the foe. He also perceived a flank movement on their part, and he fell back to Halsey's Corners, within a mile and a half of Plattsburg. There he was joined, at eight o'clock, by Captain Leonard with two pieces of artillery. These were immediately placed in battery at an angle in the road, and worked by Wool's infantry and some militia. As the enemy came on in heavy mass Leonard opened fire, and his balls cut fearful lanes through their ranks. Three times that battery hurled its deadly missiles through their lines, yet it did not check their march. The bugles sounded a charge. The men cast away their knapsacks and rushed forward at double-quick. Leonard was compelled to fly, carrying his guns with him; and he and Wool and Mooer's militia made a safe retreat across the Saranac. At the same time the imperiled detachment at Dead Creek Bridge made its way along the shores of Cumberland Bay, and crossed the Lower Bridge before the British advance reached the village. In the affair at Halsey's Corners several British officers were killed or wounded. Among them was Lieutenant Kingsbury, of the Buffs, who received a mortal hurt, and was taken to the residence of the now venerable Isaac C. Platt, where he died. The British made that house a sort of hospital while they remained.

When all had safely crossed the Lower Bridge its planks were torn up and formed into a breast-work near the stone mill, close by which, on a rise of ground, Leonard planted his field-pieces to dispute the passage of the Saranac by the foe. Mooers and his militia had fled across the Upper Bridge and destroyed that in the same way.

When the British reached Plattsburg and found themselves checked by the destruction of the bridges, they prepared to encamp and make ample preparations to force a passage across the fords. They took position in some store-houses near the river, but were soon driven out by fire, communicated to the buildings by hot shot hurled upon them by Captain Brooks. Their light troops endeavored to ford the stream, but were always repulsed. A company of young men, known as Aiken's Volunteers, of Plattsburg, stationed in the stone mill, did excellent service in that citadel near the broken bridge. They had been out on the Beekmantown road in the morning, and had smelt powder sufficiently to give them a taste for adventure.

While the British were endeavoring to pass the Saranac at the village, a strong party of them had pursued Mooers, and were endeavoring to cross the stream near the Upper Bridge. Mooers and his men made a gallant resistance, and kept them at bay. Finding the passage every where too difficult, Prevost ordered his army to encamp upon an elevated ridge about a mile back from the river, and upon the high ground north of the village. He made his headquarters at Allen's farm-house on the ridge, and issued orders for vigorous preparations for attack. Notwithstanding he was at the head of an overwhelming force the events of that day, the 6th of September, convinced the Baronet that the task before him was not a light one. He had lost in killed and wounded, since the dawn, over two hundred men, while the loss of the Americans was only forty-five.

Prevost employed the time between the 7th and the 11th in bringing up his battery trains and supplies, and in erecting several works that might command the river, the bay, and the American forts and block-houses on the Peninsula. The Americans in the mean time were not idle. They worked without ceasing in strengthening their defenses. They removed their sick and wounded to Crab Island, two miles distant, in the lake, and there erected a two-gun battery (6-pounders) and manned it with convalescents.

While these preparations were under way on land the belligerents were making ready for a combat on the water. A greater portion of the British flotilla under Captain Pring had advanced, as we have observed, to Isle la Motte, where they were joined by the remainder of the squadron and Captain George Downie, of the Royal Navy, who assumed chief command. Macdonough at the same time had the American squadron at anchor in Cumberland or Plattsburg Bay, and calmly awaited the approach of the enemy.

For almost five days the seamen waited for a general movement of the landmen, which it was at first agreed should be a signal, on the part of the British, for the weighing of anchors and preparing ships for action. During that time no military operations of great importance occurred. There were some minor movements, however, which are worthy of notice. One of these, on the part of the Americans, was a bold one. On the night of the 9th there was tempestuous weather — lightning, rain, wind, and intense darkness. The British had been seen at sunset busily engaged in the erection of a rocket battery opposite Fort Brown. Captain M^cGlassin, who was described to me by one who knew him as a "little beardless Scotchman," anxious to distinguish himself, asked General Macomb to allow him to lead fifty men that night to an attack on the builders. Macomb complied, and M'Glassin, who had arisen from a sick bed, sallied out in the gloom with his picked men, from whose gun-locks he had removed the flints, crossed the Saranac, about half-way between Fort Brown and the Upper Bridge, and, unobserved, reached the foot of the hill on which the new battery was rising. There he divided his men into two parties. One went to the rear of the battery by a circuitous route, and, when all was ready, M'Glassin shouted, "Charge! men, charge! upon the front and rear!" His men rushed forward with frightful yells. The British, believing overwhelming numbers were upon them, fled precipitately to their main body. The work was taken, the guns were spiked, and M'Glassin returned without the loss of a single man. Over three hundred veteran troops had been surprised and frightened into a flight by only fifty men; and Sir George Prevost was much mortified.

The morning of the 11th dawned brightly, and at an early hour in the forenoon the British land and naval forces were in motion for a combined attack on the American. Prevost had arranged the movement with Downie. It was agreed that when the British squadron should be seen approaching Cumberland Head the advance of the army under Major-General Robinson should press forward, force the fords of the Saranac, climb the steep banks, and with ladders escalate the American works on the peninsula, while the several batteries around Plattsburg village should open a brisk fire.

Between seven and eight o'clock the squadron was seen advancing, and at eight it rounded Cumberland Head. It consisted of the Confiance, 38 (Downie's flag-ship), the brig Linnet, 16, Captain Pring; the sloops Chub, 11, Lieutenant M'Ghee, and Finch, 11, Lieutenant Hicks. The last two were the Eagle and Growler, captured from the Americans the year before. There were also twelve gun-boats manned by about forty-five men each. Eight of them carried two guns, and four of them one gun each.

At that moment Macdonough's squadron lay in Plattsburg Bay on a line north from Crab Island, and almost parallel with the shore, at an average distance of two miles from it. On the extreme left, and at the head of the line, were two galleys at anchor, and next to them lay the brig Eagle, 26, Captain Henly, just within the point of Cumberland Head. Next south of her was the Saratoga, 26, Macdonough's flag-ship; and the next in line was the schooner Ticonderoga, 17, Lieutenant Cassin. Next southward in the line lay the Preble, Lieutenant Charles Budd, armed with seven guns. She lay so near the shoal extending from Crab Island that it was impossible for the enemy to turn that end of the line. In the rear of these larger vessels were ten gun-boats or galleys, six of them mounting one long 24-pounder, and one 18-pound Columbiad each; and the other four carrying each a 12-pounder. These were so arranged as to fill up the openings between the large vessels in the line, making the order of battle in two lines about forty rods apart. The larger vessels were at anchor, while the gun-boats were kept in position by the use of oars. The force of the American squadron was eighty-six guns and eight hundred and eighty-two men; and that of the British ninety-five guns, and a little more than one thousand men.

The American line of battle had been formed with great skill by the young commander, reference being had to the conformation of the land. It extended completely across the entrance to Plattsburg Bay from Crab Island to Cumberland Head. The enemy, rounding the Head, was compelled to approach the American squadron with his bows on, giving the latter a great advantage at the beginning. In this approach the little Finch led the van and made directly for the right of the American line in the direction of the Preble. The Chub at the same time moved toward the American left near Cumberland Head, keeping well to the windward of the Eagle, to support the Linnet in a direct attack on that vessel; while the gun-boats coming up in order, their commanders received from Commodore Downie final instructions for action. He then attempted to lay the Confiance athwart the Saratoga, while the Finch and the gun-boats should attack the Ticonderoga and Preble. He was baffled by shifting winds, and was compelled to anchor his vessel within two cable's-length of his antagonist.

Macdonough in the mean time had thoroughly prepared to receive the enemy. When his vessels were cleared for action, springs placed in the cables, and all was in readiness, he knelt upon the deck of the Saratoga near one of its heaviest guns, with his officers and men around him, and in few words asked Almighty God for aid, and committed the issue into his hands. He arose with assured courage; and as the enemy came bearing down upon him his vessels sprang their broadsides to bear, and the Eagle opened the action by firing the first shot. This was followed by the fire of a long 24-pounder from the Saratoga, which had been sighted by Macdonough. It entered the hawse-hole of the Confiance and went crashing through every obstacle the entire length of her deck, killing several men on its way, and demolishing the wheel. The Linnet, as she was passing to attack the Eagle, gave the Saratoga a broadside, but without serious effect. One of the shots demolished a hen-coop, in which a game-cock was confined. The released and startled fowl flew upon a gun-slide, and clapping his wings crowed lustily and defiantly. The sailors cheered, and regarding it as a good omen, felt their courage strengthened.

The Confiance made no reply to the Saratoga's 24-pounder until she had secured a desirable position, when she suddenly became a sheet of flame. Her entire larboard broadside guns, consisting of sixteen 24-pounders, double-shot, leveled point-blank range, coolly sighted and favored by still water, were discharged at one time into the Saratoga. The effect was terrible. She shivered from round-top to keel as with an ague; and forty of her people—almost one-fifth of her complement—were disabled. But the stunning blow was felt only for a moment. Almost immediately Macdonough renewed the conflict, and the fire of the Saratoga was steady and gallantly conducted. Her first officer, Lieutenant Gamble, was killed; and fifteen minutes afterward Commodore Downie was slain.

The battle had now become general, steady, and active between the larger vessels. The Chub, while manœuvring near the head of the American line, received a broadside from the gallant Henly of the Eagle, which so crippled her that she drifted helplessly; and after receiving a shot from the Saratoga struck her colors. She was towed to the rear and anchored at the mouth of the Saranac. An hour later the Finch was driven from her position by the Ticonderoga, commanded by the intrepid Cassin. She was badly injured; and drifting upon the Crab Island shoals grounded there, when the invalid corps on the island brought their two 6-pounders to bear upon her and compelled her to surrender.

The British gun-boats now entered vigorously into the fight and soon compelled Budd of the Preble to cut his cable and flee to a safer place nearer the shore, where his vessel anchored, and was of no further service in the fight. This success emboldened the enemy, and the galleys, now fourteen in number, made a bold and combined attack upon the Ticonderoga. Cassin walked the taffrail in a storm of grape and cannon-shot, watching the movements of the assailants and directing effective discharges of musketry, while the now venerable Admiral Paulding, then a midshipman, touched off the cannon with sparks from the snappings of his pistol, for the matches had become useless. The Ticonderoga maintained her position nobly, and covered the extremity of the line to the last, winning from the Commodore and all beholders unqualified praise for her commander and people.

While the fortunes of the day were thus fluctuating at the lower end of the line, the Americans were suffering at the other extremity. The Eagle lost the springs of her cable and became exposed to the combined fire of the Linnet and Confiance. Henly at once dropped her between and a little astern of the Saratoga and Ticonderoga, and, anchoring her there, opened his larboard guns afresh on the Confiance and the British galleys. But the Saratoga was left exposed to the whole fire of the Linnet, which sprung her broadsides in such manner as to rake the bows of her antagonist.

The two flag-ships soon became disabled. The Saratoga had not a single serviceable starboard gun left, and was silent. The Confiance was not much better off. Now was the moment for Macdonough to exhibit his splendid seamanship. He did so quickly and effectively. With the aid of Brum, his skillful sailing-master, he wound the ship by means of a stream-anchor and hawsers so that he brought the guns of his larboard-quarter to bear on the Confiance, which had vainly endeavored to imitate the movement. Under the direction of acting Lieutenant La Vallette (now Admiral La Vallette) these poured such a destructive fire on the British flag-ship that she soon surrendered. The Saratoga's fire was then directed upon the Linnet, and in the course of fifteen minutes she, too, struck her colors. The British galleys, in the mean time, had been driven off by the Ticonderoga half a mile in the rear of their statelier associates and lay scattered, affording them feeble aid. Seeing the colors of the larger vessels go down, they too dropped their ensigns; and at little past noon, not one of the sixteen national flags which were so proudly floating over British decks in the morning might be seen. Because the Americans could not immediately pursue, the galleys bent their sweeps, fled down the Sorel, and escaped. Thus ended the Battle of Lake Champlain, in the complete discomfiture of the invaders.

For two hours and twenty minutes this severe naval battle raged, while the thunders of cannon, the hiss of rockets, the scream of bombs, and the rattle of musketry were heard on the shore. It was a sublime sight, and was beheld by hundreds of spectators on the head-lands of the Vermont shore, who greeted the victory with shouts. It was a battle characterized by a vigor and destructiveness not excelled by any during the war—indeed seldom equaled any where or at any time. The victory for the Americans was complete and substantial; and from the Saratoga, half an hour after the Linnet struck and the galleys fled, Macdonough sent the following dispatch ashore in a gig, to be forwarded to the Secretary of the Navy:

"SIR,—The Almighty has been pleased to grant us a signal victory on Lake Champlain, in the capture of one frigate, one brig, and two sloops of war, of the enemy."

Two days afterward he sent Commander Cassin to Washington with the flags of the captured squadron, and a more detailed yet brief account of the victory. The entire loss of the Americans was one hundred and ten, of whom fifty-two were killed. The total British loss was more than two hundred.

Macdonough received the officers of the captured vessels with great courtesy of manner and speech. When they offered him their swords, he instantly replied, "Gentlemen, your gallant conduct makes you worthy to wear your weapons. Return them to their scabbards." They did so; and they all walked the deck of the victorious Saratoga—American and English officers—more in the character of friends than of enemies. Lieutenant La Vallette, who had taken formal possession of the Confiance, was directed to prepare the prisoners for Crab Island; and before sunset all was quiet on the lake. The British vessels were afterward taken to Whitehall, at the head of the lake, and scuttled. The Saratoga shared the same fate. I saw her remains there as late as the summer of 1850.

We have observed that while the roar of the battle-storm was heard on the water its thunders were bellowing over the land. According to arrangement, when Prevost saw, over Cumberland Head, the pennants of the British squadron moving to the attack he set a portion of the British land-forces in motion, under General Robinson, to force their way across the Saranac, at the site of the two bridges and a ford at Pike's cantonment, three miles from the mouth of the stream, and carry the American works by storm. When the first gun was fired on the lake the British land batteries were opened; and under cover of the shot and shell which they hurled toward the American works the three assailing columns moved. At the Lower Bridge they were repulsed by the guards, block-houses, and artillery of the forts served by Captains Brooks, Richards, and Smith, and Lieutenants Mountfort, Smyth, and Cromwell. At the Upper Bridge the riflemen and pickets under Captain Grovesnor, and Lieutenants Hamilton and Riley, aided by some militia, successfully disputed the passage. At the Upper Ford the enemy were a little more successful. There the Clinton and Essex militia, under Major-General Mooers, and Brigadier-General Wright, were stationed. After being driven back several times, with considerable loss, some companies of the British pushed across the stream, there shallow and rapid, firing briskly by platoons as they advanced, but doing very little harm. The militia fell back, and were soon joined by a large detachment of Vermont Volunteers and a party of artillery with a field-piece under Lieutenant Sumter.

The flying companies were now rallied and drawn up in battle-array to meet the pursuing foe, when Mr. Walworth (late Chancellor of the State of New York), Mooer's Adjutant-General, came dashing up, his horse flecked with foam, and announced the joyful intelligence that the British fleet had just surrendered! These glad tidings were greeted with three hearty cheers. At the same moment they observed their pursuers with their backs turned, making their way in haste toward the ford of the Saranac. Sir George Prevost, who always played the coward when near danger, according to British historians, had become terribly alarmed, and recalled these vigorous and only successful troops. He had experienced the "extreme mortification," he said, "to hear the shout of victory from the American works" when the fleet surrendered on the lake. They had been loud and mighty cheers, iterated and reiterated by corps after corps, as the eye and ear caught knowledge of the victory; and Sir George wisely saw, as he said, that "further prosecution of the service was become impracticable." He had assumed the position of co-operator with the fleet rather than principal, leaving to Downie the brunt of the service, but ready to receive and wear the garlands of honor which might be won. Seeing the British flags humbled on all the ships, and the gun-boats flying, he resolved to fall back toward the Canada border, and halt until he should ascertain the use the Americans intended to make of their naval ascendancy just acquired on Lake Champlain. It was a wise determination. Notwithstanding his number was overwhelming Prevost was really in peril. He might have crushed Macomb and captured the post, but it would have been at the expense of many lives without obtaining any permanent advantage. The British had lost the lake absolutely, and without any fair promises of its recovery; and the militia of all that region were thoroughly aroused, and were rapidly assembling. At the close of that memorable day, no less than twenty-five hundred Green Mountain Boys (Vermonters) were on the Saranac under General Strong. The militia of Washington and Warren counties were also streaming toward Plattsburg at the call of General Mooers; and reinforcements of regulars were on their way. Prevost's army would very soon have been equaled in numerical strength, and perhaps surrounded and its supplies from Canada cut off. He perceived these dangers when the navy was lost; and the moment the forces under General Robinson returned to camp he made preparations to abandon the siege, notwithstanding General Brisbane offered to cross the Saranac in force and carry the American works by storm in twenty minutes.

The fire from the British batteries was kept up until sunset, and Fort Brown, then under the immediate command of the gallant Mountfort, sent back responses with so much spirit and accuracy, that the British believed and reported that French artillerymen were employed by the Americans. When night fell Prevost sent all his artillery and baggage for which he could find transportation Canada-ward; and at two o'clock in the morning of the 12th the entire army fled with a precipitation that indicated a panic. It was caused by a report, purposely communicated to Prevost, that Governor Chittenden, of Vermont, was approaching with ten thousand men. The sick and wounded, and a vast amount of munitions of war were left behind; and they had reached Chazy, eight or ten miles distant, before the Americans were apprised of the flight. Light troops, volunteers, and militia started in pursuit, but heavy rains compelled them to relinquish the chase. Prevost halted at Champlain, and on the 24th left the territory of the United States forever, and retired to Montreal with the main army. He had lost in killed, wounded, missing, and deserters not much less than two thousand men, according to careful estimates made at the time. The American loss, on land, was less than one hundred and fifty.

The victory at Plattsburg on the 11th of September, 1814, produced a thrill of intense joy throughout the country; and spontaneous honors were every where awarded to the principal actors in the great drama. Bonfires and illuminations blazed in almost every city and village in honor of the event, and substantial testimonials of respect were given to the several commanders. The Congress of the United States voted them the thanks of the nation, and ordered a gold medal to be given to Macomb and Macdonough, Henly and Cassin.

A few days after the battle the citizens of Plattsburg gave Macdonough a public dinner at the United States Hotel; and honorable burial was awarded to Commodore Downie and other British officers of the army and navy who fell there. In a beautiful cemetery, in the suburbs of Plattsburg, the remains of these men were interred, and an engraved slab of marble marks each grave. A pine-tree was planted on each side of Downie's grave, and these grew to be noble specimens of their species, when one decayed and disappeared. The victory was the subject for many a ballad, but none was so popular as that written by Michael Hawkins (afterward a grocer in Catharine Street, New York) for the proprietor of the Albany Theatre, and first sung there before Governor Tompkins and a great crowd, in the character of a negro sailor, commencing:

"Back side Albany stan' Lake Champlain,
Little pond, half full o' water;
Plat-te-burg dar, too, close 'pon de main!
Town small—he grow bigger, do', herearter.

GRAVES OF THE SLAIN, PLATTSBURG.

On Lake Champlain Uncle Sam sit he boat,
An' Massa Macdonough sail 'em;
While General Macomb, make Flat-te-burg he home,
Wid de army, whose courage nebber fail 'em."

The freedom of the city of New York was given to Macomb in a gold box, and Vermont gave him a fine farm on Cumberland Head. He afterward became the General-in-chief of the armies of the United States, on the death of General Brown; and over his grave, in the Congressional burial-ground at Washington, rests a beautiful white marble monument to his memory.

With the repulse of the British at Plattsburg ended the most important military operations on the northern frontier of New York. Peace came a few months later. That repulse was almost simultaneous with the defeat of the British at Fort Erie, their expulsion from Baltimore, and their closing military operations of importance on the New England coast.

New England experienced very little actual war within its borders; yet it felt its pressure heavy in the paralysis of its peculiar industries, the continual drain upon its wealth of men and money, and the wasting excitements caused by constantly impending menaces and a sense of insecurity. From the spring of 1813 until the close of the war British squadrons were hovering along its coasts, and, in connection with the embargo acts, were double-barring its seaports against commerce, and threatening the destruction of its maritime cities and villages.

The year 1814 was a specially trying one for New England. Hitherto the more northerly coasts of the United States had been very little molested by the enemy, for Commodore Hardy's blockade of New London was so mild that it amounted to little more than simple inconvenience. Now a system of petty and distressing invasions commenced, and were followed by more serious operations.

The invasions began as early as April, 1814, when a party of British seamen and marines, from the blockading squadron off New London, entered the Connecticut River, and at Pautepaug Point, in the vicinity of Saybrook, seven miles from the Sound, spiked some cannon there, and destroyed property valued at $160,000. There was also, in the Sound, at that time, a bold privateer called the Liverpool Packet, which had swept or frightened nearly all the coast trade from that region. Commodore Lewis, with a flotilla of gun-boats, made after her, and when he arrived at Saybrook he found no less than fifty vessels there afraid to go out of the harbor because of the corsair. Lewis drove her off eastward, convoyed the coasting-vessels safely to the Thames, and boldly attacked the British blockading squadron; but the appearance of heavier ships compelled him to withdraw from the contest.

Early in June the enemy commenced depredations on the coast of Massachusetts. The chief vessels engaged in the business were the Superb and Nimrod, stationed a long time in Buzzard's Bay. Wareham, Scituate, and other places, suffered from depredations committed by armed men from these vessels.

On the 16th of June, the Bulwark, 74, Captain Milne, anchored off the mouth of the Saco River, and one hundred and fifty armed men went ashore in boats, and destroyed a very large amount of property on the Neck, belonging to Captain Thomas Cutts. At about the same time the Nimrod and La Hogue menaced New Bedford and Fairhaven; and formidable squadrons were kept off New York, New London, and Boston.

Finally more formidable demonstrations were made. Eastport and Passamaquoddy Bay, and Castine and Penobscot Bay, fell into the permanent possession of the British; and Stonington became the theatre of a most distressing bombardment. All along the eastern coast, from the Connecticut to the St. Croix, the enemy carried on this kind of warfare, in most cases marauding on private property in a manner which degraded the actors in the eyes of all honorable men to the level of mere freebooters. The more respectable portion of British writers condemned the policy, for it was damaging to the British interest. Hitherto lukewarm New England now became intensely heated with indignation against the common enemy, and burned with a war-fever, which made the Peace Party in that region exceedingly circumspect.

MACOMB'S MONUMENT.

FORT PICKERING, NEAR SALEM.

A more serious invasion of the New England coast occurred early in July. Sir Thomas M. Hardy sailed secretly from Halifax on the 5th with a considerable force for land and sea service. His squadron consisted of the Ramillies, 74, the sloop Martin, brig Borer, the Breavn, the bomb-ship Terror, and several transports with troops under Colonel Thomas Pilkington. The squadron entered Passamaquoddy Bay on the 11th, and anchored off Fort Sullivan at Eastport, commanded by Major Perley Putnam. A peremptory demand for the surrender of the post was at first refused, but the alarmed inhabitants, who were unwilling to resist, were so importunate for submission, that the fort was given up on condition that private property should be protected. A large force then landed, with fifty or sixty pieces of cannon, and took formal possession of the fort, town, and all the islands in Passamaquoddy Bay. A proclamation was issued declaring that British possession would be permanent, for that domain, of right, belonged to the Crown under the provisions of the treaty of 1783. The male inhabitants were required to take an oath of allegiance to his Majesty or leave within a week. The custom-house was opened by British officials, and business was resumed. The invaders took possession of all the public property, but failed to frighten the collector of the port into submission to their commands to sign, and thus perfect treasury notes to the amount of $9000.

Having established British authority at Eastport, and left eight hundred troops to maintain it, Hardy sailed westward with his squadron, spreading alarm along the coast. Preparations for his reception were made every where. Vigilant eyes were watching, and strong arms were waiting for the appearance of the foe at Portland. The energetic General Montgomery, of New Hampshire, was soon, with a tithe of his brigade, at Portsmouth. Fort Pickering, near Salem, and Fort Sewall, at Marblehead, were strengthened and garrisoned. Fort Warren and Fort Independence, on Castle Island, in Boston harbor, were put in readiness for action, and well-garrisoned by Massachusetts militia; and a heavy fort was speedily commenced on Noddle's Island (now East Boston), on Camp Hill, on the crown of present Webster Street. Opponents of the war, like Harrison Gray Otis, were active in forwarding the work; and when it was completed it was named Fort Strong, in honor of the Peace Party governor. The war was at their doors, and it would have been madness to play non-combatant at that perilous hour. But Boston was spared the notoriety of a battle.

Hardy did not stop until he rejoined the blockading squadron off New London. He was not long inactive. He was charged with a part of the duty enjoined by the terrible order of Admiral Cochrane, to destroy the coast towns and ravage the country; and on the 9th of August he appeared off the borough of Stonington, in Connecticut, for that purpose, with the Ramillies, the Pactolus, 44, bomb-ship Terror, brig Dispatch, and barges and launches. He anchored within two miles of the narrow peninsula on which Stonington lies at four o'clock in the afternoon, and at half past five sent a flag ashore with the following message:

"Not wishing to destroy the unoffending inhabitants residing in the town of Stonington, one hour is granted them from the receipt of this to remove out of the town."

The authorities inquired whether any arrangements might be made to spare the town, and the answer was, "I am instructed to destroy and can not spare." The dismayed inhabitants who were able to leave immediately fled, and removed as many valuable articles as possible. The few militia there, under Lieutenant Hough, were stationed on the Point to watch the movements of the enemy; and all waited anxiously for the threatened assault. It came soon. Toward sunset the Terror was warped up near the town, accompanied by barges and launches, with carronades. At eight o'clock in the evening she commenced throwing shells from two heavy mortars, and the smaller vessels hurled Congreve rockets. This assault, grand and terrible, continued until midnight without serious injury to the town.

In the mean time an express had been sent to General Cushing at New London, the United States commander of the District, who regarded this demonstration as a feint to cover an attack on New London, and an attempt to seize Decatur's vessels in the Thames. In connection with Brigadier-General Williams, commander of the militia, such disposition of troops was speedily made as would foil such design of the enemy, and confine his operations to Stonington.

During the bombardment on the evening of the 9th some bold spirits at Stonington took measures for opposing the landing of the invaders. The only ordnance in the place consisted of two 18, one 6, and one 4 pound cannon. They dragged the 6 and one 18 pounder down to the extreme point of the peninsula, cast up some breast-works, and placed them in battery there. The other 18-pounder was left in a slight battery on the southwest point, near where the present breakwater leaves the shore. By the streaming light of the rockets they watched the enemy, reserving their fire until the barges and a launch came in a line near the southeast point of the peninsula, when they opened fire, with serious effect. The guns, loaded with solid balls, were double-shotted, and these so shattered the enemy's vessels that the little flotilla retreated in confusion toward the larger warriors. From midnight until dawn quiet prevailed, and during that time a number of militia and volunteers had assembled near Stonington.

The assault was resumed at daylight on the morning of the 10th by the rocketeers of the barges. At the same time the Pactolus and Dispatch worked up nearer the town. The former grounded, but the latter beat up, while the Terror hurled bombs and carcasses industriously. One of the latter, weighing over two hundred pounds, may now be seen on a granite post in Stonington. So terrible was the bombardment that the militia and volunteers dared not enter the town. At length, at about six o'clock, some bold volunteers came over from Mystic, among whom was the now venerable Captain Jeremiah Holmes, who had been a prisoner in a British ship-of-war some years before, and had learned the art of gunnery. He and his companions made their way to the battery on the point, when Holmes took charge of the 18-pounder there. At that moment the Dispatch was making her last tack preparatory to anchoring. Holmes sighted the gun (which was double shotted), and at a favorable moment gave the word to fire. Both shot struck the hull of the brig, when she cast anchor and opened a heavy fire with 24-pound shot. The Terror sent shells in quick succession, while Holmes and his companions kept the old iron cannon busy.

The fight was now fairly opened, and it continued briskly for about an hour, when Holmes's ammunition gave out. He ceased firing at eight o'clock; and to prevent the great gun, which they could not take away, being turned upon the town by the enemy, they spiked it.

Stonington was now wholly defenseless and at the mercy of the invaders. A timid citizen proposed to haul down the flag over the battery, in token of submission. "No!" shouted Holmes, indignantly. "That flag shall never come down while I am alive!" And it didn't, in submission to the foe. And when the wind died away, and it hung drooping by the side of the staff, the brave Captain held out the flag on the point of a bayonet that the British might see it. While in that position several shots passed through it. He then caused it to be nailed to the staff, and it became completely riddled by British balls. I saw it in Stonington in the autumn of 1860, where it is preserved as a precious memento of the event.

THE STONINGTON FLAG.

The old cannon was not long silent. Some concealed powder, taken from the captured privateer Halka, was soon discovered, and at a little past nine o'clock Holmes resumed his firing, a blacksmith named Cobb having drawn the spike. It was double-shotted each time; and so telling were its missiles that by noon the Dispatch was so much injured that she slipped her cable and hauled off to a place of safety. The Terror kept throwing shells until night, but she was out of reach of the little battery.

During the day a considerable number of militia had assembled at Stonington, and General Isham took command. Order was soon restored, and some of the inhabitants, somewhat reassured, returned to their homes. A dispatch had been sent to Hardy by the magistrates to secure a cessation of further hostilities. They assured him that all offensive inhabitants had left the village, and that no torpedoes had ever been sent out from there, and none should be. Hardy agreed to suspend hostilities on condition that they should send to his ship the wife of James Stewart late British consul, who was then in New London. To this extraordinary demand they replied that they had no power to do so, when Hardy threatened to resume the assault if she was not delivered on board his flag-ship by noon on the 11th. He waited longer than noon, but in vain; and at three o'clock the Terror commenced throwing shells into the village. A sufficient military force was there to prevent the landing of the enemy.

All was silent on the water during the night of the 11th. It was broken at sunrise, when the Terror again opened her mortars, and the Ramillies and Pactolus warped up nearer the town. At eight o'clock they gave three tremendous broadsides. They proved to be a petulant parting salute; for soon afterward all the vessels withdrew, and anchored far away toward Fisher's Island.

Thus ended the assault on Stonington. Only one man was mortally wounded during the whole time, and five or six others slightly so. The martyr was Frederick Denison, a brave young man of nineteen. His gallantry was most conspicuous; and in commemoration of it the State of Connecticut erected a handsome marble monument over his grave in the cemetery at Mystic in 1856. About forty buildings were more or less injured, and two or three nearly ruined. Cobb's House, on Water Street, is yet standing, and exhibits many scars of wounds received on that day. The bombardment was singularly harmless, when it is remembered how perfectly exposed the village was, and that fifty tons of metal were hurled at it from the ships. The repulse was hailed, as it deserved to be, as a glorious exhibition of pluck. The assailing squadron had about fifteen hundred men, while the number actually engaged in driving them away did not exceed twenty. The loss to the British was twenty lives and fifty wounded, and a cost of ten thousand pounds sterling. The gain nothing. The impotence of the attack was a point for many a squib and epigram; and the occasion gave birth to one of the most popular ballads of the time, written by Philip Freneau, the bard of the Revolution.

Hardy's easy conquest of Eastport encouraged a more extensive invasion in that quarter on the part of the British. They resolved to seize the whole territory in Maine between the Passamaquoddy and Penobscot. For that purpose an expedition, consisting of the Bulwark, Dragon, and Spencer, 74's; the frigates Bacchante and Tenedos; sloops-of-war Sylph and Peruvian; and schooner Pictou, with ten transports and four thousand land-troops, sailed from Halifax on the 26th of August, 1814. The fleet was commanded by Rear-Admiral Edward Griffith, and the troops by Lieutenant-General Sir John Cope Sherbrooke, Governor of Nova Scotia, assisted by General Gerard Goselin. The expedition entered Penobscot Bay and the fine harbor of Castine, off Bigaduce Cape, at dawn on the 1st of September, and Lieutenant-Colonel Nichols was sent in a schooner to demand the instant surrender of the post, then held by Lieutenant Lewis and about forty regulars, occupying a half-moon battery and redoubt, constructed by the Americans in 1808. Nichols heralded his demand by hurling a 24-pound shot ashore. Lewis perceived that resistance would be madness; so, at sunrise, he blew up the redoubt, and, with his two little cannon, fled over the high peninsula to its neck, and escaped up the river in boats. Colonel Douglass immediately landed with about six hundred troops, and took possession of Castine, and with it the control of Penobscot Bay.

Sherbrooke had been informed that the corvette John Adams, commanded by Captain Charles Morris, had struck a rock in entering Penobscot Bay in thick weather, and was so badly damaged that she had gone up the river for repairs. He now learned that she was lying at Crosby's Wharf, at Hampden, a few miles below Bangor, and he and Griffith at once detached vessels and troops to go up and capture or destroy her. Captain Robert Barrie, of the Dragon, was placed in command of the naval part of the expedition, and Lieutenant-Colonel Henry John of the land-force, seven hundred strong. The vessels employed were the Sylph and Peruvian, a small schooner as a tender, the brig Harmony, and nine launches. The expedition sailed in the afternoon of the day on which the fleet arrived at Castine. They went up as far as the vicinity of Frankfort that evening, and anchored for the night in Marsh Bay, an expansion of the Penobscot.

On the appearance of the fleet an express was sent to Captain Morris, apprising him of the fact. He immediately sent a note to General Blake, who was then at his home opposite Bangor, eight or ten miles distant, asking him to call out the militia of his brigade to meet the invaders. Blake immediately rode to Bangor, issued orders for the assembling of the militia, and on the same evening went down to Hampden to confer with Morris. He found that vigilant officer busily engaged in preparations for defense. He was dismantling his wounded ship, and dragging her heavy cannon to the summit of the high right bank of the Soadabscook, fifty rods from Crosby's wharf, and placing them in battery there, so as to command the river approaches from below.

On the morning of the 2d General Blake held a consultation with Morris and citizens of Hampden and Bangor on the best means of defense; but opinions were so various that no specific measures were adopted. Morris had not much confidence in the militia, and declined any immediate co-operation with them. He advised meeting the foe at their landing-place, wherever it might be, and expressed his resolution to destroy the Adams should the militia retreat.

On the morning of the 2d General Goselin, with six hundred men, took possession of Belfast without resistance, and at the same time the river expedition sailed northward from Marsh Bay. They reached Bald Hill Cove, below Hampden, at five in the evening, where the troops were landed, with eighty marines, and bivouacked during the night, in the midst of a heavy rain storm. A detachment had been landed at Frankfort in the morning, and marched up the western side of the Penobscot.

During the 2d about six hundred raw militia assembled at Hampden. Not one of them had ever been in actual war service, and many were without arms and ammunition. This want Morris supplied as far as possible. Blake posted them in an admirable position on the crown of a ridge between the upper and lower village. The artillery company of his brigade were there, with two brass 3-pounders and one iron 18 from Morris's ship. Such was Blake's position on the gloomy morning of the 3d.

Morris in the mean time had planted a battery of nine short 18-pounders from the Adams on the bank above, and placed it in command of Lieutenant Wadsworth, the first officer of the Adams; and with the remainder of his guns, two hundred seamen and marines, and twenty invalids, he took position on Crosby's wharf, and prepared to defend his crippled ship to the last extremity.

The whole region of the Penobscot was enveloped in a dense fog on the morning of the 3d. The British at Bald Hill Cove had been joined by the detachment from below; and at five o'clock all were in motion toward Hampden. They moved cautiously in the thick mist, and were not discovered by Blake's scouts until they were about to ascend the eminence on which his forces were posted. Information was immediately given to the commander. No enemy could be seen, for the fog yet lay heavily on the earth. Blake pointed his cannon in the direction of their approach, and blazed away with some effect. He reserved the fire of his musketry until the enemy should be near enough to be hurt; but the waiting was an ordeal too severe for the untried militia. When the foe rushed forward at double-quick, firing volley after volley, the militia fled, leaving Blake and his officers alone. This fact was communicated to Morris, who ordered Wadsworth to spike his cannon and retreat over the only bridge that spanned the Soadabscook, for the tide was rising, and that stream would soon be unfordable. He then fired the Adams, spiked the guns on the wharf, and ordered his men to fly. He was the last man to leave, and his way to the bridge by that time was cut off by the foe. He plunged into the Soadabscook, and, under a sharp fire from the British, reached the opposite shore in safety, and with Blake and their followers fled to Bangor.—From thence Morris soon afterward made his way overland to Portland.

About five hundred British troops pushed on in pursuit to Bangor; and the little squadron went up the river at the same time. Colonel John met a deputation from Bangor a mile from the village, with a message from the magistrates, asking terms for capitulation. Nothing was promised but respect for private property. The invaders entered the town at about ten o'clock in the morning. Commodore Barrie made professions of justice; at the same time he gave his sailors tacit license to plunder. All the stores on the western side of the Kenduskeag Creek were robbed. The enemy remained there about thirty-one hours, quartered on the inhabitants, whom they compelled not only to surrender up all arms and public property—even a few dollars in the post-office—but made them report themselves prisoners of war for parole. General Blake was among those thus paroled. The Selectmen were then required to give a bond in the penal sum of $30,000, as a guaranty for the delivery of certain vessels to the British authorities at Castine, by the last of October. The speedy return of peace canceled this bond.

Having despoiled the inhabitants of Bangor of property valued at $23,000, the British returned to Hampden, where Barrie, who was an arrogant, heartless man, allowed the sailors and German soldiers to commit many depredations. Private houses were robbed, and the Meeting-house was broken open, its Bibles and psalm-books were torn up, and its pulpit and pews were demolished. They exacted a bond from the Selectmen of Hampden for $12,000, for the security of vessels there, and after plundering the inhabitants of property to the amount of $44,000, the invaders went down the river, and returned to Castine. Colonel John had endeavored to save the people from robbery, and Sherbrooke and Griffith rebuked the brutal Barrie for his outrageous connivance at barbarian atrocities.

On the 11th of September Sherbrooke and Griffith, with most of the troops and a greater part of the fleet, left Penobscot Bay, and, after capturing Machias, returned to Halifax. General Goselin, a gentleman in manners and a brave soldier, was left in command at Castine. He required all the male inhabitants above sixteen years of age, residing in the territory lying between the Penobscot and the boundary-line of New Brunswick, to take an oath of allegiance to his Majesty, or an oath that they would peaceably and quietly demean and conduct themselves while inhabiting and residing within that territory; that they would not carry arms, harbor British deserters, nor carry intelligence to the King's enemies, etc., during the current war. Goselin caused old Fort George, in the middle of the peninsula at Castine, to be repaired and strengthened, barracks to be erected, and various preparations made for the permanent occupation of the place. By his kindness and justice the General won the respect of the inhabitants. But his stay was short. The war was ended a few months after the capture of Castine; and on the 26th of April, 1815, the British evacuated the whole country west of the St. Croix and Passamaquoddy Bay. Peace, joy, tranquillity, and prosperity came with the birds and blossoms; and from that time until now no foreign enemy has ever appeared on our coast with hostile intentions, and probably never will.

MINER AT WORK—OLD MANNER OF WORKING.

COAL AND COAL-MINING.

[The following paper by HENRY D. ROGERS, Professor of Natural History in the University of Glasgow, furnishes facts and suggestions worthy of consideration in America. —ED. HARPER'S MAG.]

FEW questions can be more interesting than that of the duration of our coal-fields, on which so much of the comfort and prosperity of the world depends. Before, however, attempting to consider it, it is necessary to furnish the reader, in as succinct a manner as possible, with some well-ascertained facts regarding the quantity of coal laid up in store in the great coal-fields of Europe and America.

AMERICA.

The United States, with its vast surface of 3,000,000 square miles, has one square mile of coal-field to every 15 square miles of territory.

Great Britain has one to every 30 of surface.
Belgium has one to every 22½ of surface.
France has one to every 200 miles of surface.

To approximate more nearly to any correct estimates of the relative reserves of coal in the great coal-fields of the world, we must compare the cubic quantities they contain, deducing these from multiplying their respective areas in square miles by their respective observed or assumed depths of available coal. Thus calculated :

Belgium (assuming her coal-fields to possess the high average thickness asserted, of 60 feet of coal) contains about 36,000,000,000 tons.

France (with the same thickness) about 59,000,000,000.

The British Islands (adopting 35 feet as the average thickness) nearly 142,500,000,000. According to Mr. Hull's estimate the total supply is 79,843,000,000.

Pennsylvania (computing her average of workable coal at 25 feet) has 316,400,000,000.

Whole Appalachian Coal-Field (adopting the same proportion), 1,387,500,000,000.

Great Middle Coal-Field of the United States in Indiana, Illinois, and Western Kentucky (also with an average of 25 feet of coal), 1,277,500,000,000.

Great Western Coal-Field in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Arkansas, Indian Territory, and Texas, accepting 10 feet as the mean thickness of the coal, 739,000,000,000.

All the productive coal-fields of North America, about 4,000,000,000,000.

[The apparent discrepancy in the calculation of the British total supply of coal given by us in the above table, with that of Mr. E. Hull, derived from his valuable work on the Coal-Fields of Great Britain, is attributable mainly to the circumstance, that our estimate relates to the gross amount of coal originally under the surfaces of the coal-fields, while his has reference to the net quantities now remaining and procurable, with allowance for waste, etc., aggregated together from his special data.]

The relative superficial magnitudes of the coal-fields of the countries possessing coal, will be clearly recognized if we compare them by some simple unit of measure. Let this be 100 square miles. In this case,

Russia will be represented by	1
Spain	2
Anthracite fields of Pennsylvania	4
Westphalia and Bohemia	4
Belgium	5
France	10
Rhenish Prussia	10
British Provinces of North America	17
British Islands	40
Europe	75
Pennsylvania	126

The ratios of the actual quantities of coal in these coal-fields are approximately as follows:

Let the total store of coal in Belgium, computed at 36,000,000,000 tons, be our unit of measure, then—

The amount of coal in Belgium being	1
In France it is less than	2
In the British Islands it is less than	4
In all Europe	8½
In Pennsylvania a little less than	9
In the Appalachian coal-field about	38½
In the Great Middle American coal-field about	35½
In the Great Western American Basin about	20½
In all the coal-fields of North America about	111

Upon the very interesting but difficult question of the probable duration of the coal supply to Britain from her own apparently so richly stocked coal-fields, very little need here be said. The subject has been aptly handled by Mr. E. Hull in his able treatise on the British coal-fields, and has been frankly and impressively discussed by Sir William Armstrong in his late inaugural address to the British Association. Both of these most competent authorities have made obvious to every student of the subject, what we ourselves have for years past felt convinced of, and have repeatedly publicly maintained, that the total supply of coal beneath the soil of Great Britain, at the present rate of growth of consumption, must become entirely spent or exhausted at the lapse of 200 or 300 years from this time. It demands but little arithmetic, if we accept the unassailable statistical facts already made known, to show that such a result is inevitable. In the year 1855 the coal produced and consumed from the British collieries was reported at about 64,333,333 tons; in 1859 it amounted, we are told, to about 72,000,000 tons; in 1860 to a little more than 80,000,000 tons; and in 1861 to upward of 83,500,000 tons;* and now for the past year, 1863, just closed, the rumor is, that it will not fall short of 90,000,000 tons at the lowest estimate.

From these indisputable statements it is apparent that while, in the first interval of four years up to 1859, the average annual ratio of increase in the coal product was just about 2,000,000 tons, this ratio has since materially augmented, being indeed, between 1860 and 1861, at the least 3,500,000 tons. In other words, we can not doubt from all the data at present accessible, that the amount of the annual increase in this first half of the present decade is not less than 3,000,000, whereas in the second half of the previous decade it did not on an average materially exceed 2,000,000 tons. These figures teach us the impressive lesson that the ratio of the augmentation is itself augmenting. But Sir William Armstrong assures us that the entire quantity of available coal existing in these islands, calculated to amount to about 80,000,000,000 tons, will, with a continued yearly increase in its consumption of 2,750,000 tons, only last 212 years.† Cordially must we thank him for enjoining it upon the people and the Government to look to it that no needless and unwise wasting of a source of wealth, and power, and happiness, so precious, and yet so far from inexhaustible, should be imprudently permitted to continue.

Another very vital consideration, involving man's ability to penetrate the crust of the earth to the great depths to which the observations and calculations of miners and geologists teach us that the mineral treasures, the coal-beds, layers of iron-ore, and lodes of copper, etc., reach, is that of the globe's undeviating, inevitable increase of temperature as we descend into its bowels from the surface. No matter what the latitude, or climate, or elevation above the sea-level of the spot penetrated by the mine-shaft, the rocky crust grows warmer at the swift rate of 1° of Fahrenheit on an average for each 60 feet of progress downward. With this increment of temperature, the natural warmth at a depth of 1800 feet is 30° higher than at the surface, or rather more than 80° of Fahrenheit; that is to say, the miner is called on to exert his best muscular force, often in a constrained posture and debilitated by bad air, when the walls of the mine and the atmosphere around him are almost as hot as the air and soil at the equator in the shade.

* See a paper read before the Society of Arts by Robert Hunt, F.R.S., Keeper of Mining Records, Government School of Mines. Sir William Armstrong's statement at Newcastle differs somewhat from this, in that he cites Mr. Hunt's statistics as showing that, "at the end of 1861, the quantity of coal raised in the United Kingdom had reached the enormous total of 86,000,000 tons."

Besides this steady rise of temperature proper to the earth's crust itself, there is an additional augmentation of warmth in all deep mines, produced by the increased density of the air. It appears to obey a constantly augmenting ratio with increase of depth, but within all ordinarily penetrated depths it averages about 1° of Fahrenheit for every 300 feet of depth. At 2000 feet it amounts to 6.5° , and at 4000 to 13.16° .

Now we know that an important portion of the coal in our deeper coal-basins, lies, according to the estimates I have quoted, at depths approaching, and even far exceeding, 4000 feet, and this is equivalent to an augmentation of the warmth to the miner of some $56\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ of the thermometer due to depth, and more than 13° due to increase of density in the air; that is to say, equivalent to a temperature of about 120° . This far surpasses that of any climate upon the earth's surface, and is altogether too hot and relaxing for any human being to work in.

Here, then, we encounter a formidable impediment to the search after all this vast stock of deep-seated mineral wealth; and there arises a pressing question, of the greatest importance to every individual and community interested in the maintenance of cheapness and plenty in the two great essentials to our social welfare, iron and coal: can this obstruction to deep mining be obviated by the aid of human ingenuity?

Until very recent days neither colliery proprietors nor mine engineers could see a way to the solution of this prodigious difficulty; but an invention, steadily maturing toward practical success for several years past, and now at last working to the entire satisfaction of all who have examined its construction and principles, gives us a sanguine promise, indeed a confident assurance, that it will achieve this blessed result, though only as one of the secondary results of its wonderful capacities. I allude to an ingenious invention lately completed in Yorkshire, and now being introduced elsewhere, for cutting coal in the collieries by machinery.

This coal-cutting machine has been brought to its present high efficiency at the West Ardsley Colliery, in Yorkshire, the proprietors of which, William Firth, Esq., and Company, of Leeds, are likewise the owners, part-patentees, improvers, and constructors of the mechanism. The patentees are Firth, Donnithorpe, and Co. The engine is a large iron cylinder, with a piston and piston-rod working to and fro in the cylinder, and carrying or driving a massive iron or steel pick, which cuts the coal, working long work in any desired direction, and at a very material saving in waste from hewing or "kirving." The power that gives the reciprocating motion to the piston and pick is highly compressed air, condensed by the steam-engine stationed at all collieries near the pit-mouth, and this elastic air is conveyed by slender pipes down the shaft or pit, and along the mine to the places where the coal is to be disturbed from its long repose, and cut away from the exposed edge or face of the seam. The compressed air is pumped by the steam-engine into a receiver at the pit-head during its otherwise idle hours, or by its surplus power while drawing up the coal, or pumping out the water, from the mine, and is condensed to a tension of 45 or 50 lbs. to the square inch. It is led at the West Ardsley Company's Colliery from the receiver, in metal pipes four and a half inches in diameter, down the shaft 80 fathoms (or 480 feet) deep, and thence in pipes of a less diameter to the workings, tubes of one or one and a quarter inch calibre bringing it to the cylinder of the machine. This compressed air, when set free at each alternating stroke of the piston, imparts to the adjacent portions of the mine a pure, dry, cool atmosphere, from a well-known law of all airs or gases, that when compressed they develop heat of temperature, and that when expanding under a relaxation of pressure, they quickly acquire a state of comparative coolness. We have been told, indeed, in a paper descriptive of this mechanical coal-cutter, read to the British Association at its late meeting at Newcastle, that the air issues at a temperature very little below the freezing-point.

The machine is supported by a cast metal frame of great solidity and firmness, and is of a size and weight proportioned to the thickness and hardness of the bed of coal to be cut. It is constructed so as to give the blow of the pick or cutter, either by the pull or the push of the piston.

The form of engine hitherto found to unite the greatest degree of convenience with efficiency in practice is that known as of the "oscillating cylinder" principle. It has the merit of combining compactness of shape with a very small amount of friction in the working parts. The whole structure rests upon wheels with flanges, which are sometimes single sometimes double as the exigencies of the work demand. It is propelled forward or backward, as required, by a wheel and screw, on a ratchet and pinion, attached to one side of the engine. On the opposite side is a valve-screw, for regulating by the hand the admission and escape of the air and the stroke of the piston. The machine is also, in some specimens, made self-acting, much after the fashion of the steam-hammer. When working, the man seated upon the little stool in the rear of it moves the ratchet screw connected with the gearing of the under-carriage, and thereby propels the whole machine along the little railway or train laid parallel to the front of the coal-seam, a small distance equal to the longitudinal nip or bite of the pick, and at each swiftly-repeated blow this encroachment, of an inch or so, is renewed to the end of the "benk" or working face. In seams of coal of a thickness not less than three feet, the driver or miner sits on a seat slid into the end of the machine, but in thinner coal-beds he must rest kneeling on a truck running on low pulleys or rollers, and traveling in the rear of the cutting-machine.

The tram-road, carrying the coal-cutter, is made of T rails fastened upon cross sleepers. This railway is of a gauge which also suits the wagons in which the detached coal is carried away from the "benks" or faces, where it has been mined; and when all the fragmentary coal is cleared away, the little railway, easily taken apart and reunited, is transplanted closer up to the face of the coal-seam, and the process of cutting by the engine is resumed.

There are several distinct methods or plans of working or mining the coal-seams in our collieries. That which is best adapted for the full efficiency of the coal-cutting engine is what is technically called "long work," or some modified form of this.

Messrs. Firth, Donnisthorpe, & Co. much prefer this long-wall mode of mining wherever they employ their apparatus; and we conceive that every judicious miner will admit that where the coal-bed has a good roof no other plan of working the mine can afford such grand facilities for the application of the machine. Its inventors see no difficulty in adapting it to other commonly practiced modes of mining coal.

I shall not be doing this interesting invention justice if I do not advert, more explicitly than I have yet done, to the important assistance it is destined to furnish to the ventilating and cooling of all deep and over warm collieries.

An approximately correct notion of its efficacy as an aid to the ventilation of the working localities in a coal-mine may be gained from the facts I have now to mention.

One machine, working, we shall say, 90 blows of the pick per minute, discharges, of condensed air, about 100 cubic feet per minute, which immediately becomes 300 cubic feet of cold air at the normal density. Now an ordinary roomy colliery will employ at least five of these machines, a number productive of some 1500 cubic feet of cold air per minute. But in a very well ventilated coal-mine of medium capacity the average supply of good air to each working face is, or should be, about 2000 or 2500 cubic feet per minute. This proves that each machine is competent to supply from 12 to 15 per cent. of the ventilation, with this all-important incidental benefit, that whereas the indrawn current of air acquires in its progress a warmer temperature, and grows progressively more foul and unwholesome, the air, let off by the machine, arrives perfectly fresh, and pure, and cool, precisely at the localities where the workmen are most in need of such an atmosphere. This cooling and purifying of the air at the precise spots where good air is so indispensable magnifies this secondary function of the machine beyond the mere proportion of fresh atmosphere it contributes to the general ventilation. Observations and calculations from careful experiments indicate that, in a coal-mine having a mean temperature of say 70 degrees, the reduction in the warmth of the general mass of air will amount to about five degrees, but in the immediate vicinity of the miners the cooling action is obviously much more than this difference.

Another incidental advantage, the full importance and value of which we can not overestimate, is the power this strong jet of pure cold air must exercise to dilute and chill the "fire-damp," or explosive compound of the native coal-gas and the atmospheric air, and keep it below the proportions and temperature promotive of mine explosions. The inventors are fully aware of this valuable property in their machine, and are now planning a method of projecting a portion at least of the ventilating puff of the pure cool air where it will be most efficient in counteracting the fire-damp. The writer of this has seen the machine in operation, and he can aver that he was never in a colliery where the atmosphere of the coal-seams was so pure, so cool, and so wholesome to the respiratory organs; and he asks, could a more ample, more convenient ventilation of the parts of a mine most needing it be asked for?

It is easy, from this wonderful attribute of the compressed air coal-cutting apparatus, to see that we may henceforth dispel all our long-established misgivings as to the capacity of the mining art to perforate the earth's crust to almost any depths, to which we may inductively infer that the treasures of the deeper coal-fields any where descend.

In a coal-seam three feet three inches thick, where 1800 tons per week are cut and withdrawn, there is a saving of 27 men at the very unwholesome and severe toil of "pick work." This amounts, we are informed, in the West Ardsley Colliery, to only about 10 per cent. of the whole number employed at the colliery, for all the other branches remain without any commensurate reduction in the numbers of their workmen. We are rejoiced to learn, moreover, that this is a real saving of the men, for they are transferred from a very severe and dangerous form of toil to more inviting kinds of labor; transferred, in fact, from the business of a collier to that more thoughtful and freer one of a mechanic. And this is done without any reduction in the wages of the miners. Every friend of the laboring classes, every well-wisher to human progress, must rejoice at the contemplation of inventions such as this, which so obviously tend to abate the hardships of the muscular human machine, and lift him to the higher level of a mind-employing and intelligent mechanic.

To estimate aright the full value of any invention like this for facilitating and cheapening the mining of our "fossil fuel," we must take into view, on the one hand, the astonishing amount of wealth which this product represents, and the large and indispensable part it plays in creating new wealth by bringing into operation a multitude of arts and industries, which but for it could not exist; and, on the other hand, the many benignant uses it fulfills in promoting human health and domestic comfort. The magnitude of our coal product will be recognized, and the high importance of economizing the getting it be duly appreciated, when we reflect that the past year's yield of the British coal-mines has amounted to between ninety and one hundred millions of tons, that its value on sale as lifted from the mines can not fall far short of some £50,000,000, and that the coal-trade employs, it is believed, at least 300,000 persons in working and distributing the coal alone.

That this mechanical invention for cutting the coal in the mine will prove a real blessing to the miner must be obvious to every person who considers the nature of one of the chief perils which unceasingly besets the miner while at his task. By the process of "hand-kirving," or hewing a cleft back into the coal-seam in some soft layer of the bed, the miner in cutting into it, say three feet in depth from the face, must make a crevice or excavation of usually from 10 to 12 inches in width at the front, tapering narrow toward the back. Now one of the commonest and least avoidable dangers to the life and limb of the miner thus carving into a coal-bed with his pick, and crouching under the face of the vast block of coal he is striving to detach, is the premature and sudden dislodgment of this great lump, weighing a ton and frequently much more, and the instantaneous slipping of the ponderous mass upon him, caused by the sloping of the artificial floor he has been making. We are informed, in fact, that as high a proportion as 20 per cent. of the lives lost in coal-mines arises from this terrific crashing of the coal upon the helpless workman as he is courageously undermining it.

In striking contrast with this source of danger, attended by so much waste of precious life, is the kirving or undercutting accomplished by the machine. Mr. Samuel Firth, in his paper upon it, read at Newcastle to the British Association, assures us that the West Ardsley Machine, working in the Hetton Colliery upon a hard seam, did the "kirving" three feet deep with a groove of only three inches at the face and two inches at the back, giving an average cut of only two and a half inches high; whereas the average height of hand-kirving in the same coal-seam is about 11 inches. This saving of good coal from destruction is equal, he tells us, to ninepence per ton upon the whole yield of the coal-seam. In the West Ardsley seam the saving by the machine process of cutting amounts to one shilling per ton, on the yield of the coal-bed.

To get a just notion of the wonderful strength, speed, accuracy, and economy with which this beautiful piece of mechanism, the coal-cutter, does its task, one must go into one of the collieries where the invention is used, and behold it, as the writer did, performing smoothly and easily its regular routine work. Sitting near it, watching its movements, noting the deep yet slender groove it so swiftly cuts in the solid coal, and timing accurately its expert and quickly-repeated strokes, and then measuring the work done, the beholder's surprise at its amazing efficiency increases until it is presently lifted to admiration and enthusiasm.

A purely incidental accompaniment of the swift hard blows given respectively by the human machine and the iron one as they swing their picks into the coal, betrays in a curious manner the amazing difference in the energy of their strokes. At each blow the miner delivers, he suddenly, as so many workmen do, relaxes his fully inflated lungs, and pants loudly. So likewise the machine, but at every stroke it gives, the condensed air of three atmospheres' pressure escaping, makes a noise by its sudden emission somewhat of the tone and loudness of a highly excited bull-dog.

The machine, when we inspected it, was for the greater part of the time working at the astonishing speed of 120 strokes per minute, or at the rate of two a second; and it cut a remarkably regular smooth groove, or narrow incision, always twenty inches deep, into the coal seam, and not exceeding two inches, or two and a half in width, throughout the entire line of its course along the face of the coal. By a second traverse of the face of the coal, this groove is deepened to thirty inches, and by a third to thirty-six inches, or one yard. The miner, or, more strictly speaking now, the engineer, who sits on a little seat attached to the rear of the machine, and controls its progress and the speed of its stroke, is able by this mechanism in the colliery I visited (the West Ardsley, near Leeds) to "kirve," or undercut the coal, to the extent of fifteen or twenty yards per hour. This is his regular average rate of work. Now, a good skillful miner, employing the hand-pick, "kirves" in such a seam about seven and a half yards per day, working eight hours, or a little less than one yard per hour; so that the machine, in the amount of cutting it can effect, is equal to at least fifteen or twenty able-bodied men.

But this greatly increased efficacy or quickness of the mining process is only one of the several high advantages attending this invention. To the humane beholder it is still more impressive and gratifying, in the contrast it exhibits between the safe and comfortable state and action of its director and the very dangerous position and severe toil of the pickman working by hand. Few forms of manual labor surpass, in their arduousness of muscular exertion, in their painful constraint of attitude and movement, in their liability to accident and death, and in their habitual and unavoidable filthiness, the toilsome struggle of the industrious, lonely pickman, whose hard lot has consigned him to pass his working hours hewing with violent efforts into a hard seam of coal, in a badly ventilated mine. If the coal-bed measures only three feet, or less, as many profitable ones in our British coal-fields do, the miner can by no possibility stand erect, or fling his pick into the coal with any approach to natural, easy, and effective freedom of movement in his arms and body. On the contrary, he must sit crouched, or doubled upon his knees, or cramped down upon his hams, and in those half-paralyzing postures, wield, or try to wield, his heavy pick with an awkward and unsteady swing. Let a person but witness the two processes of mining, as the writer of this notice did, in the same slender bed of coal, and the contrast will impress him, as offering one of the finest illustrations within the wide field of modern improvements, of the blessings which invention can confer in mitigating the hardships, and abating the brutalizing toil to which the human body is still so frequently subjected.

In taking leave of this interesting invention we can not refrain from adverting to the important question, how will the mining populations of this and other countries accept it? Will they esteem it a friend sent to ameliorate their heaviest, most prostrating form of toil, or will they regard it as a rival and an enemy? We think they will view and welcome it as a pain-relieving benefactor, for well do they know the severities of their profession. The mining class are fully aware that the strain upon their physical strength is unnaturally severe, ever tending to enfeeble their health and shorten their days, and we can not doubt that every lesson of experience and every wholesome instinct will impel them to greet and to accept not only this but all similar labor-lightening inventions as blessings dispensed to them from On High through this world's human agencies.

LAURA AND HER HERO.

HARRY MILLS, as he went leaping along the rocky shore that day, apparently in such a loose hap-hazard manner, had a definite object in view. He had marked it and steadily pursued it since he had first come out in this direction; so he went on leaping lightly from rock to rock, always keeping in view a flutter of something. A flutter of something scarlet and gold, like a gay barbaric flag flung out in defiance. What was it? He knew well. What need for any body else to know that it was Laura Wingate's shawl? Laura herself hadn't the faintest idea of hanging out a lure as she sat there talking fitfully with Sue Mills. They had been there half the afternoon, shut in by the rocks from any sight or sound but the sea's, and perhaps that was the reason that gay Laura's usual brightness had tempered down into that wistful abstraction, which she so rarely shows. Perhaps the restless voices of the ocean suggested her thoughts.

"Ah me!" she said, with a faint sigh: "I am lonesome under this monotonous life, Sue. I want to go away somewhere and see the world. I wish something would happen, not actually tragic you know. Heigh-ho!" and she yawned wearily, stretching her hands toward the sea with a yearning motion. Then a change passed over her face as she caught sight of a new sail just beyond the Point. "Sue, I walked with a merman last night, in a blue-jacket. He wanted somebody to run away with him. What do you say to my going? A handsome fellow he was, Sue, tall and dark, and with such beautiful eyes, with a scar just under the left one."

"Laura, you don't mean that Tom Wilson has come back?" And Sue Mills, at the mention of her old lover, turned pale.

"Yes; Captain Tom has come back, Sue, handsomer and taller than ever. What do you say to my running away with him, eh?"

"Does he want you to?" asks Susan, really incredulous, but with a look of anxiety and fright upon her face.

"Does he want me to!" and Laura mimicked her companion's voice. But in a moment her tone changed, a soft expression came into her eyes. She bent over and touched Susan's cold hand with her own warm one, while she said, "No, Susy, he wants you; and he thinks that now, perhaps, your father may be more relenting. This last voyage has been very prosperous, and he already owns half of the ship, which shows, you know, very substantially, that he has been entirely devoted to his duty."

"And he told you—"

"Yes, he told me he wanted you, Susy; that he had never wanted any body else; that all through your father's opposition, and your submission to it, he had never ceased to love you, though for a time he was angry." There was a little pause, then she went on: "And you fancied it was me. You were jealous, Sue, all last fall when he was here. Me! jealous of me, you small simpleton."

There had come a warm glow into Susan's cheeks, and her eyes had a happy light in them as she said,

"But you flirted with him, Laura."

"I flirted with Cap'n Tom? Well, I didn't know it."

Laura's face as she uttered this was full of some cold disdain. It faded in a moment, and she added more kindly, but with a sort of weary impatience,

"That's the way people must interpret, I suppose. Well, well, let them; who cares?"

"But, Laura!"

"Well."

"Why didn't you tell me before?"

"Why didn't I? Because I have kept my word and a tryst for you, my pretty black-eyed Susan;" and Laura laughed with all her old mischief.

Susan looked bewildered.

"What do you mean, Laura?"

"Only that I promised that wily and wicked Captain Tom that I would not betray him until I saw a white sail coming round the Point with a blue flag for signal. Prepare yourself, Miss Susan; he'll be here at your feet in fifteen minutes."

Susan sprang up startled and confused; but that firm little hand, and the firmer will of Laura Wingate, pulled her back.

"Stay where you are, Susan; don't make a goose of yourself. After a year of faithfulness and well-doing Captain Wilson certainly deserves a hearing. If you are still afraid to trust him, tell him so; don't run away. I am the one to do that, you know. Catch me playing Mrs. Malaprop;" and, laughing, Laura snatched up her shawl and started out of her nook.

One, two, three steps, and she swung round a narrow ledge to meet—what? no, not Captain Wilson, but Harry Mills.

It was not she who blushed. It was for Harry Mills, the tender skinned fellow, to hang out his colors at this sudden meeting. There he was, going on quietly, the signal of gold and red no longer perceivable in the bend of the shore, but clearly seen by inward vision was that well-known eyrie of the cliffs where he thought to find her. And suddenly the gleam of the gold and red, the old barbaric pattern flashes into his eyes, and he meets that startled gaze whose very coolness half vexes him. So he thought it quite enough to blush for. Then she exclaimed:

"Where did you come from? I declare you appear like a ghost, Harry!"

"I was down at the inlet, and 'sighted' you by your red flag," he answered, putting a finger on the gay silk fringe that floated over her arm.

"Oh! my shawl. And you were coming down upon me unawares. There I should have sat in the sun, innocent of danger, when pounce, you would have come down from the top cliff, like a cat upon a mouse. I know your tricks."

And she nodded and sparkled at the young man in her gay, insouciant manner, which he appreciated, perhaps, too keenly.

"But come," she broke out, after a breath of pause, "I'm not going to stand here; are you?" And she dipped past him like a swallow on the wing, flinging back a little chain of sweet-linked laughter, and a glance that invited and defied.

He did not wait, but down sharp crag and ledge dashed on in pursuit. Again that saucy glance shot over her shoulder, and fleeing with sure but reckless foothold over rough ways of rock and loosened stones, she sang:

"Oh, follow, follow round the world,

Green earth and sunny sea—"

"So love is with thy lover's heart

Wherever he may be," responded her pursuer's voice, finishing the quotation which she hadn't given him credit for knowing.

A little disconcerted, a false step was made, and she caught, breathless, at a projecting boulder, leaning her cheek against it, and facing him so, gazing wearily but with mischievous smile at him as he came up, and saying, saucily,

"What did you trip me up for, with your sentimental half of the string? 'Twasn't fair."

"But 'twas true, Laura."

"Oh, Harry, don't! I've only just escaped from just such a scene, and then I'm tired, and I've hurt my foot or my ankle."

There was a hot glow in Harry Mills's cheek as he listened.

"You have just escaped, Laura? Then you were not pleased; you—"

"Oh yes, I was pleased. I made the appointment myself. Oh, I was very much pleased; but I ran away just in time."

"In time for what, Laura?" broke out the young man in exasperated tones.

She was standing still in that very attitude, her cheek against the gray old rock, and eying him with that concealed glimmer of fun. But here she drew up her slender figure, and put on a proper mask of pride as she exclaimed:

"I really can not see what right you have, Harry Mills, to ask me that question."

"Laura, I have no right; but—"

But here Laura broke in her tinkling laugh, and cried,

"Oh, Harry, what a dunce you are! I couldn't play the disinterested friend, could I, and make appointments for those who were too timid to make them for themselves?"

Harry's face lightened.

"What have you been up to, Laura?" he asked. Then his eyes suddenly spanned the coast. He saw just beyond a little craft, with a blue flag flying above the white sail. There it lay, rocking with the tide, close inshore. And there above—who was that climbing the cliffs so alertly?

"What—no—yes, it is. Laura, you haven't thrown Sue into that man's path?"

"Harry, come and help me down, if you expect me to say any thing. My foot is aching dreadfully, and I know I shall faint away if I'm not taken care of."

He might have thought that this was one of her arch tricks too, if he had not seen her face, really white and pinched with pain.

At this sight he bounded to her side and put out his arm.

"Lean on me, Laura; tell me what to do for you," he said, in the gentlest tones.

She clung to him a moment for rest, then—

"Help me down into the hollow there, Harry."

He lifted her without further words, and placed her where she directed—a natural cleft between the rocks.

"There, I shall be better in a minute. No, 't isn't a sprain; it's my lame foot—the one I hurt last winter on the ice. Once in a while I give it a twist, as I did when you made me slip on those stones."

"Laura, how can you?" he interposed.

"Then I had to stand parleying with you till I was like to faint," she went on, "because your curiosity was rampant to pry into affairs which didn't concern you. And even now, after causing all this mischief, you are dying to leave me, to rush off to that poor abused Captain Tom, and make more mischief."

While she rattled on this reckless nonsense Harry, never quite following her tricky spirit, was vainly endeavoring to discover how much was in earnest, how much in frolic, and she enjoying his perplexity as usual. Presently she broke the silence with,

"There, I'm better now, and I'll tell you all about it."

So she told of walking on the beach last night, and meeting the unfortunate Captain Tom, who plead his cause to her for intercession. When she had ended he said, looking at her gravely,

"I shouldn't have thought you'd have dared the responsibility, Laura, of doing any thing to further an affair of this kind."

She raised herself upon her elbow and exclaimed, with some vehemence,

"Why not? Why not? Dare! Do you suppose I am such a weakling that I can't make up my mind which is the right side, and follow it? If Sue had had a mind of her own she wouldn't have been veered round by other people's wills, but she would have seen that Tom Wilson had the stuff in him for a real man, which you hadn't one of you the sense to see, let me tell you. Wild! reckless! Well, what of that, when he had a good heart and a firm will beneath? I knew he'd come out right, and he has; owns half the ship, and has been complimented by the Boston firm there—what do you call them?"

"Did he tell you this, Laura?"

"My father told me last night, and Deacon Scofield confirmed it."

"Well, I am very glad I'm sure."

"You ain't, you little rue-faced old fellow! you're sorry. You'd like to keep Sue on tenter-hooks another six months; and the goose would let you if there was a reason to hang a cobweb of suspicion on."

"And how do you know but there is? What makes you believe in Captain Wilson so enthusiastically, Laura?"

"Because I believe in my instincts, and they from the first have told me that Captain Tom was better than his enemies. But you, Mills, never did appreciate him. I wish I had taken him off your hands long ago."

Harry's brow clouded. "You seem to appreciate him enough for that," he retorted.

Her eyes sparkled.

"Good! I like this. 'Stand fair and fight, my lord of Aix.'"

"No, Laura, there shall be no fighting. I should never quarrel with you," the young man answered, in a different tone. Then vehemently: "Laura, you must listen to me. You know what I have meant; you know what my feelings have been all along—that I love you, that I want you, Laura, for mine. Will you come?"

He was standing on a lower ledge than where she rested; and as he spoke, leaning involuntarily nearer, he put out his arms to her.

She caught his hands as he ceased speaking, and dropped her face against them, crying in a little passion of regret:

"Oh no, no, Harry; I love you—yes, yes, I love you dearly, but not that way. I love you partly as Susan loves you, perhaps, for I have known you all my life."

The young man bent over her much moved in some manner by her soft passion; and he asked: "Why, Laura, why can't you love me that way; because you have known me all your life?"

"No, not that. Because—oh, Harry, don't you feel it?—you are not mine, nor I yours."

"But I will make you mine, and you shall make me yours. That is what I ask, Laura."

The look upon her face would have been a smile if it had not been so full of desolation. She was suffering from "the pain of uncomprehension." If he did not feel it, how could she explain? But she presently said, gently,

"Don't you see, Harry, that we are not naturally affianced? See now. You have no sympathy with what you call my recklessness—my wild moods. I puzzle you; half the time you don't know whether I am in jest or earnest. You are amazed at the things I enjoy. And, on the other hand, you seem to me almost insensible to enthusiasm. If I were not so audacious, or if I didn't really regard you so truly, I should be chilled; but I get angry with you instead, and half your pursuits I can understand and relish as little as you mine. You think we may assimilate? Oh, fatal mistake! We are neither of us wax; we could not be moulded into any thing else than ourselves. As we are now we make capital friends; but bring us nearer and it would be like bringing two chords in different keys together—there would be discord. What is that you say about opposite temperaments forming better combinations? Well, it may be to a certain extent; but there must be likeness, and we haven't it, Harry: I do not belong to you."

The young fellow struck his foot impatiently against the rock as she finished, and exclaimed,

"Where have you got these ideas, Laura? What books have you been reading?"

All the softness vanished from her face as he said this; and she answered sharply, and with a curling lip that suggested a sneer, "I have read the books that the rest of the world reads. What I have left or what I have taken from them is what the qualities of my own mind demanded. But why should I get angry with you?" and here she relented a little of her coldness. "Half the world think as you do, that books make the reader's ideas instead of merely meeting them as inevitable conclusions, or— But what is the use of talking, Harry? We can never agree on such subjects. Which plainly proves my previous words—we have no natural likeness."

"And yet you allow that we can be capital friends," he put in, with an unbelieving look.

"Friends? yes—friends may differ essentially, and yet be very good friends, but lovers—no. If I married you, Harry Mills," she cried, with a sudden gust of passion, "I should be eternally alone on this earth!"

"Don't talk so, Laura. You don't know yourself," he answered, with provoking gentleness.

"I will talk so! And I know myself much better than you'll ever know me. Don't know myself!" and she laughed aloud in derision.

"Find me a woman who knows herself better at this point of her life. If you knew me a tenth part as well you would think yourself lucky to have escaped me. Harry Mills, you like me now because I am something different from others that you meet; because I amuse you; and because I am young and handsome. But I should make the torment of your life if I married you. You'd want to control me, and I wouldn't be controlled; and I should shock every fixed principle you possessed in rebelling. Yes," eyeing him with irritation. "I dare say you think you know me better than I know myself. You know the Laura who is your friend. The gay, laughing Laura who teases Sue and makes a seeming jest of life. But there's another Laura you know nothing about—the real Laura, too—the Laura who lives, and loves, and hates with a passion and intensity which would startle you; which I have no doubt you would call morbid. But this Laura is a stranger to most as to you. I have had the sense to conceal it here, for she is alien and wild." Here she ceased, suddenly, and dropped her head into her locked hands, with that lonely pain of uncomprehension aching at her heart.

Harry stood regarding her with a gloomy look of conviction stealing over his face. The conviction of the hopelessness of his suit, not of her beliefs. But after a while the gloom lifted a little, as he thought:

"I'll wait—this will pass"

How Laura would have laughed him to scorn could she have overheard this inward resolve!

When she raised her head, however, she saw nothing in his expression but perplexity and pain; and with some compunction for the sorrow she had wrought, and perhaps aggravated for the moment by her outspoken irritation, she said, quite gently:

"I am sorry to have hurt you, Harry."

He returned as gently, though somewhat ambiguously,

"You couldn't help it, Laura."

They walked home almost in silence; and both noticed without comment now that the little boat still rocked at the shore, the blue flag fluttering to the wind. Mrs. Wingate stood in the front-yard, talking to the Captain about "cuttin' that willer down" as they came up the road, and she broke off as she stood the dry branches from a withering shrub and thriftily gathered them into her apron.

"Why, where on earth have you been, Laura?" she said, rather impatiently, as the girl sauntered up the path. "Lucy and Hannah Scofield's been here, and waited and waited, till I told 'em 'twan't no use. You wouldn't come home till the cows did, maybe."

"Sue and I went down to the south shore," Laura answered, absently, and almost indifferently.

Harry, contrary to his usual custom, didn't stop to chat with the Captain, but hurried away, with hasty good-nights. He took the picture of that parting group, however, with an awakened sense of its incongruity. Awakened perhaps by those passionate words—"She is alien and wild."

Alien and wild she indeed looked beside the burly old Captain, with his brown knobby face, and Dame Wingate's spare angularities. True types were they of primitive New England; but for her, who stood so near and yet so far, what fitting type was there?

What resemblance is there in all that rugged simplicity, that Puritan plainness of exterior, and that flowering of nature which hovers near them? Could they have once combed out in lieu of those locks of dusty gray? Could they have ever flung out such intrepid glances from eyes of flame and fire? Could either of those gaunt figures ever have boasted such smoothly rounded outlines? Harry Mills might have asked himself all these questions as he pondered upon her words and the scene he had left, for they were plainly perceivable enough. But did he note as well the strange dissimilarity of character? The kind and generous, but utterly prosaic natures in contrast with this kindling imagination, this winged spirit of ardor and daring?

"That fawn-skin colored hair of hers,"

Alien and wild indeed did she seem in every particular, with her youth, her personal attractions, and her visible culture of books and thought, in contact with these old and simply-bred people and their way of life.

Long ago had the village gossips said to each other: "Miss Winget'll spile that girl, humoring her in all her notions; and the Cap'n's worse'n she is. I do believe they think there never was such a child."

Then when Laura was sent away to Boston for four successive years, only returning in rare school vacations, the gossips twittered on their perches still louder:

"That girl just turns the Cap'n and Miss Winget round her little finger. Well, well, they'll set her up so there won't be no living with her by-and-by. You'll see, you'll see!"

But Laura had now been home two years, and the gossips didn't see, though they looked sharply, the fulfillment of their prediction. She was as fond of the burly old Captain, and as willing to do her mother's behests as before. Perhaps a trifle quieter; the wild spirit shaded and toned down, and sometimes wrapt in some cloud of abstraction that gained for her that title by which people give a name to their own want of comprehension—odd. "Laura was such an odd girl."

But that night, as she sat on the floor before the wood-fire blazing on the hearth, she didn't seem so very odd. Her mood of abstraction had blown away like a vapor as she turned from the garden gate and followed her mother into the house. And there she sat all the evening, quite mollifying Mrs. Wingate by her flying needles, and pleasing the merry old Captain by drawing him on to tell his "wonderful tales of the sea."

Rhody, passing in and out of the room—Rhody had been Mrs. Wingate's help for a score of years—Rhody, passing in and out on household care, thought as she had thought a hundred times at similar scenes:

"Well, if they don't set their eyes by that child more 'n more every day!"

But Rhody herself, grim spinster as she was, partook a good deal of this glamour, as many a sharp word of defense from her lips could have testified, when the gossips came prying with invidious suggestions. More than once she had been heard to declare that "there wasn't such a girl any where round as Laura Wingate; that she'd beat them Scofields and Susan Mills all holler."

And still the gossips couldn't forgive Laura for being so "odd"—which meant, simply, that they couldn't forgive her dissimilarity to themselves—couldn't forgive her independent will, her power of fascination, her gay disregard of irksome conventionalities, and, most of all, those four years of Boston school-life.

"Exham Academy was good enough for Sue Mills and Deacon Scofield's girls, but 'twan't good enough for that little wild thing of the Wingates. Squire Mills didn't do any more for Harry than they'd done for that slip of a girl, and Squire Mills could buy and sell Cap'n Wingate any day."

They didn't know there was one treasure that all Squire Mills's money couldn't buy from the Wingates.

And so the four years cast a shadow for them to glower and gossip in. It was a topic that never lost interest, for every now and then fresh material was added by the arrival of some fine guests, who brought an atmosphere of the great world into this quiet coast country—an atmosphere wherein Laura moved as in her native element. They seemed to belong to her and she to them.

That very night, as she sat there plying her needles and her tongue with equal alacrity, she was giving many a thought to the contents of a letter her father had handed to her. It apprised her of the coming of one of these same guests—an old school friend of those four years.

"I shall be with you, I hope, Laura, on the 1st of July."

That was the intelligence that brightened Laura's cheeks, and dispersed her clouds as they gathered. She would see Emily Mayhew in a week. It was the last of June now; but on these Eastern shores summer lingered in its arrival, and sharp winds blowing round the Cape made the cheery blaze that brightened the broad hearths not unwelcome. In a week, however, whether southern breezes blew or northern gales struck their icy spears against the rugged rocks, there would be tropic sunshine for Laura Wingate, for one to whom she was neither alien nor wild would bring her companionship and sympathy—would bring her, too, news from the brilliant world of men and women and books, for which she secretly stretched forth her arms, to which she secretly knew herself belonging.

Two years ago she had bid adieu to such a life. Who may estimate the effects of that life upon this vivid temperament, this acute intelligence? What ardors, what enthusiasms, what subtle knowledge it must have brought to light; what thoughts and beliefs it must have set ablaze; what emotions kindled!

Two years of seclusion and banishment. The girl of eighteen was twenty. Two years of seclusion had not quenched the fire; though suppressed, it burned on steadily, shining through dark eyes, or flashing mutinously through quivering lips at rare times, when put at bay—as it shone and flashed when Harry Mills strove vainly for the mastery of her heart. But now how far away was Harry Mills or his suit—how far the love-perplexities of her “black-eyed Susan,” whose weakness and timidity she had overborne with her ardent strength!

During this week of expectation, busied over a hundred household matters of preparation, she thought little and saw nothing of Sue, until the night before her guest arrived. She had gone down to the ledge of rocks just behind the hill, and lying there half a-dream beneath the purple sky of sunset, she was suddenly roused by her name spoken, and the words, “You haven’t been near me all the week.”

She came out of her dream. “Oh, Sue!”

“So Emily Mayhew’s coming!” proceeded Sue, in a little tone of pique. “You’ll forget us entirely when once she gets here.”

A faint smile went out behind the hand Laura was leaning her chin against. Perhaps she recognized at that moment how little she had thought of the Mills for the last few days. She only said, however,

“I think you have been forgetting me, Sue; though I don’t question your right to, under the circumstances.”

Sue colored, and a flutter of pleasure stirred her mouth before she replied, rather irrelevantly, “Father and mother are quite satisfied about him now.”

“I knew they ought to be, and I congratulate you, Sue,” Laura answered, cordially, leaning forward and stroking Susan’s hand a moment caressingly. Then the two fell into silence for a while, Susan breaking it with the startling question,

“Laura, do you ever expect to marry?”

“Expect?—I hope I shall,” answered Laura, coolly, yet earnestly.

Susan laughed. “What other girl would have dared that answer!” she said.

“Why did you ask me in that tone? Why did you say expect to marry? Do you think my chance doubtful, Susan?” Laura broke in, unheeding Susan’s comment.

“Doubtful? Oh no; not in that way. But you are so different from other people, I couldn’t help wondering if you ever expected to meet any one that you would like to marry.”

“Expect”—and as Laura spoke the word again it was with an absent thrill in her tone, and still looking toward the setting sun, where all the purple was fusing into deep crimson dyes, she repeated, smiling, and flushing like the sun’s tints—“Expect! yes, I am expecting him—my Sir Launcelot—from day to day, perhaps from hour to hour. Somewhere I know he waits, as I for him. Somewhere I know that life is going on in which my own may find itself fulfilled; in which I may live and be expressed before I die. I have never looked upon his face, but I shall know him when he comes. When he comes!—ay, come!”

Suddenly she ceased, and out toward the crimson west, across the sea, she stretched her arms, with the smile deepened into dreamy depths.

Susan, strangely moved by surprise and some deeper emotions, was too overpowered to break the silence. But a shadow crossed their feet. She looked up.

“How long have you been there, Harry? What! and Captain Tom too?”

Captain Tom answered, swinging himself down from his eyrie with lithe movements,

“How long? oh, only long enough to catch a silence after talk.” But the glance he flashed across at Laura’s lighted face, in the moment that his back was toward the rest, as he alighted on the rock where they rested, gave her sure conviction that he had lost no word that she had spoken in the last few moments.

Well, it didn’t hurt her. Captain Tom was one of the few persons who never thought Laura “odd;” so she was quite willing to trust him with her words. But she fully appreciated his cool implying of ignorance, to preserve the outward unity of circumstance. But Harry Mills—had he too? Yes, he too. She knew it by the startled surprise that showed in his face—a mixed look of perplexity and amazement. And more than ever she thanked the tact of Captain Tom, who kept the outward peace so coolly. He tried to keep as well—this good-natured Captain Tom—the peaceful unities of ordinary conversation; but it was not in the destiny of that day to die so easily.

A little sentence, commonplace enough in itself, was the torch which lighted this unsuspected magazine.

“So Alice Gale is going to be married.”

“Yes, at last,” returned Sue, with that queer tinge of womanish spite.

“Why do you say so?” asked Laura, frowning at the thoughtless sneer. She, who could love and hate with equal intensity, hated likewise all useless expenditures of expression.

“Why? because it is only the fourth lover Alice Gale has had.”

Captain Tom laughed. “Ah, well, Susy, she doesn’t believe in first love as implicitly as you do.”

And here Laura flamed:

“First love! neither do I believe in it when it holds insanely to mere clay images built up by imagination. Unworthy idols that only degrade Love’s divinity. But that’s the unjust way you men and women, half of you, talk. A girl is full of attraction: not her eyes, or her hair, or her color, or the beauty of her form, is it simply, but a vitality that electrically informs the whole with a magnetism of which she is only conscious as she is conscious of life. So she wins what she never seeks. And do you suppose that any woman with heart and soul can find herself so near the heart and soul of another without some fluctuations of the spirit? Is it strange that, having moved such depths of emotion, she should be moved herself? So it happens, perhaps, that she loves partially—nay, it is almost inevitable that she does; or she may love Love in the person, and mistake the lover. Haply if she discovers her mistake before it is irrevocably sealed. And it is such women—yes, I say it, because it is truth—women who have both deep and delicate natures, whom you oftenest denounce as fickle, as coquettes, whom the mass of men speak of as robbed of her freshness. Freshness! What is this freshness which they laud? It is the crudeness which comes from inexperience, or from poverty of nature. ‘What we want,’ said one, who speaks always from the depths of the spirit—‘What we want is not simply innocence, but nobility: nobility that understands the good and the evil, yet whose garment’s hem passes by all evil unsoiled.’”

Here she ceased suddenly, leaving her auditors stunned into silence. They had heard Laura talk much heresy, but never any thing quite so startling as this outburst. At length Harry Mills’s even tones broke the silence:

“This all seems fine in theory, Laura; and to one who has never proved it, specially to one who by impulsiveness of nature naturally adopts the ultraisms of the day, I can well understand it is fascinating.”

Laura Wingate’s face was a study just then. It had been glowing before; but now, as Harry Mills spoke, something it had not worn previously dawned or flashed into it. A gleam of defiance, of scorn, and open mutiny. She hardly waited for him to finish ere her words leaped forth:

“Theory! You talk of theory as if, being a woman and young, I must perforce be a mere theorist. Yes, I am a woman and young, but I have proved enough of what I assert to know its truth.”

Harry Mills at this turned his gaze from the sea with a swift movement, and fronted the daring speaker. She went on:

“Four years I lived in the midst of a family where I met constantly some of the best and most varied society. Four years to a person of any quickness of perception is something; one can see and learn much of life in that time. Besides, the Mayhews were not people who believed in keeping young girls in the back-ground. They believed in society—society such as they had—as a means of education. So in those four years I met more men and women than I should meet in a century here. And as I learned to know them I learned to know myself too. What I learned was sufficient to prove my theory.”

She concluded abruptly, with a little shake of her shoulders, such as a person might give who feels impatiently that they may have said too much on sacred things.

But Sue Mills roused her again.

“You don’t mean to say, Laura, that you have ever liked any body,” she stammered, in that shame-faced way which some girls always assume when they allude to affairs of the heart.

“Liked any body!” flung out Laura, in scornful mimicry, half veiled in her derisive laugh. “I’ve liked a dozen. Imagined them severally, perhaps, heroes, because they turned their heroic side to me; perhaps they suggested my hero to me; perhaps I supposed for a time my hero had come, as I looked upon them; and was consequently disappointed when I found myself mistaken.”

Harry Mills brought his brows together, and drew a deep inaudible sigh. Sue laughed, faintly, not quite comprehending, thinking Laura such an odd girl. Captain Tom alone, approved. He turned his bronzed face toward her and said:

“How unlike American girls you are, Laura! You remind me of French women, with, perhaps, a dash of the Celtic blood. I was once shipwrecked on the coast of Ireland, and for two months was detained in a wild shore country where the only habitable place was the great house of the neighborhood—Glengarry Hall. With true Irish hospitality they insisted upon entertaining me; and entertainment it indeed was. The father, the head of the family, was a true Celt; but his wife was a French lady. The sons and daughters partook of both natures; and such a combination! Frank, enthusiastic, and full of all sorts of arch perception, they kept you literally alive in every faculty. But the girls were so honest; that was the peculiarity. They would talk so heartily and earnestly about things our girls blush over; just as you have now, Laura.”

Little Sue looked uneasy at this outright praise, in which she had no share, and Harry glanced quickly, with his old suspicion, from the bronze face to the fair one opposite; but Laura heeded nothing of this observation. The sympathetic sense of her, so cordially expressed, warmed her heart like wine, and made her for the moment unconscious of the other’s want of sympathy. But Sue brought her back in another moment.

“You see how you have made Tom appreciate you, Laura!” she said, with an uneasy attempt at fun.

Laura elevated her eyebrows. “I don’t make any body do any thing, Sue,” she answered, and then she rose up, pulled her shawl about her, shivered a little, and said in quite another voice: “The wind has changed, I am getting cold.” Whereat they all rose, and, by tacit consent, turned homeward.

This was the last time Laura ever sat upon the rocks there with Harry and his sister, and Captain Tom. The next day brought Emily Mayhew, and Emily Mayhew brought with her the grand project which changed every thing so before another summer. This project was, that Laura should spend the winter with her at Washington. It was the year Mr. Mayhew was in Congress.

"Father and mother both said I must not come back without you, Laura."

"But, Emily, I haven't a thing suitable to wear; and I will not go unless—"

"Unless you are as fine as any body, eh?"

"Just that, Em. You know I must be well dressed to feel contented."

"But your mother will let you do any thing."

"Ye-s, perhaps; but I don't feel as if it were just right for me to spend so much. And this would seem so very much to mother, merely for clothes. I know how it would be. She would think she must economize in some way. So she would make herself uncomfortable, I know."

But Emily Mayhew had a fertile brain. She fell into silence and thought. At last:

"Look here, Laura, I can manage it. You needn't buy a thing scarcely, and yet you can be better dressed than any girl there."

"What?" and Laura's eyes were large with surprise.

"No, not a thing. You have forgotten, but I remember the loads of lovely things your father brought home from Marseilles, and Canton, and India. Your mother showed them to me, you know, that summer I visited here. She said: 'Some day Laura will have these.' Why not have them now, Laura?"

And the girl-planner sparkled with her new idea. Laura, too, caught it like flame.

Thus, full armed, they broached the subject to Mrs. Wingate. She looked grave. She hesitated. She brought up all the obstacles in the world, which these two overruled with the readiness of youth. Finally the Captain said:

"Oh let her go, let her go, Miss Wingate. She can't be young but once."

And so at last it was decided. She was to go. Then Emily Mayhew had a revel over those "loads of lovely things."

There was a blue crêpe from Canton, sprinkled all over with little white silk stars. Emily held it up against the bright complexion of Laura, and shrieked with delight at the effect. A white India muslin made her rave. Then there was pink and white coral: queer ornaments of strange woods, spicy and foreign, with settings of gold; and chains of lovely Venetian shells, fit for a mermaid to wear at her wedding.

"Oh I never, never did!" sighed Emily, fresh from her city ennui, in a rapture over these treasures. "And how came the Captain to get them?"

"Oh, sailors are always bringing things from over seas; and he said he knew I'd grow up to want them."

"The old darling!" and Emily still unfolded.

She found shawls fit for a princess. Two or three silks that would "stand alone," and odd out-of-the-way finery that would transform Laura, as she had said, into the best dressed girl in Washington. Then Emily Mayhew did for Laura what she wouldn't do for herself, and thought there never was such a frolic. It was as good as getting up theatricals. She cut, fitted, and helped Laura and Abigail Beamus, the country seamstress, to get up that unique wardrobe in a style of fashion and taste that did credit to her memory and imitation. And this was the way that Laura came to be—yes, actually not only the best dressed, but the most lovely girl in Washington that winter.

Every body who knows any thing about our "society" at all, knows something what Washington society is. Knows how life runs rapidly on in rout and revel and réunion. How the new faces, the new characters, varied and strange, flash before us in quick succession! How one gets glimpses of life and human nature in a few months here one might wait for a century elsewhere! All this "tells." Upon those who have not strength, will, purpose, it wreaks ruin. They become besotted with the outward glare and gloss and glitter. They lose individuality and become submerged; lost, finally, with the thousand brilliant particles that float down the brilliant stream. Others it educates merely. Gives them insight, penetration, experience, which enriches and matures. Laura belonged to this latter class. In three months she felt as if she had lived three years. In this swift knowledge there was much that was saddening. She had seen a great deal of social and political intrigue. Had tested a good deal of apparent sincerity. Had learned a good deal more of the intense selfishness of the great world. The beginning of the three months had found her a bright, ardent, enthusiastic girl, with much natural perception, and a wide fund of belief. The end left her as you see her. Look! There she stands, talking with Judge Wilmington. She has on that very blue crêpe, sewn all over with little white silk stars; and on her head there are those very shells of Venice, shining and silvering their pearl opaline lustre into the light of the chandeliers. But it is not her dress you want to see, you saw that at first. Not her dress, except as in contrast to the effect it had three months since. Then standing just there, and as it happens talking with just the same person—Judge Wilmington—her face was the face of a child in one sense—expectant, believing.

There has come this change to the face that waits there now. It is no longer full of fresh expectation, no longer bright with belief. If there is expectation there in the deep dark eyes, it is vague and remote. The gay plans of youth have given way to the subtle knowledge of womanhood. And for her beliefs, she still believes in God and humanity. For individual beliefs; alas how much is left to us, after that first never-doubting season! Do not think this is an exaggeration; that this is an unnatural rapidity of experience and change. It is not, I do assure you. There are times when we take long leaps in life, and others where for years we seem to float on in the same current. This long leap had come to Laura, when months stand for years.

Judge Wilmington, who had been an old friend all these three months, had been watching her face. Once she gave a little low sigh.

"What is it, Miss Laura?" he asked.

She laughed then. "I don't know, I am sure."

"Then I know better than you do;" and he told her just the conclusions we have told.

"And you find it so hollow, you are a little tired of it all, and more than that, you are saddened and surprised at such a view of the world. By-and-by you will get used to it, my child, and then you will see more clearly the simple unostentatious goodness that lies at the depths of some hearts. Miss Laura, do you remember a story you were reading the other evening?—it was one of Thackeray's—I read it myself not long ago, and I remember a few words in it very well. 'Do we know any body? Ah! dear me, we are most of us very lonely in the world. You who have any who love you, cling to them and thank God.'"

Laura's face softened. She did not speak, but she thought of a great kitchen, miles and miles away, where every thing was in contrast to the splendor before her now, but where she knew that those who sat before the blazing fire upon the hearth were thinking of her with constant love. "You who have any who love you, cling to them and thank God."

Perhaps Laura in her heart thanked Him as she thought. Perhaps, too, she felt a little sad and ashamed that for so many, many weeks she had looked upon this hollow splendor with a feverish delight that made her think regretfully of the time when she must exchange it for the dull quiet of her country home.

Judge Wilmington, who had taken a great fancy to this honest little girl from the first, and had watched her career these three months, was now watching and reading her expression. Presently he said to her:

"Miss Laura, you have tried all these gay people; you have seen all the splendid youths who appeared to carry every virtue and grace of character behind those fascinating exteriors of broadcloth and fine linen. Now I want you to see and to know a friend of mine. He is not very handsome—he is not at all fashionable—nothing like those young princes in rose-colored cravats and diamond shirt-studs opposite us. There, one of them is eying me now, as if he thought I had no business to this place beside you. Shall I go over and tell him I will give it up to him, or shall I bring this friend of mine, Miss Laura?"

"You will bring your friend before any body," answered Laura, laughing at the old Judge's quaint fun, but quite in earnest to see this friend.

So the "friend" was brought. Laura saw him leave off talking to the gentleman he was standing with as the Judge said something to him; and she fancied it was more to please the Judge than from any desire of his own. This was quite natural for a man no longer in his first youth, but the young girl was nevertheless a little piqued while she owned its justice. As he stood before her she saw a man certainly not very handsome—not at all fashionable—but he looked the gentleman, and there was power in the quiet face with its slightly weary expression. His manner was kind, and full of the simple ease of a man who had met the world; but Laura felt the lack of interest, perhaps the empressement which had characterized the manners of the men she had seen in this Washington society. Men who had possibly formed their model upon the character of him who, years before, dazzled the heads and carried captive the hearts of a great portion of this Washington society; and whose secret of popularity with women was said to be that every woman with whom he talked seemed to be for that time the only woman in the world to him. But the grave gentleman who stood talking now with Laura Wingate had taken for his model in no particular the character of this American courtier. His words were pleasant but his air was a little abstracted, which piqued Laura and made her feel uncomfortable and at disadvantage. In short, they didn't get on comfortably together at all, and when there came sauntering by one of those youths in a rose-colored cravat Laura welcomed him with relief, and Mr. Shafton rejoined his friends across the room, probably wondering what Judge Wilmington had carried him away to bore this little girl for. The Judge had watched the whole scene with a mixture of vexation and amusement; and he said to himself, half laughing, as he saw the end of his plan:

"Well, well, that comes of an old fellow like me meddling with such things. I've been a bungler."

However, he managed in his disappointment to bungle a little more before he was through with it. He couldn't abide the rose-colored cravat species, and as soon as possible he found time to draw Laura aside, and say to her, reproachfully:

"How could you send Shafton off for that pink and white boy, Miss Laura?"

And Laura answered with a good deal of spirit:

"Mr. Shafton did not wait to be sent off. He condescended to me just as long as his politeness could endure it; and I am not sure that he didn't at last, by some free-masonry, summon Tommy Peyton to the rescue."

"There's no free-masonry between such men as James Shafton and Tommy Peyton, Miss Laura," retorted the Judge, with grim humor; and Laura, vexed, and mortified, and weary, felt ill-used and "out of sorts" with every body. She went home with a new distrust of herself. Humiliated and abashed she sat in judgment on herself. I dare say it was good for her.

"Here have I been," she thought, "very scornful of the froth and foam of society, but when the solids are placed before me I don't know any thing what to do with them. I believe I have been vain and arrogant, and over-rated myself." And then a little twinge of girlish pique would rise again, and—"But I don't like that Mr. Shafton any way, he was self-absorbed and stupid, and it was all his fault," she would declare. And she really thought she didn't like him. So the time went by, and this sensitive little girl, from that one humiliation of finding herself awkward and ill at ease, and with not a thing to say, became shy of the "solid" people, and let herself drift down the gayer current with all her aspirations for a higher and nobler life aching out of sight. This kind of excitement now had lost its freshness for her—therefore it had lost zest. It was all very wearisome and unsatisfying; but with a kind of despair of any thing better in the midst of this vortex she yielded to it, from day to day, from night to night, when suddenly the merest accident helped her to a change.

It was at a crowded reception somewhere, and there was such a jam in the cloak-room at the time of their departure that she stepped into an ante-room outside, to wait for the Mayhews, who were still in the melée of shawls and wraps. She had waited a long time, she thought, and wondered they did not appear. It was getting rather annoying, too; for the crowd was thinning, and one or two young men had passed her more than once with impertinent stares of admiration. All in a moment it occurred to her that there was another door opening from the dressing-room into the hall opposite; and in dismay she realized her situation. The Mayhews had gone out on that side, and supposed that she was safely in charge of the Wilingtons, who had frequently taken her home.

What should she do? How extricate herself from this painful position? Oh, if some familiar face would appear in the throng!—even Tommy Peyton's, of which she had been so weary not an hour ago. Every moment it was growing worse; for most of the ladies had gone, and the crowd was rapidly thinning. She drew her hood closer, and looked about her in despair. Thank Heaven! there was a familiar face. It seemed to her like her best friend's then. Every thing was forgotten but this feeling of relief. She started forward with outstretched hands, and a smile upon her lips.

"Oh, Mr. Shafton! Mr. Shafton!"

He came toward her with some surprise; but a few words made him comprehend her situation. In the most simple, cordial manner he manifested his care for her. The night was cold, and there was a storm coming on. Already the ground was white with snow, and the wind blew the fine icy particles in their faces as they emerged from the doorway. Not a carriage was to be obtained, and the distance was more than a mile. Her companion stopped for a moment at this view of things, and looked disturbed. He glanced down at her feet. "Have you overshoes on?" he asked. She put out a white slipper, shining with satin ribbon and pearl shells, and laughed.

"And no covering but this?" touching the silk cloak.

"We rode, you know, and made no allowance for accidents. But I am not delicate, Mr. Shafton; I have been drenched through often down on our shores at Derry."

"But you are not at Derry now. The atmosphere here at Washington is a blight for those unaccustomed to it," he answered, quickly. "But I can do something for you; you must wear this:" and he removed the cape from his cloak and put it over her shoulders. "Now," he said, "I shall make you walk very briskly; that is the best safeguard there is for you."

He was true to his word. So swiftly did he urge her along that she had some ado to keep up with him. Once he remarked:

"I dare say this is a difficult pace for you, but it may keep you from a chill." Then several times he spoke to ask her if she suffered from cold. There was little else said; for their rapid motion and the driving snow were not favorable to talk. But Laura did not find fault with him now.

Arrived at last at the Mayhews', she found them, as she conjectured, quite easy about her, supposing that she had gone home with the Wilingtons. Mr. Shafton followed her in, and astonished them, first by his presence, and then by his explanation of it. "And you walked home, Laura, in those slippers!" ejaculated Emily, in dismay. Laura put forth two little dingy drenched feet, that were so spotless a few hours before, and laughed gayly at Emily's fears.

"You'll catch your death, child," sighed Emily.

"Oh no, Em, I'm all in a glow. Mr. Shafton made me run every bit of the way." Even Mr. Shafton laughed here, but the next thing he said, quite peremptorily and gravely:

"The only thing to be done now is to take the strongest precautions. She should have"—turning to Mrs. Mayhew—"a warm bath and some hot spiced-wine before she goes to bed; and even with this, I am sadly afraid, my dear young lady, that you won't escape an influenza."

In another moment he had made his adieux and departed; and over her hot spiced-wine, after her bath, Laura merrily related her adventure, and laughed gayly at Emily, who predicted that Mr. Shafton was to be her "hero," in consideration, as she termed it, of this romantic event.

"Romantic! do you call it romantic, Em? I protest I can't see the romance of racing home over a mile of wet pavement beside a gentleman who never opens his lips but to ask some necessary question. It was kind, I allow, but not romantic."

"I suppose you would have been better pleased to have made a pretty stroll of it, oblivious of coughs, and colds, and cramps. To have had your cavalier perfectly indifferent to the inclemency of the night, while he devoted himself to the happy chance of making your acquaintance, which he should proceed to accomplish by leisurely bringing up all the sentimental subjects, comparing notes on favorite authors, discussing elective affinities, etc. He might have varied it occasionally by admiring the feet that, 'beneath her petticoat,'

'Like little mice stole in and out.'

Very wet feet they must have been too; but you would both of you have been sublimely disregardful of that."

Laura laughed. "Em, go to bed. You are too funny; I sha'n't sleep to-night; but for the last word I declare that Mr. Shafton isn't my 'hero.' Why, Em, he's middle-aged, he talks to himself, and he treats me like a grand-daughter."

Emily elevated her eyebrows, and answered out of pure fun:

"Well, you see if this middle-aged man doesn't rush round to-morrow to inquire how you are."

But she was mistaken.

Mr. Shafton did not rush round on the morrow. He met Mr. Mayhew on the street, however, and inquired how "that little girl" was after her wet feet. And two or three days following Laura was out walking, and he crossed over to meet her, smiling down upon her, and saying, "So the wetting did no harm? The air of Derry must make fine constitutions."

A word or two more and he went on, bowing pleasantly but with that half-abstracted manner which Laura had noticed at first. She no longer blamed him as self-absorbed and stupid; but he was still "middle-aged," and treated her "like a grand-daughter," she thought. But that evening at a levee he came to her and began asking her about Derry. He had spent a summer there, years ago, and was full of interest. By-and-by Laura discovered that she was talking in the most unreserved manner of her home and home pursuits, and that he was listening earnestly, or replying with warmth and respect, as if her opinions and experiences were of value to him.

"Well," said Judge Wilmington, as she passed him at the latter part of the evening—"you don't dislike my friend on longer acquaintance so much do you?"

"Oh no, I like him."

"What do you say then to coming to my house to-morrow, to dine with him and three or four more old fogies like him, Miss Laura? Mind now, there'll not be a pink cravat among them."

She nodded, laughing,

"I'll come, I'll come."

She went, and found herself in the choicest society. Men of letters and travel, chance visitors most of them, full of wit and overflowing with mellow experience. Mr. Shafton was clearly at home in this society; and Laura listened with amazement at his gayety and exuberance of fine spirits; but it was the gayety of a man, and not a boy. Later, she could not help being gratified as he left brilliant and mature women to talk with her.

She met him a good deal after this, and he became a visitor at the Mayhews. A friend of the family's, he was her friend too. Kind, thoughtful, and sympathetic, though twenty years apart from her, she found that he understood every least shade of feeling that she ever half expressed. She forgot the "grand-daughter" treatment, forgot her past annoyance, and began to regard him as such a "splendid friend."

There was about Mr. Shafton nothing of that air of conscious masculinity which always carries with it the possibility of a suitor. He had that simple manly sincerity of nature and action which is devoid of vanity, and which invites confidence. Acquaintance, then, with him was so freely natural, so earnest, and unembarrassed, that it must have been a much vainer girl than Laura to have speculated upon his preferences. And if he had this effect, it was not strange that it should go still deeper and make her unconscious of herself.

A month passed in this way. Occasionally Judge Wilmington would say to her:

"I'm glad you appreciate Mr. Shafton, Miss Laura."

And Laura would answer, honestly,

"Oh, I like him very, very much."

So occupied was she by this "splendid friend" she forgot her "hero;" but there came a day when she found him. It was at one of those choice dinner parties which Judge Wilmington—who knew every body worth knowing who came and went—had the happy faculty of getting up.

Laura in the drawing-room after dinner made one of a group of three, partly by chance, partly by choice, as such groupings come. There was Mr. Shafton, a Mr. Hunter, and herself to form the group. At first the talk included her, and though these two were so much beyond her in years and experience, she felt at ease, and expressed her thought readily. But, as was natural, she became a listener at last. It was one of those rare bits of conversation that sometimes flow out to the one or two in the corners of festive rooms, while all around and about there is the gay bustle of the occasion. The subject happened to be now some point of philosophy, involving a point of humanity, upon which the two gentlemen differed. Mr. Shafton at last, with an earnestness that had in it a noble tenderness—for he was urging the protection of the weak against the strong—presented his views at length. His voice grew soft and persuasive, with a melancholy cadence in it, as if the injustice of the world oppressed him and made him despairing; and his manner, though decided and believing, was tinged with the sadness which the knowledge of another's unbelief upon a vital question is sure to bring to one whose nature and whose habit it is to look deeply and closely into life.

And Laura listened to this earnest plea, into which all the fervor of the speaker's heart was flowing, with a rapt attention that made her face eloquent of all her admiration and appreciation. Both for the speaker and his words. She had quite forgotten herself; she was lost in the tender and heroic atmosphere that her fancy had evolved from what she heard, when, as if the intensity of her gaze had something magnetic in it, Mr. Shafton suddenly turned, in the midst of a sentence, and met her eyes. He started, paused a moment—just a breathing-space while his glance held hers—then went swiftly on to the end. And in that moment the truth flashed upon Laura. This was her “hero.”

Did she remember these sure words she had once spoken; and that she had looked upon his face many, many times, and never known it until now? There was not chance for much thought, for the end came swiftly. There was a few more words of the conversation; then Mr. Hunter rose, dropping the discussion. He had seen the look, he had marked the break in his companion’s voice, and knew that something more was pending than the matter in hand.

And Laura was alone with her “hero,” though in the midst of a festive company: for the gay hum of voices, and the sweet clangor of music, the movement and murmur, filled the room with sound and stir, and left them the magic seclusion that lurks in the midst of a multitude. He bent down as Mr. Hunter left them, and picked up the little glove she had dropped. When he lifted his head his glance again sought hers. Holding the little glove as gently as he might have held the little hand, he said, lowly:

“In my youth I read an old German story of a man who for years had been hunting for a certain precious pearl whose magic should end his wanderings and crown his life with joy. Once or twice he fancied he had found it, but time proved him mistaken. At last, when he had relinquished the hope and the search, and resigned himself to his fate, he saw shining before him, one dark and stormy night, the treasure for which he had searched so long. But youth was gone, and with it youth’s fresh and gallant bearing. How then could he hope that so fresh and lovely a thing would consent to shine upon his bosom?—Laura, I can not tell the end of the story, can you?”

“The end is what you care to have it,” answered Laura, softly.

The tender clangor of the music around, about, and above them burst forth in fuller measures here. Triumphal strains that drowned the clamor and hum of the gay voices, and bore upon its resistless tide the burden of a blissful tale, old as the world yet forever new.

“I told you he was to be your ‘hero,’ Laura,” laughed Emily Mayhew, jubilant over her congratulations.

And Judge Wilmington, after saying hearty words of approval, said, at last: “This is better than a pink cravat, Laura, isn’t it?”

And better than all, the old couple down on the shores of Derry were well pleased with this “hero.” They recognized him to be what he was—one of the world’s true men: and they knew that Laura’s heart would never grow astray from them under his influence.

Sue Mills, looking at her young and handsome lover, couldn’t understand how Laura could make a hero of that quiet, grave man who was no longer young.

Her brother understood it better. Harry Mills was candid enough to confess to himself, as he looked at this quiet, grave man, that Laura had been clearer-minded than he thought.

Rhody enjoyed the affair after her fashion.

“To think,” she said, with mock humility, to the gossips—and her voice, in spite of her demure efforts, had a savor of triumph—“to think that our Laury should a’ married one o’ them high-headed city lawyers; and she ain’t a bit sot up, nuther. I tell yew; gim me a raal downright sensible Yankee girl, with a good education, and nothin’ can spile ‘em.”

With which sensible conclusion of Rhody’s let us leave Laura and her “hero.”

SOUNDINGS.

IT was a charming day for the last week of the old year. The sky was as blue and cloudless, and the air as balmy, as if it was a sweet May morning; but, the sea, voilà une autre chose.

There must have been very heavy storms to the southward; for the waves came rolling on, one over another, with such fierce impetuosity, that the steamer was tossed here and there as if old Neptune disdained a toy so tarnished and weather-beaten as our steamer appeared. It was, indeed, an epitome of Life on board that day, so turbulent, belligerent, restive; so very dissatisfied, and yet so weary of tossing and rolling. But when I looked up to that lovely sky, the heart trembled at the thought of Who was beyond, the horror of ingratitude made me shudder, and a prayer of thanksgiving fell from my lips, prompted sincerely from the heart, for the safety of the voyage thus far, though rough and very stormy at times.

But what gladness overspread every countenance when we saw preparations made for “sounding”—sending that leaden plummet down to the bottom, to tell us of the mysteries and the wonders of this shallow water in comparison to the deep, deep soundings made by scientific men. I crept up to the captain’s side and whispered my request:

“Might I have the soundings when he was done with them?”

He stared a moment at me with his handsome and benevolent eyes, fixed doubtfully upon me.

“I feel desirous of testing them with the microscope,” I answered.

“Oh, I see, I see!” he replied. “Certainly, you shall have them as well preserved as possible;” and most admirably he kept his word.

In course of time the plates were sent me with the square bits of paper marked most carefully, and I propose to place before you the contents of some of these square bits. Many contained no animal or vegetable life; nothing but the débris of small calcareous shells in very minute atoms, and gravel of no particular formation, which would be for the reader very uninteresting, and for the geologist useless.

Of course you would like to know how I overcame the difficulties of a scientific examination of such atoms, when it was with the greatest exertion we land folk could stand at all. I will tell you how I managed. I obtained a tumbler of sea-water. I shut my room door and lighted two candles (I always carry them). What a scolding I should have received had any one in authority popped his head into my domicile just then!—but they did not. I braced my one candlestick, and the large-mouthed vial that held the other candle, tightly between the basin and the rim of the wash-stand: I then got out my glasses and magnifiers. No doubt many of you remember scent-bottles once used by your mothers and grandmothers, when perfumes were very costly. These bottles are oval with rather a large neck, made of very pure glass, and so compressed and flat that the sides almost touch each other; such a bottle served at this emergency as a trough for these little creatures. I filled the bottle with sea-water. Upon watching the different lumps of tallow I could perceive, by the moving of their cilia (small bristles), tentacula, and other signs, that some of these mysterious creatures were alive.

Now, how to free them from the tallow was the next question. I could see the upper side, and in some instances it was all I did see; but still the effort should be made to examine them as completely as possible, and give no one-sided view of their proportions. Consequently those with which I was at all dissatisfied I left for some other lover of the beautiful to find and describe. After spending a half hour in forming suggestions and then rejecting them, I hit upon the plan of heating the point of a needle with a wooden handle just warm enough to melt the tallow, raising the little atom by passing the warm needle under it, and transferring it to a camel's-hair brush it was gently placed in the flat bottle with sea-water. Holding it up under a high power before the candles, the movements (if there were any) were easily perceived; and then, perched on a trunk braced between the berth and the wash-stand, I delineated them with as much accuracy as possible upon my sheet of paper. Thus, one by one, shells and other minutæ were conveyed into the flat bottle. It was studying the beauties of Natural History under great difficulties; but these added to the enjoyment.

I must premise that these tiny creatures never entirely recovered their natural activity and elasticity. Some of the tallow must have adhered to them, and rendered the side that was downward stiff, but the upper side was perfect; their cilia and tentacula were put out and drawn in on this side with the utmost regularity. Afterward, on applying the microscope, I found very little to alter in my previous rough draft.

I have been thus explicit that the reader may understand how my illustrations were obtained. We always enjoy such an article as this more when we know the process by which it has been worked out; and in a case like this a student should be careful to describe only what was seen, and to mention frankly the process adopted to obtain these investigations.

The soundings made by our scientific naval officers with Brooks's apparatus, and sent to Professors Ehrenberg of Berlin, and Bailey of West Point, were taken, at the depth of more than two miles, from the bed of the ocean; while these are from, comparatively speaking, almost the shore, just off the banks of Newfoundland, where the coasts gradually decline to the basin of the Atlantic. It is proved beyond doubt that at the bottom of the ocean stillness and utter inactivity reign. The living never go there, but keep, as we do, on the outer edge of our graveyards as long as possible, and when they die are gradually washed down, and sink deeper and deeper, till they find a resting-place upon the bottom of the ocean.

It is yet a question to be solved how far heat and light can penetrate through water; but these little creatures can ascend to the surface, and enjoy the blessed influences of light and heat, and at their own option sink slowly into security at such a depth as our line gave. Thus there can be little doubt the shores around these mighty oceans, for many fathoms deep, serve as nurseries to fill up, in time, vast cemeteries at the bottom of the oceans—to save the ribs of the world from being abraded or worn away, as all things are on land either by water or atmospheric influences. But it is time I proceed to my illustrations and brief description.

Figure 1, I suppose, may be called Shells in the early process of formation. They were protected by several grains of gravel, which were much higher than they, and they must have been forced up into the tallow by the process of suction.—

They were of an ashy green, and appeared to be dots of ooze; but when they were placed in the bottle of sea-water they gradually threw out a vast number of cilia, and remained at the bottom, still adhering together for some days. The shell, when pricked, was not very solid, nor did it appear calcareous; if so, there must have been some foreign coloring matter in their composition. There were two small black dots, elongated into beaks, from and around which the cilia sprang;

when drawn in they reposed in small knots at the mouths of the shells. The animal inside, when picked out subsequently, was a long strip of mucus or jelly, without a vestige of a nervous system; and if it had not been for the hardness of the shell I should have concluded that they were a very minute species of sea-anemone.

and dined at his leisure. There were the remains of a mantle, with its row of filaments adhering to the interior of the shell. This was rough, much abraded on the ribs, and very coarse, of a dark Chinese blue; the inside had a small dark spot, where the little creature reposed when alive. This parasite moved slowly, lashing the water with its cilia, and a short movement of the tail. It was a sucking parasite, as evinced by its long snout. Its nervous system was very well defined. I could not find him subsequently, search as I might in the water, every drop of which I examined. I take for granted that some of the inhabitants of the vial had devoured him

Figure 3 is a variety of Clavus, either very old and rubbed, or under immediate formation. I prefer the latter supposition from the rude formation of the entire mouth and margin of the shell. The last whorl is strikingly defective. There were some rough, brown spots here and there. The shell had been recently crushed at the end, and nothing could be extracted to allow a drawing of the inhabitant to be made. Some loose cilia hung lifeless from the mouth of the shell for which I could find no owner.

Fig. 3.

Figure 4 represents specks of gravel, all of which on this piece of tallow had been abraded and worn into cones of every variety of angle. They were principally quartz. Among these were sprinkled small red particles (Figure 5), very transparent, which I take to be small grains of garnet washed down by heavy rains from the land. They were very bright and dazzling in the sun, and threw off exceedingly brilliant scintillations.

Fig. 6.

Figure 6 belongs to the family of Arca — Lamarck's genus Cucullæ — the teeth at the hinge running longitudinally instead of horizontally, as they do in the true Arca. — The two valves are not alike. It is covered with a soft, velvety fur or hair of a very dark brown, almost black, and has a deep fringe all around it. The inhabitant had evidently died very recently from a shock. It was almost transparent, with very little appearance of a nervous system. The long bristles projecting from the mouth I consider to have acted as cilia. In their early stages they all more or less have them. They could not feed themselves unless they had some such means of taking their prey. As they mature they cast off and devour these bristles themselves. Underneath there was a dark spot, which I took to be a foot; and doubtless it is one in formation. It had adhered so closely to the abdomen that it could not be separated. No doubt the creature had the power when alive of distending this portion of the abdomen so as to form a protuberance, which in time would become a peduncle or foot, which would assist it to perform its various functions when full grown.

Figure 7 is, I think, a variety of Amphisbæna — aquatic in its habits. It was dead. The body had the same thickness throughout, the head and the tail resembling each other so exactly that, except for the bulging of the membrane which falls over and conceals the eyes, you could not tell which was head or tail. It was jet black, with the two extremities a dark brown. There were evidently some scales on its upper side, but so very much amalgamated that I could not trace their markings distinctly.

Figure 8 is an animal evidently in its larva state. It was bright red, and moved through the water very slowly and awkwardly, and appeared to have been detached from either a rock or a piece of vegetable matter, as it had lost the two hooks from its tail. The remnants were hanging to the last segment.

Fig. 9.

Figure 9 is the half of a Glaucus, but dark and dingy; very unlike his beautiful confrères of blue and silver found in the Mediterranean. I am inclined to think the plummet divided it, the branchia with their long fringes were so soft and fresh, and the rupture appeared quite recent.

Fig. 10.

Figure 10 represents grains of gravel, most of which on this piece of tallow had lost their angles, and were worn into seams and ribs: they were principally quartz.

Fig. 11.

Figure 11 is an animalcule. The upper part is transparent, the lower half filled with a dark fluid. It flashed through the water with great swiftness, lashing out its cilia right and left, and steering its course by the long bristles behind. As soon as it reached the bottom of the bottle it disappeared in an instant. I suppose it went down head foremost into a mouth open to receive such a bonne bouche.

Fig. 12.

Figure 12 is a sponge of the Halichondria genus. The skeleton is supported by spiculæ, which are very silicious. It is very minute, but very similar, if it is not the same, as is found on the English and Irish coasts. The two specimens were attached to a stem of sea-weed, and did not appear very lively.

Fig. 13.

Fig. 14.

Figure 14 represents grains of gravel, their angles being worn down by friction; they will become in time quite oval and round.

Figure 15 is evidently a variety of Clio in a transition state, as appears from the tentacles of its mouth. The fleshy lips were not to be seen as yet. In this early stage, no doubt, they have cilia instead of a tongue. It could hang upon the side of the bottle by the flat end of its tail, and swing the cilia in every direction, as if making a grand haul of something more minute than itself. Finally it disappeared as the other had done, and I saw it no more.

Fig. 15.

Fig. 16.

Figure 16 represents the largest pebble brought up by the lead. It is about a quarter of an inch long, very dark round the edges, and of a grayish green on the top. It has a fawn-colored band running round it similar to the "lucky stones" met with in England and Ireland. It would be the "highest disrespect," and wanting in reverence to "the little people" (the fairies), if you did not hasten to pick it up, and, while so doing, make a wish, which the good people will be sure to have answered. I made a wish when I took it from the tallow, and if "it comes true" I shall have it mounted in a ring or a pin to show my great respect for these sea-nymphs. I suppose they belong to the same family, and go ashore to dance in the ring on the green sward, with their cousins when the halcyon gales of summer blow. I see you smile, but believe me when I tell you the belief of such aerial creatures is not exploded. I have of late met hundreds who firmly believe in their presence at times.

Fig. 17.

Figure 17 is an Aspergillum before it has undergone its last transformation. If you have them in an aquarium, which you can easily accomplish since the dredgers on the coasts bring up many at times, you will perceive that when old enough they cast off the disk with the cilia around it, and show a disk perforated with many more holes, and a corolla full of tubes around it. I picked off the disk of this one to get at the animal. There was nothing to be seen but a string of gellatine, with no marks of form about it. It may have been dead some time.

Figure 18. You perceive here that the gravel is losing its angular form more and more. I generally selected those grains which appeared to be the representations of the mass.

Fig. 19.

Figure 19. Here is a little animal which has caused me a vast deal of thought, and even now I can not assert as a positive fact its true history, but I shall tell you what I know of it, and shall feel happy to be set right if in error, or shall be gratified for any farther information concerning it. After heavy September gales there is an immense quantity of debris of various kinds washed up on the shores of the islands bordering along the Southern States. On sea-weed and other marine products you will find these little animals, denuded of their shells, clinging by their long cilia in bunches to these waifs of the ocean. Off Cape Hatteras the lead has brought them up in the shell and out of it. Some "whale's food" which was brought me from the Pacific was composed entirely of this small animal. There was not a Clio—the supposed food of the Greenland whale—to be found, nor a specimen of the Clionidae in the jar. Nothing but these small creatures, tangled in an inextricable web, a mass of green, pulpy, gelatinous, fibrous-looking jelly. It was quite a vivid green all over, except when a dark spot was seen, where an animal more fully developed than the others would be found, they hung together in this mass entirely by the long cilia or hairs. We know the Clionidae are naked, with two little fins, which they ply very actively when they have room to swim, which from their vast numbers is not often the case. I think the "whale's food" changes with the season, and that several varieties serve them during certain portions of the year. These small shells cover the coast of some parts of Greenland, to judge from the examination under the microscope, of the sand and earth from thence. The shell, you perceive, is only a half of one. It belongs to the family of the Buccinum, commonly called "Whelks." It is coarse and not highly polished, of a dark-brown color, with a lighter shade of the same between the ribs. The animal is of a transparent green hue, while in the shell. The cilia, which are very numerous, are transparent, except at the tips, where they are greenish. It is fastened into the shell by two horny substances at its back, which are left behind when it quits the shell, which is likely when they have reached their maturity, leaving it to sink or be washed on the most adjacent shore. They float away, clinging to each other, away through the genial Gulf Stream, gathering in a larger mass as they go, until they reach the Pacific, when the Balea mysticus, the true "Greenland whale," comes rushing through this green field, its mouth wide open, with its whale-bone sieve, engulfing myriads of these small animals at every gurgitation. They have the power while in the shell of drawing up the cilia; but when the shell is cast off these become much fewer in number, and cling closely round each other. The back of the shell was in the tallow, so the insect was not injured. It had the power of passing the cilia over the edge of the shell, to render itself more secure. In trying to force it up with the needle to put it on the slide, almost every bristle or cilium was torn from its body, which exhibited nothing under the glass but a pulpy speck, with two small sacs filled with a greenish fluid. Its head was elongated into somewhat of a beak, which was drawn in to the first section of its body, and was never again protruded, as it died immediately when it was forced from the shell. Figure 20 is the back part of the shell. I hope at some future day to follow up this little animal, intruding itself before me off and on for nearly twenty years.

Fig. 20.

Fig. 21.

Figure 21. This shell belongs to the genus Lecteria, judging from the hinges with its two cardinal teeth, and the small pit of a triangular shape. It was a dull, ugly shell, gray and black on the edges. It had acted as a guillotine to a poor marine mite, as a head and some cilia hung from its edge.

Figure 22 is a variety of Clausilia, although defective or broken at the mouth. It was very much rubbed, was coarse, and grainy, which testified to its long resistance to the action of the sea. A little black dot, with three fibrous, stiff cilia protruded from the mouth. The head of a parasite, which had taken possession of this shell during the life of the former occupant or afterward. The true animal resembles somewhat a snail, and has tentacula instead of cilia. They are generally found near water, on the banks of rivers, at the foot of trees, in moss, or under lichens. It may have been washed into the ocean in the debris of some river, or there may be aquatic varieties belonging to the ocean, of which we only know of what is on the surface, and that much very superficially.

Fig. 23.

Figure 23 represents grains of gravel, worn into very small bits; I might almost say they were grains of coarse sand. They were all quartz.

Fig. 24.

Figure 24 is a Pectenulus, very beautiful. It was as transparent as glass, with the slightest shading of calcareous matter. It had a slight fringe round it, much worn away in parts. It was nearly covered with grains of sand, which protected it from the rough shock of the waves. There was no sign of an inhabitant; it must have been tenantless a long time. I took the grains of sand very carefully away from around it, and luckily copied it before I touched it, as it crumbled to pieces when I touched it with the forceps.

Figure 25 is a Terebratula, a coarse black shell, with no inhabitant. The valves must have been closed, but were separated by the stroke of the lead. Figure 26 is a branch of seaweed. Its color the darkest of brown. Its fronds all crinkled and twisted. Small berries on short stems sprang from the main branch, and feelers hung loose as if seeking something to which they could cling. I have never seen this sea-weed before, not even among the vast varieties on the English and Irish coasts, with which I am quite familiar. I dried it under the usual process, but it shrank into a knot resembling a small piece of black thread, and even when it was returned to the water it did not expand.

Fig. 30.

Figure 27 represents a vast number of black specks found among the gravel, which are evidently atoms of coal.

tached to a piece of oyster-shell; its color a very dark-red brown. The second and third of the globules had the power, when touched, of receding into the largest, clinging with several hooks or tentacles to the oyster-shell. When thus hidden the long cilia looked like the tentacles of the sea-anemones. It died almost immediately. It must have been injured in some way, for they are generally quite tenacious of life. We can only wonder there was life in any of them, when we consider with what force the plummet must strike the bottom to bring up what will adhere to the tallow. It must only have been by the gravel and stones being higher than they: the tallow forces them up by suction.

Figure 30 is the cast-off skin of a worm. Fancy this frail, fragile thing coming up from such a distance in such good preservation: the grains of gravel must have protected it.

Fig. 31.

Figure 31 is another variety of Clausilia. It was rough and weather-beaten, and defective at the mouth. It really looked as if it had been patched, or rather pieced, by its former occupant, as the extreme end was still unfinished, and no whorls marked on it at all. A black spot, and a few cilia of a parasite, showed the last inhabitant of this little tenement. From the similarity of appearance and structure of these parasites I have no doubt they are the natural enemy of this variety of Clausilia, and take up their abode within the shells when they have devoured their builders, and either undergo another transformation or die in their usurped habitations.

Fig. 32.

Figure 32 represents pieces of mica, quartz, and gravel worn quite flat and transparent; there was much grayish blue sand mixed with them.

Figure 33 shows a pair of Zoophytes, belonging to the genus Campanularia, as its ringed stalks proclaim. They were attached singly to a piece of shell, apparently a piece of a crab or lobster. They were of a dark chocolate color, with yellowish tentacles, but soon closed down, folding them in and never revived. There might have been something offensive to them in the crowd with which they were associated at the bottom of the bottle.

Fig. 34.

Figure 34 represents Zoophytes of the same family, judging from the twisted and ringed stalks, but differently shaped. Their color was a faded yellow, and could with difficulty be distinguished from the tallow. They were attached singly to a flat piece of quartz. I could not free them from the tallow, and they sank very soon to the bottom.

Fig. 35.

Figure 35, I feel assured, is the parasite found so repeatedly in the shells of the Clausilia. It was very active in the water. It appeared to have segments; and its nervous system consisted of two long tubes and a shorter one, at the end of which was a small sac filled with a dark fluid.

Fig. 36.

Figure 36 I should suppose to be a portion of the last whorls of a shell. It resembled a Tri-ton's horn; and who will assert there may not be in all these sea changes creatures small enough to make sweet music in a mermaid's cave from such a horn as this?

Figure 38 represents mud, nearly the color of the celebrated Boue de Paris, a mixture of clay, black marl, and white sand, with no foreign matter, either vegetable or animal, with it. A true, authentic lump of mud, proclaiming as distinctly as the olive branch in the dove's beak that land was near.

Fig. 38.

Here my studies of these deep-sea mysteries must end. You will perceive, gentle reader, that I have given no names at a venture. I have contented myself with illustrating them as correctly as was in my power under the circumstances at the time, and giving them a strict re-examination when ashore. I give you merely the families they belong to, leaving for another day, and perhaps a better chance, a more scientific and especial description.

I hold the opinion, that the immense varieties in the numerous host found in the depths of the sea to be so fathomless that the leads of no two ships may bring up the same animals or specimens, even if only a few yards apart; therefore where was the use of seeking names for animals which perhaps neither you nor I may ever see again, as you perceive they appeared singly, therefore were not in colonies to authorize an expectation of finding them very numerous at some future day?

I must recall to you here Mr. Maury's beautiful paragraph: "The wonders of the sea are as marvelous as the glories of the heavens, and they proclaim in songs divine that they too are the works of holy fingers." My illustrations are strictly "Authentic tidings of invisible things,

Of ebb and flow, and ever-during power,
And endless peace, subsisting at the heart
Of everlasting agitation."

HOW IT HAPPENED.

LONG ago I had decided just how and when I should fall in love; and had plainly seen, in my mind's eye, the lady who alone could fill my heart. She should be tall, brilliant, and stately, with glorious black eyes and hair. Her mind should be stored with knowledge, and her heart should be filled with—well, with me, of course. As to time, I had resolved not to even look for my paragon until I was twenty-seven.

On my twenty-second birthday I left the paternal roof and proceeded to New York to earn a fortune for the future Mrs. Smith and myself. And in less than a month fell desperately, irretrievably in love with a sweet young blonde, tiny and fragile, who hated the very sight of a book, and looked with sublime indifference upon my unhappy self.

Oh! how I loved her!

She was a second-floor boarder in the house which I had selected as a temporary abiding-place—an orphan, under the protection of a maiden aunt. There were four other lady boarders in the house, but Julia Darley, my Julia, was the flower of them all.

Mrs. Green, the keeper of the boarding-house, was the mother of a maiden who, compared with my unattainable Julia, was as rock is to crystal, as darkness is to light; and yet this maiden, even while my heart throbbed for another, dared lift her eyes admiringly to mine! Call it not conceit—the thing was plain.

Imagine my feelings then, when, one day sauntering into the parlor, and finding Miss Green there alone, I was accosted with:

"Mr. Smith, I feel I ought to communicate my intentions to you—unless, indeed, through the gossip of the house, you know them already."

Shuddering at the innovations of modern novelists, and intending to abash her into silence, I replied:

"I am acquainted with them, Miss Green, and I must say, once for all, that both circumstances and inclination prevent me from being willing in any way to—to—"

"Oh, as for that," interrupted Miss Green, loftily, "I shall not press the matter; though [with a sigh] I am very sorry to lose you, and mamma I know will be keenly disappointed. My up-stairs rival is too powerful, I find."

"Miss Green!" I gasped, "pray explain yourself—I do not comprehend—your rival?"

"Yes, my rival," responded Miss G., without a blush; "for as you have refused in advance the offer I was about to make you, I must certainly infer that you have promised yourself to Miss Darley."

Bewildered, and yet determined not to appear behind the age, I managed to say, with a ghastly smile:

"I am sorry, my dear lady, that you feel compelled to draw such an inference; but how do you know that Miss Darley wants me?"

"Oh! that is no secret," returned Miss Green, with rather a toss of the head. "She has had her eye on you ever since you came to the house, and only yesterday told Mrs. Scott on the fourth floor that she only wished she could secure you."

"Miss Darley said this?" I exclaimed, horror-stricken, yet not utterly wretched.

"Certainly she did; it's her way. But you're not bound, of course, to follow her fortunes unless you choose; or if you do not like her—"

"Like her!" I echoed, passionately; "I—"

I was going to say, "I love her! I idolize her!" when the landlady came in the room, just in time to save my dignity from utter wreck.

Seizing the opportunity and my hat at the same time, I bowed hastily to both ladies, and left the apartment.

In the solitude of my own room I sat down to meditate on the remarkable interview through which I had just passed. For Miss Green and her unwomanly offer I simply entertained feelings of contempt. But what meant those insinuations concerning my Julia? Dear, dear girl! Can it be that she loves me in secret? But those horrible words, "Meant to secure me if she could!" No, no—I will never believe she said them. At most she may, in the innocence of her heart, have confided her feelings to a false friend. I will never believe it. And yet Miss Green called her her "rival." Women can detect each other's feelings more quickly than we men can. Oh, what if Julia love me, after all!

All that night, sleeping and waking, my heart kept echoing these words. The next day's work could not drive them away. What if she love me! What if she love me! How the thought lit up the dull back-office, and gilded the very edges of the "blotter!" How I scribbled "Love" and "Julia" on bits of waste paper, and then wrote "Cash" and "Scrimpskins" over the words so that nobody could read them!

Well, when I returned to my room that afternoon I concluded to relieve myself then and forever. To say that I spoiled a quire of "cream-laid" is to make a moderate estimate; finally I produced a missive which I flatter myself would have done credit to any young man of twenty-two under similar circumstances. It was an epistle to Julia, telling her of my deep, my abiding love, of my prospects in life, of my resolve to win fortune and renown for her sake. In short, I told her all my hopes and fears; begged her, in case she could at all reciprocate my emotions, not to divulge to mortal soul what had passed between us; and concluded by imploring her to pen me a line in reply.

Carefully folding my letter, and directing the envelope in my best hand to "Miss Julia Darley," I watched an opportunity, slipped it under her door, and flew up stairs four steps at a time.

Unluckily for me, I ran into a nervous boarder, named Hopkins, at the first landing-place. As I appeared flushed and confused, he at once regarded me with suspicion.

"Holloa, Smith! what on earth is the matter with you?"

"Matter?" I panted, pushing furiously past him—"nothing."

He caught me by the arms.

"Smith," said he, "you are ill!"

Fearing that Julia would hear the commotion, and driven to desperation, I hissed into his ear,

"Yes, small-pox—let me go!"

He needed no second hint, but hurried down stairs, muttering something about sending up help as he went.

Seating myself by my open window (for it was summer), I was soon lost in conjectures concerning the reception of my note. By this time Julia had certainly read it; nay, in all probability she was already bending her blushing face over the asked-for reply—Why, there was Julia herself on the opposite sidewalk! She halted—crossed the street—rang the bell—the door opened and closed. Now she was surely on the stair! I rushed to the hall and leaned over the baluster. She entered her room. Now she would read the letter! Now I should learn my fate!

Before my head was raised from the interesting survey I heard a shrill voice, from the hall above, exclaim,

"Oh mercy! There he is! Don't stand there in the hall, Mr. Smith! Go into your room for Heaven's sake!"

This was pleasant, to say the least. However, I obeyed orders, and resumed my seat at the window.

Presently the very air seemed thrilled by a rustling in the hall. Turning, I saw something white thrust nervously under my door. It was a folded piece of paper.

With a beating heart I picked it from the carpet, and read:

"MR. SMITH,—I implore you to leave this house at once, if you are able to walk. Never mind paying your bill. I can wait. Your room shall not be entered until you return to it. The new family come to-morrow. As there are nine children I do not wonder at your refusing my offer of taking a dollar per week less than formerly from all the old boarders who would remain with us. Yours in deep sympathy,
M. GREEN."

Just then another slight rustling occurred in the hall, and in an instant the tiniest letter in the world twitched itself in under the door. It contained these words, traced in a fair, feminine hand:

"MY DEAR MR. SMITH,—Thy sweet words have filled me with surprise, and awakened emotions which I believed were dead within me. You are young, but there is promise of a fine character there. Brief as have been our interviews, I have detected your powers of mind, and they are worthy of my heart's purest and best love. If you really feel that you can be happy with me, I CAN offer you the 'ray of hope' to which you allude so beautifully. Yours (in all probability), JULIA."

The first perusal made me half wild with bliss; the second excited a sense of mystery, and the third convinced me that joy at my proposal had driven the poor girl deranged. That allusion to my youth—what could it mean? "Promise of character," too—what! in me?—in me, who felt myself to be already a care-worn, thoughtful man, older in experience and wisdom than Methuselah himself? What could it mean, indeed, but that the writer was demented?

She loved me, though—that was evident. Meanwhile how could I see my enchantress; how enjoy an interview with her away from that horrid, over-dressed aunt who was always at her elbow? Ah! a thought struck me: I would see her at once—I would test her love! Without calculating the consequences I hastily wrote the following lines:

"DEAR MISS JULIA,—I am confined to my room. The landlady will tell you what is the matter. If you love me, hasten to my side. I am alone in a large city—alone and friendless.
Yours forever,
"JAMES."

Fearing another encounter in the hall I crumpled up my note, and attaching it to the end of a roll of thread I cautiously let it down from my window, trusting that no observing eyes would mark me from the street.

It was seen, however, from the window below—a hand was stretched forth, the thread hastily broken, and the note drawn in.

Soon I heard a light step ascending the stair—then down again—then it returned—it passed along the hall—it halted at my door! The knob turned, and Julia's maiden aunt rushed into the room:

"James," she cried, "I have come to you—" and fell fainting at my feet.

"Hallo!" thought I, as I dashed a tumblerful of water into her face, "what does all this mean?"

Her eyes opened; "James," she murmured, stretching forth her hand, "I have no fear of it. Living or dying I am thine!"

"The deuce you are!" I muttered, sotto voce. Then aloud, while bowing at a respectful distance, "Really, Madam, there is some mistake here. Leave me, I pray you."

"Heavens!" cried the maiden aunt. "He does not know me. It has gone to his brain already!"

"But I do know you," I insisted; and I repeat, you are laboring under some fatal error, Miss Darley."

"Miss Darley!—oh no, call me Julia. Do not drive me away—let me soothe that poor, distracted—"

"Julia!" I interrupted, forcing her away from me, "is your name Julia, too, Madam?"

The sharp eyes of the maiden aunt lost their tender expression in an instant. "Is my name Julia too—oo. What do you mean, Sir?"

"Why, I mean," I replied, recoiling, "I mean—in short—that—in other words—I didn't know your name was Julia."

"And your letters?" she gasped, getting ready, I felt sure, to faint again.

"They were addressed to your niece, of course, my dear Madam."

"Of course!" screeched the aunt, now too angry to think of swooning. "And you dared address yourself to that child—that school-girl?"

"But really, Madam, I—"

"Silence, Sir. Don't Madam me. Oh that I should have risked the horrors of contagion for such a wretch!" And clapping her hand to her mouth, she started pell-mell for the door.

In vain I asked her pardon, and shouted that I had not the small-pox. She was down stairs before the words were spoken. Her door closed with a bang. "Now for a dénouement," thought I; "the whole house must have heard this racket." I listened; all was still as death. I did not know that my landlady and her daughter were locked in their garret-room, not daring to descend until they were certain I had left the house. The sound of what they believed to be my raving had alarmed them only the more.

Leaving a hasty note on my table containing an unconditional surrender of my apartments, and, as nearly as I could estimate, the amount due for board, I packed my valise and peeped into the hall. The way was clear; not a human being was to be seen. In another moment the street-door of that mansion closed behind me forever.

At the corner who should I meet but Julia—the Julia, looking lovelier than ever. Scarce conscious of what I was doing, I halted before her and exclaimed,

"Why, Miss Darley, how came you here? I thought you were in your own room."

"So I was a few moments ago," she returned, with a frank smile. "I have only been around the corner to see the doctor."

"The doctor!" I echoed, with some anxiety. "You surely are not ill, Miss Darley?"

"Oh no; but the fact is, I am anxious concerning aunt. It is, perhaps, wrong to tell you, and yet—"

Of course I protested that she was doing exactly the right thing; that I would be only too happy, etc., etc., etc. Meanwhile we found ourselves walking slowly up the avenue.

"It is very strange," she continued, as we moved on together. "Aunt has never shown symptoms of any thing of this kind before, though, perhaps, I notice it more now that I am about to leave her. Did you not know it?" observing my startled look. "I am going next week to live with another relative in Twenty-third Street. Aunt has been so absorbed of late in her plan of hiring a house and taking boarders that it may have been too much excitement for her. She acts very, very strangely. I really fear that she is becoming deranged."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. When I returned home this morning after my drawing lesson I found her in the most singular state of mind imaginable. She is nearly forty, you know, yet she declared that she felt herself to be too young to keep a boarding-house, and must give up the idea entirely. Then she asked me how many bridesmaids I liked at a wedding, and hinted something about the iron bands of secrecy, and that there was no time, no age with love, and ever so many other strange things. Next she wrote a letter; and when I offered to post it for her she declared she would not trust it even in an angel's hands, and flew out of the room with it, begging me, for Heaven's sake, to stay where I was. After she came in again she seated herself by the window and sighed, then looked up at the sky and smiled—oh, so strangely!"

"Dear me!" I ejaculated, feeling that I must say something.

"Yes, but that isn't half. In a few moments a piece of a boy's kite, or something of that kind, fluttered down by the window, and would you believe? she actually snatched it from the string, looked at it an instant, pressed it to her lips, and then ran up to the landlady's room. Soon she came down again, looking just as pale as—as any thing. Then she clasped her hands and exclaimed, 'I have decided!' (wasn't that queer?) and kissed me, and ran out of the room, begging me on no account to move until her return."

"Dear me!" I exclaimed again, for want of something better to say.

"Well, do you know, in a little while she came back, oh, in such a rage! So mad, too, because I had been named after her; and when I implored her to tell me what was the matter she shook her head fiercely at me, and said 'All the scoundrels were not dead yet.' Oh, I'm sure she's crazy," added the poor girl in a distressed tone.

"Undoubtedly," said I, solemnly.

"The doctor can't go to her for two hours yet. What shall I do, Mr. Smith? Oh, it's dreadful!"

Thus appealed to, I decided to make a clean breast of the whole affair. Forgetting my bashfulness, forgetting the heavy valise hanging from my left hand, I told her all, my love, my sufferings, my day's adventures, my present hope.

It was better there—there in the crowded avenue—for her veil hid her blushes and our faltering tones did not disturb the passers-by. Once she laughed—once she sighed "Poor aunty!" and at last, when we were nearly up to Fiftieth Street, she said in reply to a delicate hint,

"Oh yes, I am sure Aunt Emily will be most happy to have you call. It is No. 40."

"I shall be very grateful to Aunt Emily," I persisted; "but her niece—will she be glad to see me?"

Oh how beautiful a blush is through a black dotted veil, and how plainly one can see when a little hand trembles, even when it is steadied by a parasol!

"Certainly, Mr. Smith. I am always happy to see my friends."

It was non-committal to be sure; but I am naturally sanguine, and a young lady isn't apt to say "f-r-i-e-n-d-s" as though she could scarcely speak, unless she means more than she is willing to express—at least I found it to be so in Julia's case.

So you see, reader, I could not fall in love at twenty-seven, as I had intended, or with that tall, stately, dark-haired girl, because I met Julia in the mean time. Her eyes seem to grow bluer and her hair more golden every day; still I am satisfied, and very, very glad that things "happened" as they did.

Aunt Julia and I are pretty good friends now. She, too, is married. It was a short courtship; but the Doctor makes her a capital husband, in spite of Miss Green's malicious remark that "a widower with four children wasn't much of a bargain."

DOOMED TO MUSIC.

"IT'S in him," said Mr. Benjamin Brown, oratorically. "And mark me, Sir, it must come out!"

"Well, let it come out, if it will," answered Uncle Tompkins. "I don't pretend to know much about genius, but it strikes me that the thing has a spontaneous gush and don't need all this Artesian boring."

"Artesian boring! Nonsense! We have only dug a channel—trained the too impetuous flow into depth, and purpose, and beauty. It was Nature touched the rock, we only accept and guide the overflow. Haydn is bound to be a musician."

"Then you will persist in dooming him?"

"My dear Sir, I see no alternative but a shocking waste of talents. He has given unmistakable evidences of his power already, and I look upon it as a precious legacy to be carefully nurtured, not ruthlessly thrown away."

Uncle Tompkins, who had been reclining on a lounge, sat up, wiped his face with his great cotton handkerchief, and evinced a new interest in the conversation.

"I'll tell you, Brown, being that you are determined on this thing, what I would do. Give your boy—why the dickens did you call him Haydn?—a companion of similar tastes, a musical companion if you like—say a young woman. Don't shut him off from the world. How would the Third Ward do?"

"The Third Ward?"

"Yes, certainly," laughing. "I call her the third, as she is. Mary was the first, Susan the second, and Celia is the third. She is a musical genius, and in my barren house I half suspect is pining away secretly, though you wouldn't think it to hear her. I'll send her out here. It will be a good arrangement for both of them. Her father died in New Orleans several years ago, and she is as poor as a church mouse—as you probably know—but that is neither here nor there. If you want a musical companion for your boy she's the person. I'll send her out."

Then Uncle Tompkins replaced the cotton handkerchief over his face and fell back gently upon the lounge, leaving Mr. Brown standing in the centre of the room with his hands behind him, virtually cut off from any rejoinder. He did not stand long, however; he turned and paced up and down the room in a noiseless and contemplative manner. Thinking, undoubtedly. It was retrospection. That word "doom," coldly suggestive, had touched something in him, and his son's experience in life came back vividly from the cradle to the christening—picture by picture; but there was nothing cruel or hard in the record to the father. They had met the boy at the threshold of life with their doom ready prepared; the first remonstrance of the little lips was proclaimed to be a proof of his fitness, and the whole assemblage of relations at subsequent gatherings, who either had an intuitive perception of the parental dogma, or held theories of their own not dissimilar, insisted upon the musical bias already discernible, and gave him a musical name. Then they swathed him with art, tied him up in early discipline, and the first inclination of the sturdy young twig under the pressure was hailed as an evidence of natural proclivity.

Far back the Browns were broad-shouldered, hard-fisted fellows: nothing like a daisy of genius had ever glinted forth; but here was a divergence in the family line. Something to be coddled and coaxed into precocity and pre-eminence. So means were not spared nor eloquence withheld.

"And he has advanced," said Mr. Brown to himself. "Why, I can see it. And this companion will doubtless finish the business by awakening his ambition."

He walked the floor some time in deep meditation, until a snore from under the handkerchief recalled his thoughts, and then he stole out of the room on tip-toe.

Uncle Tompkins, having completed his week of recuperation, had his fowling-piece brought out of the store-room, its contents discharged, and then posted off back to the city. In less than a week the Third Ward arrived, escorted by a young gentleman named Tom Barrows. From that day a new condition of affairs was inaugurated; new relationships, new prospects, new feelings, at Slightington. The house of Mr. Brown no longer echoed with the intricate but wearisome exercises on the piano. Bach and Von Weber were displaced for Verdi.

On the day she arrived Haydn was deep in thorough-base, in the room devoted to his studies. He sat at the open window for an hour. Suddenly he threw the book down with an expression of disgust, and broke out into open protest:

"It's no use!" and then catching a glimpse of a new thrashing-machine, stationed out on the lawn and surrounded with curious men, he put on his hat and went off to inspect it.

A comely lad he appeared, walking across the grass. Straight, long-limbed, and intelligent, but with a listless air—a vacant, purposeless carriage, that did not accord with the meaning of the eyes. The great lumbering vehicle with the drums and straps interested him.

He listened to the remarks of the rough practical men who criticised it; he caught the meaning of the intricate combination. It pleased him. Something seemed to interpret for him the inventor's aim, and translate the language of the wood and iron. His hands were drawn from his pockets, his cap pushed back; there was a new eagerness in his eyes that thorough-bass had never awakened. They were hitching the horse to it when his sister Matilda came to announce Celia's arrival, and she was compelled to pull him away.

The meeting of the victim with the Third Ward was in the music-room. She, all vivacity, came and presented both her hands; he, diffident and confused, formed a hasty opinion that she was the most brilliant gossiping creature he had ever seen. Whereas she was a very plain girl with bright eyes, dark curls, and not very classical nose or chin. Besides, there was a patronizing air about her that did not please him.

"We shall get along bravely together," as though a tutor had said it. Was he a protégé?

Slightington never saw such a character before. Such conversational powers, versatility, wit, and occasionally recklessness. Haydn sat down to the instrument to verify report for her, and undoubtedly exerted himself to his utmost, for she applauded enthusiastically. How long had he studied? So many years! and been through all that music piled there? Would he like to hear her?

She took his place, and the contact of her white fingers with the instrument made him shrink as from a blow. He had never heard any thing like it. Such a fusillade! Such rapidity! A wonderful electrical response! The instrument seemed to flash all manner of odd strains and cadences; arias volleyed, and leaped, and commingled in glorious abandonment. Every voice that slept among the wires seeming to break out into the articulation of revelry at her command. It was all new and grand and cruel to him. He looked quite over the music and saw his own barren pathway. There was a mistake somewhere!

After she had run her fingers over the last octave, and broken out in a laugh that seemed a continuation of it, she turned suddenly to encounter a sullen face, half averted, as though he were listening and despairing at the same time.

"You are a musician?" he said.

"Yes, a natural one, they tell me."

"They are right. You love the piano. I hate it."

"Oh, then we shall agree perfectly. Do you know, I don't like to see a man at a piano."

He accepted her taste in the matter at once, and abandoned the instrument; threats nor promises could prevail upon him to return to it. The Third Ward reigned. New echoes filled the house, and Haydn, growing daily more moody, gave up the music-room to Tom Barrows.

There were festivals, and picnics, and concerts at Slightington; but never again appeared the victim on the stage to receive the bouquets of Matilda, as often before. He told them he had grown out of it. But as two years rolled away, and Tom Barrows continued to make regular visits at the house, sometimes bringing his Morgan horse for Celia to ride, Haydn grew to dislike Barrows quite as earnestly as he did the piano.

"Have you relinquished your studies altogether?" she asked of the victim one afternoon, when he was lolling listlessly under a tree.

He spread his linen coat upon the grass for her to sit upon, and looking her in the face, said,

"Do you think I can ever make a musician?"

The Third Ward would have laughed had she not pitied him.

"How can I tell? Success belongs to perseverance."

"Yes, you might tell my brother Joshua that. It is true enough for a blacksmith, but for a—"

"Do you wish to earn success? I ask you this, because I came here to assist you, and it looks as though I had returned evil for good. Has all your ambition departed?"

"No; on the contrary, it has just arrived. I never had any before. Yesterday was my birthday; I am eighteen years old, and think of making a bold strike."

The Third Ward laughed. "A bold strike" was ambiguous. It might refer to a new style of piano-pounding; it might mean a whaling-voyage with harpoons and blubber. She had her own views and purposes, and commenced to give him some good advice.

"We all know your genius, Haydn, and I, at least, know something from my reading about the moods and eccentricities of genius. I don't think a young man could commence life under better or more promising auspices. Indulgent fathers and rich uncles are not always vouchsafed to genius, perhaps, you know. The profession is a worthy one; and if you love it, as I suppose you do, you can need no incentive to study and work. Let me tell you I sympathize in all your dreams of fame and wealth. I have heard the same siren voices that whisper to you in music and in nature; but I am a woman, and you will soon be a man—that's the difference. You may follow where they lead, but not I."

"I never had any such dreams; never heard any whispering, except when you were playing, and then I suspected it was Tom Barrows behind you."

She proceeded, regardless of his protest.

"I know what it is to be fascinated by music. The other evening, when we went to hear Ole Bull, I was transported. The weird tones of his instrument seem to take form. I shut my eyes, and they seemed flames of fire, crackling with a delicious destruction, burning their rhythmical way into my brain, now dying out in smouldering brilliancy, with little jets of bright sharpness shooting up thin and lurid, and then bursting out afresh in the great diapason of a mighty conflagration."

"Yes," said Haydn, "I remember it; but my sensations were different. It seemed to me, when he was performing that solo, that 'Home, Sweet Home' was wrestling on a staircase with the 'Carnival of Venice,' and the two were going down step by step, growing fainter in their struggles, until they seemed to reach some kind of a cellar door, that was burst open, and liberated a whole swarm of melodies that joined in a general riot among themselves."

The Third Ward laughed a clear, happy, bugle laugh. Something more than the description pleased her.

The next day the victim went off from running the gamut to a rope-walk, where a sordid man offered him two shillings a day to turn a wheel and mind his business. Something grim and exasperated lugged him back with a reference to his uncle and his bright future, both of which seemed dark and inscrutable enough. He fell into his old niche mechanically. Joshua came at intervals, jingled his pocket-money, self-earned, with imperious independence, and spoke of music disrespectfully.

The uncle too, in his usual orbit, came with guns and hat-boxes. Third Ward was in one of her "spells," as Barrows called it; the whole house echoed with Lucia and the Trovatore. "Ha!" exclaimed the uncle with a curious joy. "He's improving. I never heard him do any thing like that before; it rings like a charge of cavalry. Egad that's something to be proud of. Excellent, 'pon my honor!" In vain Brown tried to intimate a mistake. He would none of it.

"Don't make any explanations," he shouted. "I can tell music when I hear it. If I had never heard him play like that, I should have known it wasn't in him and you were making a fool of yourself!"—and then he wanted to go to sleep.

That afternoon Haydn sat in his room alone watching the dead leaves drifting about down in the meadows, and listening to the music.

By-and-by it ceased, and shortly afterward he saw the Barrows' animal and his father's saddle horse through the trees, and he knew who managed them.

"It's an infernal shame," he said aloud, getting up and standing defiantly before a picture of Thalberg. "You are a ninny-hammer!"

This was not addressed to the lithographic pianist. It might have been meant for Barrows, and it may have been designed for himself. "I'll talk to her about it now." So he put on his great-coat and hat and went off to stand at the stepping-stone and wait till they returned. It was very raw outside and he suffered some, but stood there resolutely till they came. Third Ward was flushed and beautiful. Tom was red and cynical, and asked him if he had "stood it long."

"Come to the library, I want to speak to you," he whispered in her ear as she dismounted.

"Has any thing happened?" rather startled.

"No; but something may. I'll wait for you."

When she came to the library with part of her riding-habit still on, and saw the white face of the victim as he walked the floor, she stood irresolute with her hand upon the knob.

"What frightens you?" he asked, moving a chair for her. "I'll turn the key so that we will not be interrupted. I only want your advice."

She sat down looking somewhat perplexed, but very charming, and he commenced,

"Celia, I'm nothing but a boy, as you know, in experience, and whatever of manliness belongs to me has been stunted by compression. I'm sick, disgusted, and desperate; and I want you to advise me. There isn't much for me to tell you, for I feel that you understand it as well if not better than I do. You have not been here so long without knowing that I am a prisoner; you have tested my tastes and aspirations by a standard of your own when I did not know it; and I couldn't help feeling great respect for you."

Third Ward toyed with a card-case and looked dreamily into the grate, the flame throwing a ruddy glow over her cheeks. "Respect" was full of meaning, but not the meaning usually associated with it. He stopped a moment and she looked up to say,

"I hope I haven't forfeited your respect."

"No, not that. You seem to understand me better than most people, and I can't help feeling a greater interest in your opinion of me. I suppose it is always so when young people are thrown together."

There was no doubt in Third Ward's mind now of the nature of the interview, and with her characteristic kindness and impetuosity she resolved to assist him.

"Sit down—do, Haydn—and let us talk as we always do. You will make me nervous if you walk about that way."

He sat down. "I should like to know if I could please you most by growing up what I am, or by being as other men are?"

This cost him an effort. She saw it; but asked, "Why me? Have you no sense of duty, obligation; no higher motive?"

"Last summer," continued Haydn, "when you and I were over at the foundries, you told me there was something pleased you in the Herculean employment of the men. You said it seemed to be noble in man to invent or forge; to drive or delve. Manufacture, toil, energy, skill, you said were masculine, and many other things were feminine. I knew what you meant, for I felt it before you said it. When we were in the Riceville mills, and the wheels were spinning and singing around us, shafts and belts and cogs seemed to make a music such as I had never heard before, and you remarked that I evinced a new interest in the machinery. It was the same feeling that you experience with music, but I never do; and somehow I have always felt that you knew it or desired it. I thought you would have a better opinion of me if I told you."

Then, shortly after, when no answer was made:

"I don't think I am a man, Celia; but I want to be, and I think I was intended for one: don't you?"

"Yes, I think you were, Haydn."

"And if I ever should be, you would think as highly of me as—Tom Barrows?"

It was all out now, and Third Ward found a place to laugh.

He was a foolish boy. What put such a ridiculous notion as that in his head? Tom Barrows indeed! And then, with a sudden seriousness, she got up, approached him, and said, "I'm only a year older than you, Haydn, and don't know much more; but I think you are more of a man now than twenty Tom Barrows." That was all. She was gone.

So he lay awake all night, and thought of a thousand new things that never occurred to him before; very many of which were rose tinted, and all of which sprang with a new vigor in his brain.

When his uncle sent for him next day he marched boldly up to the room, and presented himself to that worthy with a great deal of latent defiance lurking in his face.

"Well, young man, what's your prospects in life now? Can you sing a song of sixpence with your pockets full of rye? Are you ready to go to Europe? What's your forte now?"

He had no prospects in life. He could not sing, for his heart was fuller than his pockets, and he would much rather go to work than to Europe. Something like it he said, and more. He would go to the city. His blood was stagnant, his muscles flaccid, his brain empty. Music was no achievement, only an accomplishment. With his father it was more violent. Disappointment and indignation found rough words. His son was a disgrace, and he would have nothing to do with him. The last words Mr. Brown said were, "Don't you come back here again!"

Celia gave him her hand. "I understand you," she said. "I think you are right. If you understand me you will try to be." He understood her.

After that there was a plunge into the great metropolis: an aimless drifting about in the maze of traffic and manufacture, full of uncertainty as to his own judgment, and doubt as to his purpose: a vagabond week among idlers and pedestrians swayed hither and thither by impulse, until he brought up in an immense structure where furnaces glowed and trip-hammers shook the earth, and swarthy men flitted in the red light, and ponderous machines rattled and clanked with a vitality and power that were new to him. There was something in this Titanic stir that woke a new feeling in him. There was a kindly aspect in the clumsy iron giants that he could not account for; he longed to handle and inspect them; to become intimate and friendly with them. Behind the lusty fellows who whistled in the smoke and chatted 'mid the clang of metal, he knew there were more intelligent brains guiding and directing the whole, animate and inanimate. He found them, a few frank words were sufficient, and the next morning he was among the workmen, pigmy indeed, and already begrimed, but with a curious satisfaction in his eyes and the same resolve over all.

Here was the divergence. Nothing could be more widely separated than himself and the family at Slightington. Mr. Brown, incensed at the conduct of his son, proceeded openly to lavish his son's portion on The Third Ward. She was to be the family musician and genius; and not only did he make this apparent in expenditure, but he invited musical celebrities from the city; threw open his house to routs and soirées, and from the brilliancy of his entertainments and the talents of his protégée soon succeeded in surrounding her with influences of the most dazzling and dangerous character. Matilda, being a young woman of no particular radiance of her own, made no objection to shining with borrowed light. It was her father who did it, that was enough for her; and the only persons who made open and secret protest were Uncle Tompkins and Tom Barrows: the former disliking very much to be kept awake by a "great thundering orchestra" from the city performing under his window, and the latter feeling that the new companions that surrounded Celia were far more attractive than himself or his Morgan stud. Mr. Brown, it must be confessed, had a foolish parvenu horror of the very world he sprang from, and that world his son had voluntarily entered, commencing at the bottom round, and might have been seen by the father any afternoon, in paper cap and overalls, with smutted face, among the common workmen, doing the meanest drudgery about the machines.

That son boarded in a crowded house. He acquired books. He studied late and early; and as he himself afterward expressed it, he felt something commence to expand in him as soon as he had entered upon his homely duties.

What was his surprise one evening on going to his room to receive a letter from his Uncle Tompkins. It ran as follows, and inclosed a check for a hundred dollars:

"Young man, you are a brick. If I had a hundred such as you I'd build up the reputation of a good citizen. Keep on your own hook and let music alone. Here's a check; don't spend it for candy."

He kept it a week. One morning he took it to the office of the works, asked to see the superintendent, and showing it to him, inquired if he could not be given better employment. There was a conference, and he was set to work in the office, making copies of plans for machinery. So he sent the check back to Tompkins with many thanks, and the promise to stay "on his own hook." A year rolled away. His eyes were sharp, his brain invigorated and quickened, and nothing in that smoky office had escaped him. He had mastered the rudiments of mechanics with wonderful alacrity. Men knew there was something in him now, for it began to show itself in little plans of his own; here a suggestion to improve a steam-gauge, there an inclination of two degrees in a shaft that resulted in greater speed or more strength; now a screw and now a brace, but all obedient to a law of intelligence; and he grew gradually strong in the contact with obedient matter as man will. He learned his power to command strength, and felt the first intuition of the omnipotence of mind. All this was music that charmed and strengthened him. Such harmony as results from the healthy action of the faculties.

With his own money in his pockets he started off at the expiration of the year to visit Slightington and arrived at his father's house at night. It was all ablaze with light; and music issued from the opened windows—opened to admit air into the crowded rooms. At first it struck him there might be a wedding, but the character of the music undeceived him—it was one of Mr. Brown's receptions. He hesitated to go in; some sense of the chasm, recently opened, between himself and the guests held him back. This was the first trial. He looked in at the window and saw Celia in full dress, altogether more magnificently attired than he had ever seen her before. He looked at his own clothes, selected without reference to fashion, and at his hands, no longer white and soft; then he turned and came back to the city with the first train.

Back in the murky office: the tools and furniture looking cheerless enough, and he for a day sullen and abstracted. Could he have made a mistake? thrown away advantages never to be recovered? was not the profession that had been selected for him after all the path of honor and ease? what was there in Celia's advice to warrant his conclusions? He was out of the way now. Then the great bell struck, a whistle sounded shrill, the ponderous wheels moved, bands began to play; every giant stretched its iron limbs preparatory to the day's work; the men, hearty and loud, bustled about; and the young man, who had stood by his father's window and listened unmoved to the exquisite symphonies of the great masters, felt his heart beat quicker as though struggling to time itself with the music around him.

So cheerily to work: sleeves rolled up, quick strokes, and no repining. Thus another year rolled by: from drudgery to trust and supervision; now consulted in great schemes; and now intrusted with plans that demanded all his quick intelligence, and always willing, eager, hopeful.

There were secrets hidden in the lumber and cinders of the great work-house, as there always is in combinations of mute matter—mysteries in the corners, about the surging, driving engines, lurking in the vapor and glow—mysteries that needed only the key of intelligence to unlock them and lug them forth facts for the world to seize upon and use and pay for in its gold. Is it strange that the watchful young man, who sat for hours before an intricacy of wheels and teeth and levers, catching the meaning of the wonderful play, who knew the purpose and power of every screw because it had interested him and won him, should begin to feel about for new facts? He groped for a while, and then the voice in him said, authoritatively, this would be better so! It were in accordance with the law; but now perfect harmony is not attained. He was sure of it. It came back to him at night; he drew it with square and rule; and then he proclaimed it.

At first they were doubtful; he demanded trial, and practical men were not long in understanding it. It was true. So the workmen called him smart, the superintendent spoke of him to the directors; they said it was genius, and patented his discovery in their own right, giving him promotion and a wider, clearer field! After that he was a man.

Benjamin Brown speculated and doubled his fortune. He grew fond of gay society and purchased a city residence. His last folly was a land mania, and somewhere in Pennsylvania were great tracts of barrenness subject to his will, if, indeed, they could ever be subjected to any thing.

The Third Ward had gone through the ordeal of watering-places, flirtation, folly; she sang her way into the first set, and then became disgusted at the set because of her music rather than herself. Several well-to-do young men made it their chief business in life to fall in love with her, and she made it her mission to laugh at them. Her friends who had planned and predicted for her became disgusted until a young gentleman by the name of Lakely, better known at the Browns' as "George," turned up and threatened to finish the business. Poet, artist, author, vocalist, and such a reader! His "Charge of the Light Brigade" and the "Bridge of Sighs" from an ottoman in the drawing-room won him the day. After his exquisite warble of "You'll Remember Me," Mr. Brown, who was eating ice-cream in the corner, said to his wife, "Such, my dear, was Haydn's destiny; but he slighted it."

Nobody could translate the libretto of an Opera like George, and the consequence was, no one pleased Celia so well on opera nights; besides, he was handsome, tall and slender, pale and effeminate, indolent and amiable. And her friends saw that matters were approaching a crisis. Uncle Tompkins sent for her and asked her why she was not married. So she blushed and hesitated, and said it was not her fault. He advised her to attend to it at once, and she obediently promised to do so the next day.

The next day George advised her to do the same thing, and let him arrange the details; the latter she preferred to do herself. He should have an answer in a week.

Then she wrote a note to Haydn. "Come and see me immediately; I want to ask your advice;" and signed it "Third Ward," as though to intimate to him that she was still a girl.

And Haydn came of course. Four years had flown since he had asked her for advice. She expected to see him altered, but only in manner. She felt young and blithe and careless, and I forgot that circumstances sometimes make men of boys rapidly. So when he came and she rose to give him her hand she was astonished. He was taller and broader and heavier. He stood erect and was self-reliant; there was, too, the master's expression in his eye; the speaking consciousness of purpose that is strength, and pride of intellect self-exhumed.

Her greater knowledge of conventional usage and her acquired self-possession did not save her from some confusion. She had sent for Haydn, and summoned a giant.

After the formalities it went smooth enough though.

"You once asked my advice," she said, "and I gave it to you. It may or may not have been true that I understood you as you claimed, but you needed advice then, and I do now. I am sick, disgusted, desperate. Listen to my case attentively and answer me frankly. I am dependent, self-willed, and proud; that you know. I can not live much longer in my present condition. I have even promised my uncle to change it as soon as possible. I don't think I should be particularly happy in following any advice that I have received yet, much less in giving in to their importunities. Now what would you advise as a friend?"

"Is it not somewhat singular that you should appeal to me in so delicate a matter when you are surrounded by friends whose tastes and prejudices, if I may use that word, are similar to your own?"

"Not at all. You once said our 'tastes' were alike, what right had you to alter your opinion?"

"If I understand you," he said, "you are beset, annoyed, almost coerced. You think that in yielding you will be unhappy. Am I correct?"

"Yes, mainly so."

"Then this is my advice. Ever since I left you at Slightington your words have rung in my ears. 'If you understand me you will try to be.' Celia, I thought I understood you. I am a man. If I did not interpret your words amiss MARRY ME, and don't have any trouble!"

She neither simpered nor smiled. She got up, held out her hand business-like, and said,

"Haydn, I will!"

If it sounds stiff and methodical to you, poor reader, it is because you are in the habit of seeing these things dimly through a glass of non-sense.

What was afterward said partly redeemed the transaction from any such charge. Like practical people, having settled the business to their satisfaction they gave way to nonsense, and Martha burst in upon them sitting both on one chair.

She had turned his hands over and looked at them with wonder, and he had said: "If you believe that a man with ambition, and courage, and patience can win success in any sphere, however rude, you will be content to trust me and wait with me."

She wanted to see his stiff fingers on the key-board, but he would not wait. "I'll show you music, Celia, one of these days—a mighty instrument, organ toned, with a thousand keys and voices that shall be heard all over the continent." And she said again, with some of his fire reflected in her eye, that she understood him.

So they were married, without parade or display, to the consternation, disgust, and scandal of musicians in and out of Slightington and all the Browns collectively.

Uncle Tompkins acted most strangely. Sent for one of his fowling-pieces and fired it out of the window when he heard the news. Wrote several impertinent letters to different people, and astonished Brown by saying that it was just what he had expected and worked for!

The years were uneventful after that. But the sequel is now. If you would like to see Haydn's instrument you must visit the immense works over there. It is an enormous music-box wound up every morning; a thousand men form the chorus inside, and their music goes out upon the iron rails to sing its own praises through the forests and over the prairies; to charm the roar of the ocean and to dig up the treasures of earth hidden fathoms deep.

There is an office on the first floor, and there we shall find the key-board of the instrument, with the master-hand that plays upon it. He was right. It is a harmony at once sweetly terrible and wonderful. Perhaps you know him, having heard of him in connection with ocean navigation and the new iron-clads, or have some acquaintance with the large family. I hope so.

Mr. Brown, with a sense of poetic justice that did him credit, failed. His barrennesses in Pennsylvania were about to be brought to the hammer when Haydn went off down there with a couple of practical men, camped out a week in the rocks, and then bought in the whole tract. The next that was heard from there came through the newspapers, and had reference to a discovery of petroleum. Improved machinery has pumped up a great many thousand dollars from the tract since.

As for George, he is a member of a negro minstrel troupe; and is, I believe, deservedly popular.

You would hardly think that the lady I point out to you, stepping from her carriage, and followed by three children—that tall, serious woman—is the Third Ward; but it is. You have encountered her name before to-day associated with some local or national charity, but you never suspected it was my heroine.

THREE YEARS.

THREE autumn tides have browned the year
 And leaves thrice ripened to their fall,
 Since through our homesteads, far and near,
 In tones resonant, loud, and clear,
 Rang out the thrilling battle-call.

Its echoes lingered on the hearth,
 It chilled us with its wild alarm,
 It dashed with pain our cup of mirth,
 And fateful Sorrow stalked on earth
 With haggard eye and lifted arm.

An angry murmur from afar,
 A reddening glow from lurid skies,
 Grim rumors of the shock of war
 (As southward waned star after star)
 Filled all our hearts with sad surprise.

And hands were loosed from hands. We sate
 Inquiring mutely of the end.
 The shadows of approaching fate
 Seemed darkly round the hearth to wait,
 Enwrapping closely friend from friend.

Then manhood sternly rose, and bade
 The weakness of the hour depart.
 By war's black tempest undismayed,
 On God's right arm for succor stayed,
 Arose in strength the patriot heart.

Ye gave us, and we went. With sighs,
 With saddened hearts ye sent us forth;
 With faltering lips, with streaming eyes,
 Your firm-devoted sacrifice,
 O women of the loyal North!

Ye pledged us—yours the hands that pressed
 Within our own the battle-brand;
 The lips were yours whose kisses blessed,
 Yours the endearments that caressed
 Each hero of the martyr-band.

And years have fled in strife and pain,
 The sickly revelry of war;
 The Southern summer burns again,
 And sad, stern eyes, through blinding rain,
 Look forth where glows the Northern Star.

Ye watch and wait, and hope the day
 That calls us from these fields of woe,
 That rifts the battle-cloud away,
 That plucks us harmless from the fray,
 That makes a friend of every foe.

O mother, sister, maid, and wife,
 Who hold our hearts in sorrow's thrall,
 Call us not back while yet the strife
 Is madly raging for the life
 Of her the mother of us all!

Not yet, not yet! Once more inspire
 Our arms, our hearts, our souls with strength
 To trample down all weak desire,
 To brave anew hell's awful fire,
 The victory to grasp at length!

NEW ORLEANS, June, 1864.

THREE YEARS IN MONTGOMERY.

FIVE years ago, influenced by the logic of high wages, I went South to pursue my trade as a machinist. Knowing that in the Cotton States competent mechanics were comparatively few, I imagined that I would there be able to make my way to fortune more certainly and easily than in the overcrowded North, where industry and genius characterized all departments of the mechanic arts. In the fall of 1860 I became foreman of the machine works of the Florida and Alabama Railroad Company, situated at Montgomery, Alabama. These works were among the most extensive in the Gulf States, and afforded me precisely the opportunity I wanted to demonstrate my capacity and achieve a competence. The opportunity, however, for which I had longed and waited, brought with it, when it came, possibilities of evil as well as promises of good. In November of that year, Mr. Lincoln having been elected President, secession began to be talked of. A feeling of uneasiness and distrust began to creep through society and to disturb the channels of business and trade. I soon felt that, as a Northern man, loyal in every throb of my heart to the Union, my position, in the event of actual separation, might become unpleasant if not dangerous; but I knew my value to my employers, and I determined to remain and trust to circumstances to deliver me from whatever perils might arise.

We who loved the Union of the fathers lived centuries of feeling in those first days of rebellion. Every where madness ruled the hour. Extravagant in hope, prodigal in promises of success, the movement swept on for a time with a vehemence which nothing could resist. The whole city was ablaze with excitement. Troops coming and going; drums beating, trumpets snarling, flags flying, the populace thronging in holiday attire to reviews and parades; all this passed before our eyes and saluted our ears day and night. Yet few, if any, dreamed that war would actually come. Even the chief conspirators who, on the 4th of April, 1861, met in convention and a day or two after ordained a Provisional Government, imagined they would be permitted to achieve their ends without actual conflict. The popular enthusiasm would have been vastly abated had a suspicion of what was to follow illuminated for one moment the general understanding; one glimpse of the horrors of Shiloh, Antietam, and Gettysburg, would have been quite sufficient to cool the impetuous ardor of the most sanguine and arrogant; and the masses would have shrunk appalled from even the first Bull Run could a revelation of its pains and slaughter have been held before them in prophetic vision. But even we, Northern men as we were, believed that hostilities would not ensue, or if they did, that they would terminate with one or two engagements, and it was in that conviction chiefly we had determined to remain. When we, who ought to have known so much better, thus misinterpreted the temper of the North and the plain signs of the times, we can hardly wonder that the multitude at the South were swept away by the sudden tide of enthusiasm, and applauded what they did not comprehend?

The storm deepened. State after State seceded. Jeff Davis was inaugurated—I remember well with what an indignant heart I stood by and witnessed the solemn mockery; and I was not long in learning that it would have been true wisdom in me to have quitted the Confederacy. We saw, from the day when the Government was formally installed, that it had the eyes of Argus and the arms of Briareus. The conspirators understood much better than the North has ever done their true dangers and real weakness. They knew that their only chance of success was in compelling universal acquiescence in their rule, in reducing the people to such complete subjection as to enable the usurping authority to seize, possess, and use, unopposed and unresisted, all the resources and energies of the revolted States in furtherance of their desperate enterprise. Hence personal liberty was restricted; spies were set at every corner; barrel-head inquisitions were instituted, and their summary edicts pitilessly enforced; in a hundred nameless ways we were made to feel that a harsh, vigilant despotism hedged us about on every side, lying in wait, as it were, with cunning seines for every tripping foot. That thus menaced by a mysterious and sometimes impalpable oppression, we grew ourselves to be suspicious, to speak with bated breath, to walk to and fro with cautious steps, and eyes watchful and observant, was only a logical sequence—was necessary, indeed, to safety.

There were, of course, some loyal men in Montgomery. I say of course, because there are Union men every where throughout the South. A stranger, indeed, would not discover the fact; they have learned that the stillest air may babble secrets in unfriendly ears, and that safety lies only in silence; but in retired places, among those whose fidelity is assured, they express freely their thoughts and the aspirations of their hearts. As a Northern man I naturally drifted into communication with these loyalists; and the rebellion was not a month old before I had a perfect understanding with them all, and knew my position exactly.

In the fall of 1861, in order that we might enjoy as far as possible exemption from the prevalent espionage, five other young men and myself, all of Northern antecedents and sympathies, engaged a house, and fitting it up with necessary conveniences, placed it in charge of an old negro possessing superior qualifications as a cook. Here we lived until our escape was finally effected, subjected often to annoyance; but yet comparatively free to speak and act as our convictions inclined us. Our rooms became in time a favorite resort, at favorable opportunities, of the loyal men of the city, and more than one suffering and persecuted household was relieved through the charities there devised. I may as well say here that the loyalists of the city were united by the closest fellowship, holding frequent meetings in quiet places, and all co-operating for the help of each in every strait and emergency where help could be given. At these meetings such Northern papers and periodicals as by any means fell into our possession were passed from hand to hand, and their contents absorbed for future reflection and use. Frequently I have seen papers so worn and soiled by this wide circulation and perusal as to be almost illegible, and yet, even then, they were regarded as treasures of too great value to be lightly thrown aside. Considering that for two years our only communication from the North, and our only trustworthy information as to the progress of events among our kindred, was obtained in this way, and that it was only at rare intervals such Northern papers came into our hands, it will not be difficult for any one to understand how absolutely we were in the dark as to the temper, hopes, and purposes of those whom we felt to be fighting for us, prisoners in the far South, as much as for themselves and their posterity.

As time slipped on and the necessities of the conspirators became more urgent and imperative, it daily grew more certain that we were exposed to danger, and could not always expect to escape the chances of a call to the field. When at last a draft was ordered, our distress of mind was complete; we had resolved never to fight against the Government, but how to elude the clutch of the conscription was a question which caused us many a sleepless night. Providence, however, was on our side. The weeks ran into months, and the months rolled away, and still we escaped. One day the Superintendent of the Works called me to his office and informed me that in view of the importance of keeping the railroads in working order, it had been determined to exempt from the draft all the workmen employed by our Company; and in confirmation of his statement, gave me the following certificate, duplicates of which were at once furnished to all the operatives:

OFFICE OF ALABAMA AND FLORIDA RAILROAD CO.
MONTGOMERY, Oct. 21, 1863

I certify that W. Hedges, aged 32 years, five feet five inches high, fair complexion, blue eyes, auburn hair, is engaged in the service of this Company, and is, in the capacity of foreman in machine-shop, under the laws of the Confederate Congress, exempt from military duty.

NOTE.—It is made the duty of the Superintendent to report to the enrolling officer the names of all men leaving the service of this Company.

SAM'L G. JONES,
Engineer and Sup't.

The Note embodied in this certificate had a significance which is hardly apparent to the casual observer. It had two objects; first, to prevent "strikes" among the operatives, and second, to simplify and facilitate the work of conscription whenever, for any cause, any of them might leave the establishment. It had occurred on one or two occasions that the workmen had combined to compel an increase of wages, and to that end had ceased work at critical moments when every man was particularly needed in his place. These proceedings had greatly embarrassed the Government, and summary corrective measures were consequently adopted. Orders were issued that all operatives who might hereafter engage in "strikes" should be seized by the officers of conscription and placed in the ranks, whence they would be detailed to the machine-works for service. In this way the Government would secure their labor at thirteen dollars a month instead of fifty or sixty as before, and the spirit of disaffection would, moreover, be effectually crushed. The Note embodied in the exemption certificate was designed to remind the operatives of these facts, presenting distinctly the danger of insubordination, while at the same time it served as a perpetual warning to the Superintendent to report faithfully and promptly "the names of all men leaving the service of the Company." There was in this a spice of despotism; but then, despotism was every where, menacing every thing, and so inconsiderable a trifle as this scarcely occasioned a thought.

Only once did my certificate fail to command respect. One night hurrying along the street, I was challenged by a sentinel. I stopped and exhibited my certificate, supposing he would be satisfied upon discovering my position. But I was mistaken; the fellow was resolute, declaring that his orders were imperative not to permit any person to pass his post, unless provided with a pass, after eight o'clock at night. A parley ensued, and angry at the detention, I was on the point of pronouncing my opinion of the Confederacy in no choice terms, when a gentleman who had come up interfered with the remark that it was "all right," and I was permitted to depart. I learned the next day that the person so befriending me was the chief of the Conscription Bureau in the city, and though obliged to him for his intercession, the knowledge as to his personality was by no means gratifying. It was obvious that he was intimately informed as to my occupation and relations; and the more I reflected upon the circumstance the more uneasy I became.

About a fortnight after the adoption of the regulation in reference to exemptions, an order was received from Richmond directing that all persons holding exemption certificates should be required to obtain formal recognitions of the fact, or, in other words, safe-conducts from the Provost Marshal, and that all other persons liable to military duty should be immediately forced into the ranks. In compliance with this order, a week or so after its announcement, I called at the office of the Provost Marshal and there obtained the following:

MILITARY POST, MONTGOMERY, ALA.
PROVOST MARSHAL'S OFFICE, Nov. 18, 1863.

Permission is hereby granted to W. Hedges to remain in the city for sixty (60) days.

A. & F. R. R. Co.

By order,

FRANK CLARKE,
Captain and Provost Marshal.

Per WM. MCGREGOR.

Neither myself nor my room-mates, all of whom obtained similar permits, liked the limitation they contained as to time. We could remain in the city for sixty days, but what was to come after that? Daily occurrences around us for some time had not been calculated to afford us any strong assurance of safety. Hourly, we had seen men seized and hurried to the conscription head-quarters. Daily, gangs of men from the surrounding country were brought in, often wearing handcuffs—sometimes resisting doggedly every step of the way toward the slavery that awaited them. In those days it had been no unusual occurrence to see men, who had driven loads of wood into the city for sale, taken from their wagons and carried away, in spite of protests, entreaties, and resistance, to fill places in the ranks. Then, next day, we had found in the daily papers notices to the families of the men thus abducted, advising them to come and take away the abandoned teams. All these things served to deepen and intensify the thought which had been lying so long in our minds. We must make our escape at once, if we would escape at all—that was at last too obvious to admit of question.

We acted instantly on this conviction. For a year we had been awaiting an opportunity to escape, but it had never offered; every door seemed closed against us. One chief difficulty in the way had been our inability to procure a guide, upon whom we could depend, to pilot us through the mazes of outlying rebel pickets to a place of safety on the sea-board. The country to the south, toward the Gulf coast, off the main lines of travel, was entirely unknown to all of us; and to undertake to escape by interior routes to the North was only to expose ourselves to the risk of entanglement and almost certain capture. For a whole year, therefore, we had simply watched and waited. But at last, the very day before I obtained my safe-conduct, I had received information that a guide was to be had near Pollard, a town one hundred miles southward on the line of the railroad to Pensacola. Having the freedom of the road I had at once satisfied myself that the person of whom we had heard was trust-worthy, had engaged him, through his agent, to undertake our deliverance, and within a few hours after visiting the office of the Provost Marshal had completed all arrangements for departure—the tenor of the permits there obtained tending greatly to accelerate our movements. Our party consisted of five persons in all—namely, George Folwell, Peter Martin, James Ward, John Pierce, and myself—William Hedges. The day preceding that on which we had engaged with the guide to meet him at Pollard Martin went down to that place on pretense of procuring lumber for a shop which the Company had in course of erection, and did not return to Montgomery. The same day Pierce, who was running a locomotive on the road, managed to precipitate his train into another, crushing several cars and badly damaging the engine. Ward, who was also acting as engineer on another train, had met with a similar accident the week before, and both trains were still lying in their ruins. These circumstances were singularly favorable to our scheme! There being no engines to operate Folwell, Ward, and Pierce gave out that they would go down and ascertain what could be done toward repairing the damaged locomotives, intimating that, if their presence were not afterward required in the works, they might make an excursion to Mobile, as they had been in the habit of doing at intervals, when work was not pressing, during the past year. No objection was made to their proposition, and accordingly, on the morning of Saturday the 21st of November, 1863, taking the early train, they departed, not unprovided, however, for any emergencies that might arise in the course of their adventure. The day before I had purchased a ham—the last but one in the market as I discovered by visiting all the stores—for which I had paid thirty dollars; and this, having been cooked and boned, was smuggled in the night, together with bread and crackers, on board the tender of the engine, being safely hidden under the wood, where also two trusty shot-guns were snugly stowed away out of sight. It is possible that had the engineer of the train been aware of the nature of the luggage carried by the excursionists he might have objected—might, indeed, have reported the singular circumstance to his superiors; but fortune was on our side, and so, amply provisioned, four of the party were started and out of reach, certain of not being expected, in any case, before the following Monday or Tuesday.

At noon, putting an old pair of boots under my arm, I went to the Superintendent and told him that I would like to run down to Evergreen, seventy-five miles distant, where I could have my boots repaired much more cheaply than in Montgomery. This was true, and the Superintendent knew it. Citizens frequently went to the surrounding towns for repairing and to purchase the necessities of life, owing to the extravagant prices demanded by the Montgomery dealers. The Superintendent at once consented to my request, remarking that business was slack, and I could as well as not have a day or two to myself. Thus I too, going on board the train just about to leave, got away unsuspected. It really seemed as if Providence were ordering every thing to our hands, and that thought comforted me as the wheezing engine dashed us slowly onward through the mellow afternoon into the solemn night.

Passing Evergreen I reached Burnt Corn Station at midnight and found my comrades—who, leaving the train at various points, had there united—awaiting me. This station was ten miles from Pollard, to which place it had been deemed unsafe to go, owing to the presence there of a considerable Confederate force. At Burnt Corn, Ward and Pierce had removed our arms and provisions from the tender, while Folwell was entertaining the engineer and fireman at the station groggery, the removal being fortunately accomplished without discovery. According to instructions we at once, upon my arrival, pushed into the woods, where we were very soon met by an old man and a girl, who led us to a house two miles away where the guide had agreed to meet us. The girl, who seemed to enter with the utmost heartiness into our adventure, appeared to us strangely out of place in that obscure and sunless place. Attired in the very plainest clothing, there was yet something very winning in her demure air and face, and her lithe, graceful figure. She was evidently more intelligent than those around her, but we could learn very little as to her history beyond the fact that her father, who had once been well-to-do, had been driven from his home for persisting in his devotion to the Union; that her mother had subsequently died broken-hearted; and that she, only fourteen years of age, all alone in the world, had found a refuge with the old man, whose companion she now was. This man, though worn and enfeebled by age, seemed to find a malicious delight in the thought that he had aided many others besides ourselves to escape. It was in this way, probably, he was avenging the wrongs of the girl, whose young life had been made desolate by rebel cruelty.

At the house of the guide we found three other refugees seeking an opportunity to escape, who earnestly entreated that they might be permitted to join our party; but we did not know how far they could be trusted, and therefore declined the pleasure of their company. We learned, in the conversation that ensued upon their request, that our guide had already piloted thirty-eight loyalists like ourselves across the enemy's lines; and all of us felt safer and more confident upon hearing that he had never yet failed in his undertakings.

Shortly before two o'clock in the morning, having been refreshed by a substantial repast, with the guide in advance, we set out on our pilgrimage. We had nearly one hundred miles yet to travel. We knew the way was a difficult one; that the country was thronged by enemies; that there were dense, malarious swamps to cross, wide rivers to pass, great stretches of forest to penetrate; that, in a word, dangers would confront us at almost every step; but nothing we might meet could possibly equal in horror the sad, dismal life we were leaving, and so, making light of scratches, bruises, and the ghostly goblins of wood and thicket, we went courageously forward. After walking some three miles or more we encountered our first serious impediment in a creek which it was necessary to cross, and which, after some difficulty, was finally passed in a boat which the guide found in the darkness somewhere under the bank. From that time until ten o'clock the following morning we marched steadily onward, moving, after daylight, with the utmost caution—keeping away from the main roads, and flanking, by circuitous movements, the few houses lying along the route. The distance accomplished up to this time was, according to the guide, eighteen miles; to us it seemed as if we had traveled that many leagues. We were yet in the first tremor of nervous apprehension, and our pace seemed horribly sluggish, though we knew that every step forward—and I am not sure that we did not count them all—carried us further toward the Canaan we were seeking.

This day was Sunday, and accordingly, after finding a retreat in a dense swamp, we determined to encamp until evening, knowing that it would be dangerous to go forward in the broad light of day in the more thickly settled region which we were now approaching. Meanwhile the guide, leaving us in our retreat, scouted about the country, with which he was perfectly familiar, making observations and in some instances inquiries, with a view of ascertaining the position of the rebel pickets, and whether any alarm had been given as to our escape. During his absence we tried, lying on the ground, to find rest in sleep, but it was a vain effort. Our anxiety was stronger than the appeals of nature for repose; Sodom was behind us and Zoar before, but we could not tell whether our feet would reach it, and that thought made sleep impossible. As for myself, I had suffered during our night walk the sharpest tortures from a pair of boots for which I had paid the moderate price of $125, and I could as well have dreamed of heaven in the shadows of the world of the lost as have slept in the pain which was left me as a legacy of our first ten hours of pedestrianism.

That night, with our guide again moving carefully in the advance, we walked ten miles, when three of us found ourselves exhausted. Our feet had swollen, we were weak and faint, and it seemed at first as if we must abandon, then and there, all hope of accomplishing the ten miles which yet remained between us and the Blackwater River, which it was necessary we should cross at a certain point, by the only bridge within our reach, before daylight. But after a time, having bathed our feet and changed our hose, we again started out, moving painfully and slowly, but still steadily diminishing the distance lying between us and the point at which we aimed. Ward, however, long before we reached the river, gave out utterly, and for the remainder of the way was supported by Folwell and Pierce, who almost forgot their own weariness in their anxiety to stimulate his flagging energies. I have never seen any thing more hopeless and desolate than poor Ward's face as he toiled painfully forward through the swamps and forests, oppressed with the fear of failure in his struggle for freedom, and yet determined, with a sort of grim desperation, to keep on and on, even though upon his hands and knees. Once only did he utterly despair. "I can't budge another foot," he said, desperately. His whole soul seemed to be overshadowed. "I shall never see Mary again," he added; "I must die here in these swamps; you can never carry me to Pensacola, and I can't walk any further." Poor fellow! he did not know that his wife was even then dead, and that the autumn leaves were lying on the grave of his only boy, far away in the Granite State.

At length, however, spite of pains and weariness, the Blackwater was crossed, it being still dark and no one guarding the bridge to obstruct our progress. This was better fortune than we had expected, and we felt then, as we feel now, that a special Providence held wide open that gate to the land of promise beyond. Having passed the point of danger we threw ourselves on the ground, and for the first time slept soundly for an hour; then, awaking numb and sore, pushed on, having five miles yet to go before reaching the Yellow Water River, where we were to find an accomplice of the guide's with a boat to carry us across. But a disappointment awaited us, for, on arriving at the river, neither man nor boat was to be found. For a moment thoughts of betrayal filled us with dismay. Had we journeyed so far and suffered so much only to fail at last? Interrogations like these flew instantly to our lips, and were addressed with almost angry vehemence to the guide, who, amidst them all, remained resolute and calm. To all our questioning he replied that he knew his men; that he had as much at stake as ourselves, and that if we would only be patient every thing would yet result to our satisfaction. With this he left us, moving stealthily along the river, and was absent for an hour, during which we suffered all the tortures of the keenest suspense, sometimes even doubting the guide himself, spite of his logical protest as to the dangers of his own position. Finally returning, he reassured us by leading us several miles down the river to the house of a friend, where we were kindly received and furnished an excellent meal, to which keen appetites enabled us to do full justice. The host, who was henceforth to have us in charge, was a "character" of the most marked type—one of those robust, sturdy men, with little education but strong, incorruptible integrity and dauntless courage, whose influence, unconsciously to the possessor, often sways whole communities, especially in the South, where characters like these appeal with peculiar force to the benighted populace. He was loyal to the core, and loved the old flag with an almost idolatrous affection. He understood perfectly the peril of his position; but he also knew his rights, and he would sell his life, he said, in their defense. He had toiled hard for many years, he told us, to earn his little property, and now it was his, he did not mean that any man, or set of men, should drag him from it to fight for the infernal traitor rag. The old man's brave talk stirred and strengthened us like new wine; we felt that we could trust our lives with him as with a brother; that come what might, he would stand by us to the end.

The wife of this veteran Alabama loyalist was hardly less outspoken than himself in her expressions of attachment to the flag. "I was born under it," she said, during our conversation at the table, "and I hope I shall never live to see another put in its place. I tell my boy there"—pointing to a bright-faced lad of twelve or thirteen years—"that I'd rather bury him with my own hands than have him fight against his country; and I don't believe he ever will do that. At any rate," she added, "he sleeps with the flag over him every night," and before we left she confirmed this assertion by taking us to the boy's bedroom and showing us a little flag hanging from the tall head-board, and almost touching the pillow.

After an hour or so, which had been occupied by an elder son of the host in procuring a boat, we crossed the river in the direction of East Bay, down which we proposed to sail to Pensacola Navy-yard. Before doing so we settled with our guide, paying him fifty dollars in specie and five hundred dollars in Confederate paper. We endeavored at first to persuade him to accept the entire amount in paper, but he declined, remarking that he "wanted some good money; trash could be had at any time." We also gave him one of our guns, and with a hearty "God bless you!" shook him by the hand and went apart, never, perhaps, to meet again this side of the grave. The last we saw of him he was standing on the river bank gazing after us as we slowly drifted away, waving our hands in adieu. Wherever he may be to day, may Heaven bless and guard him, that he may live to deliver from bondage many others, yearning, as we did, for liberty!

Now for the first time from the moment of our departure we felt safe. Up to this point we knew the country swarmed more or less with Confederate cavalry pickets, and at every step we had taken there was liability of discovery and capture. Now, however, that danger was past. The enemy, even if at that moment in pursuit and standing on the opposite bank of the river, could not cross without going forty miles or more further up. We had the only boat which was to be obtained; and we knew that long before any pursuing squadron could overcome that distance we would be beyond their reach. So, deliberately building a fire, we lay down and slept for hours. On the very same spot eighty refugees, we were told, had at one time encamped, having crossed the river to escape the conscription.

Resting through the night, we set out in the morning, still stiff and sore, for East Bay. Both Ward and myself, our feet having so swollen as to make our boots intolerable, walked the entire distance barefoot. Within three miles of East Bay the guide reported a horseman in sight, which, with all our confidence in our final escape, alarmed us seriously, since it was possible that a roving guerrilla gang might still infest that region, notwithstanding its practical abandonment by the Confederacy. We immediately withdrew into a strip of swamp, and put our pistols and our shot-gun in order, and then again moved forward, going straight to a house on the Bay, where we found a loyal family, and learned that the horseman was merely a neighbor riding his horse to water. Here, at the head of Live Oak Island, twenty-five miles from Pensacola, we contracted for a boat to carry us to the latter place. Passing over to the island from the main land, we stopped during the night with a brother of the guide, and the next morning, hoisting sail, set our prow toward Pensacola and liberty. At three o'clock on the afternoon of that day—Wednesday, November 25—we reached the Navy-yard, and that night slept under the light of the stars which rebel ferocity, we fervently believe, shall never blot from the flag of the republic.

The following day an incident occurred which strikingly illustrates the frailty of the tenure by which thousands in the Confederate army are held in its ranks. About noon a Confederate Lieutenant and three cavalymen were brought in from a picket-station, where they had given themselves up, and asked to be permitted to take the oath of allegiance. "They were questioned closely, when it appeared that they belonged to a party which had been sent out from Pollard in our pursuit, on the authority of a dispatch from Montgomery received during the afternoon of Monday. This was precisely in accordance with our expectations when we started—that suspicion would not be aroused in Montgomery before that time. The dispatch announcing our escape stated, according to the story of the Lieutenant, that there were six of us in all, and he was considerably surprised when he found only five, saying, however, with a laugh, that "There were six, after all, and three to spare." The mistake of the authorities at Montgomery was accounted for by the fact that William Anderson, who had lived with us in our hired house, left the city the day before our departure, going in the direction of Selma, whence he escaped afterward, as I learned on coming North, to Memphis, Tennessee.

Thus, not merely our arms, but the arms of four Confederates whose hearts had never been in their work, were by our adventure secured to the service of the Union. Doubtless Superintendent Jones and Provost Marshal Clarke were sadly vexed at our departure, and have missed us greatly since we came away; but they may find some consolation in reading this sketch of how we did it in the pages of Harper at the Confederate reading-room in Montgomery.

ONE OF THE NOBLE.

SCATTERED here and there, like pearls in the great deep, I pick out some of the loveliest, of whom I would dearly love to speak. There is one on whose pictured semblance my hand falls as it lies before me in its little gilt frame. I take it up and look at it, meeting a pair of sweet, sad eyes, in whose depths slumber love and mercy. The fair, pale brow, the brown waving hair, the gentle, tender mouth are all in keeping with characters I knew once and loved so well; and as it is no fancy sketch I shall tell you, I hope to do some good by the recital of her brief life-history.

Marian Vrain was motherless at twelve years of age, and at eighteen her father and only brother both fell at Fort Donelson. I can never forget the day she received the news. Through all time her white face and anguished eyes will haunt me with the same chilling sensation I felt when she dropped the letter upon her lap and looked up at me, giving vent to a low, peculiar cry that sent the blood in waves to my heart.

"Father, brother, both gone! Oh me!"

The last two words were spoken in a long, heart-breaking moan; and then the little hands clasped tightly, and I saw her trying to suppress the tremor that shook her from head to foot.

"Oh, Marian, darling, don't do that!" I exclaimed, going to her side and kneeling by it to enfold her. "Give way to your feelings and cry! Let the tears come freely. They will do you good."

"I can't," she whispered. "Oh, I can't!"

The letter lay upon her lap still and I took it up. It was written in a fair, delicate hand, by the wife of an officer in the fort. Father and son were in the same regiment, and they had fought side by side in the hot contest, and the same shell had killed them both. The lady dwelt upon the touchingness of the incident, and expressed her sympathy in beautiful terms for the bereaved daughter. She had learned her address from her husband, who knew Mr. Vrain well, and took the sorrowful task upon herself, offering her sympathy and her prayers.

Tears streamed over my own face, but I suppressed my sobs to read aloud the touching passages, lingering over them in the hope of reaching the sealed-up fountains of Marian's grief. But all in vain. White and tearless she sat for a long time, gentle and un murmuring, yet crushed and stunned by the magnitude of the fearful blow.

That night I staid by her and no change came. But on the day following a little package of the beloved ones' effects were brought her, and over them she could weep at last. The pent-up flood came in torrents till she was exhausted, and then she slept for hours with the precious mementoes of the lost ones clasped to her bosom.

One day more was given to tears and silent mourning; but after that she rose up to duty again. Her little feet were seldom at rest, her little hands always busy. To hundreds she carried comforts and consolation; and when people wondered and questioned she would answer with gentle earnestness,

"Can I be idle when the work is yet unfinished they died trying to accomplish? No. I urged them to go. They have fallen, and my work is consequently doubled."

The white sorrow-stricken face told its story, and the eyes seemed each day to grow sadder, but never a murmur was heard from her lips—nor did her energy flag for one moment. Labor was the only antidote for a grief like hers, and she seized upon it eagerly.

Before the secession of the Confederate States Marian had been betrothed to a young man of acknowledged merit; but immediately afterward he was forced to go to Europe on business which his father had left unsettled at his death, and did not return till after the event just related. That she loved her promised husband fondly I knew well; and I knew also that her hope was to see him take up the cause of the Union warmly on his return. It was one among the first wishes she uttered after their meeting, and the conversation that followed showed the noble devotion and self-sacrificing nature of the girl. Sitting by the window I heard it all as they paced the veranda in the clear white moonlight. Her face looked fairer under its silvery beams, and her black robes falling around her slender form seemed to give her a singularly sacred appearance in my eyes. Once as she passed I saw as she looked up toward me that her eyes were full of tears. The sight of them made me listen to the words he was speaking with slow distinctness:

"I can not think it my duty to go away, Marian, and leave my mother alone in her old age. She has no one but myself to depend upon, and it would break her heart. Besides, I can not afford it. My pay would not support us, and I am almost poor now, since our affairs in England have turned out so badly. I feel it my duty to go into some business and make as much money as I can. There are splendid chances open now to the speculator, and I think I can soon make a comfortable little fortune, if I set myself to it. Then I can claim you, my darling, and give you a home worthy of your merit."

"Oh, Harry! you pain me beyond measure," she answered in quivering accents. "Do you think I could enjoy wealth and luxuries at the expense of principles every man should maintain? Could I sit down happily amidst possessions gained while our country called loudest for the help you refused her, that you might accumulate riches for selfish purposes? Oh no, no!"

His voice was constrained and cold when he spoke again.

"Marian, this does not sound like the love I had thought existed in your heart. Heaven seeks to shield its object, not to involve it in a broil that may cost life, and end all the bright dreams of youth at one fell blow."

"Harry, love seeks to place its object above reproach always," she answered in full, ringing accents. "It is my love for you that makes the desire more strong, that you should not fail in your duty."

"But my mother," he urged; "what will become of her?"

"Leave her to my care. I pledge myself to watch over her every step, faithfully and lovingly as you could. With what I have I can live comfortably and be yet able to spare something, and she shall never miss a luxury that money can purchase. Every wish of her old age shall be gratified. Will you not trust her with me, and take upon yourself the crowning action of your manhood—stamp yourself one of the irreproachable men of the age, and, forgetting selfish interest, labor for our country till she no longer needs you? I will help you, Harry, and in all things else your every thought and wish shall be gratified as far as my power extends. Only go, and go soon!”

They talked on for an hour longer, he arguing and she combating his arguments till they were exhausted. At last he promised to go, and then they came into the house to perfect their plans to be put into immediate action. Before he left us, they had agreed to be married immediately, and he was to accept a position on General —’s staff, in the Army of the Southwest.

The next day but one a few friends were quietly gathered in Marian’s parlor and she was married to Harry Prince. When the guests were all gone she began to make preparations for her husband’s departure, calmly and steadily, though the sweet, quivering lip testified to the secret pain the action cost her.

Of the two in that time little Marian was the strongest, and had things nearly altogether her own way.

“Mother shall come here,” she said, cheerfully. “This house is ours, and all the furniture in it. What she likes best she can bring with her. The remainder, with the house she lives in, can be sold, and the money placed in the bank for such uses as she or you deem proper. I have enough for household expenses for some time to come, and she thinks this arrangement far the best. Is it not so?”

“Have it as you like,” he answered, a little sadly. “You know best what will please yourself and her.”

After Harry Prince had entered upon the duties of his position, and was becoming reconciled to it, he began to feel something of Marian’s spirit of patriotism when he found himself installed in the General’s head-quarters, and heard brave, noble men discussing the affairs of the Nation.

Then came the first battle, in which he felt the hot fires of his nature wholly aroused, and fought like a tiger amidst the bravest. On the field of Shiloh he learned to feel what men were there for, and that feeling nerved his arm and quickened his judgment to the accomplishment of heroic deeds. His name went abroad over the land, and reached the young wife and aged mother in their quiet home, where they were “watching and waiting,” and was greeted by tears of gratitude and proud tenderness.

Several months passed away, and now they were stationed at Corinth, Mississippi. Rumors of contemplated attacks often went abroad, and his letters to Marian spoke of a coming battle there as certain. But her answers were always cheerful and encouraging, and breathed a love that was as deep and pure and sustaining as ever flowed from the heart of woman to gladden the life of man.

About this time I joined my husband at the same place, and saw Harry Prince every day. He made a fine officer, and was very popular with the men under his General’s command, as well as the officers who came to know and like him.

A few days later a letter came from Marian to me, stating that her mother-in-law was dead. The old lady had died very suddenly, and I could see from the tone of her letter that my little friend was more deeply moved than I had ever known her.

“Oh,” she wrote, “what will Harry say to me now! On the eve of a great battle, probably, he can not come, and I fear it will hurt him beyond recovery. He loved his mother so above all other earthly things. I have telegraphed him, and before this reaches you I shall know whether he can leave his post; but I shall not know more until I see him, and it seems as though I could not wait. Talk to him for me. Tell him how bitterly it grieved me that he was from her side in the last hour. Oh, if he knew how I suffer, he would pity and never blame me!”

Near the close of the letter she described the sweet and peaceful closing scene of the dear old lady’s life, and expressed her thankfulness at having the privilege to stand, as a child, at her bedside, and receive her blessing at parting.

Two weeks later Marian Prince came to Corinth. There was nothing now to keep her at home, and she felt that her place was by Harry’s side. She had rented the house and furniture at a good price, and determined to follow him wherever she might.

“There is much work here, and few to do it,” she said to me, after our first greeting, “and when Harry does not need me others do. The suffering among the refugees, I am told, is fearful. Are there any besides yourself who are looking after them?”

“None now, I believe. At least I have met none,” I answered; “and I am more than glad you have come!”

Marian came to board with me, and we four had our head-quarters together. For several days every thing went on splendidly. I saw that Harry was gladdened by her presence, and in the evenings we could all rest, even enjoy ourselves with music and conversation. During the day Marian and I sought out the suffering and aided them all in our power, finding them shelter, food, and clothing, and reporting their needs to those from whom help must come as a gift of the Government, until such a time as they could be sent on to the North.

Thus September passed, and brought us at last to the eve of that fearful battle which had so long been expected.

With the first indications of the coming contest every man was alert for duty. The first gun fired set fire to the band of officers and men, and as we watched them buckling on swords and spurs with rapid finger, heard the tones of their voices, and the firm, quick tread of restless feet, we knew that they were going out to conquer.

Long before we saw any thing of the contest we heard the deep roaring of the cannon, and saw the effects of the battle. The ground shook with the heavy reverberations, and the smoke from the field rose to sight, and came nearer and nearer as the foe pressed on. Wounded men began to fill the house and claim our attention, and we could see the shells hurtling through the air, with their little white mantles of smoke, bearing death to many as they fell. It was near noon on the second day when the contest became most fearful. At that time we were in the Tishamingo Hotel, and they had pressed into the town, penetrating to the Corinth House, and upon the bridge near it. Marian and I watched the struggling masses from the window.

"O Heavens!" she groaned. "See, Catherine, how they drive our men before them! Hear the hissing of the bullets; and oh, see how they fall! The smoke is dense, but I can see them, and they are dropping like rain. Hark to their shouts! Ah, those pieces of artillery! How they sweep death into the ranks: and our darlings—perhaps they are gone!"

I could not answer. The mighty and awful grandeur and mingled horror of that hour struck me dumb. With arms twined round each other we stood and watched till a crash startled us. A shell had penetrated the wall and scattered the bricks and plastering upon the floor near us, killing a man lying sick upon a cot in a room adjoining.

After this shells frequently struck the hotel, doing little injury, and the battle grew hotter. Officers sent and forced us below stairs, where they thrust us into a room heaped up with the dead and dying. This room was in the rear of the building and opened at the side of a well, from whence we drew water for the sufferers, and bathed their wounds.

The shouts of men, the roll of drums, the cries of the suffering, and the terrible rolling of the guns, were mingling all the while and penetrating our retreat with awful distinctness. Yet personal fear had passed away, and we became absorbed in things immediately around us.

It was about the middle of the afternoon the first day that General Hackleman fell, mortally wounded, and they brought him into the parlor of the Tishamingo. Marian was busy with a dying man, and I went to the General, whom they had laid upon a cot.

A shot had passed through the neck, cutting the tongue at its root and rendering speech impossible. Lifting his dark eyes to my face he struggled hard to utter something, and finding that he could not, closed them in anguish, and large tears stole from under the lids and fell over his sun-browned cheeks. I thought he wanted to send some message to his family, and questioned him, trying to get answers by signs, but his agony became too great, and in a short time the soul went home to the God from whence it came. On my knees, beside the dead husband, with the roll of battle in my ears, I knelt in silent prayer for the wife and little ones in his far-off home in Indiana. I remembered them then, and how tenderly and proudly he had spoken of them to me before the catastrophe came. And oh, how keenly I felt the remembrance of his confident life! He never thought that death would find him. He had always spoken of the future as his, and dwelt glowingly on what he meant to do! Alas, how many others fell that day equally confident and hopeful!

General Oglesby was brought in the same day badly wounded, but not mortally—though it was then thought his wound was mortal—and many others followed. The hotel was converted into a hospital at once; and when I passed through the rooms later I found Marian quietly but earnestly engaged in dressing their wounds.

"I have heard from Harry and your husband," she looked up to say as I came near, "and both are safe. I shall expect them soon, for it is too dark to fight now. The forces are being withdrawn for the night."

The reader will remember that this was on the first day of the battle. On the second the rebels penetrated to the Corinth House, a stone's-throw from the Tishamingo, and passed upon the bridge that is above the railroad near it. The hour was a fearful one, and for a time many of us thought all was lost. But our troops rallied bravely, went forward with deafening yells, and forced the rebels back, scattering the dead in heaps upon the drenched dust.

But on this night our husbands did not come to us. The cry of Victory! rang through our ranks, sending thrills of glad triumph to every heart; but our rejoicing was tempered with wild and bitter pain, born of fears that we could not repulse. We could hear nothing of them, and concluded that they were either dead or wounded.

About ten o'clock at night Marian came to me and took my hand. Hers were burning, and her face whiter than ever under the burden of her great fear.

"I can not bear this suspense, Kate. Come, let us hunt them."

At that moment one of the surgeons of an Illinois Regiment came and drew me aside.

"How will you tell her?" he asked, with emotion. "Prince has been found dead, and I fear the shock will kill her. Your husband has not yet been heard of, but I hope he has not met the same fate. Poor Prince! Try to soften the blow for her."

There was no need. She had heard all, and stood at my elbow as pallid as snow.

"Where is he, doctor?" gently.

"In the house. They have carried him to one of the rooms above."

No more was said, and I followed her rapid, silent footsteps till she reached the side of her dead husband, and knelt beside it, kissing the white, cold lips in speechless agony.

"Shot through the heart," said one of the men in a low voice. "Poor fellow! She'll never hear him speak again." And then, as his eyes rested on her, they filled, and he turned away.

Oh, it was a sad and sorrowful sight to see her that night! She asked for water to wash the dust from his face, and would let no one touch him but herself. With her own fingers she pressed down the lids over the eyes, and smoothed the damp hair from the cold brow. She crossed his hands over his bosom, and kissed his face again and again, moaning in those low, pitiful tones devoid of complaint, but full of utter wretchedness. I saw her all the while, and my heart ached while I gave to others the help she had gently rejected.

I looked at my watch after a while, and found that it was twelve o'clock. How the time had flown! A few minutes later I saw Marian spread a white sheet over her husband, and leave him.

"Come, I am going now," she said, in her low, sweet voice. "Half the sufferers are not found yet, and hundreds may die with thirst before they can be relieved. The dead does not need me, and the living do. Those that are in the house are sufficiently relieved to spare us. Come."

Out into the night we went, and on to the battle-field where the contest had raged hottest—one heart rising crushed and bleeding from a deadly blow to struggle onward among the dead for the sake of the living; the other with the fires of suspense and agony still burning within it, and gazing into each upturned face with dread lest it should prove to be the missing face of a husband.

Oh those hours among the mangled forms upon the field of Corinth! Night's dark mantle spread above us made the light of the lanterns we held more fearfully vivid as it fell upon the ghastly faces of the dead. And every step we took was in clotted gore for nearly fifty yards. Little groups of men, with their lanterns, were seen here and there picking up the wounded, and their voices came to us strangely through the gloom. Low, faint moans startled us sometimes from forms under our very feet, and pitiful voices called to us for help. The demon of thirst raged among the fallen on the field, and we trod the horrible ground over and over to refill our vessels till the gray dawn came, and friends found us. But all through that night Marian Prince proved her right to the brightest crown of fame that ever graced woman's brow. With a heroism worthy of immortality she carried relief to the suffering, ignoring the agony in her own heart, and, one might have thought, the dead form in the house behind us, but for the low, shivering moans that came to me through the gloom. Once I heard her sob—one great, deep sob—as she laid a wounded head upon a little pile of leaves she had raked up for it to rest upon, and then the low, pitiful voice broke into a prolonged wail that went to my heart like a stab.

"Oh, Harry! Harry! Oh, Harry! my darling, my husband—no more!" and for a minute the head bowed, as if unable longer to sustain the weight of grief. I went to her and laid my hand upon the drooping head.

"Go in, Marian," I urged, tearfully. "You are overtaxing yourself. Go in and stay with him."

"No, no, Katie. That is only his dear, dead body, and it don't need me. His spirit is—who knows—here with me, perhaps! I must stay while I am needed, and can be of use. O God, what horrors are all around us!"

She got up and continued her work, and, as I have said, never left the field, except for water, till the morning came.

The morning passed in the same agonizing uncertainty. My husband was not found among the dead or wounded. But later in the day I heard that he had been taken prisoner and was unhurt. I will here add that he was among the first exchanged after the Corinth battle, and immediately resumed his place in the service, where he is still engaged as an officer of cavalry.

Marian Prince and I left Corinth together, and with us brought the remains of her noble husband. After this event I was ill for several weeks, and heard little of her, but when I recovered and again joined my husband I heard of her at the Memphis hospitals, where she was devoting herself to the sick during the siege of Vicksburg. It was a long gap between. The autumn and winter had passed, and the summer had come before we met again; but in that time she, with a great grief bearing down her life, went on her way, while I had stopped and yielded my strength for weeks before ability came to work again.

I went to see her on Sunday, having just arrived in the city and put up at the Gayoso House. There Colonel Brent was to meet me, and a dispatch informed me that he would be in upon the evening's train from Corinth, whither I was again going, then occupied by General Dodge's command.

As I entered the door Marian turned her head and recognized me. The next moment her arms were round my neck, her head against my bosom, and we both sobbed together, while strange eyes regarded us curiously.

"Oh, Catherine, it takes me back to that night to see you again!" she said, lifting her head; and then I saw how thin she had grown, and was startled.

"Marian! Marian! you must not stay here," I said, in alarm. "You will die."

"No sooner here than elsewhere, Katie dear," shaking her head with a sweet, sad smile. "I know it will come soon, and I want to try to spend what is left of my life as usefully as I can."

A few weeks later I heard from her. She wrote that she had grown too weak for further duty, and was going home. I knew that she ought to have added "to die," for death was in her face when I last saw her, and by the next train I followed the impulse that prompted me to go with her.

Arriving at Memphis, I was just in time to take her under my care, and we started up the river on the Platte Valley, a large boat bruised and battered with balls from frequent attacks by guerrillas. That trip up the Mississippi was a revelation to me. I stood confounded at the wonderful power of one frail, sorrow-stricken woman, who had labored all the while so silently and with such effect.

One day a party of gentlemen sat near us, and some officers were expressing disapprobation, in open and strong terms, of the habit women had of following up the army.

"They are not fit for it, and do themselves lasting injury, as well as much harm to the officers, at a time when they ought to be otherwise employed than in taking care of them. Men come to fight, not to set up establishments for the comfort and care of women! Poor things! They think they are doing a great deal of good, when, instead, they are only killing themselves! There is one of them now," pointing toward Marian. "She, no doubt, thinks that she has done a great deal of good, and, maybe, will die happy under the delusion."

My cheeks tingled, and a sharp retort rose to my lips. Marian smiled and laid her hand upon my arm, but I would not be hushed.

"Sir, may I ask if you were ever in a battle?" I asked, facing him. The whole group stared at me, and the one spoken of answered, "Not yet."

"Then let me tell you that this lady has, and felt the blows of two; and if she were to die now I could think it no wonder. At Donelson a father and only brother fell; at Corinth her husband; and on the night of his death she laid his beloved form out in repose, and then went out on the field to minister to the wounded there. Do you call this nothing? Is such a thing to be sneered or laughed at, or even to be passed over lightly? Since that time she has known no rest. Labor earnest and unceasing has been hers, frail and slender as she was, and crushed with sorrow. Yet, if she should go home and die happy with the thoughts those labors have brought her, with the memory of thanks and blessings in her ears, you would term it a fond delusion. I would to Heaven, Sir, that every man under the Government may have worked half as earnestly and effectually as she has! I trust that you will do so."

A week later Marian Prince died, and we buried her by her husband; and America has received no purer or nobler sacrifice than that of her young, unselfish life.

MY BOAT.

I SENT it out upon the stormy sea,
Freighted with hope, with many cares and fears:
Trusting, in due time, its return to me,
I sent it out in a farewell of tears.

It has not come, though years have passed away—
Full time enough for it to go and come:
Upon the shore I watch, day after day,
With straining eyes, for its returning home.

O! tell me, have you seen it, sailors grim and gray,
You whose whole lives are passed upon the sea;
O! tell me, have you seen in any sea or bay
The boat that years ago went forth from me?

It was a little boat to venture forth from land,
Too small, I fear, to combat with the gale;
But years of labor, on this dreary sand,
I spent upon the hull, and mast, and sail.

Its name was "Faith"—a gentle, trusting name—
None fitter could it bear upon the stormy sea;
Its builder cares for neither wealth nor fame:
My little boat is all the world to me.

O! hear ye winds that fill its little sail!
Deal gently with the wanderer wheresoe'er it be:
In storm and calm, in sunshine and in gale,
Remember little "Faith" is all the world to me.

O! boisterous waves, that roughly dash and break,
Filling my soul with dread upon the shore,
Break gently round her prow and in her wake:
If ye should take my "Faith" what have I more?

THE UNKIND WORD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

CHAPTER I.

THERE was—nay, there is, for it doubtless exists still—in a certain nook of the Western Highlands of Scotland, a certain cottage, of which, as of the celebrated cottage over which the "smoke so gracefully curled," it might truly be said,

"That, oh! if there's peace to be found in the world,
A heart that is humble might hope for it here."

Very "humble," certainly, the heart should be; for the cottage was so, consisting only of two rooms, with a byre adjoining: unto which byre the original owners periodically migrated, somewhat to the inconvenience of the cow: while the house itself was let to any summer lodgers who preferred the primitive and picturesque to the elegant and convenient.

Most picturesque it was: this solitary abode, nestling under a perpendicular rock, in the curve of a small bay, with a glorious sea-view in front, and behind it a magnificent glen, presided over by two ranges of granite hills. These hills from dawn to sunset—nay, all night long, for they never looked grander than by starlight—were continually changing their aspect and color. Only their forms remained, permanently outlined, in shine or storm, white mist or purple shadow, giving a sense of eternal endurance and majestic calm.

Besides this large beauty of the mountains, there was an infinite perfection of small beauties on every hand. Nowhere could be found such heathery moorlands; such verdant bogs, rich in lovely and rare bog-plants; such a pleasant shore, where from curious conglomerate rocks you might peer down a dozen feet, through crystal depths of brine, into the brilliant sea-gardens, waving with under-water vegetation, wonderful to behold. On land too, all about these rocks, which were strewn every where, or left standing upright in great boulders, were nooks that would almost make you believe in fairies' bowers; so that you would never feel surprised to see a wee green man perk up his head from among the delicate mosses and ferns, to ask you what business you had in his especial dominion.

Thus, outside, the cottage possessed every attraction that heart or eye could desire. Inside, perhaps, the less that is said of it the better. Except that it had two merits—rare, alas! in this region—it was undoubtedly clean: and it had windows which were actually made to open! Thanks to these advantages, within it had for the last month been stowed away, in the all but miraculous manner in which people do contrive to stow themselves away in Highland solitudes, a family of six persons—two brothers, three sisters, and a cousin—living that wild, free, Robinson-Crusoe sort of life which is so delicious to the young. For they were all young—the brothers and the cousin being under twenty, the three sisters a little older. Five of them were Wyvills—Agnes, Emma, Jane, Maurice, and Richard—motherless children of a grim, poor, proud Yorkshire squire; the sixth was Jessie Raeburn, orphan heiress of a rich old uncle, a Glasgow merchant. It was through her that the young Wyvills had been persuaded to spend their holidays in the North, renting this cheap, out-of-the-way cottage, and keeping house for themselves; for no servant was possible.

Very simple were all their domestic arrangements. The four girls appropriated the one double-bedded room; the other apartment—which, like the cobbler's stall, "served them for kitchen, and parlor, and all"—was likewise made to serve a third purpose, being at night, by means of that mysterious arrangement, universal in Scotland, "a concealed bed," ingeniously contrived to accommodate the boys. They, daily rising with the lark—only, it being September, there were no larks to rise with—always rushed out at once to their glorious morning bath on the near sea-shore, leaving the chamber free. When they came home as hungry as hunters, it was to find the kitchen all "redd up," as the Scotch cousin expressed it (and could do it too, though she was a rich Glasgow young lady), the kettle singing on the "twa-three" iron bars which did duty for a grate—just enough to keep the peat and wood from spluttering out on the earthen floor—and the breakfast all laid out on the one table. A very homely meal, consisting merely of a great bowl of porridge, and two jugs of sweet milk and buttermilk. If the boys desired fish, they had to rise at dawn and catch it for themselves out of the burn; and oh! what splendid sea-trout they sometimes brought home, and what a grand frying there was in the solitary frying-pan! which, with the three-legged pot and one sauce-pan, formed their only culinary apparatus. Yet even with these the girls had, during the month, become very tolerable cooks, and maids-of-all-work besides. To be sure, some disasters had at first occurred—such as when Agnes, coming home one day a little in advance of the rest, to prepare what is technically and most truthfully called a "hungry tea," unfortunately filled the kettle, and afterward the tea-pot, out of a can, not of fresh, but of sea-water! And again, when the "half-sheep," which she was accustomed to order weekly, had (with its corresponding half of course) betaken itself to the mountains, declining to be killed, and also, owing to storms or piscatory incapacity, all the fish, both in sea and burn, unanimously refused to come to the boys' hooks, there was absolute famine in the house. For two days the family had to breakfast, dine, and sup upon oatmeal porridge: at which they had first laughed, then grumbled, and then taken to quarreling, as they not seldom did. "And as all brothers and sisters do," they told the little quiet cousin, who, quite alone in the world, with no one either to love her or to vex her, could not understand it at all.

But, in spite of these small troubles, they had been very happy together; and now that their holiday was nearly over—it was then Sunday night, and Wednesday would be the first of October and their month's end—they all felt a little sad. They sat over their tea-table in the early closing twilight, without any of the skirmishes which, either in jest or earnest, were always rising up among these strong, rough Yorkshire natures—warm to love and quick to hate, or at least to wrangle, in a way that to little Jessie seemed as if it must spring from or result in undying hatred, till she found that they always made the quarrel up again, or, without any making up, went on in five minutes just as cheerfully as if it had never happened.

"You are the very queerest family!" she would say sometimes. "I suppose it is your English demonstrativeness which seems to me so odd. You speak out whatever comes into your minds, good or bad, kind or unkind. If any one were to say to me half the things that you say to one another every day of your lives, I should break my heart about it for weeks after: and if I were so left to myself as to speak to any body else in that way, it would imply that I had lost all love and respect for them, and I should just go away and leave them, and never befriends with them any more."

"Should you? Then you'd be a little donkey!" Agnes would answer. "We all like one another well enough, and we speak to one another no worse than father always speaks to us. We are used to that sort of thing, and don't heed it. It might have been different had mother been alive."

So Jessie often thought, but did not like to say. She knew very slightly her aunt's husband, except that her old uncle always looked "dour" when he mentioned Mr. Wyvill of Wyvill Court. And in her fond little heart—which her solitary life had made prematurely wise—she made great allowances for this rugged family, which had brought itself up much as it chose; with no softening influence of parental love, no restraining hand of parental guidance. And she loved them all, hardly making any difference; at least none that she then knew. And they all loved her; nor, even in their worst and roughest humors, did they ever ill-use her or say to her the sharp ill-natured things that they often said to one another. As she sat on the settle in front of the fire—so small in face and figure that she almost seemed a child, and so grave and quiet that she might have been a little old woman—she contrasted strongly with the handsome young Wyvills, both boys and girls, all large-made, well-featured, hearty-voiced: full of health, and spirit, and life. No wonder that to her—reserved, rather dreamy, delicate in health, and passive in nature—those wild Yorkshire cousins brought exactly the elements in which her dull, easy, rich, shut-up existence was deficient, and that she had been very happy this month—happier, she often thought, than ever since she was born.

So she told Agnes, and, a little less frankly, told Maurice also, as, after the tea-things had been washed up by the girls, and the fire piled up by the boys, they took their usual evening walk—past the old kirk, and along the burn-side, where the fringing birch-trees were turning yellow, and the rowan-berries a coral red; up the steep hill-road which led to the nearest point of communication with the civilized world—a fishing village, where, twice a week in summer and once in winter, a steamer stopped to take passengers and herrings to Glasgow.

"I don't think I'll go up to Glasgow to-morrow," said Maurice, suddenly stopping the line of procession, which now, as in all their walks had latterly happened, was just two and two and two—Maurice and Jessie, Dick and Agnes,

Emma and Jane. "Dick, you could get the money at the bank just as well as I could; and bring it back in time for us to pay our rent and clear away on the 1st. You shall go; I don't see why I should always be the man of business of the family. It would be awfully 'nice,' as you say, Jessie, to get two more days on the hills before I go back to college."

"And why shouldn't I get the benefit of those two days as much as you?" said Richard, sulkily: he was more given to sulks, and Maurice to quick, short angers. "See if you make me go up to Glasgow for you, my lad. I'll be shot if I do."

"Hush! don't quarrel; it's Sunday," said Jessie, using the first argument that came to hand, though her heart misgave her that it was a feeble one, seeing there was no reason people should be less good on week-days than on Sundays. But the Sunday evening silence had more influence than her speech, even over these young lads. Hardly any creature above the nature of a boor could fail to be impressed, consciously or unconsciously, by such a lovely, heavenly night, the like of which is now and then seen in the Highlands just before "coarse" weather sets in: a combination of all the beauty of all the seasons—warm and mild as summer, clear as autumn, solemn and soundless as winter.

Jessie Raeburn, who is a middle-aged woman now, could still describe it, vividly as if it were yesterday, that lonely hill-road, the sunset fading rosily over the sea on the right hand, and the full moon, with a star above her, climbing in a flood of brightness above the black mountains on the left. The two mountain ranges, with the desolate glen lying between them, from which, through the utter silence all abroad, rose up the faint far-off ripple of the burn, like the voice of a soul alive in the midst of death. And she remembers—or, whether or not she does, all the rest do—all save one (and perhaps he does too, in some strange way, belonging to the mysteries which are unfathomable in this world)—how her voice suddenly and involuntarily went up like an arrow of sound through the pellucid air; in a hymn-tune of course. It was that tune called "French," which in Scotch churches is usually sung, as Jessie sang it now, to the 121st Psalm:

"I to the hills will lift mine eyes,
From whence doth come mine aid.
My safety cometh from the Lord,
Who heaven and earth hath made.
Thy foot he'll not let slide, nor will
He slumber that thee keeps;
Behold, He that keeps Israel,
He slumbers not, nor sleeps.

"The Lord thee keeps, the Lord thy shade
At thy right hand doth stay;
The moon by night thee shall not smite,
Nor yet the sun by day.
The Lord shall keep thy soul; He shall Preserve thee from all ill.
Henceforth thy going out and in,
God keep for ever will."

The psalm ended, they all stood motionless; awed by the unearthly beauty of the scene, and by the involuntary solemnity which creeps over any six persons who have spent a very happy time together, and are now on the eve of parting, with the consciousness which common experience teaches, that it is at least doubtful how, when, and where the whole six may meet, or if they may ever meet together again.

"We shall soon be going home now," observed Richard, in a dolorous voice.

"I almost wish we were never going home any more," said his brother.

"Oh, Maurice!" cried Agnes, reprovingly.

"At least not to such a dreary home as ours. But some time"—and the lad, who had hold of cousin Jessie's hand, looked up toward the moonlit mountain-tops with a new expression of manly will and manly hope dawning in his handsome boyish face—"some time, perhaps, I will myself make a real home."

Just at that moment they were all startled by one of those sudden meteors common enough on Scottish autumn nights. It blazed out from beside the moon, quivered over the mountain peak below, and then vanished in blackness just over a pass which the boys had often talked of trying—fancying it would prove a short cut to the fishing-village—instead of pursuing this winding road across the wilderness of moorland, rock, and bog.

"By Jove, how plain that bit of the hill showed! I'll have a try at climbing it to-morrow."

"You won't, my lad," Dick answered to his brother. "You'll be far enough off by this time to-morrow."

"We'll see," Maurice said, somewhat angrily. But either he was too happy or too sad to wish to quarrel, or something else evidently engrossed him; for he walked home without saying a word more, not even to Jessie.

Presently they all gathered round the kitchen table for their supper—their last meal together; for whichever of the brothers went up to Glasgow to-morrow, he would have to rise before daylight, and cross the country by the mountain road to catch the steamer, returning only just in time on Wednesday to pay the rent, and escort the family to the point where the weekly boat would touch next day. Thus to-night was the real close of this Arcadian life. They would return to the comforts and discomforts of civilization. And though all the party tried to be exceedingly jolly—nay, Agnes actually brought out the whisky-bottle, and unexceptionable toddy made by Maurice was distributed fairly round, even to the silent and sullen Dick—still there was a cloud over them, a cloud long remembered and spoken of with awe.

"Well, boys, do settle it. Which is to go?" said Agnes.

"Richard," cried Maurice.

"Maurice," cried Richard.

"I'll make you do it."

"I'll be hanged if you will."

And from words they might have gone still further had not Jessie laid her little hand on the elder brother's arm.

"Don't quarrel; not this night, at least, when we have been so happy. Oh, don't!"

"Let go of him, Jessie!" cried Dick, fiercely. "He's a selfish, domineering, ill-natured brute."

"Am I?" said Maurice between his teeth, when he caught sight of Jessie's imploring face. "Hold your tongue, lad. You and I will settle it by-and-by, after the girls have gone to bed. Good-night now."

They said good-night all round, obediently; even Agnes, the house-mother and ordinary ruler of the family; for something in Maurice quite startled them, so unusual was his dignity of command, as well as self-command.

"I wonder what has come over the boy?" she said, when the four girls had shut themselves in their bedroom. "How well he kept his temper! and he usually loses it so soon."

Jessie said nothing.

Shortly afterward there came a little tap at the door.

"I want to speak to one of you girls for a moment."

"Which of us?"

"Cousin Jessie will do."

And Jessie, who had not begun to undress, but sat meditatively on her bed, went out, right outside the door into the starlight night, which was the only available place for conversation with Maurice.

"I want to ask you one thing, Jessie. Ought I to give in to Richard or not?"

"About to-morrow?"

"Yes."

"I don't know," said Jessie, sorely perplexed at being thus raised into a sort of Mentor, and, more painful still, a judge between the two brothers. "You are the elder, and have a right to get your own way. But still—nay, Maurice," she added, suddenly, "I'm not a bit wiser or better than you. Don't ask me to decide, for I really don't know."

"I do," said Maurice, and he looked down tenderly into the gentle face. "I won't vex him; for I'm a great deal happier than he, Jessie. I'll go to Glasgow myself."

And with a thrill at her heart, half of pleasure, half of pain, Jessie said, "Yes, go."

"Then good-night, for we'll likely never have another night here again."

"Good-night, Maurice. You are very, very good."

"Thank you."

They stood together, these two, girl and boy, little more than children, in the still night under the stars, with the murmur of the sea close below, and the great silent mountains beyond. They hardly understood either one another or their own selves, and yet somehow they did, or one of them learned it afterward.

"Oh, Jessie, give me a kiss—just one!" Maurice breathed rather than spoke.

Either she gave it, or he took it—she hardly knew which—but Jessie Raeburn has remembered and will remember it all her life long.

"Maurice—good Maurice," she sighed lovingly to herself, as she curled round on her hard but peaceful and happy pillow, "how could Richard say to him one unkind word?"

CHAPTER II.

JESSIE lay awake for a long time, but no ominous sound of quarreling came through the thin wall. She concluded the boys had made it up in the easy way that all wars were made up between them, namely, by the mere cessation of strife: contrition or forgiveness being things neither given nor exacted in this not over-sensitive or sentimental family. She went to sleep at last with a quiet heart, in which the deep feeling waking into existence was only just enough conscious of itself to diffuse a sense of vague happiness throughout her whole being, the happiness of which there is but one sort, coming once in a lifetime, in all this world.

When the girls rose they found the boys already away. Neither of them returned to breakfast, which caused some surprise.

"They can't both have gone to Glasgow. It would be very ill-natured of them; for I want help in ever so many ways. I wonder how they settled the quarrel last night?"

"Maurice told me he meant to go," said Jessie, briefly and quietly.

"That's all right; and most likely Dick has walked with him across the hill, and will be back to dinner."

So, after a reasonable time, they cleared away breakfast, and fell to their packing cheerily, with all the small jests indulged in under such circumstances by four lively and lightsome girls, who enjoy being busy, and busy all together. In the activity of their work they had quite got over the slight shadow of regret at parting, and were planning new meetings and new pleasures with the hopefulness and elasticity of youth. Afterward they looked back upon that morning, when they were all so active and gay, so preternaturally full of laughter and fun, with a kind of shiver, which for years made them pause in the midst of any mirth, as if they heard through it all the soundless footsteps of approaching Fate.

Their gayety was only checked, not suppressed, by the arrival of Richard, in not the best of humors. Poor fellow! this time he had some cause; for he had slipped into a rocky crevice, bruised his shoulder, and scarified his knee.

"It's lucky I didn't hurt myself worse," said he; "for some of those places are confoundedly deep, and so overgrown with heather that one never sees them till one puts one's foot into them. They are regular crevasses, I think, and they are just in that particular bit of the hill-side where we have so often intended to go. I've been, girls. I played old Maurice a nice trick, and slipped off before daybreak. So he would be obliged to go to Glasgow. Is he gone?"

"I suppose so, more shame to you, Dick," said Agnes.

"He meant to go; he made up his mind last night," Jessie added.

"Did he? Now that was jolly of him," said Dick, cordially. "But he might as well have told me so."

"Didn't he say any thing last night?"

"Not a word, for I shammed to be asleep. And this morning I left him really asleep, as sound as a church. Well, it was jolly of Maurice, and I'll do him a good turn some day for it."

So Dick quite recovered his spirits, and in spite of his bruises made himself both useful and agreeable all that day and the next, even though the coarse weather, of which that heavenly Sunday was the warning, had fairly set in, and the family were shut up between their two rough apartments, unable even to cross the threshold for blast and storm; such storm as is only seen in these mountains, where the rain not falls, but drives, in absolute sheets of water; and the wind grows into a perfect whirlwind; and the burn rises and roars along in a foaming torrent, thick and brown; and the sea becomes a mass of "white horses," and dashes itself along the once quiet beach and weedy rocks in a mad mass of waves and spray. It was a slight forewarning of what winter must be here, and it made the young people a little reconciled to the idea of going home.

"Only fancy being out on the mountains on a night like last night;" for the storm began about dusk on Monday. "I am glad Maurice started so early for the boat, and that you were back early too, Dick. Fancy if you had been out till now."

"Pooh, Agnes! I'd have stood it well enough. The shepherds do. And I'm glad I 'did' that pass after all; only it's nonsense supposing it's a nearer way to the coast—it's ever so much farther. Nothing so deceiving as miles of heather and bog. A horrid place. Ugh! but my shoulder is sore yet."

He occupied a good deal of the girls' time in waiting upon and nursing him, and apparently rather liked their doing it, especially Jessie, who was very sorry for him and very kind to him, as she would have been to any human creature.

The wild weather lasted all Tuesday, but on Wednesday morning it cleared up into that wonderful brightness of calm which succeeds these equinoctial storms. The packing was finished in great glee, and all preparations made for departure, as soon as Maurice should come with the cart that was to convey themselves and their luggage to the little inn where they had agreed to sleep, in order to be ready for the early boat next morning.

The girls prepared a hasty dinner out of the last of their provisions—had a final "crack" with their landlady, Mrs. MacDiarmid, who was expecting her "man" home from a week's absence at the fishing—and then they all kept sauntering about rather restlessly watching along the white line of road for the black speck which ought to be Maurice. They all felt, and said, that they would be quite glad to see him again: in his absence they had found out how pleasant and useful Maurice had been all this month, and how, with his bright cheery face and unfailing good-nature, he was, even though he had his little hot-temper occasionally, a more important element in the family circle than any one had imagined. Agnes owned, with a sigh, that she was half sorry he was going to Cambridge—the father having at last consented to this step.

"Perhaps it is all the better for him; but we shall miss him very much at home."

"Not a bit of it; you've me," said Richard, sharply. "And it's he that's the lucky fellow to get away from home, with father so cross, and you girls always bothering."

"Oh, Dick!" cried Jessie; and then, "Oh, Agnes!" as Agnes returned her brother some sharp answer, in the family fashion. After which little outburst the family horizon cleared up; but Jessie would have liked it better had it never clouded, especially just at the leaving of this sweet place, where they had enjoyed themselves so much. She said little, but kept looking wistfully and lovingly along the mountain-road for that small speck in the distance, which, as tourists were getting rare now, was almost sure to be Maurice; but it never came. No—though the afternoon melted into evening, the sun set goldenly in the sea, and the moon rose over the hill-top, in the same spot, and almost as bright and beautiful as on Sunday night—Maurice never came.

"The steamer could not have put in yesterday; it often happens so in stormy weather," Jessie said at last, speaking oracularly, as being the most familiar with these parts, and trying to hide a tremor of disappointment that was perceptible in her voice.

"But how shall we find that out?" Agnes answered. "And it will be so very provoking if it is so, for we shall have to wait for Maurice another day or more; and it is too late for Dick to start off and inquire."

"Dick won't do it, neither," emphatically declared that young gentleman. "You must just unpack and stop here another night. Who cares? I don't."

"But about Maurice," suggested Jessie, meekly. "There, look! somebody is coming down the road." And they all ran forward eagerly.

But it was only Diarmid MacDiarmid, otherwise Diarmid Beg, being a small man, with hardly an idea beyond fishing-nets and whisky. By the latter he was considerably overcome just then; and it was with difficulty they could make him understand what they meant to inquire—namely, whether the boat had stopped at all yesterday, and if either then or on any other day he had seen Maurice.

"Maybe I did, but I'm no sure. Eh! my heid's no gude at messages. But bide a wee, leddies." And, with a sudden lucky gleam of recollection, he pulled out of his pouch a scrap of paper, on which was written, in Maurice's own bold scrawl, "I'm off, and I'll be back on Wednesday."

"He met you, then? He gave you that?"

"He just did," affirmed Diarmid Beg, from whom no further information could be by any means elicited.

There was, therefore, no help for it but to conclude that he had gone to Glasgow on Monday, but that the return boat had not stopped at the fishing village; so that Maurice had been, as not seldom happens in the Highlands to unlucky winter passengers, conveyed against his will to some further port, whence he would have to get back how and when he could.

"Very provoking!" Agnes exclaimed; and they all agreed that, on the whole, civilization had its advantages. But they determined to make the best of things, and spent a not very doleful evening, or morning either,—when, sleep having brought Diarmid Beg a little more to "himself," they called him into the kitchen and again questioned him. He still declared that the scrap of paper—which, after being passed eagerly round, was left lying about, till Jessie took it up and put it in her pocket—had been given him by Maurice, who was hurrying to catch the boat.

"And did he catch it?"

"Maybe he did, and maybe he didn't," said the cautious Highlander. But afterward, being hard pressed, and seeing, with the mingled cunning and kindness of his race, how very anxiously the information was desired, giving vent to the universal Celtic imagination, he told a long and consecutive story of how he was afterward lying in his boat in the bay, and the steamer passed him, and there was on her deck a gentleman who he felt sure was the young master, for he called out to him, "unco ceevil," as Master Maurice always was, "Eh, Diarmid Beg, and hoo are ye the day?"

Which story, resting on no foundation at all, or on the slender foundation of two probabilities, perhaps facts, so twisted together as to compose one absolute lie, was eagerly received by the Wyvills: and afterward repeated and believed with that intensity of belief with which people seize on one only possible clew in the midst of a sea of doubt and misery.

On this fortunate lie, therefore, the family rested, tolerably at ease, for two days more: when getting no letter and no message, they decided, in general council, that their wisest plan was to take the Saturday boat up to Glasgow. Something must have happened—perhaps their father was ill, and Maurice had been summoned direct home; still, they grumbled, he might have contrived to send them some line or word, instead of leaving them in this forlorn condition. It was thoughtless—like all boys.

"Oh, don't blame him, Agnes. Not now!"

"Well, I won't, Jessie," replied the elder sister, who perhaps felt a relief in being cross. Yet it was strange, and seemed stranger still afterward, how little real anxiety they had at first, and how wonderfully they kept up their spirits—these five young people, to whom life had always been so easy that they scarcely understood what fear or sorrow meant. And a few physical inconveniences, natural under their forced stay—such as tea without sugar, and no meat to be got for love or money—kept their minds in a state of wholesome irritability and self-compassion, which took away the sense of real dread.

Only the first shadow of apprehension came over them on Friday; when, having explained their position to Mrs. MacDiarmid, and given Uncle Raeburn's name as security for the unpaid rent, they counted out all their money, and found it barely enough to carry them to their uncle's door at Glasgow.

"It's very hard, and it wasn't like Maurice to forget us so," said Agnes, almost crying. "I hope nothing has gone wrong with him—that he is not ill."

And when, in a somewhat dreary procession, they quitted, with scarce a farewell glance, the pretty cottage, and filed away—some walking, some riding in the cart—along the mountain-road, Richard confided to Jessie that he rather feared Maurice was ill—had perhaps caught a fever—for he shivered several times, and tossed about for a good while after he came to bed on Sunday night.

"And yet you never spoke to him?"

The boy hung his head.

"And the last thing you said to him was that unkind word!"

"I'll never say it again!" cried Dick, in a passionate burst of compunction. And poor Jessie's sore heart melted to see what deep, honest, brotherly love lay beneath the rough and quarrelsome exterior. "Never again, I promise you, Jessie!" But alas! why had he said it at all?

And so they passed on, a very silent little party, along the familiar road, and lost sight, forever, of the cottage where they had been so happy: the pleasant bay, the singing burn; and, at last, of the sharply outlined mountains, which kept eternal watch, in shower and sunshine, summer and winter, over the desolate glen.

DENIS DUVAL.

BY WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

CHAPTER VI.

I ESCAPE FROM A GREAT DANGER.

I SPOKE of the affair of the brickbats, at home, to Monsieur de la Motte only, not caring to tell mother lest she should be inclined to resume her box-on-the-ear practice, for which I thought I was growing too old. Indeed, I had become a great boy. There were not half a dozen out of the sixty at Pocock's who could beat me when I was thirteen years old, and from these champions, were they ever so big, I never would submit to a thrashing, without a fight on my part, in which, though I might get the worst, I was pretty sure to leave some ugly marks on my adversary's nose and eyes. I remember one lad especially, Tom Parrot by name, who was three years older than myself, and whom I could no more beat than a frigate can beat a seventy-four; but we engaged nevertheless, and, after we had had some rounds together, Tom put one hand in his pocket, and, with a queer face and a great black eye I had given him, says—"Well, Denny, I could do it—you know I could: but I'm so lazy I don't care about going on." And one of the bottle-holders beginning to jeer, Tom fetches him such a rap on the ear that I promise you he showed no inclination for laughing afterward. By-the-way, that knowledge of the noble art of fisticuffs which I learned at school, I had to practice at sea presently in the cockpit of more than one of his Majesty's ships of war.

In respect of the slapping and caning at home I think M. de la Motte remonstrated with my mother, and represented to her that I was now too old for that kind of treatment. Indeed, when I was fourteen, I was as tall as grandfather, and in a tussle I am sure I could have tripped his old heels up easily enough, and got the better of him in five minutes. Do I speak of him with undue familiarity? I pretend no love for him; I never could have any respect. Some of his practices which I knew of made me turn from him, and his loud professions only increased my distrust. Monsieur mon fils, if ever you marry, and have a son, I hope the little chap will have an honest man for a grandfather, and that you will be able to say, "I loved him," when the daisies cover me.

La Motte, then, caused "the abolition of torture" in our house, and I was grateful to him. I had the queerest feelings toward that man. He was a perfect fine gentleman when he so wished; of his money most liberal, witty (in a dry, cruel sort of way)—most tenderly attached to Agnes. Eh bien! As I looked at his yellow, handsome face, cold shudders would come over me, though at this time I did not know that Agnes's father had fallen by his fatal hand.

When I informed him of Mr. Joe Weston's salute of brickbats he looked very grave. And I told him then, too, a thing which had struck me most forcibly—viz., that the shout which Weston gave, and the oath which he uttered when he saw me on the wall, were precisely like the oath and execration uttered by the man with the craped face, at whom I fired from the post-chaise.

"Bah, bêtise!" says La Motte. "What didst thou on the wall? One does not steal pears at thy age."

I dare say I turned red. "I heard somebody's voice," I said. "In fact, I heard Agnes singing in the garden, and—and I got on the wall to see her."

"What, you—you, a little barber's boy, climb a wall to speak to Mademoiselle Agnes de Saverne, of one of the most noble houses of Lorraine?" La Motte yelled, with a savage laugh. "Parbleu! Monsieur Weston has well done!"

"Sir!" said I, in a towering rage. "Barber as I am, my fathers were honorable Protestant clergymen in Alsace, and we are as good as highwaymen, at any rate! Barber, indeed!" I say again. "And now I am ready to swear that the man who swore at me, and the man I shot on the road, are one and the same; and I'll go to Dr. Barnard's, and swear it before him!"

The chevalier looked aghast and threatening for a while. "Tu me menaces, je crois, petit manant!" says he, grinding his teeth. "This is too strong. Listen, Denis Duval! Hold thy tongue, or evil will come to thee. Thou wilt make for thyself enemies the most unscrupulous and the most terrible—do you hear? I have placed Mademoiselle Agnes de Saverne with that admirable woman, Mistress Weston, because she can meet at the Priory with society more fitting her noble birth than that which she will find under your grandfather's pole—parbleu. Ah, you dare mount on wall to look for Mademoiselle de Saverne? Gare aux manstraps, mon garçon! Vive Dieu. If I see thee on that wall I will fire on thee, moi le premier! You pretend to Mademoiselle Agnes. Ha! ha! ha!" And he grinned and looked like that cloven-footed gentleman of whom Dr. Barnard talked.

I felt that henceforward there was war between La Motte and me. At this time I had suddenly shot up to be a young man, and was not the obedient, prattling child of last year. I told grandfather that I would bear no more punishment, such as the old man had been accustomed to bestow upon me; and once, when my mother lifted her hand, I struck it up, and griped it so tight that I frightened her. From that very day she never raised a hand to me. Nay, I think she was not ill pleased, and soon actually began to spoil me. Nothing was too good for me. I know where the silk came from which made my fine new waistcoat, and the cambric for my ruffled shirts, but very much doubt whether they ever paid any duty. As I walked to church, I dare say I cocked my hat and strutted very consequentially. When Tom Billis, the baker's boy, jeered at my fine clothes, "Tom," says I, "I will take my coat and waistcoat off for half an hour on Monday, and give thee a beating if thou hast a mind; but to-day let us be at peace, and go to church."

On the matter of church I am not going to make any boast. That awful subject lies between a man and his conscience. I have known men of lax faith pure and just in their lives, as I have met very loud-professing Christians loose in their morality, and hard and unjust in their dealings. There was a little old man at home—Heaven help him!—who was of this sort, and who, when I came to know his life, would put me into such a rage of revolt while preaching his daily and nightly sermons, that it is a wonder I was not enlisted among the scoffers and evil-doers altogether. I have known many a young man fall away, and become utterly reprobate, because the bond of discipline was tied too tightly upon him, and because he has found the preacher who was perpetually prating over him lax in his own conduct. I am thankful, then, that I had a better instructor than my old grandfather with his strap and his cane; and was brought (I hope and trust) to a right state of thinking by a man whose brain was wise, as his life was excellently benevolent and pure. This was my good friend Dr. Barnard, and to this day I remember conversations I had with him, and am quite sure they influenced my future life. Had I been altogether reckless and as lawless as many people of our acquaintance and neighborhood, he would have ceased to feel any interest in me; and instead of wearing his Majesty's epaulets (which I trust I have not disgraced), I might have been swabbing a smuggler's boat, or riding in a night caravan, with kegs beside me and pistols and cutlasses to defend me, as that unlucky La Motte owned for his part that he had done. My good mother, though she gave up the practice of smuggling, never could see the harm in it; but looked on it as a game where you played your stake, and lost or won it. She ceased to play, not because it was wrong, but it was expedient no more; and Mr. Denis, her son, was the cause of her giving up this old trade.

For me, I thankfully own that I was taught to see the matter in a graver light, not only by our doctor's sermons (two or three of which, on the text of "Render unto Cæsar," he preached to the rage of a great number of his congregation), but by many talks which he had with me; when he showed me that I was in the wrong to break the laws of my country to which I owed obedience, as did every good citizen. He knew (though he never told me, and his reticence in this matter was surely very kind) that my poor father had died of wounds received in a smuggling encounter: but he showed me how such a life must be loose, lawless, secret, and wicked; must bring a man among desperate companions, and compel him to resist Cæsar's lawful authority by rebellion, and possibly murder. "To thy mother I have used other arguments, Denny, my boy," he said, very kindly. "I and the Admiral want to make a gentleman of thee. Thy old grandfather is rich enough to help us if he chooses. I won't stop to inquire too strictly where all his money came from;* but 'tis clear we can not make a gentleman of a smuggler's boy, who may be transported any day, or, in case of armed resistance, may be—" And here my good doctor puts his hand to his ear, and indicates the punishment for piracy which was very common in my young time. "My Denny does not want to ride with a crape over his face, and fire pistols at revenue officers! No! I pray you will ever show an honest countenance to the world. You will render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and—the rest, my child, you know."

* Ehen! where a part of it went to I shall have to say presently.—D. D.

Now, I remarked about this man, that when he approached a certain subject an involuntary awe came over him, and he hushed as it were at the very idea of that sacred theme. It was very different with poor grandfather prating his sermons (and with some other pastors I have heard), who used this Name as familiarly as any other, and.....but who am I to judge? and, my poor old grandfather, is there any need at this distance of time that I should be picking out the trabem in oculo tuo?.....Howbeit, on that night, as I was walking home after drinking tea with my dear doctor, I made a vow that I would strive henceforth to lead an honest life; that my tongue should speak the truth, and my hand should be sullied by no secret crime. And as I spoke I saw my dearest little maiden's light glimmering in her chamber, and the stars shining overhead, and felt—who could feel more bold and happy than I?

That walk schoolward by West Street certainly was a détour. I might have gone a straighter road, but then I should not have seen a certain window: a little twinkling window in a gable of the Priory House, where the light used to be popped out at nine o'clock. T'other day, when we took over the King of France to Calais (his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence being in command), I must needs hire a post-chaise from Dover, to look at that old window in the Priory House at Winchelsea. I went through the old tears, despairs, tragedies. I sighed as sentimentally, after forty years, as though the infundi dolores were fresh upon me, as though I were the school-boy trudging back to his task, and taking a last look at his dearest joy. I used as a boy to try and pass that window at nine, and I know a prayer was said for the inhabitant of yonder chamber. She knew my holidays, and my hours of going to school and returning thence. If my little maid hung certain signals in that window (such as a flower, for example, to indicate all was well, a cross-curtain, and so forth), I hope she practiced no very unjustifiable stratagems. We agreed to consider that she was a prisoner in the hands of the enemy; and we had few means of communication save these simple artifices, which are allowed to be fair in love and war. Monsieur de la Motte continued to live at our house, when his frequent affairs did not call him away thence; but, as I said, few words passed between us after that angry altercation already described, and he and I were never friends again.

He warned me that I had another enemy, and facts strangely confirmed the chevalier's warning. One Sunday night, as I was going to school, a repetition of the brickbat assault was made upon me, and this time the smart cocked hat which mother had given me came in for such a battering as effectually spoiled its modish shape. I told Dr. Barnard of this second attempt, and the good doctor was not a little puzzled. He began to think that he was not very wrong in espying a beam in Joseph Weston's eye. We agreed to keep the matter quiet, however, and a fortnight after, on another Sunday evening, as I was going on my accustomed route to school, whom should I meet but the doctor and Mr. Weston walking together! A little way beyond the town gate there is a low wall round a field; and Dr. Barnard, going by this field a quarter of an hour before my usual time for passing, found Mr. Joseph Weston walking there behind the stone inclosure!

"Good-night, Denny," says the doctor, when he and his companion met me; but surly Mr. Weston said nothing. "Have you had any more brickbats at your head, my boy?" the rector continued.

I said I was not afraid. I had got a good pistol, and a bullet in it this time.

"He shot that scoundrel on the same day you were shot, Mr. Weston," says the doctor.

"Did he?" growls the other.

"And your gun was loaded with the same-sized shot which Denis used to pepper his rascal," continues the doctor. "I wonder if any of the crape went into the rascal's wound?"

"Sir," said Mr. Weston, with an oath, "what do you mean for to hint?"

"The very oath the fellow used whom Denny hit when your brother and I traveled together. I am sorry to hear you use the language of such scoundrels, Mr. Weston."

"If you dare to suspect me of any thing unbecoming a gentleman, I'll have the law of you, Mr. Parson, that I will!" roars the other.

"Denis, mon garçon, tire ton pistolet de suite, et vise moi bien cet homme là," says the doctor; and griping hold of Weston's arm, what does Dr. Barnard do but plunge his hand into Weston's pocket, and draw thence another pistol! He said afterward he saw the brass butt sticking out of Weston's coat, as the two were walking together.

"What!" shrieks Mr. Weston; "is that young miscreant to go about armed, and tell every body he will murder me; and ain't I for to defend myself? I walk in fear of my life for him!"

"You seem to me to be in the habit of traveling with pistols, Mr. Weston, and you know when people pass sometimes with money in their post-chaises."

"You scoundrel, you—you boy! I call you to witness the words this man have spoken. He have insulted me, and libeled me, and I'll have the lor on him as sure as I am born!" shouts the angry man.

"Very good, Mr. Joseph Weston," replied the other, fiercely. "And I will ask Mr. Blades, the surgeon, to bring the shot which he took from your eye, and the scraps of crape adhering to your face, and we will go to lor as soon as you like!"

Again I thought with a dreadful pang how Agnes was staying in that man's house, and how this quarrel would more than ever divide her from me; for now she would not be allowed to visit the rectory—the dear neutral ground where I sometimes hoped to see her.

Weston never went to law with the doctor, as he threatened. Some awkward questions would have been raised, which he would have found a difficulty in answering: and though he averred that his accident took place on the day before our encounter with the beau masque on Dartford Common, a little witness on our side was ready to aver that Mr. Joe Weston left his house at the Priory before sunrise on the day when we took our journey to London, and that he returned the next morning with his eye bound up, when he sent for Mr. Blades, the surgeon of our town. Being awake, and looking from her window, my witness saw Weston mount his horse by the stable-lantern below, and heard him swear at the groom as he rode out at the gate. Curses used to drop naturally out of this nice gentleman's lips; and it is certain in his case that bad words and bad actions went together.

The Westons were frequently absent from home, as was the chevalier our lodger. My dear little Agnes was allowed to come and see us at these times; or slipped out by the garden-door, and ran to see her nurse Duval, as she always called my mother. I did not understand for a while that there was any prohibition on the Westons' part to Agnes visiting us, or know that there was such mighty wrath harbored against me in that house.

I was glad, for the sake of a peaceable life at home, as for honesty's sake too, that my mother did not oppose my determination to take no share in that smuggling business in which our house still engaged. Any one who opposed mother in her own house had, I promise you, no easy time: but she saw that if she wished to make a gentleman of her boy, he must be no smuggler's apprentice; and when M. le Chevalier, being appealed to, shrugged his shoulders and said he washed his hands of me—"Eh bien, M. de la Motte!" says she, "we shall see if we can't pass ourselves of you and your patronage. I imagine that people are not always the better for it." "No," replied he, with a groan, and one of his gloomy looks, "my friendship may do people harm, but my enmity is worse—entendez vous?" "Bah, bah!" says the stout old lady. "Denisot has a good courage of his own. What do you say to me about enmity to a harmless boy, M. le Chevalier?"

I have told how, on the night of the funeral of Madame de Saverne, Monsieur de la Motte sent me out to assemble his Mackerel men. Among these was the father of one of my town play-fellows, by name Hookham, a sea-faring man, who had met with an accident at his business—strained his back—and was incapable of work for a time. Hookham was an improvident man: the rent got into arrears. My grandfather was his landlord, and, I fear me, not the most humane creditor in the world. Now, when I returned home after my famous visit to London, my patron, Sir Peter Denis, gave me two guineas, and my lady made me a present of another. No doubt I should have spent this money had I received it sooner in London; but in our little town of Winchelsea there was nothing to tempt me in the shops, except a fowling-piece at the pawnbroker's, for which I had a great longing. But Mr. Triboulet wanted four guineas for the gun, and I had but three, and would not go into debt. He would have given me the piece on credit, and frequently tempted me with it, but I resisted manfully, though I could not help hankering about the shop, and going again and again to look at the beautiful gun. The stock fitted my shoulder to a nicety. It was of the most beautiful workmanship. "Why not take it now, Master Duval?" Monsieur Triboulet said to me; "and pay me the remaining guinea when you please. Ever so many gentlemen have been to look at it; and I should be sorry now, indeed I should, to see such a beauty go out of the town." As I was talking to Triboulet (it may have been for the tenth time), some one came in with a telescope to pawn, and went away with fifteen shillings. "Don't you know who that is?" says Triboulet (who was a chatter-box of a man). "That is John Hookham's wife. It is but hard times with them since John's accident. I have more of their goods here, and, entre nous, John has a hard landlord, and quarter-day is just at hand." I knew well enough that John's landlord was hard, as he was my own grandfather. "If I take my three pieces to Hookham," thought I, "he may find the rest of the rent;" and so he did; and my three guineas went into my grandfather's pocket out of mine; and I suppose some one else bought the fowling-piece for which I had so longed.

"What, it is you who have given me this money, Master Denis?" says poor Hookham, who was sitting in his chair, groaning and haggard with his illness. "I can't take it—I ought not to take it."

"Nay," said I; "I should only have bought a toy with it, and if it comes to help you in distress I can do without my plaything."

There was quite a chorus of benedictions from the poor family in consequence of this act of good nature; and I dare say I went away from Hookham's mightily pleased with myself and my own virtue.

It appears I had not been gone long when Mr. Joe Weston came in to see the man, and when he heard that I had relieved him, broke out into a flood of abuse against me, cursed me for a scoundrel and impertinent jackanapes, who was always giving myself the airs of a gentleman, and flew out of the house in a passion. Mother heard of the transaction, too, and pinched my ear with a grim satisfaction. Grandfather said nothing, but pocketed my three guineas when Mrs. Hookham brought them; and, though I did not brag about the matter much, every thing is known in a small town, and I got a great deal of credit for a very ordinary good action.

And now, strangely enough, Hookham's boy confirmed to me what the Slindon priests had hinted to good Dr. Barnard. "Swear," says Tom (with that wonderful energy we used to have as boys)—"swear, Denis, 'So help you, strike you down dead!' you never will tell!"

"So help me, strike me down dead!" said I.

"Well, then, those—you know who—the gentlemen—want to do you some mischief."

"What mischief can they do to an honest boy?" I asked.

"Oh, you don't know what they are!" says Tom. "If they mean a man harm, harm will happen to him. Father says no man ever comes to good who stands in Mr. Joe's way. Where's John Wheeler, of Rye, who had a quarrel with Mr. Joe? He's in jail. Mr. Barnes, of Playden, had words with him at Hastings market: and Barnes's ricks were burnt down before six months were over. How was Thomas Berry taken, after deserting from the man-of-war? He is an awful man, Mr. Joe Weston is. Don't get into his way. Father says so. But you are not to tell—no, never, that he spoke about it. Don't go alone to Rye of nights, father says. Don't go on any—and you know what not—any fishing business, except with those you know." And so Tom leaves me with a finger to his lips and terror in his face.

As for the fishing, though I loved a sail dearly, my mind was made up by good Dr. Barnard's advice to me. I would have no more night-fishing such as I had seen sometimes as a boy; and when Rudge's apprentice one night invited me, and called me a coward for refusing to go, I showed him I was no coward as far as fisticuffs went, and stood out a battle with him, in which I do believe I should have proved conqueror, though the fellow was four years my senior, had not his ally, Miss Sukey Rudge, joined him in the midst of our fight, and knocked me down with the kitchen bellows, when they both belabored me, as I lay kicking on the ground. Mr. Elder Rudge came in at the close of this dreadful combat, and his abandoned hussy of a daughter had the impudence to declare that the quarrel arose because I was rude to her—I, an innocent boy, who would as soon have made love to a negress as to that hideous, pock-marked, squinting, crooked, tipsy Sukey Rudge. I fall in love with Miss Squintum, indeed! I knew a pair of eyes at home so bright, innocent, and pure, that I should have been ashamed to look in them had I been guilty of such a rascally treason. My little maid of Winchelsea heard of this battle, as she was daily hearing slanders against me from those worthy Mr. Westons; but she broke into a rage at the accusation, and said to the assembled gentlemen (as she told my good mother in after-days), "Denis Duval is not wicked. He is brave and he is good. And it is not true, the story you tell against him. It is a lie!"

And now, once more it happened that my little pistol helped to confound my enemies, and was to me, indeed, a gude Wehr und Waffen. I was forever popping at marks with this little piece of artillery. I polished, oiled, and covered it with the utmost care, and kept it in my little room in a box of which I had the key. One day, by a most fortunate chance, I took my school-fellow, Tom Parrot, who became a great crony of mine, into the room. We went up stairs, by the private door of Rudge's house, and not through the shop, where Mademoiselle Figs and Monsieur the apprentice were serving their customers; and arrived in my room, we boys opened my box, examined the precious pistol, screw, barrel, flints, powder-horn, etc., locked the box, and went away to school, promising ourselves a good afternoon's sport on that half-holiday. Lessons over, I returned home to dinner, to find black looks from all the inmates of the house where I lived, from the grocer, his daughter, his apprentice; and even the little errand-boy who blacked the boots and swept the shop stared at me impertinently, and said, "Oh, Denis, ain't you going to catch it!"

"What is the matter?" I asked, very haughtily.

"Oh, my lord! We'll soon show your lordship what is the matter." (This was a silly nickname I had in the town and at school, where, I believe, I gave myself not a few airs since I had worn my fine new clothes, and paid my visit to London.) "This accounts for his laced waistcoat, and his guineas which he flings about. Does your lordship know these here shillings and this half-crown? Look at them, Mr. Beales! See the marks on them which I scratched with my own hand before I put them into the till from which my lord took 'em."

Shillings—till? What did they mean? "How dare you ask, you little hypocrite!" screams out Miss Rudge. "I marked them shillings and that half-crown with my own needle, I did; and of that I can take my Bible oath."

"Well, and what then?" I asked, remembering how this young woman had not scrupled to bear false witness in another charge against me.

"What then? They were in the till this morning, young fellow; and you know well enough where they were found afterward," says Mr. Beales. "Come, come. This is a bad job. This is a sessions job, my lad."

"But where were they found?" again I asked.

"We'll tell you that before Squire Boroughs and the magistrates, you young vagabond!"

"You little viper, that have turned and stung me!"

"You precious young scoundrel!"

"You wicked, little, story-telling, good-for-nothing little thief!" cry Rudge, the apprentice, and Miss Rudge in a breath. And I stood bewildered by their outcry, and, indeed, not quite comprehending the charge which they made against me.

"The magistrates are sitting at Town Hall now. We will take the little villain there at once," says the grocer. "You bring the box along with you, constable. Lord! Lord! what will his poor grandfather say?" And, wondering still at the charge made against me, I was made to walk through the streets to the Town Hall, passing on the way by at least a score of our boys, who were enjoying their half-holiday. It was market-day, too, and the town full. It is forty years ago, but I dream about that dreadful day still; and, an old gentleman of sixty, fancy myself walking through Rye market, with Mr. Beales's fist clutching my collar!

A number of our boys joined this dismal procession, and accompanied me into the magistrates' room. "Denis Duval up for stealing money!" cries one. "This accounts for his fine clothes," sneers another. "He'll be hung," says a third. The market people stare, and crowd round, and jeer. I feel as if in a horrible nightmare. We pass under the pillars of the Market House, up the steps, to the Town Hall, where the magistrates were, who chose market-day for their sittings.

How my heart throbbed, as I saw my dear Dr. Barnard seated among them!

"Oh, doctor!" cries poor Denis, clasping his hands, "you don't believe me guilty?"

"Guilty of what?" cries the doctor, from the raised table round which the gentlemen sate.

"Guilty of stealing."

"Guilty of robbing my till."

"Guilty of taking two half-crowns, three shillings, and twopence in copper, all marked," shriek out Rudge, the apprentice, and Miss Rudge, in a breath.

"Denis Duval steal sixpences!" cries the doctor; "I would as soon believe he stole the dragon off the church-steeple!"

"Silence, you boys! Silence in the court, there; or flog 'em and turn 'em all out!" says the magistrates' clerk. Some of our boys—friends of mine—who had crowded into the place, were hurrahing at my kind Doctor Barnard's speech.

"It is a most serious charge," says the clerk.

"But what is the charge, my good Mr. Hickson? You might as well put me into the dock as that—"

"Pray, Sir, will you allow the business of the court to go on?" asks the clerk, testily. "Make your statement, Mr. Rudge, and don't be afraid of any body. You are under the protection of the court, Sir."

And now for the first time I heard the particulars of the charge made against me. Rudge, and his daughter after him, stated (on oath, I am shocked to say) that for some time past they had missed money from the till; small sums of money, in shillings and half-crowns, they could not say how much. It might be two pounds, three pounds, in all; but the money was constantly going. At last, Miss Rudge said, she was determined to mark some money, and did so; and that money was found in that box which belonged to Denis Duval, and which the constable brought into court.

"Oh, gentlemen!" I cried out, in an agony, "it's a wicked, wicked lie, and it's not the first she has told about me. A week ago she said I wanted to kiss her, and she and Bevil both set on me; and I never wanted to kiss the nasty thing, so help me—"

"You did, you lying, wicked boy!" cries Miss Sukey. "And Edward Bevil came to my rescue; and you struck me, like a low, mean coward; and we beat him well, and served him right, the little abandoned boy."

"And he kicked one of my teeth out—you did, you little villain!" roars Bevil, whose jaw had indeed suffered in that scuffle in the kitchen, when his precious sweet-heart came to his aid with the bellows.

"He called me a coward, and I fought him fair, though he is ever so much older than me," whimpers out the prisoner. "And Sukey Rudge set upon me, and beat me too; and if I kicked him, he kicked me."

"And since this kicking match they have found out that you stole their money, have they?" says the doctor, and turns round, appealing to his brother magistrates.

"Miss Rudge, please to tell the rest of your story," calls out the justices' clerk.

The rest of the Rudges' story was, that, having their suspicions roused against me, they determined to examine my cupboards and boxes in my absence, to see whether the stolen objects were to be found, and in my box they discovered the two marked half-crowns, the three marked shillings, a brass-barreled pistol, which were now in court. "Me and Mr. Bevil, the apprentice, found the money in the box; and we called my papa from the shop, and we fetched Mr. Beales, the constable, who lives over the way; and when that little monster came back from school we seized upon him, and brought him before your worships, and hanging is what I said he would always come to," shrieks my enemy, Miss Rudge.

"Why, I have the key of that box in my pocket now!" I cried out.

"We had means of opening of it," says Miss Rudge, looking very red.

"Oh, if you have another key—" interposes the doctor.

"We broke it open with the tongs and poker," says Miss Rudge, "me and Edward did—I mean Mr. Bevil, the apprentice."

"When?" said I, in a great tremor.

"When? When you was at school, you little miscreant! Half an hour before you came back to dinner."

"Tom Parrot, Tom Parrot!" I cried. "Call Tom Parrot, gentlemen. For goodness-sake call Tom!" I said, my heart beating so that I could hardly speak.

"Here I am, Denny!" pipes Tom in the crowd; and presently he comes up to their honors on the bench.

"Speak to Tom, Doctor, dear Doctor Barnard!" I continued. "Tom, when did I show you my pistol?"

"Just before ten o'clock school."

"What did I do?"

"You unlocked your box, took the pistol out of a handkerchief, showed it to me, and two flints, a powder-horn, a bullet-mould and some bullets, and put them back again, and locked the box."

"Was there any money in the box?"

"There was nothing in the box but the pistol and the bullets and things. I looked into it. It was as empty as my hand."

"And Denis Duval has been sitting by you in school ever since?"

"Ever since—except when I was called up and caned for my Corderius," says Tom, with a roguish look; and there was a great laughter and shout of applause from our boys of Pockock's when this testimony was given in their school-fellow's favor.

My kind doctor held his hand over the railing to me, and when I took it my heart was so full that my eyes overflowed. I thought of little Agnes. What would she have felt if her Denis had been committed as a thief? I had such a rapture of thanks and gratitude that I think the pleasure of the acquittal was more than equivalent to the anguish of the accusation. What a shout all Pocock's boys set up as I went out of the justice-room! We trooped joyfully down the stairs, and there were fresh shouts and huzzahs as we got down to the market. I saw Mr. Joe Weston buying corn at a stall. He only looked at me once. His grinding teeth and his clenched riding-whip did not frighten me in the least now.

CHAPTER VII.

THE LAST OF MY SCHOOL-DAYS.

As our joyful procession of boys passed by Partlett's, the pastry-cook's, one of the boys—Samuel Arbin—I remember the fellow well—a greedy boy, with a large beard and whiskers, though only fifteen years old—insisted that I ought to stand treat, in consequence of my victory over my enemies. As far as a groat went, I said I was ready: for that was all the money I had.

"Oh you story-teller!" cries the other. "What have you done with your three guineas which you were bragging about and showing to the boys at school? I suppose they were in the box when it was broken open." This Samuel Arbin was one of the boys who had jeered when I was taken in charge by the constable, and would have liked me to be guilty, I almost think. I am afraid I had bragged about my money when I possessed it, and may have shown my shining gold pieces to some of the boys in school.

"I know what he has done with his money!" broke in my steadfast crony Tom Parrot. "He has given away every shilling of it to a poor family who wanted it, and nobody ever knew you give away a shilling, Samuel Arbin," he says.

"Unless he could get eighteenpence by it!" sang out another little voice.

"Tom Parrot, I'll break every bone in your body, as sure as my name is Arbin!" cried the other, in a fury.

"Sam Arbin," said I, "after you have finished Tom, you must try me; or we'll do it now, if you like." To say the truth, I had long had an inclination to try my hand against Arbin. He was an ill friend to me, and among the younger boys a bully and a usurer to boot. The rest called out, "A ring! a ring! Let us go on the green and have it out!" being in their innocent years always ready for a fight.

But this one was never to come off: and (except in later days, when I went to revisit the old place and ask for a half-holiday for my young successors at Pocock's) I was never again to see the ancient school-room. While we boys were brawling in the market-place before the pastry-cook's door, Dr. Barnard came up, and our quarrel was hushed in a moment.

"What! fighting and quarreling already?" says the doctor, sternly.

"It wasn't Denny's fault, Sir!" cried out several of the boys. "It was Arbin began." And, indeed, I can say for myself that in all the quarrels I have had in life, and they have not been few, I consider I always have been in the right.

"Come along with me, Denny," says the doctor, taking me by the shoulder: and he led me away and we took a walk in the town together: and as we passed old Ypres Tower, which was built by King Stephen, they say, and was a fort in old days, but is used as the town prison now, "Suppose you had been looking from behind those bars now, Denny, and awaiting your trial at assizes? Yours would not have been a pleasant plight," Dr. Barnard said.

"But I was innocent, Sir! You know I was!"

"Yes. Praise be where praise is due. But if you had not providentially been able to prove your innocence—if you and your friend Parrot had not happened to inspect your box, you would have been in yonder place. Ha! there is the bell ringing for afternoon service, which my good friend, Dr. Wing, keeps up. What say you? Shall we go and—and—offer up our thanks, Denny—for the—the immense peril from which—you have been—delivered?"

I remembered how my dear friend's voice trembled as he spoke, and two or three drops fell from his kind eyes on my hand, which he held. I followed him into the church. Indeed and indeed I was thankful for my deliverance from a great danger, and even more thankful to have the regard of the true gentleman, the wise and tender friend, who was there to guide, and cheer, and help me.

As we read the last psalm appointed for that evening service, I remember how the good man, bowing his own head, put his hand upon mine; and we recited together the psalm of thanks to the Highest who had had respect unto the lowly, and who had stretched forth His hand upon the furiousness of my enemies, and whose right hand had saved me.

Dr. Wing recognized and greeted his comrade when service was over; and the one doctor presented me to the other, who had been one of the magistrates on the bench at the time of my trial. Dr. Wing asked us into his house, where dinner was served at four o'clock, and of course the transactions of the morning were again discussed. What could be the reason of the persecution against me? Who instigated it? There were matters connected with this story regarding which I could not speak. Should I do so, I must betray secrets which were not mine, and which implicated I knew not whom, and regarding which I must hold my peace. Now, they are secrets no more. That old society of smugglers is dissolved long ago: nay, I shall have to tell presently how I helped myself to break it up. Grandfather, Rudge, the chevalier, the gentlemen of the Priory, were all connected in that great smuggling society of which I have spoken; which had its dépôts all along the coast and inland, and its correspondents from Dunkirk to Havre de Grace. I have said as a boy how I had been on some of these "fishing" expeditions; and how, mainly by the effect of my dear doctor's advice, I had withdrawn from all participation in this lawless and wicked life. When Bevil called me coward for refusing to take a share in a night-cruise, a quarrel ensued between us, ending in that battle royal which left us all sprawling, and cuffing and kicking each other on the kitchen floor. Was it rage at the injury to her sweet-heart's teeth, or hatred against myself, which induced my sweet Miss Sukey to propagate calumnies against me? The provocation I had given certainly did not seem to warrant such a deadly enmity as a prosecution and a perjury showed must exist. Howbeit, here was a reason for the anger of the grocer's daughter and apprentice. They would injure me in any way they could; and (as in the before-mentioned case of the bellows) take the first weapon at hand to overthrow me.

As magistrates of the county, and knowing a great deal of what was happening round about them, and the character of their parishioners and neighbors, the two gentlemen could not, then, press me too closely. Smuggled silk and lace, rum and brandy? Who had not these in his possession along the Sussex and Kent coast?

"And, Wing, will you promise me there are no ribbons in your house but such as have paid duty?" asks one doctor of the other.

"My good friend, it is lucky my wife has gone to her tea-table," replies Dr. Wing, "or I would not answer for the peace being kept."

"My dear Wing," continues Dr. Barnard, "this brandy-punch is excellent, and is worthy of being smuggled. To run an anker of brandy seems no monstrous crime; but when men engage in these lawless ventures at all, who knows how far the evil will go? I buy ten kegs of brandy from a French fishing-boat, I land it under a lie on the coast, I send it inland ever so far, be it from here to York, and all my consignees lie and swindle. I land it, and lie to the revenue officer. Under a lie (that is a mutual secrecy) I sell it to the landlord of the 'Bell' at Maidstone, say—where a good friend of ours, Denny, looked at his pistols. You remember the day when his brother received the charge of shot in his face? My landlord sells it to a customer under a lie. We are all engaged in crime, conspiracy, and falsehood; nay, if the revenue looks too closely after us, we out with our pistols, and to crime and conspiracy add murder. Do you suppose men engaged in lying every day will scruple about a false oath in a witness-box? Crime engenders crime, Sir. Round about us, Wing, I know there exists a vast confederacy of fraud, greed, and rebellion. I name no names, Sir. I fear men high placed in the world's esteem, and largely endowed with its riches too, are concerned in the pursuit of this godless traffic of smuggling, and to what does it not lead them? To falsehood, to wickedness, to murder, to—"

"Tea, Sir, if you please, Sir," says John, entering. "My mistress and the young ladies are waiting."

The ladies had previously heard the story of poor Denis Duval's persecution and innocence, and had shown him great kindness. By the time when we joined them after dinner, they had had time to perform a new toilet, being engaged to cards with some neighbors. I knew Mrs. Wing was a customer to my mother for some of her French goods, and she would scarcely, on an ordinary occasion, have admitted such a lowly guest to her table as the humble dress-maker's boy; but she and the ladies were very kind, and my persecution and proved innocence had interested them in my favor.

"You have had a long sitting, gentlemen," says Mrs. Wing; "I suppose you have been deep in politics, and the quarrel with France."

"We have been speaking of France and French goods, my dear," said Dr. Wing, dryly.

"And of the awful crime of smuggling and encouraging smuggling, my dear Mrs. Wing!" cries my doctor.

"Indeed, Dr. Barnard!" Now, Mrs. Wing and the young ladies were dressed in smart new caps and ribbons, which my poor mother supplied; and they turned red, and I turned as red as the cap-ribbons, as I thought how my good ladies had been provided. No wonder Mrs. Wing was desirous to change the subject of conversation.

"What is this young man to do after his persecution?" she asked. "He can't go back to Mr. Rudge—that horrid Wesleyan who has accused him of stealing."

No, indeed, I could not go back. We had not thought about the matter until then. There had been a hundred things to agitate and interest me in the half-dozen hours since my apprehension and dismissal.

The doctor would take me to Winchelsea in his chaise. I could not go back to my persecutors, that was clear, except to reclaim my little property and my poor little boxes, which they had found means to open. Mrs. Wing gave me a hand, the young ladies a stately courtesy, and my good Dr. Barnard putting a hand under the arm of the barber's grandson, we quitted these kind people. I was not on the quarter-deck as yet, you see. I was but an humble lad belonging to ordinary tradesmen.

By-the-way, I had forgotten to say that the two clergymen, during their after-dinner talk, had employed a part of it in examining me as to my little store of learning at school, and my future prospects. Of Latin I had a smattering; French, owing to my birth, and mainly to M. de la Motte's instruction and conversation, I could speak better than either of my two examiners, and with quite the good manner and conversation. I was well advanced, too, in arithmetic and geometry; and Dampier's Voyages were as much my delight as those of Sinbad or my friends Robinson Crusoe and Man Friday. I could pass a good examination in navigation and seamanship, and could give an account of the different sailings, working-tides, double altitudes, and so forth.

"And you can manage a boat at sea too?" says Dr. Barnard, dryly. I blushed, I suppose. I could do that, and could steer, reef, and pull an oar. At least I could do so two years ago.

"Denny, my boy," says my good doctor, "I think 'tis time for thee to leave this school at any rate, and that our friend Sir Peter must provide for thee."

However he may desire to improve in learning, no boy, I fancy, is very sorry when a proposal is made to him to leave school. I said that I should be too glad if Sir Peter, my patron, would provide for me. With the education I had I ought to get on, the doctor said, and my grandfather, he was sure, would find the means for allowing me to appear like a gentleman.

To fit a boy for appearance on the quarter-deck, and to enable him to rank with others, I had heard would cost thirty or forty pounds a year at least. I asked, did Dr. Barnard think my grandfather could afford such a sum?

"I know not your grandfather's means," Dr. Barnard answered, smiling. "He keeps his own counsel. But I am very much mistaken, Denny, if he can not afford to make you a better allowance than many a fine gentleman can give his son. I believe him to be rich. Mind, I have no precise reason for my belief; but I fancy, Master Denis, your good grandpapa's fishing has been very profitable to him."

How rich was he? I began to think of the treasures in my favorite "Arabian Nights." Did Dr. Barnard think my grandfather was very rich? Well—the doctor could not tell. The notion in Winchelsea was that old Mr. Denis was very well to do. At any rate I must go back to him. It was impossible that I should stay with the Rudge family after the insulting treatment I had had from them. The doctor said he would take me home with him in his chaise, if I would pack my little trunks; and with this talk we reached Rudge's shop, which I entered not without a beating heart. There was Rudge glaring at me from behind his desk, where he was posting his books. The apprentice looked daggers at me as he came up through a trap-door from the cellar with a string of dip-candles; and my charming Miss Susan was behind the counter tossing up her ugly head.

"Ho! he's come back, have he?" says Miss Rudge. "As all the cupboards is locked in the parlor, you can go in and get your tea there, young man."

"I am going to take Denis home, Mr. Rudge," said my kind doctor. "He can not remain with you after the charge which you made against him this morning."

"Of having our marked money in his box? Do you go for to dare for to say we put it there?"

cries miss, glaring now at me, now at Doctor Barnard. "Go to say that. Please to say that once, Dr. Barnard, before Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Scales" (these were two women who happened to be in the shop purchasing goods). "Just be so good for to say before these ladies that we have put the money in that boy's box, and we'll see whether there is not justice in Hengland for a poor girl whom you insult, because you are a doctor and a magistrate indeed! Eh, if I was a man, I wouldn't let some people's gowns, and cassocks, and bands remain long on their backs—that I wouldn't. And some people wouldn't see a woman insulted if they wasn't cowards!"

As she said this, Miss Sukey looked at the cellar-trap, above which the apprentice's head had appeared, but the doctor turned also toward it with a glance so threatening, that Bevil let the trap fall suddenly down, not a little to my doctor's amusement.

"Go and pack thy trunk, Denny. I will come back for thee in half an hour. Mr. Rudge must see that after being so insulted as you have been, you never as a gentleman can stay in his house."

"A pretty gentleman, indeed!" ejaculates Miss Rudge. "Pray, how long since was barbers gentlemen, I should like to know? Mrs. Scales mum, Mrs. Barker mum—did you ever have your hair dressed by a gentleman? If you want for to have it, you must go to Mounseer Duval, at Winchelsea, which one of the name was hung, Mrs. Barker mum, for a thief and a robber, and he won't be the last neither!"

There was no use in bandying abuse with this woman. "I will go and get my trunk, and be ready, Sir," I said to the doctor; but his back was no sooner turned than the raging virago opposite me burst out with a fury of words that I certainly can't remember after five-and-forty years. I fancy I see now the little green eyes gleaming hatred at me, the lean arms a-kimbo, the feet stamping as she hisses out every imaginable imprecation at my poor head.

"Will no man help me, and stand by and see that barber's boy insult me?" she cried. "Bevil, I say—Bevil! 'elp me!"

I ran up stairs to my little room, and was not twenty minutes in making up my packages. I had passed years in that little room, and somehow grieved to leave it. The odious people had injured me, and yet I would have liked to part friends with them. I had passed delightful nights there in the company of Robinson Crusoe, mariner, and Monsieur Galland and his Contes Arabes, and Hector of Troy, whose adventures and lamentable death (out of Mr. Pope) I could recite by heart; and I had had weary nights, too, with my school-books, cramming that crabbed Latin grammar into my puzzled brain. With arithmetic, logarithms, and mathematics I have said I was more familiar. I took a pretty good place in our school with them, and ranked before many boys of greater age.

And now my boxes being packed (my little library being stowed away in that which contained my famous pistol), I brought them down stairs, with nobody to help me, and had them in the passage ready against Dr. Barnard's arrival. The passage is behind the back-shop at Rudge's—(dear me! how well I remember it!)—and a door thence leads into a side-street. On the other side of this passage is the kitchen, where had been the fight which has been described already, and where we commonly took our meals.

I declare I went into that kitchen disposed to part friends with all these people—to forgive Miss Sukey her lies, and Bevil his cuffs, and all the past quarrels between us. Old Rudge was by the fire having his supper; Miss Sukey opposite to him. Poulson, as yet, was minding the shop.

"I have come to shake hands before going away," I said.

"You're a-going, are you? And pray, Sir, whereever are you a-going of?" says Miss Sukey, over her tea.

"I am going home with Dr. Barnard. I can't stop in this house after you have accused me of stealing your money."

"Stealing? Wasn't the money in your box, you little beastly thief?"

"Oh, you young reprobate, I am surprised the bears don't come in and eat you," groans old Rudge. "You have shortened my life with your wickedness, that you have; and if you don't bring your good grandfather's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave I shall be surprised, that I shall. You, who come of a pious family—I tremble when I think of you, Denis Duval!"

"Tremble! Faugh! the wicked little beast! he makes me sick, he do!" cries Miss Sukey, with looks of genuine loathing.

"Let him depart from among us!" cries Rudge.

"Never do I wish to see his ugly face again!" exclaims the gentle Susan.

"I am going as soon as Dr. Barnard's chaise comes," I said. "My boxes are in the passage now, ready packed."

"Ready packed, are they? Is there any more of our money in them, you little miscreant? Pa, is your silver tankard in the cupboard, and is the spoons safe?"

I think poor Sukey had been drinking to drive away the mortifications of the morning in the court-house. She became more excited and violent with every word she spoke, and shrieked and clenched her fists at me like a mad woman.

"Susanna, you have had false witness bore against you, my child; and you are not the first of your name. But be calm, be calm; it's our duty to be calm!"

"Eh!" (here she gives a grunt) "calm with that sneak—that pig—that liar—that beast. Where's Edward Bevil? Why don't he come forward like a man, and flog the young scoundrel's life out?" shrieks Susanna. "Oh, with this here horsewhip, how I would like to give it you!" (She clutched her father's whip from the dresser, where it commonly hung on two hooks.) "Oh, you—you villain! you have got your pistol, have you? Shoot me, you little coward, I ain't afraid of you! You have your pistol in your box, have you?" (I uselessly said as much in reply to this taunt.) "Stop! I say, Pa!—that young thief isn't going away with them boxes, and robbing the whole house as he may. Open the boxes this instant! We'll see he's stole nothing! Open them, I say!"

I said I would do nothing of the kind. My blood was boiling up at this brutal behavior; and as she dashed out of the room to seize one of my boxes I put myself before her and sat down on it.

This was assuredly a bad position to take, for the furious vixen began to strike me and lash at my face with the riding-whip, and it was more than I could do to wrench it from her.

Of course, at this act of defense on my part, Miss Sukey yelled for help, and called out, "Edward! Ned Bevil! The coward is a striking me! Help, Ned!" At this the shop door flies open, and Sukey's champion is about to rush on me, but he breaks down over my other box with a crash of his shins and frightful execrations. His nose is prone on the pavement; Miss Sukey is wildly laying about her with her horsewhip (and I think Bevil's jacket came in for most of the blows); we are all higgledy-piggledy, plunging and scuffling in the dark—when a carriage drives up, which I had not heard in the noise of action, and, as the hall door opened, I was pleased to think that Dr. Barnard had arrived, according to his promise.

It was not the doctor. The new-comer wore a gown, but not a cassock. Soon after my trial before the magistrates was over, our neighbor, John Jephson, of Winchelsea, mounted his cart and rode home from Rye market. He straightway went to our house, and told my mother of the strange scene which had just occurred, and of my accusation before the magistrates and acquittal. She begged, she ordered Jephson to lend her his cart. She seized whip and reins; she drove over to Rye; and I don't envy Jephson's old gray mare that journey with such a charioteer behind her. The door, opening from the street, flung light into the passage; and behold, we three warriors were sprawling on the floor in the higgledy-piggledy stage of the battle as my mother entered!

What a scene for a mother with a strong arm, a warm heart, and a high temper! Madame Duval rushed instantly at Miss Susan, and tore her shrieking from my body, which fair Susan was pommeling with the whip. A part of Susan's cap and tufts of her red hair were torn off by this maternal Amazon, and Susan was hurled through the open door into the kitchen, where she fell before her frightened father. I don't know how many blows my parent inflicted upon this creature. Mother might have slain her, but that the chaste Susanna, screaming shrilly, rolled under the deal kitchen table.

Madame Duval had wrenched away from this young person the horsewhip with which Susan had been operating upon the shoulders of her only son, and snatched the weapon as her fallen foe dropped. And now, my mamma, seeing old Mr. Rudge sitting in a ghastly state of terror in the corner, rushed at the grocer, and in one minute, with butt and thong, inflicted a score of lashes over his face, nose, and eyes, for which any body who chooses may pity him. "Ah, you will call my boy a thief, will you? Ah, you will take my Denny before the justices, will you? Prends moi ça, gredin! Attrape, lâche! Nimmt noch ein paar Schläge, Spitzbube!" cries out mother, in that polyglot language of English, French, High-Dutch, which she always used when excited. My good mother could shave and dress gentlemen's heads as well as any man; and faith I am certain that no man in all Europe got a better dressing than Mr. Rudge on that evening.

Bless me! I have written near a page to describe a battle which could not have lasted five minutes. Mother's cart was drawn up at the side-street while she was victoriously engaged within. Meanwhile, Dr. Barnard's chaise had come to the front door of the shop, and he strode through it, and found us conquerors in possession of both fields. Since my last battle with Bevil, we both knew that I was more than a match for him. "In the king's name, I charge you drop your daggers," as the man says in the play. Our wars were over on the appearance of the man of peace. Mother left off plying the horsewhip over Rudge; Miss Sukey came out from under the table; Mr. Bevil rose, and slunk off to wash his bleeding face; and when the wretched Rudge whimpered out that he would have the law for this assault, the doctor sternly said, "You were three to one during part of the battle, three to two afterward, and after your testimony to-day, you perjured old miscreant, do you suppose any magistrate will believe you?"

No. Nobody did believe them. A punishment fell on these bad people. I don't know who gave the name, but Rudge and his daughter were called Ananias and Sapphira in Rye; and from that day the old man's affairs seemed to turn to the bad. When our boys of Pockock's met the grocer, his daughter, or his apprentice, the little miscreants would cry out, "Who put the money in Denny's box?" "Who bore false witness against his neighbor?" "Kiss the book, Sukey my dear, and tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, do you hear?" They had a dreadful life, that poor grocer's family. As for that rogue Tom Parrot, he comes into the shop one market-day when the place was full, and asks for a penn'orth of sugar-candy, in payment for which he offers a penny to old Rudge sitting at his books behind his high desk. "It's a good bit of money," says Tom (as bold as the brass which he was tendering). "It ain't marked, Mr. Rudge, like Denny Duval's money!" And, no doubt, at a signal from the young reprobate, a chorus of boys posted outside began to sing, "Ananias, Ananias! He pretends to be so pious! Ananias and Saphia—" Well, well, the Saphia of these young wags was made to rhyme incorrectly with a word beginning with L. Nor was this the only punishment which befell the unhappy Rudge: Mrs. Wing and several of his chief patrons took away their custom from him and dealt henceforth with the opposition grocer. Not long after my affair, Miss Sukey married the toothless apprentice, who got a bad bargain with her, sweet-heart or wife. I shall have to tell presently what a penalty they (and some others) had to pay for their wickedness; and of an act of contrition on poor Miss Sukey's part, whom, I am sure, I heartily forgive. Then was cleared up that mystery (which I could not understand, and Dr. Barnard could not, or would not) of the persecutions directed against an humble lad, who never, except in self-defense, did harm to any mortal.

I shouldered the trunks, causes of the late lamentable war, and put them into mother's cart, into which I was about to mount, but the shrewd old lady would not let me take a place beside her. "I can drive well enough. Go thou in the chaise with the doctor. He can talk to thee better, my son, than an ignorant woman like me. Neighbor Jephson told me how the good gentleman stood by thee in the justice-court. If ever I or mine can do any thing to repay him, he may command me. Houp, Schimmel! Fort! Shalt soon be to house!" And with this she was off with my bag and baggage, as the night was beginning to fall.

I went out of the Ridges' house, into which I have never since set foot. I took my place in the chaise by my kind Dr. Barnard. We passed through Winchelsea gate, and dipped down into the marshy plain beyond with bright glimpses of the Channel shining beside us, and the stars glittering overhead. We talked of the affair of the day, of course—the affair most interesting, that is, to me, who could think of nothing but magistrates, and committals, and acquittals. The doctor repeated his firm conviction that there was a great smuggling conspiracy all along the coast and neighborhood. Master Rudge was a member of the fraternity (which, indeed, I knew, having been out with his people once or twice, as I have told, to my shame). "Perhaps there were other people of my acquaintance who belonged to the same society?" the doctor said, dryly. "Gee up, Daisy! There were other people of my acquaintance who were to be found at Winchelsea as well as at Rye. Your precious one-eyed enemy is in it; so, I have no doubt, is Monsieur le Chevalier de la Motte; so is—can you guess the name of any one besides, Denny?"

"Yes, Sir," I said, sadly; I knew my own grandfather was engaged in that traffic. "But if—if others are, I promise you, on my honor, I never will embark in it," I added.

"'Twill be more dangerous now than it has been. There will be obstacles to crossing the Channel which the contraband gentlemen have not known for some time past. Have you not heard the news?"

"What news?" Indeed I had thought of none but my own affairs. A post had come in that very evening from London, bringing intelligence of no little importance even to poor me, as it turned out. And the news was that his Majesty the King, having been informed that a treaty of amity and commerce had been signed between the Court of France and certain persons employed by his Majesty's revolted subjects in North America, has judged it necessary to send orders to his ambassador to withdraw from the French Court.....and relying with the firmest confidence upon the zealous and affectionate support of his faithful people, he is determined to prepare to exert, if it should be necessary, all the forces and resources of his kingdoms, which he trusts will be adequate to repel every insult and attack, and to maintain and uphold the power and reputation of this country.

So as I was coming out of Rye court-house, thinking of nothing but my enemies, and my trials, and my triumphs, post-boys were galloping all over the land to announce that we were at war with France. One of them, as we made our way home, clattered past us with his twanging horn, crying his news of war with France. As we wound along the plain, we could see the French lights across the Channel. My life has lasted for fifty years since then, and scarcely ever since, but for very, very brief intervals has that baleful war-light ceased to burn.

The messenger who bore this important news arrived after we left Rye, but, riding at a much quicker pace than that which our doctor's nag practiced, overtook us ere we had reached our own town of Winchelsea. All our town was alive with the news in half an hour; and in the market-place, the public houses, and from house to house, people assembled and talked. So we were at war again with our neighbors across the Channel, as well as with our rebellious children in America; and the rebellious children were having the better of the parent at this time. We boys at Pocock's had fought the war stoutly and with great elation at first. Over our maps we had pursued the rebels, and beaten them in repeated encounters. We routed them on Long Island. We conquered them at Brandywine. We vanquished them gloriously at Bunker's Hill. We marched triumphantly into Philadelphia with Howe. We were quite bewildered when we had to surrender with General Burgoyne at Saratoga; being, somehow, not accustomed to hear of British armies surrendering, and British valor being beat. "We had a half-holiday for Long Island," says Tom Parrot, sitting next to me in school. "I suppose we shall be flogged all round for Saratoga." As for those Frenchmen, we knew of their treason for a long time past, and were gathering up wrath against them. Protestant Frenchmen, it was agreed, were of a different sort; and I think the banished Huguenots of France have not been unworthy subjects of our new sovereign.

There was one dear little Frenchwoman in Winchelsea who I own was a sad rebel. When Mrs. Barnard, talking about the war, turned round to Agnes, and said, "Agnes, my child, on what side are you?" Mademoiselle de Barr blushed very red, and said, "I am a French girl, and I am of the side of my country. Vive la France! vive le Roi!"

"Oh, Agnes! oh, you perverted, ungrateful little, little monster!" cries Mrs. Barnard, beginning to weep.

But the doctor, far from being angry, smiled and looked pleased; and making Agnes a mock reverence, he said, "Mademoiselle de Saverne, I think a little Frenchwoman should be for France; and here is the tray, and we won't fight until after supper." And as he spoke that night the prayer appointed by his Church for the time of war—prayed that we might be armed with His defense who is the only giver of all victory—I thought I never heard the good man's voice more touching and solemn.

When this daily and nightly ceremony was performed at the Rectory, a certain little person who belonged to the Roman Catholic faith used to sit aloof, her spiritual instructors forbidding her to take part in our English worship. When it was over, and the doctor's household had withdrawn, Miss Agnes had a flushed, almost angry face.

"But what am I to do, aunt Barnard?" said the little rebel. "If I pray for you, I pray that my country may be conquered, and that you may be saved and delivered out of our hands."

"No, faith, my child, I think we will not call upon thee for Amen," says the doctor, patting her cheek.

"I don't know why you should wish to prevail over my country," whimpers the little maid. "I am sure I won't pray that any harm may happen to you, and aunt Barnard, and Denny—never, never!" And in a passion of tears she buried her head against the breast of the good man, and we were all not a little moved.

Hand in hand we two young ones walked from the Rectory to the Priory House, which was only too near. I paused ere I rang at the bell, still holding her wistful little hand in mine.

"You will never be my enemy, Denny, will you?" she said, looking up.

"My dear," I faltered out, "I will love you for ever and ever!" I thought of the infant whom I brought home in my arms from the seashore, and once more my dearest maiden was held in them, and my heart throbbed with an exquisite bliss.

THE FORTUNES OF WAR.

HOW THEY ARE MADE AND SPENT.

THE strangest and most frequently repeated boasts—for boasts we make, such is our national vanity, on all occasions whether of prosperity or adversity—is that we don't feel this war. Above the shock of battle, the groans of the wounded and dying, the sobs of the bereaved, the murmurs of defeat, and the shouts of victory, rises the triumphant exclamation, We don't feel it! Is this insensibility? Is it the delight in ruin? Is it indifference to failure or success? No! It is worse than either of these, for it embraces them all; it is the chuckling of gain over its pockets filling with the treasure of the country, while our brave soldiers are pouring out their blood in its defense.

We don't feel the war! is the exulting cry of the contractors, money-changers, and speculators, whose shouts of revel stifle the tearful voice of misery. It is in our large cities especially where this boasted insensibility to the havoc of war is found. It is there in the market-place and exchange, where fortunes are being made with such marvelous rapidity, and in the haunts of pleasure, where they are being spent with such wanton extravagance, that they don't feel this war. They are at a banquet of abundance and delight, from which they are not to be unseated, though the ghosts of the hundreds of thousands of their slaughtered countrymen shake their gory locks at them.

While the national wealth has been poured out with a profuse generosity in behalf of a cause dear to the national heart, there have been immense fortunes made by enterprising money-getters, seeking only to fill their own pockets.

When the war suddenly burst upon the nation, and before it was able to arouse its gigantic energies, the Government was so helpless that it besought aid at any cost. It was then, as our brave fellow-citizens came forward in multitudes to defend their country, there arose an urgent demand for arms, clothing, and subsistence. Every thing required for the use and consumption of the soldier was wanted, and wanted at once. Tents and blankets to protect him from the weather—clothes, from cap to shoe, to dress him—bread and meat and all the varied necessities of the daily ration, even to the salt, to feed him—the knapsack, haversack, belt, and cartridge box, to equip him—muskets, pistols, cannon, swords, sabres, powder, shot, and percussion caps to fight with—horses and mules, wagons, railways, steam and sailing vessels of all kinds, for transportation.

A hundred thousand men or more in the immediate and continued want not only of all the ordinary necessities of life, but of the many additional requirements for war, were to be provided for without delay. The Government, with a commissariat organized only for an army of some sixteen thousand soldiers, and suddenly called upon to clothe, arm, and subsist more than six times the number, could do nothing but appeal to the enterprise of trade to supply its pressing necessities. The appeal, with the treasure of the whole nation to sustain it, was not made in vain. Another army—the army of contractors—then came forward no less promptly than the hundred thousands of citizen soldiers. These with their lives as their offering asking nothing in exchange, and receiving only a bare subsistence; the former, no less liberal of the contents of their docks, ships, fields, stables, granaries, warehouses, and shops, demanding a great price, and getting it.

Think of the immense activity with which trade was inspired by the numerous and multifarious demands of the Government! Contractors for meat, contractors for bread, contractors for tents, contractors for clothing, contractors for arms, contractors for ammunition, contractors for equipments, contractors for wagons, contractors for horses, contractors for mules, contractors for forage, contractors for railway conveyance, contractors for steamers, contractors for ships, contractors for coal, contractors for hospitals, contractors for surgical instruments, contractors for drugs, and contractors for every thing else required for human use and consumption in order not only to sustain life but to destroy it, suddenly started into existence. The Government, pressed by a necessity which admitted of no hesitation in regard to time, character, quantity, quality, and cost, accepted almost every offer, and paid almost any price. It is true, that political allies and social friends and relatives were favored with the earliest information and the best places in the general race and scramble for the national treasure. That eager partisans and devoted brothers, cousins and brothers-in-law, having taken the shortest road, should come in ahead and grasp the first and biggest prizes, was not unnatural. There was one of these lucky favorites who made a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars or more as easily as these words which state the fact are written. Having secured a contract or agency for the purchase of transport steamers and other vessels, he fulfilled it with no more cost to himself than a cigar or two over the preliminary negotiation, and no greater effort than signing his name. The fortune was made by a minimum of personal labor given and a maximum of pay received.

The contractors of all kinds, with their contracts signed and sealed, hastened to pocket the profits. In many cases, with a mere dash of their pens, they transferred their bargains at an advance, and made snug fortunes, without the labor of an hour or the expense of a shilling. In other instances they fulfilled their contracts in a way more profitable to themselves than useful to the Government. The quality of the article they heeded little, provided it bore the name and the semblance of the thing, and could be had for almost nothing, or for much less than they were to receive for it. Thus shoddy, a villainous compound, the refuse stuff and sweepings of the shop, pounded, rolled, glued, and smoothed to the external form and gloss of cloth, but no more like the genuine article than the shadow is to the substance, was hastily got up, at the smallest expense, and supplied to the Government at the greatest. Our soldiers, on the first day's march, or in the earliest storm, found their clothes, over-coats, and blankets, scattering to the winds in rags, or dissolving into their primitive elements of dust under the pelting rain. Splendid looking warriors to-day, in their bran-new uniforms! To-morrow, in their rags and nakedness more pitiful objects than the ragged regiment of Falstaff, without a whole shirt among 'em! Shoddy, with the external gloss and form of a substantial thing but with the inherent weakness and solubility of its reflected image, has ever since become a word, in the vocabulary of the people, always quick in their forcible and incisive rhetoric to catch and appropriate a simple and expressive figure to represent a familiar idea. The ostentatious nouveau riche, the fraudulent contractor who makes a display of his ill-gotten gains, and vulgar pretenders of all kinds, will forever, in the popular eye, bear upon their emblazoned coaches, the fronts of their palatial residences, the liveries of their coachmen, and on their own backs of superfine cloths and glistening silks, the broad mark SHODDY. It is a good and significant word, and expresses exactly the opposite of a long-used term in popular parlance, to wit: Made of whole cloth, aptly applied to a complete thing of any kind or to a person of sound integrity. Shoddy, false pretension will be called as long as false pretension exists. It is obvious how large fortunes were made in this way, when contractors received immense sums for cloth and delivered only valueless shoddy.

It was not only in the contracts for clothing, but in those for almost every other supply that Government paying for the substance was mocked by the shadow. For sugar it often got sand; for coffee, rye; for leather, something no better than brown paper; for sound horses and mules, spavined beasts and dying donkeys; and for serviceable muskets and pistols the experimental failures of sanguine inventors, or the refuse of shops and foreign armories. There was, it is true, a show of caution on the part of the authorities in the form of a Governmental inspection; but the object of this was often thwarted by haste, negligence, collusion, or favoritism.

A proprietor of a patent breach-loading carbine, who had been for years groaning over his unfortunate speculation, was suddenly animated with the hope of making a fortune out of what had long since reposed and been mourned over among his "dead stock." He did make his fortune, for the Government gave him a contract, received the carbines, paid largely for, but never, it is believed, used them. There was, however, a valiant resistance on the part of an honest inspector of the Ordnance Department. The proposal of the adventurous dealer in carbines was sent back to him with the indorsement—

"Respectfully returned. This carbine has never been adopted for the United Service.....This proposition is objectionable on account of its introducing an arm untried in the field—of its requiring a special cartridge, and of the price charged." The importunate proprietor of the carbine returned to the charge, but was again met with a repulse from the sturdy defender of the Ordnance Department. "I have carefully considered," he wrote, "the proposition of Mr. — to furnish ten thousand of —'s patent breach-loading carbines at $35 each. I would gladly avail myself of any opportunity of obtaining at this time, at any price not beyond reason, such arms as are required for the troops called into the service. The carbine is only, however, a cavalry arm; it is used only by dragoons when dismounted and fighting on foot; and the orders in the Division of the Potomac are to arm the cavalry with pistols and sabres only.....In view of all those circumstances," quietly adds the honest inspector, "it is submitted whether it will be advisable to accept a proposition involving so large an expenditure [$350,000] as that of Mr. — does."

But in spite of all this the lucky proprietor, having a friend at court, got a contract for his carbines, which, we venture to declare in answer to the submissive inquiry of the modest inspector, it was not "advisable" for the Government to buy at any price. This is one of the many easy ways in which the large fortunes of this war have been made. The carbine proprietor may exult in his sudden wealth, but he and his "friend at court" are emblazoned all over in letters of light with "shoddy."

There were fifty millions of dollars spent by the Government in a few months, at the beginning of the war, for arms alone. Out of this a dozen or more contractors enriched themselves for life. Poor men thus became rich between the rising and setting of the same day's sun; while the hundreds of thousands of dollars of the wealthy increased to millions in the same brief space of time. It is said that one of our great merchant princes gained from his transactions with Government two millions of dollars in a single year.

The proprietors of coal-mines came in for a large share of the national treasure. One company made such enormous profits from its supplies of coal to the Government, and the general rise in price in consequence of the increased demand, that it was enabled to declare, in a single year, dividends that, in the aggregate, amounted to two-thirds of its capital. Its stock, which a few years since could hardly tempt a purchaser at ten dollars a share, has arisen since the war to more than two hundred dollars, and is eagerly caught up at that price. One shareholder, in a twelvemonth, received in dividends no less than a hundred and fifty thousand dollars for a stock which cost him less than that sum, but which he could now sell for a million.

The "good time" of the contractors has, however, now gone. The Government, with the experience of three years' war, and with its commissariat thoroughly organized, is no longer at the mercy of the fraudulent and extortionate. In fact, it is said that in some later contracts the Government, more thanks to its luck than shrewdness, has, with the depreciation of the currency and the consequent rise in prices, got the best of the bargain.

As fortunes can be no longer made in a day out of the national treasury the eager money-seekers have taken to the stock exchange to make them out of each other. The rage of speculation—excitement is too mild a word—which has seized upon the community, and is fast making us a nation of stock-jobbers, has never been equaled since the days of John Law during the French regency of the Duc d'Orleans. The city exchanges and their approaches are already crowded with a frenzied throng of eager speculators, as was the Rue de Quincampoix of old. Streets are blocked up by a mass so frenzied by the general passion for gain that almost all regard for individual safety and respect for personal propriety seems lost. The drayman can only make his way by the dint of whip, curse, and the brute strength of his sturdy beast through the heaving but coherent multitude, whose reluctant flanks, as they are forced aside, are still so absorbed by the ruling passion that, while pressed upon by hoof and grazed by grinding wheels, they seem unconscious of their danger. The stranger goes to take a look at the speculators at the hour of exchange as he does at a collection of wild beasts at feeding-time, and comes away with the same impression, namely, that in their hunger to get their fill they are ready to devour each other. The prudent citizen turns the street, and shuns the place as dangerous to his morals and his person. If not tempted to risk his fortune, he is sure to be so hustled by the unruly crowd as to spoil his temper or his clothes, and perhaps endanger his limbs or life.

The passion for stock-gambling is fast extending to every class of society. Merchants, mechanics, and traders of all kinds are abandoning their counting-houses, their work-shops, and their stalls, and thronging into Wall Street. The daily industry, the constant self-denial, the vigilant prudence, and the patient expectation necessary to acquire a decent competence are scorned for the chances of making a fortune in a day. The number of brokers has more than quadrupled in a few months, such has been the enormous increase of stock-jobbing. Their aggregate business, in the city of New York alone, has arisen from twenty-five to more than a hundred millions a day. The transactions of several sum up to the amount of millions each in a morning, with a profit in commissions alone of more than a thousand dollars daily. There would be a cause of congratulation if this enormous business was an indication of the increased productive wealth of the nation; but it is nothing of the kind. It is only a proof of the passion for buying and selling, with the hope of benefiting by the fluctuations of price. Purchase and sale are essential means for the exchange of products, without which, no doubt, the productive power of the country would be paralyzed. The merchant, the broker, and trader are to it what the sensitive and motor nerves are to the brain—subordinate to its functions, but necessary to its action. The nerves may be active, though the brain be torpid, but the result is a St. Vitus's dance of excited sensation, and perpetual and irregular movement, which waste the power, and finally destroy the organization. So it is when the merchant, broker, and trader make their function of exchange, which should be subordinate, paramount to the productive power of labor. This is what the rage of speculation is doing, and it requires no prophet to tell the result. Ruin must come with the certainty of the fulfillment of a natural law.

Yet, when the passion of speculation, however obvious the fatal consequences, has once fevered the blood of a people, it unfortunately is seldom checked, except by its own retributive effect of exhaustion. The homilies of the pulpit, the daily warnings of the press, and the demonstrations of political economy are unheeded by ears ringing with the jubilant shouts of the favorites of fortune. When they hear of one who was a bankrupt but a few months since, but now counts by millions his fortune, made in a short half year at the stock exchange, or rather in "the street"—for his credit was never clean enough for admission to the fastidious company of gentlemen at "the Board;" when they hear of another who was but yesterday a vendor of apples and peanuts at the street corner, and is to-day, by fortunate speculations, the possessor of hundreds of thousands; and again of a third, who, in the course of a flying visit from a neighboring city to New York, took a chance, merely pour passer le temps, in the lottery of Cumberland or Mariposa, and went home, after a week's absence, with a prize of a hundred thousand dollars in his pocket—when they hear of these and the like, as we all do every day, they are loth to turn from so brilliant examples of success to listen to the sober precepts of Prudence. The small voice of Prudence, moreover, is hourly becoming fainter and fainter, drowned as it is in the general shout of triumph. Prudence, it is feared, will soon cease altogether, for want of a listener, from uttering further warnings, and leave to retributive justice to vindicate a natural law, the abuse of which she could not prevent.

The mania of speculation is wondrously contagious, especially among a people so gregarious and sympathetic as we are. What touches one is apt to be felt by all. As men of every class, age, and business are already thronging Wall Street, it may not be long before our women shall be seen, as in the times of John Law in France, and of the South Sea bubble in England, trailing their silks and satins in the dust of the exchange, and raising their voice in its din of excited barter. Already the spirit of speculation so pervades the community that the rise and fall of stocks is the most common topic of daily conversation in our houses during the hours of leisure, if hours of leisure we can be said to have when they are filled with the thoughts and talks of business. Some of our women are already infected with the prevailing passion of money-making as they have been long with that of spending it. "What's the price of gold to-day, my dear?" escapes from the pretty mouth of your wife before she has impressed the habitual kiss of connubial welcome upon your expectant lips. If you are a speculator, as you probably are in common with most of your fellow-citizens at this moment, and have made a good day of it, you answer blandly and don't complain of the loss of the conjugal embrace. If you have been unlucky and want consolation, and seek what you have a right to expect but don't find, you mourn over the loss, and conclude probably, with St. Paul, that money, or rather the love of it, is the root of all evil.

The day has been found too short for the untiring stock speculators. They gather in a great hotel, and renewing the morning's strife for gain prolong it to the late hours of the night, which they make hideous with their eager and noisy competition. What care they for wives deserted, children unseen from day to day and turned night after night into bed unblessed by a father's kiss; domestic joys and duties forsaken, and all the claims of social intercourse neglected, provided they gain their cent. per cent. on the rise or fall, as it may be, of Cumberland and Mariposa?

It is obvious that when all are seeking to make their fortunes at others' expense that most will be disappointed. Each one, however, thinks that it will be his neighbor until he awakes some morning and finds it is himself who is ruined. There are some seductive examples undoubtedly of great success, of the rise of poverty to wealth in the course of a few weeks. There will be, too, with no less certainty before long, many striking instances of a fall from riches to beggary. Michelet, in his chapter on Law's scheme, tells of one who was a footman at the beginning of the month, a millionaire by his successful speculations at its close, and again a footman before the end of another thirty days, with nothing in possession but his suit of livery, and nothing in prospect but his wages.

It is not within our province to discuss the policy or necessity of the issue of the present paper currency. It is obvious, however, to all that its increasing abundance is the exciting cause which, acting upon a community singularly prone to the disease, has produced the prevalent fever of speculation. Some of the largest fortunes have been made by those shrewd men, who from the beginning foresaw the natural effect of a redundant paper currency in raising prices. These, with apparent recklessness but with real shrewdness, bought every thing of value they could borrow money enough to buy or purchase on credit. As the currency depreciated and prices necessarily rose, they paid their debts in less value than they had received, and received a greater value in what they had bought than they paid. The rise in prices from day to day, as the paper money becomes more abundant and less valuable, is the great stimulus to speculation. It is advisable for those who possess substantial property to cling to it. If you have houses, farms, land, dividend paying stocks, or even merchandise which can be kept without spoiling, do not be tempted to part with them too readily by the high prices offered in paper. Again, if you have currency to invest, do not be frightened by the high prices, but buy what is of substantial value and that alone, even if it takes a great deal of paper to do it. Above all eschew speculation, and trust not the bubbles which the flatulant enterprise of the day is blowing so industriously. They may rise and float for a while, glittering with a false sparkle of gold and silver and all the bright colors of the rainbow, but when you shall attempt to grasp them the air will escape, leaving you nothing in hand but the scum of which they are made. Such a discretion on the part of men of real means would do much to check the dangerous passion of speculation, or if not, save themselves and the country from ruin.

The old proverb says: "That which comes easy goes easy." The suddenly enriched contractors, speculators, and stock-jobbers illustrate its truth. They are spending money with a profusion never before witnessed in our country, at no time remarkable for its frugality. Our great houses are not big enough for them; they pull them down and build greater. They, like the proud and wanton Caligula, construct stables of marble at a fabulous cost, in which their horses are stabled (some, doubtless, to be fed on gilded oats), with a luxury never hitherto indulged in by the most opulent of our fellow-citizens. Even the manure heaps lie upon more resplendent floors than are swept by the silken trains of our proudest dames. So magnificent are these structures that their proprietors have not hesitated to assemble within them "the best society" they could command of fine gentlemen and finer ladies, to hold a carnival of pleasure. The playing of Comedies, it is said, was a part of the programme, as if the presence of the beau-monde, seeking pleasure in a stable, was not in itself a sufficiently sorry farce. What was acted we know not; but we can testify that "High Life Below Stairs" was the chief performance. The very horses must have neighed in applause of the appropriateness of the piece, and life-like action of the players. A horse-laugh was surely their well-merited reward.

These Sybarites of "shoddy" buy finer furniture than was ever bought before, and dress in costlier cloths and silks than have been hitherto imported. No foreign luxury, even at the present enormous prices, is too dear for their exorbitant desires and swollen pockets. The importations of the country have arisen to the large amount of thirty millions of dollars a month, chiefly to satisfy the increased appetite for luxurious expense.

The ordinary sources of expenditure seem to have been exhausted, and these ingenious prodigals have invented new ones. The men button their waistcoats with diamonds of the first water, and the women powder their hair with gold and silver dust.*

As excess, overflowing the natural channels of enjoyment, is always sure to take an irregular and perverted course for the indulgence of its unchecked vagaries, it is not surprising to find the boundless extravagance of the times assuming forms at variance with propriety and taste. Paris, provoked to excessive folly and wild extravagance by an imperial court willing to enervate the people by debauchery that they may become too languid for resistance to tyranny, has, among other forms of dissipations, invented a grotesque kind of fancy ball. In this the guests represent things instead of persons. For example, one presents herself as a kitchen, with her person hung all over with pots and kettles, wearing a saucepan for a helmet, like Sancho Panza, brandishing a shovel and tongs, and playing the part of a kitchen wench with probably a dish-clout hanging to her tail. Another of a more sentimental turn is a flower-garden, festooned with roses and bearing a spade and rake. A third is a pack of playing-cards, bedizened all over with clubs, diamonds, and hearts, and so on with every possible transformation of the human spiritual being (supposed to be rational) into the senseless, material thing.

This absurdity has been imported by our wealthy New Yorkers, together with other Parisian extravagances. Last winter, during which high carnival was held by our nouveaux riches, a dame who has traveled, and had the honor of fainting in the arms, it is said, of Imperial Majesty, in the course of which embrace she probably imbibed her high appreciation of imperial folly, got up one of these grotesque fancy balls. She herself appeared on the occasion as music, and bore upon her head an illuminated lyre supplied with genuine gas, from a reservoir and fixtures concealed somewhere under her clothes. "We don't feel this war," they say. We believe them. Nothing, we fear, while they are stupefying themselves in this whirl of absurd folly would bring them to their senses short of a shower of Greek fire.

If this extravagance and wantonness were confined to the fools of fortune we might leave them to the exhaustion that must come from this waste of means and perversion of the faculties of mind and body. Their ruin would be hardly felt or regretted. But, unfortunately, our people are so imitative that when one simpleton, provided he be rich, leads the way, all follow. Every man and woman thinks he must do as his wealthy neighbor does. The consequence is already shown in the general prevalence of extravagance and dissipation. The shops of the dry-goods man, the jeweler, the dealer in carpets and cabinet-ware, and the gilded establishments of the restaurateur were never so crowded. The tradesman hardly shows any but his most expensive wares, which his greedy customer snatches up without solicitation. Thus camel's-hair shawls, at fifteen hundred dollars or more, go off briskly at the price; rivers of diamonds (rivière de diamants) flow unchecked by any regard for cost. Aubusson and tapestry carpets of fabulous expense are bought unhesitatingly and recklessly trod upon, and dinners are eaten and wine drunk at Delmonico's and the Maison Dorée at a price per head, in a single sitting, which would support a soldier and his family for a good portion of the year. Who knows but that our wives and daughters may all take to powdering their hair with gold and silver dust at fifteen dollars per head, or transforming themselves into gas-fixtures? What is to hinder our young dandies of the counting-house and shop—for haven't they an old fool of the Stock Exchange to show them the example—from buttoning their waistcoats with diamonds?

Apart from the fatal and permanent effect of the habit of expense and sensual indulgence upon the individual and national character, it may have a disastrous influence upon the war. While the passion for speculation is raging, and the means for gratifying the appetite for luxury and pleasure are abounding, the war is not felt, and is willingly concurred in. Let, however, the reaction come, as it surely will, when fortunes shall scatter more rapidly than they have been gathered, and abundance and delight be no longer so easily purchasable, then the sensibility of our luxurious citizens may be so awakened as to feel the war, and feel it so much that they may wish it at an end before its great purpose is accomplished. We shall perhaps find our Capua at home, and its people too enervated by indulgence to smite their enemies. Are we deluding ourselves with the idea that this war is to be a continued carnival of abundance and pleasure? If so, we had better awaken at once to the fact that it is a sacrifice demanding the utmost effort of patient endurance. No noble cause, such as we are struggling for, was ever won by men while besotting themselves with excess and dallying pleasure. We must feel this war, and feel it resolutely, or we shall never triumph. Are we willing to prove ourselves worthy to triumph?

* There are three kinds of resplendent powder used by our fashionable women: the gold and silver, which cost fifteen dollars a head, and the diamond, which at present is only of glass, and costs much less.

IN "DIXIE."

AS I was in Montgomery on the 1st, in Macon on the 3d, in Augusta on the 7th, in Columbia on the 10th, in Raleigh on the 13th, and in Richmond on the 15th of March, I think I can give you a better picture of Dixie's land generally than even the "reliable gentleman" of the newspapers.

Alabama is my home. For the past twenty years I have continued to cultivate a small plantation, beginning with seven slaves, and now owning twenty.

Fifteen years ago my State was, as to general commercial and agricultural interests, enjoying a prosperity as great as could be desired. As an illustration of the average circumstances of those within my own acquaintance, I will select my friend and neighbor, Mr. Ames, and tell you what were then his possessions and prospects; premising that, before my letter is over, I will let you know how as to the same respects he stands to-day. Mr. Ames was then a married man with two children. He was twenty-six years old. He owned eight hundred acres of excellent land, with twelve laborers and eight servants too young to labor. He employed no overseer, being himself very industrious, a good farmer, and fond of devoting all his time and energies to his plantation. The following is a fair estimate of his capital and stock in the business of agriculture, in gold, at that time:

Eight hundred acres of land.....	$8,000
Twelve laborers.....	14,000
Eight other servants.....	4,000
Cattle and farming implements.....	1,000
Seven mules.....	1,050
One horse.....	200
Total.....	$28,250

The annual product of this farm, over and above the supplies raised for the family and servants, was sixty bales of cotton, which, at the rate of ten cents per pound, or fifty dollars per bale, amounted to three thousand dollars per annum. Of this sum one thousand dollars was all he expended beyond what his land produced for the wants of the household, so that his annual savings were two thousand dollars, to be invested from year to year in grown hands, or women with young children, or in land; it being necessary to increase his land twenty-five per cent. every eighth year to accommodate his increasing help.

His home was pleasant, and furnished with every thing necessary for comfort. As to clothing his family made a respectable appearance, and he was educating a daughter at a considerable expense in a neighboring female seminary. He was a very pious member of the Methodist Church, liberal in his gifts to benevolent objects, and his house was noted as the home of preachers as they passed through that county.

As to his future prospects in life, there was every reason to suppose that at the age of forty he might increase the comforts and luxuries of his family; annually visit the Northern States or enjoy a European tour; and educate his children either at home or abroad in the best manner; while, if spared to the age of fifty years, it would be equally probable that his property would by that time have reached the amount of $125,000, which would provide ample fortunes to each of a family of five children. In fact, it was a common declaration of business men in that county that they doubled their capital every five years; or, to use the language of their ordinary statement, "A man may buy a plantation and negroes without a cent, borrowing the money for the purpose, and make both pay for themselves in five years, the overseeing and managing being thrown into the account."

I may add, although it is not essential to complete the estimate of my friend's fortune and prospects, that Mr. Ames, although finding, as he came on the stage of life, slavery to be the normal condition of the blacks in his State, and, while obtaining his servants by the gift of his mother and his wife's father as part of his capital in commencing business as a planter, yet had no violent sentiments as to its extension or perpetuity. He was known to be conservative as to Southern rights and demands in the incoming States, and was a friend to the doctrine known as "Popular Sovereignty." He had, however, no scruples as to the system as he found it in Alabama, and expected its continuance in the Cotton States.

I have purposely selected this individual as representing to my memory the average thrift and intelligence of the community in which he lived; and this general description of my friend would answer to describe many others residing near him, and who were accustomed to daily intercourse at the county seat, or a country store nearer home. In this county the large body of citizens were men of similar opinions and information. Mr. Ames read no daily paper, but took one religious and two secular weeklies.

This was fifteen years ago. At that time, however deep the seeds of disunion may have been sowed in our vicinity, we heard or read nothing of secession from the Union. But in 1850, when the compromise measures were discussed in Congress, many of our local politicians openly avowed the opinion that, to enjoy the highest prosperity, the South must declare itself an independent Government. My friend was active in the expression of an opposite sentiment; was a strong supporter of Mr. Clay's "Compromise;" was spoken of for the Legislature, and, had he consented, could have been elected by a large Union majority.

I do not propose to detain you with a history of the change in public opinion and its causes, so familiar to all, but will say that in the last Presidential election, after the Charleston Convention had broken up, it was the hope of the Union men at the South that no candidate would be chosen by the people, that Congress would elect a President, and that the choice would fall either upon Douglas or Bell, whose election would not furnish to the violent secession men the pretext they would plead if Mr. Lincoln were chosen.

When Sumter was reinforced, attacked, and finally taken, the leaders of disunion took pains that every where there should seem to be demonstrations of great rejoicing; but there were not a few who, justly appreciating the magnitude of the contest before them, regarded the event with a deep, anxious, heart-rending solicitude.

These prime leaders of the rebellion, who first controlled and still hold in tyranny our crushed and manacled South, inspired all the newspapers to give forth the same utterances that filled the public messages and proclamations sent from Montgomery, and afterward from Richmond. The following are fair specimens of these utterances:

"President Lincoln will never dare to make war."

"It will be impossible to raise a man or a dollar to defend the Union cause against seceding States."

"Troops never can march an inch through the Border States on such an errand."

"Foreign recognition is a certainty, and there is no question as to it except of a few weeks or more in time."

"The slaves will supply by their labor all necessary productions for an army to defend the South, or, if necessary, invade the North."

"Even should there be an attempt to organize an army to oppose secession and maintain the Union, Washington must fall, and the national Administration with it, before such an army can be matured."

Such were some of the axioms studiously instilled into the minds of the people of the South; and under the influence of these and similar statements, relied upon and gradually confided in, a deluded people were hurried into what has already brought desolation and death into many of their homes, and made the whole land weep with garments rolled in blood. Not more certainly did a "lying spirit" of old enter into all the prophets that Ahab, King of Israel, might fall in battle, than did a lying spirit seem to twist and distort the condition of every thing in the minds of the leaders of the rebellion, giving heed to which the South is to-day suffering its present extremities.

The first signs of actual warfare appeared in the daily and nightly drilling of the uniformed companies of militia in the towns and cities. These companies were continually parading, with martial music. Banners were presented to them, speeches were made exhorting them to die for Southern independence, and they were organized into the army that fought at Bull Run.

After the result of that battle was known all supposed that there would be no more fighting and no more troops needed. Victory was with the Confederacy, Washington was theirs, the North would yield and obey, and Southern independence was achieved. Such was the universal cry of the Government, the army officers, and all the journals.

No other topic was heard; and all comparisons instituted between North and South ended by declaring the people of the latter to be the most intelligent, refined, wise, and brave on the face of the earth. It was not safe to hazard the supposition that the North had brave men or noble women; to infer that she would fight; or speak of the battles of Revolutionary times, in which the forefathers of Northern men were victorious. The only qualities which "the Yankees" could be praised for without personal danger were money-making without labor, and knavery in the spheres of peddling, manufacturing gilt jewelry, compounding patent medicines, and the like. As to statesmanship, philosophy, literature, learning, science, or art, any advances or proficiency in these it was universally claimed were only derived or copied from the savans of Europe or of the Confederate States.

The almost universal impression has been that "the Yankees" could only fight under the protection of their gun-boats, or with a numerical force double that of their antagonists; and not until the successes of Vicksburg and Gettysburg has this conviction been at all shaken.

The general estimate of the chances for the South in this matter may be thus briefly stated: If a compromise candidate or even a War Democrat is elected, there will be a show of war, but only a show, and then a peace will be concluded on the basis of two Governments. If another war or Anti-Slavery candidate is chosen the old army of office-holders and Government contractors will be ejected, and the new and successful aspirants for their vacant places will succeed in prolonging the war for their own advantage. Then, as Micawber says, "something will turn up," and recognition abroad or dissatisfaction at home will give victory to the Confederacy. But if Lincoln is elected all hope for the Confederacy is dead.

Do you ask me whether we feel the war much yet? Hardly, in our pockets. The Government has spent such enormous sums that money is very plenty, but is principally in the hands of producers of surplus provisions, contractors, speculators, and manufacturers. Shop-keepers are as a class abolished; their stores are closed, and, as such, they can not operate.

I have said that I was in Macon on the 3d of March, and perhaps I can not give you a better impression of how a business town now appears than by telling you what I saw and experienced there.

The cotton warehouses are loaded, I may say densely packed and overflowing. The cotton in them belongs to farmers, merchants who have closed business and thus invested, bank and railroad corporations, men claiming British, French, or German citizenship, or speculators who have made fortunes since the war, the latter of whom have largely invested in land, or cotton, or city property, all the funds not necessary for their business. I may add, many of the above are now enjoying the protection which a Northern residence affords them, and are to be found in New York, Philadelphia, and other cities of the loyal States. I found about half of the mercantile houses closed entirely and not used at all. Of the remainder half may be said to be filled with cotton or tobacco on storage, and the few others about half open, presenting much such an appearance as stores partially open on Sunday here present. Of articles to be sold there was to be found about a twentieth part of the variety that could formerly be obtained. The merchants are without clerks and entirely indifferent as to whether they sell or not, generally seeming to prefer the articles on hand to Confederate money at any price.

My wife, who before the war was accustomed to every luxury, and always made her Northern shopping tour annually, had not purchased since the war a single dress, but was now extravagant enough to demand calico for one only. I purchased accordingly some articles for her, and here, with some annotations, is the bill which I paid :

10 yds. [narrow] prints [$\frac{1}{2}$ wide, said to be English, blockade; but on examination bearing the label " Sprague's narrow prints "], \$3 50 per yd.....	\$85 00
20 yds. [coarse] muslin, $15 per yd.....	300 00
10 yds. [coarse poor] challis, $18 per yd.....	180 00
3 spools Coates's thread, $3 per spool.....	9 00
1 [narrow ribbon] cravat.....	3 75
1 card hooks and eyes [poor quality].....	3 00
1 [small coarse] linen hdkf.....	5 00
2 slate pencils.....	5 00
	$590 75

Having traded to my satisfaction, I went to look at the mechanics' shops. These are closed, except such as are under the supervision of and employed by the Government, or those having Government contracts, who, however, smuggle in a little work for individual customers or friends. All the mechanics thus employed are regularly mustered into the army, and are detailed for this duty.

The hotels are unswept and unwashed. The servants are few in number. So many soldiers, some sick, some with neglected wounds remain in them, that the rooms are in an ill plight as to cleanliness, and a disgusting odor fills them all. You register your name. If there is a room you get a portion of it, and the whole or part of a bed, by paying twenty dollars. The lodging is only ten, but you must pay for one meal also (tea or breakfast), to secure it: you then receive a lodging ticket and a meal ticket. You go to your room. The servant apologizes for the lack of every thing by saying, "The soldierus done stole all de tings." So there is no soap, no bowl, no pitcher, no towel. Half an inch of tallow-candle is given you at bed time; you find but one sheet on your bed and very scanty covering. If you ask for a fire you pay two dollars extra. This is of course a wood fire, as there is no transportation for coal. If you can sleep, you do so; and then the following breakfast awaits you when you give up your ticket at the dining-room.

STEAK.—[That is such beef as you may read of in Robinson Crusoe or Gulliver.]

COFFEE.—[That is a decoction of wheat, rye, corn, sweet-potatoes, or ground pease, with sugar from the bottom of a molasses barrel, nearly as black as tar, and the molasses not being dripped out, of course wet.]

CORN BREAD and butter.—[The latter fair.]

The dinner is of a piece with the breakfast. It would seem that there could be but little temptation to visit the bar where liquors are five dollars a drink, which is doled out in a small wine-glass, no man being allowed to help himself.

The private residences wear the appearance of neglect; as there is no mechanical labor at command there are no repairs. All additions or alterations commenced before the war remain just as they then were. The streets are not swept, and are also neglected as to repairs, but crowded with a motley assemblage of refugees from the conquered portions of different States, who wander about almost without the means of living; for many of these once rich are now nearly beggars. I saw several from Charleston, Savannah, etc., in rags, and only saved from starvation by a State fund appropriated to the sustenance of poor soldiers' families and the distressed generally. The universal dress is a home-made jean with shoes of cloth uppers and wooden soles. I visited a large house, almost the only manufactory I saw in the South that is not working for the Government, where they make ladies' shoes with patent cloth uppers and leather single soles that are readily bought at from thirty to forty dollars per pair.

I might go on thus to sketch for you the aspect of Southern towns and Dixie's land generally, but have talked longer now than I intended, and will close by giving you, as I promised, a glimpse of my friend, Mr. Ames, as I left him a few weeks ago.

His workmen have increased, as he now owns twenty-four laborers. All his horses, mules, and stock, save those actually used in the tillage of his land, are impressed.

You ask how is this impressment conducted? Thus: The country is divided into districts, over each of which an impressing agent is appointed. These are ordered from time to time to take such property as is not actually necessary for the sustenance of families. The prices are fixed by two Commissioners, one appointed by the General Government, and one by the State Government. These Commissioners meet every month and assign the prices that the agents subject to them shall give for impressed property. The agents then are furnished with money, or, at the option of the owner of the goods, give a certificate payable in scrip. These agents are also instructed to purchase if they can at the same prices, and not to impress unless no purchase can be effected otherwise. If it is suspected that property is secreted, or its amount underestimated by the owner, his premises are most thoroughly searched.

My friend has thus had all of his horses impressed. He is allowed by law to plant only three acres of cotton. All his meat (bacon) over one-half the usual allowance for his negroes has been impressed. All his cattle, except oxen actually used on his farm and milch cows actually now giving milk, and all other cattle except sucking-calves, were impressed.

He is unable to obtain more than half the iron requisite for his plow-work.

His negroes have not for four years had a single blanket, but for a substitute a loose spongy fabric of home-made cotton. One of these poor substitutes for blankets is given each year to every adult negro. The children have none. He and his immediate family have only such clothing as they make from the fabric produced on their own wheels and looms introduced in 1861 and 1862. As they have no sheep they have no wool for blankets or aught else.

Besides these privations my friend suffers all the depression of spirits arising from the overthrow of all his plans for future life. Instead of riches and luxury, poverty and distress are before him. His property is consumed by taxation, his servants are a burden, he has abandoned the idea of educating his children or of foreign travel. He was intending to erect a pleasant dwelling, the old home of his family being much dilapidated; this intention he will never fulfill or his expectations of a comfortable living in his old age. As he now considers the rebellion a failure, and has given up all hopes of success under the present tyranny, he sees nothing before him but distress; and the premature whiteness of his locks reveals that there are secret corroding griefs within his heart that he dares not utter.

As I have shown you what he was worth fifteen years since I will furnish an estimate of his present possessions, reckoned in Confederate money and in gold.

	In Confederate Money.	In Gold.
Eight hundred acres of land	$40,000	$1143
Twenty-four laborers at $4000 apiece.....	96,000	2742
Twenty other servants at $1500 each	30,000	860
Horses none, all impressed.
Cattle and hogs.....	4,000	114
Farming utensils	2,500	71
Total value of his property now.....	$172,500	$4930

If we subtract from this the value at which we have put his slaves, which Mr. Ames says are not now worth to him a cent, and he believes will soon be free, the property that fifteen years ago was worth in gold $28,250 has dwindled down to $1328, while under good care and with hard and persevering toil expended upon it.

While his income is now small, the little cotton he does raise lying in his gin-house, and liable any day to be burned by Confederate scouts to keep it from falling into the hands of the Yankees, he must pay for iron to mend his tools $5 per pound; for cotton cards, $60 per pair; for a hat, $50; for salt, $150 per sack if "Liverpool;" if "coast," $70 per 100 pounds.

If he should send a child to school, he must pay $60 per month for its board and $150 for its tuition. He has no opportunity or means to repair his furniture and the natural wear and tear of all household articles. His last carpet, being first cut into pieces two yards long by one yard wide, has gone where all his blankets and most of his coverlets have gone, to eke out the limited blankets of the soldiers; while his own misery is enhanced by the reflection that it is shared by most of his acquaintances and friends, and that through the agency of demagogues his much-loved native land lies desolate and mourning. The case of my friend Mr. Ames is a type of the whole South.

OLD LAMPS FOR NEW.

AN untutored instinct, be it of the child, the barbarian, or the man advanced only into an imperfect civilization, loves and values things evident, largely outlined; height, breadth, vastness, strength, swiftness, glowing color, joy, and the present instant; almost to exclusion of shadows, sorrows, waiting, things homely and minute; finds expression in a monstrous mythology, in prodigious gateway and pillar, and miles of obelisks still now with an unutterable desolation amidst the piling sand, in the marvels of a literature where was much enchantment and no everyday living, in the brawn and muscle of a Cœur De Lion, in the annals of a time when there were courts and titles of an astounding assumption, but no people, unless numbers chanced to give these fractional bits of dull humanity such respectability as attaches to a herd, or the canaille, in the nursery growth of bean stalks and the strides of seven-league boots, in the very baby clutching at the cruel flame and careless of eyes soft with mother love.

Every where is, and has been, imaged forth a deeper and sweeter wisdom; in the patience of the sky, in the peace of the mountains, in the elaboration of the mosses, in rising mist and floating cloud and faithful seasons. There came, too, a time when things insignificant, in the "widow's mite" and the "cup of cold water," had their spoken evangel; and to sorrow and patience was affixed a priceless value: but the dead centuries have been at all times slow of heart and dull of ear, rebellious or in hot haste, and so recked little of the sweet voices and quiet teachings; while we—certainly our matured civilization is the apotheosis of many a sober-hued power and principle down-trodden in the dust of the old times—we have the word smoothly on our lips and blazoned over our door-posts, and as for our hearts, these are days of much delicacy and fine feeling, and a most comprehensive charity, and every man, like Cain, is his own keeper. We proclaim the microscope with the telescope; we deal much with first causes; we are fond of digging after that well where truth lies hidden, and accomplish a vast deal of sifting and analyzing. We are exceedingly wide-awake about pretension; we weigh creeds with curious nicety, and a cold tolerance that is sublime, and are very exact about the component parts. We are wise in our own eyes, and prudent in our own sight. We smile at the coarse sense that found power in the infraction rather than the observance of nature's laws, with its bulky genii and mushroom palaces. We, too, have our genii slaves of the lamp and of the ring, but creations not of an ignorant faith but of the science after whose canons we hold them; genii that can be weighed, and bottled, and demonstrated; in their very incorporeal natures tributes to the hard practicality that made out the spell with which to conjure them, and dragging them at its chariot wheels has subjugated the whole earth; colossal slaves working marvels past those of fairy-lore, yet reducible to figures, best expressed in that one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, on which Gradgrind takes his stand, and in which he puts his trust as the one fact in a crack-brained world.

But the wise old Easterns held their genii in bondage. The fisherman must needs clap the cover on his for his life. Aladdin commanded his hideous servants as slaves of the lamp, and him who held the lamp; and they and the palace, with its dome and its windows imbedded in gems, and the rest of the interminable and somewhat tiresome splendors, were but so many accidents, consequent on the old brass lamp on the cornice; but we are prone to bow down before our genii and ignore the talisman. We pantingly proclaim that this is the century and steam is its prophet, and stunned by the thunder and splendor of our going forget the tea-kettle from which we started. We applaud the effect, and overlook or despise the cause. We make success the cardinal virtue, and electricity, in a manner, the object of the age. We have with much ado spelled out the rocky pages of the earth's story, the colossal plan blocked out in space with a vastness inconceivable, ages on ages of silence and dimness, ages on ages of monstrous growth and still more monstrous life, slow deposit, tumultuous upheaval, fire and flood evoked from chaos, disorder, riot, and death made to work harmony and life, cycles of a gradual maturing to perfection, to lose the lesson of so vast a patience in the thought of the wisdom that can read the cipher. We have overthrown the giant Ignorance, we have beaten back the dragon Prejudice, the castle-gates fly open at our touch, and we stand before the heaped-up treasure, or the lovely princess, lost in an idiotic admiration of the key that turned the wards, or the sword that cleft the monsters in twain.

Always with us it is the spell of power forgotten, for the quaint blazoning on the vellum, the monarch for the jeweled clasps on his robe, purple peak and smiling land cut off by the bare hill-side in closer neighborhood. The difference between our age and the times past is simply told. They set a clumsy hoof of Ignorance on quiet power and low-voiced virtues; we, having an eye to profit, use them first. We! on faith of the grammar a plural pronoun, masculine or feminine; but here I edge off gingerly from the masculine segment as one having a due humility, and small desire to exercise myself with matters too lofty for me. Grant that my lords being undazzled and right judging, go hunting as did Aladdin, putting their trust in the talisman and not in the genii. Go, mes-sieurs! and bon voyage. It is for the Badroul Bondours that I am knotting the cords of my whip, the idle princesses to whom it is not given to ride down grain fields and beat the jungle for tigers, and who, looking from behind gilded lattices at the whirl and rush of the city surging up against the gates of the quiet palace, catch the infection of its mad tumult and betake themselves to that trade of mischief of such doubtful patronage according to Dr. Watts.

For, when Badroul Bondour's eyebrows were done to a shade (is it not written in the chronicles of every nursery?), and her finger tips to proper depths of henna, when she had tried on the peach-blossom trowsers and her last new shawl, boxed her slave's ears, admired the dome and the twenty-four windows for the hundredth time, laughed at the fat old vizier waddling in at the gate of the Sultan her father, and gently fretted because Aladdin was so fond of that tiresome hunting, she must needs take to bargaining, and sell old lamps for new. Poor little princess! she knew nothing of the talisman, and though some women may achieve logic, and many have logic thrust upon them, I think few are born logical. "Brass, ergo worthless," was her reasoning. It was left for the magician to divine that in a palace whose meanest furnishings were gold and silver, a brass lamp must be the talisman; and as in the days of Aladdin, so we find it now. There are many Badroul Bondours; there is much of this chaffering. The sales are not quoted in money columns; they are not entered in revenue reports; there are no signs, no advertisements, of the times and places when "old lamps will be sold for new;" yet is the business miserably brisk notwithstanding, and I suppose there is no one branch of commerce of so reverend an antiquity, seeing that the first sale on record was that famous one made by Madam Eve; while it has always been a notable peculiarity of such bargains from her time down, that one once made, you can never have done with it, since it is not so much a pact, closed, sealed, for which you can take your whipping, wash your hands, and go about your business, as the initial of a doleful infinite series.

You may know the victims by their anxious faces. Does Mrs. Creame Syllabub image self-content in her look? Do you find peace in her household? Has the Syllabub family, in your thought, a funded interest in common-sense, unselfishness, happiness, self-respect? or have they rather the air of a company of speculators, whose capital, if any, is certainly floating? the restlessness, and outlooking eyes of those who think of expedients rather than resources?

The Syllabub Lares and Penates, in place of sitting cannily about the hearth, show a clean pair of heels, and you may always find the entire family in full cry after them, in almost any conceivable spot outside of home. The Syllabub home is the supposed focus of all the neighboring spy-glasses; the Syllabub life is a perpetual dress parade, carried on with an ever-present consciousness of a gossip's court of inquiry always in session, and nervous about their verdict. Paterfamilias, who had once ways of his own, is held in bondage of the Tartes across the way; the Mesdemoiselles Syllabub have their gowns cut with reference to Mrs. Apricot, the second door below; the entire family live, as it were, on inspection, and under fire; for the street, the neighbors, any body but themselves and each other. It has been thought sufficiently difficult to suit one's self, but these martyrs wear out existence in the hopeless attempt to please Mrs. T—m, D—k, H—y. Extremes meet. Here are mortals whose aims are so narrow that they are merged in a chaotic liberality; whose selfishness, in virtue of its very intensity, becomes an idiotic disinterestedness.

Who will tell the shrewd story of the old man carrying the ass to market, after the manner of an engraver, and send it finely framed to Mrs. Syllabub? I can fancy the dear woman's comment on the frame. The point is beyond her. She would be quite certain that no man could have been so stupid, and will never know why all the world laughs; and yet, in the years long past, there was the old lamp on the cornice, and the genii waiting her touch. There was possible for her a patience so sweet, a sympathy so ready, a thought so unselfish, a gentleness and purity so entire, that the very atmosphere of her house should have been a rest and a delight; possible for her, for any woman, because such patience and purity is not in us, nor of us, but shines through us; and to become mediums of the heavenly light needs no mightier power than that of an earnest and honest prayer; and the talisman was in her hands, left there perforce; for our Aladdins can not button it in their waistcoat pockets, but must leave it on the cornice; but perhaps she knew nothing of its powers, or perchance she had nerves, and the genii were too much for them. Doubtless the copper lamp was better to her taste, or, like Badroul Bondour, she gave the matter only the weight of an idle jest. Let us not be too bitter against the little woman. The household virtues are silent and shamefaced, and their ministration that of little things, and often unguessed at; and for such the age has much paying of vows and offering of fealty, but little practical loyalty; and all the while goes on the whirl, and the dazzle, and the tumult, fevering steadier pulses, and turning stronger heads than Mrs. Syllabub's.

Moreover, in the event of her condemnation, who is to throw the first stone? For my own part I will not dare affirm that I speak not out of a bitter practical experience, and that the whip with which I had been administering on her white shoulders, has not first descended on my own, in the privacy of my closet; and I know that you shall find the copper things in the best houses, and the mem. "Old lamps for new" the most frequent entry in your friends' account books, if they be honestly kept.

Penelope vows that Mrs. Syllabub, having no ear for minor chords, has warped a noble harmony into a barren roundelay, and goes about in a perpetual discontent at finding herself out of tune with the universe; but has not Mrs. Penelope herself exchanged an old lamp for a new?

It is held as an article of faith among her friends that somewhere, in a remote section of the Penelope mansion, are children; accepted not on testimony of Mrs. Penelope's manner and conversation, but as a discovery of some one who has stumbled on them; perhaps through an indiscretion of Mr. Penelope, who is understood to have a weakness for them; a far-off fact like the North Pole, no more affecting the Penelope life and circle than the existence of a herd of young walruses; yet is her nursery to a wise Penelope her studio, where she moulds little plastic hearts, her eyes on a divine model of excellence, her garden where she tends the healthy growth of her tender plants; her work-room where, hour by hour, she weaves young hearts and sad ones together, her own thought and desire with small hopes and pleasures, quaint questionings and droll terrors, with gentlest teachings and sweetest wisdom, after the pattern of love; while the old lamp on the cornice burns with the soft steady flame of an unceasing vigilance, and the gentle slaves of the lamp help on web and woof with busy fingers, for there is need of diligence when there is given for such labor but the little time of childhood.

Woven the web will be! If not by mother fingers, then by those of hirelings and strangers; and let Mrs. Penelope know as little as she will of what weaving goes on in the nursery, and how flies the spindle, yet must she wear the woof sooner or later, and her household be clothed with it perforce. Ah, fair Mrs. Penelope! chatting gayly over your copper lamps, I am miserably afraid for you, lest in the dark days you should sadly miss that soft flame streaming from the cornice.

Old lamps for new! the sales go bravely on; there is my poor May Lillian, a sweet-lipped, soft-eyed baby, grown to a woman's height and air, but a baby upon my honor, nothing more; to whom one forgave the coquetries of her fan and eyes, the gravity of her chatter on cherry bodies and Faust, and the weight of her stress on perfumed nothings, because the alchemy of her loveliness made even absurdity tolerable in her. Verily upon the children are visited the sins of the fathers. The talisman had lain unheeded on the cornice, and she, thinking it a thing worthless, gave it gladly, and the world is not done talking yet of her great new copper lamp, finely burnished and bearing the device un bon parti.

Rosy Mauds and Marians find their eyes quite put out by its dazzle, and pout in envious admiration; but, dear May Lillian, the Mauds and Marians do but wave you off on Life's journey, and toss roses after you; and the flowers are trampled into the dust, and they and their admiration will soon be for you a thing forgotten, or carelessly remembered; and then— In the story, wherever in the charmed ring the flame died down, pressed in the Powers of Darkness at the gap; and if in your home circle burns not that lamp of love, despised of your ignorance, poor child! what evil and dreadful faces will not look in upon you? Playtime is done for you, and when necessity sets you down at the puzzle of existence, you may cry out your pretty eyes over it, but if you have not that light you will never make it out. You have bartered your talisman, and there are tasks before you for which its genii alone are able; legends which they alone can read, gates fast-barred that they alone may open, a paradise of which you have thrown away the key. Henceforth your life will be for you a harp without the skillful hand, a cipher lacking a translator, a wearing, meaningless, but very actual and present pain, that will not be conjured down by "un bon parti," that potent spell with Mauds and Marians, and poor, dainty, mistaken little Mays.

The old lamp on the cornice sheds always a soft and tranquil light, brightening the entire household, and reflected in the look of its every member, and the working thereof is harmony and rest, fruit of the gentle magic of the Slaves of the Lamp; but in the house of Mrs. Arachne I find no trace of such ministration, only proofs many that she and hers are slaves to a lamp, and held of it in bondage. Mrs. Arachne is a woman of consistency, and reverses an entire existence to be in harmony with her first mistake. Houses, and carpets, and chairs, and curtains, and clothes were made lest life should be fretted and warped away from noble aims for lack of comforts. She frets and warps life from both rest and nobility that house, and chairs, and carpets, and curtains, and clothes may be uninjured.

Mr. Arachne stretches not his legs into such postures of ease as his soul loveth, having the fear of cushions and mantles and Mrs. Arachne before his eyes. He taketh no post-prandial smoke, in consideration of the curtains, and inclineth never his head backward, having a saving regard for the "tidy." He sitteth mournful and upright in a clean desert, with his papers, his pet-book, on the top shelf, his boots in the closet, his "daily" folded and laid away. For their possession he plans long and deeply; but so involved are Mrs. Arachne's drawing-rooms, dining-room, library, sleeping-rooms, with screen and cover, gauze and anti-Macassars that, though he con her by-laws never so diligently, taking them as is enjoined, "line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little, and there a little," he can hardly go amiss of a lecture.

There is no pleasure entertained of Mrs. Arachne that can damage the stair-carpets, or break the china; no comforts hard on damask, no sports prejudicial to the well-being of small frocks and trowsers, or entailing scrubbing, no jests, no home ease, no little ways deranging chairs and tables; and argument with Mrs. Arachne is of small use since her besetting folly is a sham virtue. Your honest vice, when fairly unmasked, will sneak away to its kind, but your sham virtue, presuming on the cut of its features, is loud-voiced, open-mouthed, and almost inevitably talks you dumb: so if it chance that the Arachne sons and daughters, regarding home with the affectionate reverence due to a washing-tub, and paterfamilias, unable to disconnect his wife from cleaning-day (of which he entertains a wholesome horror), leave her, as far as practicable, to the chairs and curtains that she serves, she will have still this consolation, "They at least are as good as they were twenty years ago."

I confess that I have been hesitating over the coming paragraph, half afraid to go further. I may preach to the Mrs. Syllabubs and May Lillians, and crack my whip boldly enough in the ears of shallow little sinners erring out of very frothiness of spirit; but what shall be said of Sybilla, chaffering on the steps of the temple of knowledge itself? The rest of my fellow-penitents, judging only on the surface, and seeing tinsel, and hearing clap-trap, accepted the tinsel as gold, the clap-trap as an oracle; but Sybilla has divined Life's meaning (Mrs. Penelope has yet to learn that it has one), she has summoned the Slaves of the Lamp, she has been with them in the hidden gardens of Truth, she takes the tumult and glitter about her at its just value, yet wears the tinsel and writes the clap-trap, sneering the while.

"Soyez de votre siècle," she is fond of saying, with a shrug. "If the age demands tinsel and clap-trap what would you have? I know, no one better, that the world is not done in rouge and lampblack; that a scoundrel, who does evil as the devils do for the love of it alone, and who plans his wickedness deliberately and confesses it to himself (the last one in whom we are apt to confide), is a libel on nature; that a boarding-school girl, as a rule, can't sight a rifle, take in sail, scull off in a storm to a sinking vessel and save an entire crew, or serve the guns of a fort, be the emergency what it will; that a plot culled from the records of crime, and having regard neither to truth, probability, morality—any thing but sensation, is bad for the moral digestion; that such an olla podrida contains no more mental pabulum than the writings of that loftier school which deals in incident and description refined to unintelligibility and essays, too elegantly written to admit plain truths; but again I say what would you have? Is it I who sets the standard of popular taste? I have my way to make, and writing is not the easy matter that it was of old; then a story got over much ground by the aid of stilted sentences, and had always a wizard or well-disposed ghost on hand to help it out of an impossibility; but we are practical; we believe in any thing that we can measure, describe, bisect, subtend, see through a glass, or demonstrate—nothing else; so the age shuts down on all life but what is called real life, and sends poor authors out just the same to make bricks without straw, and when it comes to the trial people will have none of real life; for that is arranged very much like strong lights and deep shadows—in points, not masses. In everyday life the deep feeling and the fierce passion comes but seldom, and the ripple and faint waving outline of little incident make up the rest. Shall I draw this life which I find every where about me, and a check at the same time on that future generation for whom we shall have laid all the railways, patented all the inventions, settled all the questions of science and politics, and which, having nothing to do but enjoy the fruit of our labors, will probably find time and inclination to read my little article? If the public, being addicted to aqua vitæ, requires cayenne in its coffee shall I prate to it about its digestion? On the contrary, I shall bring the cayenne and write myself blessed if I can but induce it to look toward my teaspoon. I know that the public is on its back now, gasping ‘Pens off!’ that there are no doors so blocked as those of editors, that in the throng and press mere excellence won’t keep an article on its feet an instant. If you say this is to make of inspiration a lunacy, I grant you; but let me tell you, he or she who gibbers the loudest has the most chance of the public ear—if it is to make of genius the court fool, why, if motley be not your only wear, it is warm, comfortable wear notwithstanding. Your theory is admirable, but one must live. If this were Utopia, the old lamp should never leave my cornice; as it is the nineteenth century, the copper one is better suited to my purpose. To be in advance of the age one should possess a fortune or a taste for martyrdom. I confess a weakness for purple and fine linen.”

Alas, Sybilla! How shall I say to her that the end of reading and writing is, or at least should be, that the tired man or weary woman who sits down to essay, poem, or story should find there a something of noble incentive, a thought of beauty, purity, or heroism to take out with them into the stir and turmoil of life, and remember savingly, perhaps, in trial or temptation; for the very humblest scribbler, addressing his or her work to the least intelligent class of readers, by working in a truthful and good-giving spirit, may make that work beautiful and even noble. Doctrine may be false, moral erring, the tale well or ill told, successful or otherwise; but the spirit of the writer, subtle as electricity, will touch spirit, and consciously or unconsciously influence every reader. There is no more neutrality in literature than in nature. Every line makes some one and something worse and better, and the humblest writer has a share in the tremendous responsibility; for the point is not whether we serve a battery or carry a pop-gun, because truth and falsehood are not shot, but atmospheres; and to their very outermost limit the possessor, in spite of himself, blows hot or cold on the thought and purpose with which he comes in contact. And if the frothy tide sets against us we may not stem it, but need we swell it? Because we are not Samsons to pull down the gates of Gaza by our single strength, it scarcely follows that we are to set about a temple for Dagon.

And if this be true of all, what of those like Sybilla, to whom it is given to stand apart and above common life as seers and prophets, and looking on visions of beauty, to bring them to the doors of tired, anxious life-strugglers, that they too may be blessed? If a will-o'-the-wisp may lure to destruction, what of those stars that leave the blue vaults of heaven to blaze in swamps and forests of death? If our teachers show us a mirage in place of Eden, or stammer when they should speak in clear and certain tones, who shall estimate the wrong done the starved and famished souls who for bread get stones? Certainly it is a hard matter to sow small seed in stony furrows, while great events file by with blare of trumpets and blazon of banners on the world's great highway; to weave the dull web in the old tower, while the rest go on to the tourney; for human instinct is impatient of the justice of a tombstone or an obituary, and the current wisdom of the world is pretty fairly summed in the proverb, “A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush,” a boorish, shallow wisdom, true; but, though Faith heads a paragraph well, and Patience makes admirable matter for the argument thereof, and Glory ends it sublimely, yet, at least in a woman's life, Faith often can scarce get a glance upward for the little frets clamoring about her feet, and the even tenor of Patience's going is apt to be hindered by all manner of thorny vexations.

Without these two, suffering borne as a necessity and not a lesson, and labor done as labor without higher purpose, simply brutifies, like the forced endurance of the slave under the lash; and so seen life shows so bleak, and dull, and bare that it is small wonder if many among us cry out on the cramped thought and narrow aims of a woman's life; and men, tired with treachery, and weary with wrangling, who find a woman scheming over her mantua-making, or quarreling in her kitchen, or given over heart and soul to both, point and sneer; while men more generous, knowing that such things are not the purpose of any life, think the fault lies in the puddings, and clamor against the harmless paste; till women's duties have become a perfect tower of Babel, working little besides confusion of tongues; yet to one removed from the turmoil the matter seems sufficiently simple.

If God has given to any woman fingers more dextrous with the brush of the artist, or the pen of the scribe, or the lancet of the physician than with the needle, the brain for deep thought and patient study, the soul-love for music, be the gift what it may, even let her paint, write, sing, do the thing for which she was made, as does the bee and the flower; and God bless and keep her, for her tender feet tread ways that are hard for men. If a woman has hands prompt to cut and dextrous to sew, an eye for the component parts of a pudding, and an intelligence to regulate the workings of a household, and the sewing, and cooking, and system, are that for which she lives, then are her aims indeed narrow, and she unworthy to be the mother of heroes; or if she is held of them as a serf, and makes existence a perpetual sullen mutiny, her life is profitless; but if she have eyes to see, and ears to hear, let her take heart of grace, and a lesson from a tree; that at prompting of the spring pushes forth a leaf bravely here and another there, never bemoaning itself about the time needed for their rounding out, or taking thought about the sap, or that one leaf is so like another, or that many are needed to mantle it with verdure, or that they are on a different fashion from the oak and pine; or in the belief that leaves are the object of its growing, putting forth all its strength in one monster leaf, but catches a glint of sunshine where it can, and treasures shadow and coolness as well, to wave and rustle them forth again out on the parched and dusty road, by which it stands a blessing and a delight.

The old lamp is on every cornice, even the lowest. The genii are ready at your touch, and its soft flame has an alchemy that makes the dullest duties golden; and shining on through the dim future shows you there the riddle troubling you now fairly written out in letters of promise. Little things are God's levers; pay them due respect. Small duties are all of royal birth, kings in disguise, and be sure that you have a wedding garment, for you know not the day when one may throw aside his fisher's robes and stand before you Haroun Al Raschid. Moreover good works and words and thoughts have this pre-eminence over bad and weak ones: they are immortal and life-producing. Ever so little seed, in ever so barren soil, is sure at last of a harvest, and a joyous one; the blessing, however small, is always out at compound interest, and you get the interest in this life and punctually; for though individuals may be knavish it is astonishing how honest is the world in the aggregate. Good measure of such measure as ye mete shall men give you, shaken together, pressed down, and running over; and if just now appreciation prove short-sighted as to your whereabouts, why you have only to fall hopefully into line with the poets, the wits, the leading minds, the master spirits, the purest saints of every age.

Patient weary workers, in the nursery, at the needle, in the schools, whoever and wherever you may be, keep your lamp trimmed with patience, and in the end it shall shine on your exceeding great reward; but for those who barter old lamps for new, the copper lamps burn with but a feeble flicker, and are soon out; and is there not an old story of five foolish virgins who were found without oil in their lamps?

THE HEART'S LONGINGS.

A SLENDER shaft of sunset gold
Came gliding slantwise through my room,
The hearth was naked, blank, and cold;
The walls seemed tapestried with gloom.

The clock upon the mantle's shelf
Ticked ever wearily and slow;
The heart within my weary self
Responded feebly, faint, and low.

And flitting through my idle brain
Went visions of the vanished years—
Old memories of joy and pain,
And childhood with its smiles and tears:

The hopes which came with boyhood's time:
The dreams of youth so fair and bright;
And lusty manhood's vigorous prime—
The athlete fitted for the fight.

And musing on the Past, I said:
"Oh heart, what makes thee beat so low!—
Are all thy hopes, long cherished, dead?
What useful longings fill thee now?"

And from within a voice replied:
"Oh give me back the smiles and tears
Of childhood, and from far and wide
The scattered hopes of boyhood's years!

"Oh give me back the dreams of youth,
The friends who gathered round me then,
The early freshness and the truth
Which doubted not my fellow-men!

"Where are the castles that I reared,
And where the fame I thought to find?
My boy-wreath's once green leaves are seared
By Disappointment's frosty wind.

"Where are the ships I sent to sea,
The golden spires I raised so high?
My ships, they never come back to me;
The spires, they melted in the sky.

"Where is the wife I would possess;
The children climbing to her knees
To share their mother's fond caress?
Ah, more than all I long for these!"

Oh cease, sad heart! your chambers all
Are vacant, lone, and drear, I know;
Yet on each blank and naked wall
Shall shine a sudden sunset glow.

For Life is never always dark:
No one by fate is so accursed
But somewhere lurks a hidden spark
That into flame will sometime burst.

CHAPTER V.

BOFFIN'S BOWER.

OVER against a London house, a corner house not far from Cavendish Square, a man with a wooden leg had sat for some years, with his remaining foot in a basket in cold weather, picking up a living on this wise:—Every morning at eight o'clock he stumped to the corner, carrying a chair, a clothes-horse, a pair of trestles, a board, a basket, and an umbrella, all strapped together. Separating these, the board and trestles became a counter, the basket supplied the few small lots of fruit and sweets that he offered for sale upon it and became a foot-warmer, the unfolded clothes-horse displayed a choice collection of half-penny ballads and became a screen, and the stool planted within it became his post for the rest of the day. All weathers saw the man at the post. This is to be accepted in a double sense, for he contrived a back to his wooden stool by placing it against the lamp-post. When the weather was wet, he put up his umbrella over his stock in trade, not over himself; when the weather was dry, he furled that faded article, tied it round with a piece of yarn, and laid it cross-wise under the trestles: where it looked like an unwholesomely-forced lettuce that had lost in color and crispness what it had gained in size.

He had established his right to the corner, by imperceptible prescription. He had never varied his ground an inch, but had in the beginning diffidently taken the corner upon which the side of the house gave. A howling corner in the winter time, a dusty corner in the summer time, an undesirable corner at the best of times. Shelterless fragments of straw and paper got up revolving storms there, when the main street was at peace; and the water-cart, as if it were drunk or short-sighted, came blundering and jolting round it, making it muddy when all else was clean.

On the front of his sale-board hung a little placard, like a kettle-holder, bearing the inscription in his own small text:

*Errands gone
On with fi Delity By Ladies and Gentlemen
I remain
Your humble Serv^t: Silas Wegg.*

He had not only settled it with himself in course of time, that he was errand-goer by appointment to the house at the corner (though he received such commissions not half a dozen times in a year, and then only as some servant's deputy), but also that he was one of the house's retainers and owed vassalage to it and was bound to leal and loyal interest in it. For this reason, he always spoke of it as "Our House," and, though his knowledge of its affairs was mostly speculative and all wrong, claimed to be in its confidence. On similar grounds he never beheld an inmate at any one of its windows but he touched his hat. Yet, he knew so little about the inmates that he gave them names of his own invention: as "Miss Elizabeth," "Master George," "Aunt Jane," "Uncle Parker"—having no authority whatever for any such designations, but particularly the last—to which, as a natural consequence, he stuck with great obstinacy.

Over the house itself he exercised the same imaginary power as over its inhabitants and their affairs. He had never been in it, the length of a piece of fat black water-pipe which trailed itself over the area-door into a damp stone passage, and had rather the air of a leech on the house that had "taken" wonderfully; but this was no impediment to his arranging it according to a plan of his own. It was a great dingy house with a quantity of dim side window and blank back premises, and it cost his mind a world of trouble so to lay it out as to account for every thing in its external appearance. But, this once done, was quite satisfactory, and he rested persuaded, that he knew his way about the house blindfold: from the barred garrets in the high roof, to the two iron extinguishers before the main door—which seemed to request all lively visitors to have the kindness to put themselves out, before entering.

Assuredly, this stall of Silas Wegg's was the hardest little stall of all the sterile little stalls in London. It gave you the face-ache to look at his apples, the stomach-ache to look at his oranges, the tooth-ache to look at his nuts. Of the latter commodity he had always a grim little heap, on which lay a little wooden measure which had no discernible inside, and was considered to represent the penn'orth appointed by Magna Charta. Whether from too much east wind or no—it was an easterly corner—the stall, the stock, and the keeper, were all as dry as the Desert. Wegg was a knotty man, and a close-grained, with a face carved out of very hard material, that had just as much play of expression as a watchman's rattle. When he laughed, certain jerks occurred in it, and the rattle sprung. Sooth to say, he was so wooden a man that he seemed to have taken his wooden leg naturally, and rather suggested to the fanciful observer, that he might be expected—if his development received no untimely check—to be completely set up with a pair of wooden legs in about six months.

THE BIRD OF PREY.—[SEE CHAPTER I.]

Mr. Wegg was an observant person, or, as he himself said, "took a powerful sight of notice." He saluted all his regular passers-by every day, as he sat on his stool backed up by the lamp-post; and on the adaptable character of these salutes he greatly plumed himself. Thus, to the rector, he addressed a bow, compounded of lay deference, and a slight touch of the shady preliminary meditation at church; to the doctor, a confidential bow, as to a gentleman whose acquaintance with his inside he begged respectfully to acknowledge; before the Quality he delighted to abase himself; and for Uncle Parker, who was in the army (at least, so he had settled it), he put his open hand to the side of his hat, in a military manner which that angry-eyed, buttoned-up inflammatory-faced old gentleman appeared but imperfectly to appreciate.

The only article in which Silas dealt, that was not hard, was gingerbread. On a certain day, some wretched infant having purchased the damp gingerbread-horse (fearfully out of condition), and the adhesive bird-cage, which had been exposed for the day's sale, he had taken a tin box from under his stool to produce a relay of those dreadful specimens, and was going to look in at the lid, when he said to himself, pausing: "Oh! Here you are again!"

The words referred to a broad, round-shouldered, one-sided old fellow in mourning, coming comically ambling toward the corner, dressed in a pea over-coat, and carrying a large stick. He wore thick shoes, and thick leather gaiters, and thick gloves like a hedger's. Both as to his dress and to himself he was of an overlapping rhinoceros build, with folds in his cheeks, and his forehead, and his eyelids, and his lips, and his ears; but with bright, eager, childish-inquiring, gray eyes, under his ragged eyebrows, and broad-brimmed hat. A very odd-looking old fellow altogether.

"Here you are again," repeated Mr. Wegg, musing. "And what are you now? Are you in the Funns, or where are you? Have you lately come to settle in this neighborhood, or do you own to another neighborhood? Are you in independent circumstances, or is it wasting the motions of a bow on you? Come! I'll speculate! I'll invest a bow in you!"

Which Mr. Wegg, having replaced his tin box, accordingly did, as he rose to bait his gingerbread-trap for some other devoted infant. The salute was acknowledged with:

"Morning, Sir! Morning! Morning!"

("Calls me Sir!" said Mr. Wegg, to himself. "He won't answer. A bow gone!")

"Morning, morning, morning!"

"Appears to be rather a 'arty old cock, too," said Mr. Wegg, as before. "Good-morning to you, Sir."

"Do you remember me, then?" asked his new acquaintance, stopping in his amble, one-sided, before the stall, and speaking in a pouncing way, though with great good-humor.

"I have noticed you go past our house, Sir, several times in the course of the last week or so."

"Our house," repeated the other. "Meaning—?"

"Yes," said Mr. Wegg, nodding, as the other pointed the clumsy forefinger of his right glove at the corner house.

"Oh! Now, what," pursued the old fellow, in an inquisitive manner, carrying his knotted stick in his left arm as if it were a baby, "what do they allow you now?"

"It's job work that I do for our house," returned Silas, dryly, and with reticence; "it's not yet brought to an exact allowance."

"Oh! It's not yet brought to an exact allowance? No! It's not yet brought to an exact allowance. Oh!—Morning, morning, morning!"

"Appears to be rather a cracked old cock," thought Silas, qualifying his former good opinion, as the other ambled off. But, in a moment he was back again with the question:

"How did you get your wooden leg?"

Mr. Wegg replied (tartly to this personal inquiry), "In an accident."

"Do you like it?"

"Well! I haven't got to keep it warm," Mr. Wegg made answer, in a sort of desperation occasioned by the singularity of the question.

"He hasn't," repeated the other to his knotted stick, as he gave it a hug; "he hasn't got—ha!—ha!—to keep it warm! Did you ever hear of the name of Boffin?"

"No," said Mr. Wegg, who was growing restive under this examination. "I never did hear of the name of Boffin."

"Do you like it?"

"Why, no," retorted Mr. Wegg, again approaching desperation; "I can't say I do."

"Why don't you like it?"

"I don't know why I don't," retorted Mr. Wegg, approaching frenzy, "but I don't at all."

"Now, I'll tell you something that'll make you sorry for that," said the stranger, smiling. "My name's Boffin."

"I can't help it!" returned Mr. Wegg. Implying in his manner the offensive addition, "and if I could, I wouldn't."

"But there's another chance for you," said Mr. Boffin, smiling still, "Do you like the name of Nicodemus? Think it over. Nick, or Noddy."

"It is not, Sir," Mr. Wegg rejoined, as he sat down on his stool, with an air of gentle resignation, combined with melancholy candor; "it is not a name as I could wish any one that I had a respect for, to call me by; but there may be persons that would not view it with the same objections.—I don't know why," Mr. Wegg added, anticipating another question.

"Noddy Boffin," said that gentleman. "Noddy. That's my name. Noddy—or Nick—Boffin. What's your name?"

"Silas Wegg.—I don't," said Mr. Wegg, bestirring himself to take the same precaution as before, "I don't know why Silas, and I don't know why Wegg."

"Now, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin, hugging his stick closer, "I want to make a sort of offer to you. Do you remember when you first see me?"

The wooden Wegg looked at him with a meditative eye, and also with a softened air as deservng possibility of profit. "Let me think. I ain't quite sure, and yet I generally take a powerful sight of notice, too. Was it on a Monday morning, when the butcher-boy had been to our house for orders, and bought a ballad of me, which, being unacquainted with the tune, I run it over to him?"

"Right, Wegg, right! But he bought more than one."

"Yes, to be sure, Sir; he bought several; and wishing to lay out his money to the best, he took my opinion to guide his choice, and we went over the collection together. To be sure we did. Here was him as it might be, and here was myself as it might be, and there was you, Mr. Boffin, as you identically are, with your self-same stick under your very same arm, and your very same back toward us. To—be—sure!" added Mr. Wegg, looking a little round Mr. Boffin, to take him in the rear, and identify this last extraordinary coincidence, "your very self-same back."

"What do you think I was doing, Wegg?"

"I should judge, Sir, that you might be glancing your eye down the street."

"No, Wegg. I was a-listening."

"Was you, indeed?" said Mr. Wegg, dubiously.

"Not in a dishonorable way, Wegg, because you was singing to the butcher; and you wouldn't sing secrets to a butcher in the street, you know."

"It never happened that I did so yet, to the best of my remembrance," said Mr. Wegg, cautiously. "But I might do it. A man can't say what he might wish to do some day or another." (This, not to release any little advantage he might derive from Mr. Boffin's avowal.)

"Well," repeated Boffin, "I was a-listening to you and to him. And what do you—you haven't got another stool, have you? I'm rather thick in my breath."

"I haven't got another, but you're welcome to this," said Wegg, resigning it. "It's a treat to me to stand."

"Lard!" exclaimed Mr. Boffin, in a tone of great enjoyment, as he settled himself down, still nursing his stick like a baby, "it's a pleasant place, this! And then to be shut in on each side, with these ballads, like so many book-leaf blinkers! Why, it's delightful!"

"If I am not mistaken, Sir," Mr. Wegg delicately hinted, resting a hand on his stall, and bending over the discursive Boffin, "you alluded to some offer or another that was in your mind?"

"I'm coming to it! All right. I'm coming to it! I was going to say that when I listened that morning, I listened with admiration amounting to haw. I thought to myself, 'Here's a man with a wooden leg—a literary man with—'"

"N—not exactly so, Sir," said Mr. Wegg.

"Why, you know every one of these songs by name and by tune, and if you want to read or to sing any one on 'em off straight, you've only to whip on your spectacles and do it!" cried Mr. Boffin. "I see you at it!"

"Well, Sir," returned Mr. Wegg, with a conscious inclination of the head; "we'll say literary, then."

"A literary man—with a wooden leg—and all Print is open to him!" That's what I thought to myself, that morning," pursued Mr. Boffin, leaning forward to describe, uncramped by the clothes-horse, as large an arc as his right arm could make; "'all Print is open to him!' And it is, ain't it?"

"Why, truly, Sir," Mr. Wegg admitted, with modesty; "I believe you couldn't show me the piece of English print that I wouldn't be equal to collaring and throwing."

"On the spot?" said Mr. Boffin.

"On the spot."

"I know'd it! Then consider this. Here am I, a man without a wooden leg, and yet all print is shut to me."

"Indeed, Sir?" Mr. Wegg returned with increasing self-complacency. "Education neglected?"

"Neg—lected!" repeated Boffin with emphasis. "That ain't no word for it. I don't mean to say but what if you showed me a B, I could so far give you change for it, as to answer Boffin."

"Come, come, Sir," said Mr. Wegg, throwing in a little encouragement, "that's something, too."

"It's something," answered Mr. Boffin, "but I'll take my oath it ain't much."

"Perhaps it's not as much as could be wished by an inquiring mind, Sir," Mr. Wegg admitted.

"Now, look here. I'm retired from business. Me and Mrs. Boffin—Henerietty Boffin—which her father's name was Henery, and her mother's name was Hetty, and so you get it—we live on a compittance, under the will of a diseased governor."

"Gentleman dead, Sir?"

"Man alive, don't I tell you? A diseased governor? Now, it's too late for me to begin shoveling and sifting at alphabets and grammar-books. I'm getting to be a old bird, and I want to take it easy. But I want some reading—some fine bold reading, some splendid book in a gorging Lord Mayor's-Show of wollumes" (probably meaning gorgeous, but misled by association of ideas); "as'll reach right down your pint of view, and take time to go by you. How can I get that reading, Wegg? By," tapping him on the breast with the head of his thick stick, "paying a man truly qualified to do it, so much an hour (say twopence) to come and do it."

"Hem! Flattered, Sir, I am sure," said Wegg, beginning to regard himself in quite a new light. "Hem! This is the offer you mentioned, Sir?"

"Yes. Do you like it?"

"I am considering of it, Mr. Boffin."

"I don't," said Boffin, in a free-handed manner, "want to tie a literary man—with a wooden leg—down too tight. A half-penny an hour sha'n't part us. The hours are your own to choose, after you've done for the day with your house here. I live over Maiden Lane way—out Holloway direction—and you've only got to go East-and-by-North when you've finished here, and you're there. Twopence half-penny an hour," said Boffin, taking a piece of chalk from his pocket and getting off the stool to work the sum on the top of it in his own way; "two long'uns and a short'un—twopence half-penny; two short'uns is a long'un and two long'uns is four long'uns—making five long'uns; six nights a week at five long'uns a night," scoring them all down separately, "and you mount up to thirty long'uns. A round'un! Half a crown!"

Pointing to this result as a large and satisfactory one, Mr. Boffin smeared it out with his moistened glove, and sat down on the remains.

"Half a crown," said Wegg, meditating.

"Yes. (It ain't much, Sir.) Half a crown."

"Per week, you know."

"Per week. Yes. As to the amount of strain upon the intellect now. Was you thinking at all of poetry?" Mr. Wegg inquired, musing.

"Would it come dearer?" Mr. Boffin asked.

"It would come dearer," Mr. Wegg returned. "For when a person comes to grind off poetry night after night, it is but right he should expect to be paid for its weakening effect on his mind."

"To tell you the truth Wegg," said Boffin, "I wasn't thinking of poetry, except in so far as this:—If you was to happen now and then to feel yourself in the mind to tip me and Mrs. Boffin one of your ballads, why then we should drop into poetry."

"I follow you, Sir," said Wegg. "But not being a regular musical professional, I should be loath to engage myself for that; and therefore when I dropped into poetry, I should ask to be considered so far, in the light of a friend."

At this, Mr. Boffin's eyes sparkled, and he shook Silas earnestly by the hand: protesting that it was more than he could have asked, and that he took it very kindly indeed.

"What do you think of the terms, Wegg?" Mr. Boffin then demanded, with unconcealed anxiety.

Silas, who had stimulated this anxiety by his hard reserve of manner, and who had begun to understand his man very well, replied with an air; as if he were saying something extraordinarily generous and great:

"Mr. Boffin, I never bargain."

"So I should have thought of you!" said Mr. Boffin, admiringly.

"No, Sir. I never did 'aggle and I never will 'aggle. Consequently I meet you at once, free and fair, with—Done, for double the money!"

Mr. Boffin seemed a little unprepared for this conclusion, but assented, with the remark, "You know better what it ought to be than I do, Wegg," and again shook hands with him upon it.

"Could you begin to-night, Wegg?" he then demanded.

"Yes, Sir," said Mr. Wegg, careful to leave all the eagerness to him. "I see no difficulty if you wish it. You are provided with the needful implement—a book, Sir?"

"Bought him at a sale," said Mr. Boffin. "Eight wollumes. Red and gold. Purple ribbon in every wollume, to keep the place where you leave off. Do you know him?"

"The book's name, Sir?" inquired Silas.

"I thought you might have know'd him without it," said Mr. Boffin slightly disappointed. "His name is Decline-And-Fall-Off-The-Rooshan-Empire." (Mr. Boffin went over these stones slowly, and with much caution.)

"Ay indeed!" said Mr. Wegg, nodding his head with an air of friendly recognition.

"You know him, Wegg?"

"I haven't been not to say right slap through him, very lately," Mr. Wegg made answer, "having been otherways employed, Mr. Boffin. But know him? Old familiar declining and falling off the Rooshan? Rather, Sir! Ever since I was not so high as your stick. Ever since my eldest brother left our cottage to enlist into the army. On which occasion, as the ballad that was made about it describes:

"Beside that cottage door, Mr. Boffin,

A girl was on her knees;

She held aloft a snowy scarf, Sir,

Which (my eldest brother noticed) fluttered in the breeze.

She breathed a prayer for him, Mr. Boffin;

A prayer he could not hear.

And my eldest brother lean'd upon his sword, Mr. Boffin,
And wiped away a tear."

Much impressed by this family circumstance, and also by the friendly disposition of Mr. Wegg, as exemplified in his so soon dropping into poetry, Mr. Boffin again shook hands with that ligneous sharper, and besought him to name his hour. Mr. Wegg named eight.

"Where I live," said Mr. Boffin, "is called The Bower. Boffin's Bower is the name Mrs. Boffin christened it when we come into it as a property. If you should meet with any body that don't know it by that name (which hardly any body does), when you've got nigh upon about a odd mile, or say and a quarter if you like, up Maiden Lane, Battle Bridge, ask for Harmony Jail, and you'll be put right. I shall expect you, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin, clapping him on the shoulder with the greatest enthusiasm, "most jylfully. I shall have no peace or patience till you come. Print is now opening ahead of me. This night, a literary man—with a wooden leg—" he bestowed an admiring look upon that decoration, as if it greatly enhanced the relish of Mr. Wegg's attainments—"will begin to lead me a new life! My fist again, Wegg. Morning, morning, morning!"

Left alone at his stall as the other ambled off, Mr. Wegg subsided into his screen, produced a small pocket-handkerchief of a penitentially-scrubbing character, and took himself by the nose with a thoughtful aspect. Also, while he still grasped that feature, he directed several thoughtful looks down the street, after the retiring figure of Mr. Boffin. But profound gravity sat enthroned on Wegg's countenance. For, while he considered within himself that this was an old fellow of rare simplicity, that this was an opportunity to be improved, and that here might be money to be got beyond present calculation, still he compromised himself by no admission that his new engagement was at all out of his way, or involved the least element of the ridiculous. Mr. Wegg would even have picked a handsome quarrel with any one who should have challenged his deep acquaintance with those afore-said eight volumes of Decline and Fall. His gravity was unusual, portentous, and immeasurable, not because he admitted any doubt of himself, but because he perceived it necessary to forestall any doubt of himself in others. And herein he ranged with that very numerous class of impostors, who are quite as determined to keep up appearances to themselves, as to their neighbors.

A certain loftiness, likewise, took possession of Mr. Wegg; a condescending sense of being in request as an official expounder of mysteries. It did not move him to commercial greatness, but rather to littleness, insomuch that if it had been within the possibilities of things for the wooden measure to hold fewer nuts than usual, it would have done so that day. But, when night came, and with her veiled eyes beheld him stumping toward Boffin's Bower, he was elated too.

The Bower was as difficult to find as Fair Rosamond's without the clew. Mr. Wegg, having reached the quarter indicated, inquired for the Bower half a dozen times without the least success, until he remembered to ask for Harmony Jail. This occasioned a quick change in the spirits of a hoarse gentleman and a donkey, whom he had much perplexed.

"Why, yer mean Old Harmon's, do yer?" said the hoarse gentleman, who was driving his donkey in a truck, with a carrot for a whip. "Why didn't yer niver say so? Eddard and me is a goin' by him! Jump in."

Mr. Wegg complied, and the hoarse gentleman invited his attention to the third person in company, thus:

"Now, you look at Eddard's ears. What was it as you named, agin? Whisper."

Mr. Wegg whispered, "Boffin's Bower."

"Eddard! (keep yer hi on his ears) cut away to Boffin's Bower!"

Edward, with his ears lying back, remained immovable.

"Eddard! (keep yer hi on his ears) cut away to Old Harmon's."

Edward instantly pricked up his ears to their utmost, and rattled off at such a pace that Mr. Wegg's conversation was jolted out of him in a most dislocated state.

"Was-it-Ev-verajail?" asked Mr. Wegg, holding on.

"Not proper jail, wot you and me would get committed to," returned his escort; "they giv' it the name, on accounts of Old Harmon living solitary there."

"And-why-did-they-callitharm-Ony?" asked Wegg.

"On accounts of his never agreeing with nobody. Like a speeches of chaff. Harmon's Jail; Harmony Jail. Working it round like."

"Doyouknow-Mist-Erboffin-in?" asked Wegg.

"I should think so! Every body do about here. Eddard knows him. (Keep yer hi on his ears.) Noddy Boffin, Eddard!"

The effect of the name was so very alarming, in respect of causing a temporary disappearance of Edward's head, casting his hind hoofs in the air, greatly accelerating the pace and increasing the jolting, that Mr. Wegg was fain to devote his attention exclusively to holding on, and to relinquish his desire of ascertaining whether this homage to Boffin was to be considered complimentary or the reverse.

Presently, Edward stopped at a gateway, and Wegg discreetly lost no time in slipping out at the back of the truck. The moment he was landed, his late driver with a wave of the carrot, said, "Supper, Eddard!" and he, the hind hoofs, the truck, and Edward, all seemed to fly into the air together, in a kind of apotheosis.

Pushing the gate, which stood ajar, Wegg looked into an inclosed space where certain tall dark mounds rose high against the sky, and where the pathway to the Bower was indicated, as the moonlight showed, between two lines of broken crockery set in ashes. A white figure advancing along this path, proved to be nothing more ghostly than Mr. Boffin, easily attired for the pursuit of knowledge, in an undress garment of short white smock-frock. Having received his literary friend with great cordiality, he conducted him to the interior of the Bower and there presented him to Mrs. Boffin:—a stout lady of a rubicund and cheerful aspect, dressed (to Mr. Wegg's consternation) in a low evening-dress of sable satin, and a large black velvet hat and feathers.

"Mrs. Boffin, Wegg," said Boffin, "is a highflier at Fashion. And her make is such, that she does it credit. As to myself, I ain't yet as Fash'nable as I may come to be. Henerietty, old lady, this is the gentleman that's a-going to decline and fall off the Rooshan Empire."

"And I am sure I hope it'll do you both good," said Mrs. Boffin.

It was the queerest of rooms, fitted and furnished more like a luxurious amateur tap-room than any thing else within the ken of Silas Wegg. There were two wooden settles by the fire, one on either side of it, with a corresponding table before each. On one of these tables the eight volumes were ranged flat, in a row, like a galvanic battery; on the other, certain squat case-bottles of inviting appearance seemed to stand on tip-toe to exchange glances with Mr. Wegg over a front row of tumblers and a basin of white sugar. On the hob, a kettle steamed; on the hearth, a cat reposed. Facing the fire between the settles, a sofa, a footstool, and a little table, formed a centre-piece devoted to Mrs. Boffin. They were garish in taste and color, but were expensive articles of drawing-room furniture that had a very odd look beside the settles and the flaring gaslight pendent from the ceiling. There was a flowery carpet on the floor; but, instead of reaching to the fireside, its glowing vegetation stopped short at Mrs. Boffin's footstool, and gave place to a region of sand and saw-dust. Mr. Wegg also noticed, with admiring eyes, that, while the flowery land displayed such hollow ornamentation as stuffed birds and waxen fruits under glass-shades, there were, in the territory where vegetation ceased, compensatory shelves on which the best part of a large pie and likewise of a cold joint were plainly discernible among other solids. The room itself was large, though low; and the heavy frames of its old-fashioned windows, and the heavy beams in its crooked ceiling, seemed to indicate that it had once been a house of some mark standing alone in the country.

"Do you like it, Wegg?" asked Mr. Boffin, in his pouncing manner.

"I admire it greatly, Sir," said Wegg. "Peculiar comfort at this fireside, Sir."

"Do you understand it, Wegg?"

"Why, in a general way, Sir," Mr. Wegg was beginning slowly and knowingly, with his head stuck on one side, as evasive people do begin, when the other cut him short:

"You don't understand it, Wegg, and I'll explain it. These arrangements is made by mutual consent between Mrs. Boffin and me. Mrs. Boffin, as I've mentioned, is a highflier at Fashion; at present I'm not. I don't go higher than comfort, and comfort of the sort that I'm equal to the enjoyment of. Well then. Where would be the good of Mrs. Boffin and me quarreling over it? We never did quarrel, before we come into Boffin's Bower as a property; why quarrel when we have come into Boffin's Bower as a property? So Mrs. Boffin, she keeps up her part of the room, in her way; I keep up my part of the room in mine. In consequence of which we have at once, Sociability (I should go melancholy mad without Mrs. Boffin), Fashion, and Comfort. If I get by degrees to be a higher-flier at Fashion, then Mrs. Boffin will by degrees come for'arder. If Mrs. Boffin should ever be less of a dab at Fashion than she is at the present time, then Mrs. Boffin's carpet would go back'arder. If we should both continny as we are, why then here we are, and give us a kiss, old lady."

Mrs. Boffin, who, perpetually smiling, had approached and drawn her plump arm through her lord's, most willingly complied. Fashion, in the form of her black velvet hat and feathers, tried to prevent it; but got deservedly crushed in the endeavor.

"So now, Wegg," said Mr. Boffin, wiping his mouth with an air of much refreshment, "you begin to know us as we are. This is a charming spot, is the Bower, but you must get to appreciate it by degrees. It's a spot to find out the merits of, little by little, and a new'un every day. There's a serpentining walk up each of the mounds, that gives you the yard and neighborhood changing every moment. When you get to the top, there's a view of the neighboring premises, not to be surpassed. The premises of Mrs. Boffin's late father (Canine Provision Trade), you look down into, as if they was your own. And the top of the High Mound is crowned with a lattice-work Arbor, in which, if you don't read out loud many a book in the summer, ay, and as a friend, drop many a time into poetry too, it sha'n't be my fault. Now, what'll you read on?"

"Thank you, Sir," returned Wegg, as if there were nothing new in his reading at all. "I generally do it on gin and water."

"Keeps the organ moist, does it, Wegg?" asked Mr. Boffin, with innocent eagerness.

"N-no, Sir," replied Wegg, coolly, "I should hardly describe it so, Sir. I should say, mellers it. Mellers it, is the word I should employ, Mr. Boffin."

His wooden conceit and craft kept exact pace with the delighted expectation of his victim. The visions rising before his mercenary mind, of the many ways in which this connection was to be turned to account, never obscured the foremost idea natural to a dull overreaching man, that he must not make himself too cheap.

Mrs. Boffin's Fashion, as a less inexorable deity than the idol usually worshiped under that name, did not forbid her mixing for her literary guest, or asking if he found the result to his liking. On his returning a gracious answer and taking his place at the literary settle, Mr. Boffin began to compose himself as a listener, at the opposite settle, with exultant eyes.

"Sorry to deprive you of a pipe, Wegg," he said, filling his own, "but you can't do both together. Oh! and another thing I forgot to name! When you come in here of an evening, and look round you, and notice any thing on a shelf that happens to catch your fancy, mention it."

Wegg, who had been going to put on his spectacles, immediately laid them down, with the sprightly observation:

"You read my thoughts, Sir. Do my eyes deceive me, or is that object up there a—a pie? It can't be a pie."

"Yes, it's a pie, Wegg," replied Mr. Boffin, with a glance of some little discomfiture at the Decline and Fall.

"Have I lost my smell for fruits, or is it a apple-pie, Sir?" asked Wegg.

"It's a veal and ham pie," said Mr. Boffin.

"Is it indeed, Sir? And it would be hard, Sir, to name the pie that is a better pie than a weal and hammer," said Mr. Wegg, nodding his head emotionally.

"Have some, Wegg?"

"Thank you, Mr. Boffin, I think I will, at your invitation. I wouldn't at any other party's, at the present juncture; but at yours, Sir!—And meaty jelly too, especially when a little salt, which is the case where there's ham, is melling to the organ, is very melling to the organ." Mr. Wegg did not say what organ, but spoke with a cheerful generality.

So, the pie was brought down, and the worthy Mr. Boffin exercised his patience until Wegg, in the exercise of his knife and fork, had finished the dish: only profiting by the opportunity to inform Wegg that, although it was not strictly Fashionable to keep the contents of a larder thus exposed to view, he (Mr. Boffin) considered it hospitable; for the reason, that instead of saying, in a comparatively unmeaning manner, to a visitor, 'There are such and such edibles down stairs; will you have any thing up?' you took the bold practical course of saying, 'Cast your eye along the shelves, and, if you see any thing you like there, have it down.'

And now, Mr. Wegg at length pushed away his plate and put on his spectacles, and Mr. Boffin lighted his pipe and looked with beaming eyes into the opening world before him, and Mrs. Boffin reclined in a fashionable manner on her sofa: as one who would be part of the audience if she found she could, and would go to sleep if she found she couldn't.

"Hem!" began Wegg, "This, Mr. Boffin and Lady, is the first chapter of the first wollume of the Decline and Fall off—" here he looked hard at the book, and stopped.

"What's the matter, Wegg?"

"Why, it comes into my mind, do you know, Sir," said Wegg, with an air of insinuating frankness (having first again looked hard at the book), "that you made a little mistake this morning, which I had meant to set you right in, only something put it out of my head. I think you said Rooshan Empire, Sir?"

"It is Rooshan; ain't it, Wegg?"

"No, Sir. Roman. Roman."

"What's the difference, Wegg?"

"The difference, Sir?" Mr. Wegg was faltering and in danger of breaking down, when a bright thought flashed upon him. "The difference, Sir? There you place me in a difficulty, Mr. Boffin. Suffice it to observe, that the difference is best postponed to some other occasion when Mrs. Boffin does not honor us with her company. In Mrs. Boffin's presence, Sir, we had better drop it."

Mr. Wegg thus came out of his disadvantage with quite a chivalrous air, and not only that, but by dint of repeating with a manly delicacy, "In Mrs. Boffin's presence, Sir, we had better drop it!" turned the disadvantage on Boffin, who felt that he had committed himself in a very painful manner.

Then, Mr. Wegg, in a dry unflinching way, entered on his task; going straight across country at every thing that came before him; taking all the hard words, biographical and geographical; getting rather shaken by Hadrian, Trajan, and the Antonines; stumbling at Polybius (pronounced Polly Beeious, and supposed by Mr. Boffin to be a Roman virgin, and by Mrs. Boffin to be responsible for that necessity of dropping it); heavily unseated by Titus Antoninus Pius; up again and galloping smoothly with Augustus; finally, getting over the ground well with Commodus: who, under the appellation of Commodious, was held by Mr. Boffin to have been quite unworthy of his English origin, and "not to have acted up to his name" in his government of the Roman people. With the death of this personage, Mr. Wegg terminated his first reading; long before which consummation several total eclipses of Mrs. Boffin's candle behind her black velvet disk, would have been very alarming, but for being regularly accompanied by a potent smell of burnt pens when her feathers took fire, which acted as a restorative and woke her. Mr. Wegg, having read on by rote and attached as few ideas as possible to the text, came out of the encounter fresh; but, Mr. Boffin, who had soon laid down his unfinished pipe, and had ever since sat intently staring with his eyes and mind at the confounding enormities of the Romans, was so severely punished that he could hardly wish his literary friend Good-night, and articulate "To-morrow."

"Commodious," gasped Mr. Boffin, staring at the moon, after letting Wegg out at the gate and fastening it: "Commodious fights in that wild-beast-show, seven hundred and thirty-five times, in one character only! As if that wasn't stunning enough, a hundred lions is turned into the same wild-beast-show all at once! As if that wasn't stunning enough, Commodious, in another character, kills 'em all off in a hundred goes! As if that wasn't stunning enough, Vittle-us (and well named too) eats six millions' worth, English money, in seven months! Wegg takes it easy, but upon-my-soul to a old bird like myself these are scarers. And even now that Commodious is strangled, I don't see a way to our bettering ourselves." Mr. Boffin added as he turned his pensive steps toward the Bower and shook his head, "I didn't think this morning there was half so many Scarers in Print. But I'm in for it now!"

CHAPTER VI.

CUT ADRIPT.

THE Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters, already mentioned as a tavern of a dropsical appearance, had long settled down into a state of hale infirmity. In its whole constitution it had not a straight floor, and hardly a straight line; but it had outlasted, and clearly would yet outlast, many a better-trimmed building, many a sprucer public house. Externally, it was a narrow lopsided wooden jumble of corpulent windows heaped one upon another as you might heap as many toppling oranges, with a crazy wooden veranda impending over the water; indeed the whole house, inclusive of the complaining flag-staff on the roof, impended over the water, but seemed to have got into the condition of a faint-hearted diver who has paused so long on the brink that he will never go in at all.

This description applies to the river-frontage of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters. The back of the establishment, though the chief entrance was there, so contracted that it merely represented in its connection with the front, the handle of a flat-iron set upright on its broadest end. This handle stood at the bottom of a wilderness of court and alley: which wilderness pressed so hard and close upon the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters as to leave the hostelry not an inch of ground beyond its door. For this reason, in combination with the fact that the house was all but afloat at high-water, when the Porters had a family wash the linen subjected to that operation might usually be seen drying on lines stretched across the reception-rooms and bed-chambers.

The wood forming the chimney-pieces, beams, partitions, floors and doors, of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters, seemed in its old age fraught with confused memories of its youth. In many places it had become gnarled and riven, according to the manner of old trees; knots started out of it; and here and there it seemed to twist itself into some likeness of boughs. In this state of second childhood it had an air of being in its own way garrulous about its early life. Not without reason was it often asserted by the regular frequenters of the Porters, that when the light shone full upon the grain of certain panels, and particularly upon an old corner cupboard of walnut-wood in the bar, you might trace little forests there, and tiny trees like the parent tree, in full umbrageous leaf.

The bar of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters was a bar to soften the human breast. The available space in it was not much larger than a hackney-coach; but no one could have wished the bar bigger, that space was so girt in by corpulent little casks, and by cordial-bottles radiant with fictitious grapes in bunches, and by lemons in nets, and by biscuits in baskets, and by the polite beer-pulls that made low bows when customers were served with beer, and by the cheese in a snug corner, and by the landlady's own small table in a snugger corner near the fire, with the cloth everlastingly laid. This haven was divided from the rough world by a glass partition and a half-door, with a leaden sill upon it for the convenience of resting your liquor; but, over this half-door the bar's snugness so gushed forth, that, albeit customers drank there standing, in a dark and draughty passage where they were shouldered by other customers passing in and out, they always appeared to drink under an enchanting delusion that they were in the bar itself.

For the rest, both the tap and parlor of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters gave upon the river, and had red curtains matching the noses of the regular customers, and were provided with comfortable fireside tin utensils, like models of sugar-loaf hats, made in that shape that they might, with their pointed ends, seek out for themselves glowing nooks in the depths of the red coals, when they mulled your ale, or heated for you those delectable drinks, Purl, Flip, and Dog's Nose. The first of these humming compounds was a specialty of the Porters, which, through an inscription on its door-posts, gently appealed to your feelings as, "The Early Purl House." For, it would seem that Purl must always be taken early; though whether for any more distinctly stomachic reason than that, as the early bird catches the worm, so the early purl catches the customer, can not here be resolved. It only remains to add that in the handle of the flat-iron, and opposite the bar, was a very little room like a three-cornered hat, into which no direct ray of sun, moon, or star, ever penetrated, but which was superstitiously regarded as a sanctuary replete with comfort and retirement by gaslight, and on the door of which was therefore painted its alluring name: Cozy.

Miss Potterson, sole proprietor and manager of the Fellowship-Porters, reigned supreme on her throne, the Bar, and a man must have drunk himself mad drunk indeed if he thought he could contest a point with her. Being known on her own authority as Miss Abbey Potterson, some water-side heads, which (like the water) were none of the clearest, harbored muddled notions that, because of her dignity and firmness, she was named after, or in some sort related to, the Abbey at Westminster. But, Abbey was only short for Abigail, by which name Miss Potterson had been christened at Limehouse Church, some sixty and odd years before.

"Now, you mind, you Riderhood," said Miss Abbey Potterson, with emphatic forefinger over the half-door, "the Fellowships don't want you at all, and would rather by far have your room than your company; but if you were as welcome here as you are not, you shouldn't even then have another drop of drink here this night, after this present pint of beer. So make the most of it."

"But you know, Miss Potterson," this was suggested very meekly though, "if I behave myself, you can't help serving me, miss."

"Can't I!" said Abbey, with infinite expression.

"No, Miss Potterson; because, you see, the law—"

"I am the law here, my man," returned Miss Abbey, "and I'll soon convince you of that, if you doubt it at all."

"I never said I did doubt it at all, Miss Abbey."

"So much the better for you."

Abbey the supreme threw the customer's halfpence into the till, and, seating herself in her fireside-chair, resumed the newspaper she had been reading. She was a tall, upright, well-favored woman, though severe of countenance, and had more of the air of a schoolmistress than mistress of the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters. The man on the other side of the half-door was a water-side man with a squinting leer, and he eyed her as if he were one of her pupils in disgrace.

"You're cruel hard upon me, Miss Potterson."

Miss Potterson read her newspaper with contracted brows, and took no notice until he whispered:

"Miss Potterson! Ma'am! Might I have half a word with you?"

Deigning then to turn her eyes sideways toward the suppliant, Miss Potterson beheld him knuckling his low forehead, and ducking at her with his head, as if he were asking leave to fling himself head foremost over the half-door and alight on his feet in the bar.

"Well?" said Miss Potterson, with a manner as short as she herself was long, "say your half word. Bring it out."

"Miss Potterson! Ma'am! Would you excuse me taking the liberty of asking, is it my character that you take objections to?"

"Certainly," said Miss Potterson.

"Is it that you're afraid of—"

"I am not afraid of you," interposed Miss Potterson, "if you mean that."

"But I humbly don't mean that, Miss Abbey."

"Then what do you mean?"

"You really are so cruel hard upon me! What I was going to make inquiries was no more than, might you have any apprehensions—leastways beliefs or suppositions—that the company's property mightn't be altogether to be considered safe, if I used the house too regular?"

"What do you want to know for?"

"Well, Miss Abbey, respectfully meaning no offense to you, it would be some satisfaction to a man's mind, to understand why the Fellowship-Porters is not to be free to such as me, and is to be free to such as Gaffer."

The face of the hostess darkened with some shadow of perplexity, as she replied: "Gaffer has never been where you have been."

"Signifying in Quod, Miss? Perhaps not. But he may have merited it. He may be suspected of far worse than ever I was."

"Who suspects him?"

"Many, perhaps. One, beyond all doubts. I do."

"You are not much," said Miss Abbey Potterson, knitting her brows again with disdain.

"But I was his pardner. Mind you, Miss Abbey, I was his pardner. As such I know more of the ins and outs of him than any person living does. Notice this! I am the man that was his pardner, and I am the man that suspects him."

"Then," suggested Miss Abbey, though with a deeper shade of perplexity than before, "you criminate yourself."

"No I don't, Miss Abbey. For how does it stand? It stands this way. When I was his pardner, I couldn't never give him satisfaction. Why couldn't I never give him satisfaction? Because my luck was bad; because I couldn't find many enough of 'em. How was his luck? Always good. Notice this! Always good! Ah! There's a many games, Miss Abbey, in which there's chance, but there's a many others in which there's skill too, mixed along with it."

"That Gaffer has a skill in finding what he finds, who doubts, man?" asked Miss Abbey.

"A skill in purwiding what he finds, perhaps," said Riderhood, shaking his evil head.

Miss Abbey knitted her brow at him, as he darkly leered at her.

"If you're out upon the river pretty nigh every tide, and if you want to find a man or woman in the river, you'll greatly help your luck, Miss Abbey, by knocking a man or woman on the head aforehand and pitching 'em in."

"Gracious Lud!" was the involuntary exclamation of Miss Potterson.

"Mind you!" returned the other, stretching forward over the half door to throw his words into the bar; for his voice was as if the head of his boat's mop were down his throat; "I say so, Miss Abbey! And mind you! I'll follow him up, Miss Abbey! And mind you! I'll bring him to book at last, if it's twenty year hence, I will! Who's he, to be favored along of his daughter? Ain't I got a daughter of my own!"

With that flourish, and seeming to have talked himself rather more drunk and much more ferocious than he had begun by being, Mr. Riderhood took up his pint pot and swaggered off to the tap-room.

Gaffer was not there, but a pretty strong muster of Miss Abbey's pupils were, who exhibited, when occasion required, the greatest docility. On the clock's striking ten, and Miss Abbey's appearing at the door, and addressing a certain person in a faded scarlet jacket, with "George Jones, your time's up! I told your wife you should be punctual," Jones submissively rose, gave the company good-night, and retired. At half-past ten, on Miss Abbey's looking in again, and saying, "William Williams, Bob Glamour, and Jonathan, you are all due," Williams, Bob, and Jonathan with similar meekness took their leave and evaporated. Greater wonder than these, when a bottle-nosed person in a glazed hat had after some considerable hesitation ordered another glass of gin and water of the attendant pot-boy, and when Miss Abbey, instead of sending it, appeared in person, saying, "Captain Joey, you have had as much as will do you good," not only did the captain feebly rub his knees and contemplate the fire without offering a word of protest, but the rest of the company murmured, "Ay, ay, Captain, Miss Abbey's right; you be guided by Miss Abbey, Captain." Nor was Miss Abbey's vigilance in anywise abated by this submission, but rather sharpened; for, looking round on the deferential faces of her school, and desiring two other young persons in need of admonition, she thus bestowed it: "Tom Tootle, it's time for a young fellow who's going to be married next month, to be at home and asleep. And you needn't nudge him, Mr. Jack Mullins, for I know your work begins early to-morrow, and I say the same to you. So come! Good-night, like good lads!" Upon which, the blushing Tootle looked to Mullins, and the blushing Mullins looked to Tootle, on the question who should rise first, and finally both rose together and went out on the broad grin, followed by Miss Abbey; in whose presence the company did not take the liberty of grinning likewise.

In such an establishment, the white-aproned pot-boy with his shirt-sleeves arranged in a tight roll on each bare shoulder, was a mere hint of the possibility of physical force, thrown out as a matter of state and form. Exactly at the closing hour, all the guests who were left filed out in the best order: Miss Abbey standing at the half door of the bar, to hold a ceremony of review and dismissal. All wished Miss Abbey good-night, and Miss Abbey wished good-night to all, except Riderhood. The sapient pot-boy, looking on officially, then had the conviction borne in upon his soul, that the man was evermore out-cast and excommunicate from the Six Jolly Fellowship-Porters.

"You Bob Glibbery," said Miss Abbey to this pot-boy, "run round to Hexam's and tell his daughter Lizzie that I want to speak to her."

With exemplary swiftness Bob Glibbery departed, and returned. Lizzie, following him, arrived as one of the two female domestics of the Fellowship-Porters arranged on the snug little table by the bar fire Miss Potterson's supper of hot sausages and mashed potatoes.

"Come in and sit ye down, girl," said Miss Abbey. "Can you eat a bit?"

"No thank you, Miss. I have had my supper."

"I have had mine too, I think," said Miss Abbey, pushing away the untasted dish, "and more than enough of it. I am put out, Lizzie."

"I am very sorry for it, Miss."

"Then why, in the name of Goodness," quoth Miss Abbey, sharply, "do you do it?"

"I do it, Miss!"

"There, there! Don't look astonished. I ought to have begun with a word of explanation, but it's my way to make short cuts at things. I always was a pepperer. You Bob Glibbery there, put the chain upon the door and get ye down to your supper."

With an alacrity that seemed no less referable to the pepperer fact than to the supper fact, Bob obeyed, and his boots were heard descending toward the bed of the river.

"Lizzie Hexam, Lizzie Hexam," then began Miss Potterson, "how often have I held out to you the opportunity of getting clear of your father, and doing well?"

"Very often, Miss."

"Very often? Yes! And I might as well have spoken to the iron funnel of the strongest sea-going steamer that passes the Fellowship-Porters."

"No, Miss," Lizzie pleaded: "because that would not be thankful, and I am."

"I vow and declare I am half-ashamed of myself for taking such an interest in you," said Miss Abbey, pettishly, "for I don't believe I should do it if you were not good-looking. Why ain't you ugly?"

Lizzie merely answered this difficult question with an apologetic glance.

"However, you ain't," resumed Miss Potterson, "so it's no use going into that. I must take you as I find you. Which indeed is what I've done. And you mean to say you are still obstinate?"

"Not obstinate, Miss, I hope."

"Firm (I suppose you call it) then?"

"Yes, Miss. Fixed like."

"Never was an obstinate person yet, who would own to the word!" remarked Miss Potterson, rubbing her vexed nose; "I'm sure I would, if I was obstinate; but I am a pepperer, which is different. Lizzie Hexam, Lizzie Hexam, think again. Do you know the worst of your father?"

"Do I know the worst of father!" she repeated, opening her eyes.

"Do you know the suspicions to which your father makes himself liable? Do you know the suspicions that are actually about, against him?"

The consciousness of what he habitually did oppressed the girl heavily, and she slowly cast down her eyes.

"Say, Lizzie. Do you know?" urged Miss Abbey.

"Please to tell me what the suspicions are, Miss," she asked after a silence, with her eyes upon the ground.

"It's not an easy thing to tell a daughter, but it must be told. It is thought by some, then, that your father helps to their death a few of those that he finds dead."

The relief of hearing what she felt sure was a false suspicion, in place of the expected real and true one, so lightened Lizzie's breast for the moment, that Miss Abbey was amazed at her demeanor. She raised her eyes quickly, shook her head, and, in a kind of triumph, almost laughed.

"They little know father who talk like that!"

("She takes it," thought Miss Abbey, "very quietly. She takes it with extraordinary quietness!")

"And perhaps," said Lizzie, as a recollection flashed upon her, "it is some one who has a grudge against father; some one who has threatened father! Is it Riderhood, Miss?"

"Well; yes it is."

"Yes! He was father's partner, and father broke with him, and now he revenges himself. Father broke with him when I was by, and he was very angry at it. And besides, Miss Abbey!—Will you never, without strong reason, let pass your lips what I am going to say?"

She bent forward to say it in a whisper.

"I promise," said Miss Abbey.

"It was on the night when the Harmon murder was found out, through father, just above bridge. And just below bridge, as we were sculling home, Riderhood crept out of the dark in his boat. And many and many times afterward, when such great pains were taken to come to the bottom of the crime, and it never could be come near, I thought in my own thoughts, could Riderhood himself have done the murder, and did he purposely let father find the body? It seemed a'most wicked and cruel to so much as think such a thing; but now that he tries to throw it upon father, I go back to it as if it was a truth. Can it be a truth? That was put into my mind by the dead?"

She asked this question rather of the fire than of the hostess of the Fellowship-Porters, and looked round the little bar with troubled eyes.

But, Miss Potterson, as a ready schoolmistress accustomed to bring her pupils to book, set the matter in a light that was essentially of this world.

"You poor deluded girl," she said, "don't you see that you can't open your mind to particular suspicions of one of the two, without opening your mind to general suspicions of the other? They had worked together. Their goings-on had been going on for some time. Even granting that it was as you have had in your thoughts, what the two had done together would come familiar to the mind of one."

"You don't know father, Miss, when you talk like that. Indeed, indeed, you don't know father."

"Lizzie, Lizzie," said Miss Potterson. "Leave him. You needn't break with him altogether, but leave him. Do well away from him; not because of what I have told you to-night—we'll pass no judgment upon that, and we'll hope it may not be—but because of what I have urged on you before. No matter whether it's owing to your good looks or not, I like you and I want to serve you. Lizzie, come under my direction. Don't fling yourself away, my girl, but be persuaded into being respectable and happy."

In the sound good feeling and good sense of her entreaty, Miss Abbey had softened into a soothing tone, and had even drawn her arm round the girl's waist. But she only replied, "Thank you, thank you! I can't. I won't. I must not think of it. The harder father is borne upon, the more he needs me to lean on."

And then Miss Abbey, who, like all hard people when they do soften, felt that there was considerable compensation owing to her, underwent reaction and became frigid.

"I have done what I can," she said, "and you must go your way. You make your bed, and you must lie on it. But tell your father one thing: he must not come here any more."

"Oh, Miss, will you forbid him the house where I know he's safe?"

"The Fellowships," returned Miss Abbey, "has itself to look to, as well as others. It has been hard work to establish order here, and make the Fellowships what it is, and it is daily and nightly hard work to keep it so. The Fellowships must not have a taint upon it that may give it a bad name. I forbid the house to Riderhood, and I forbid the house to Gaffer. I forbid both, equally. I find from Riderhood and you together, that there are suspicions against both men, and I'm not going to take upon myself to decide betwixt them. They are both tarred with a dirty brush, and I can't have the Fellowships tarred with the same brush. That's all I know."

"Good-night, Miss!" said Lizzie Hexam, sorrowfully.

"Hah!—Good-night!" returned Miss Abbey with a shake of her head.

"Believe me, Miss Abbey, I am truly grateful all the same."

"I can believe a good deal," returned the stately Abbey, "so I'll try to believe that too, Lizzie."

No supper did Miss Potterson take that night, and only half her usual tumbler of hot Port Negus. And the female domestics—two robust sisters, with staring black eyes, shining flat red faces, blunt noses, and strong black curls, like dolls—interchanged the sentiment that Missis had had her hair combed the wrong way by somebody. And the pot-boy afterward remarked, that he hadn't been "so rattled to bed" since his late mother had systematically accelerated his retirement to rest with a poker.

The chaining of the door behind her, as she went forth, disenchanted Lizzie Hexam of that first relief she had felt. The night was black and shrill, the river-side wilderness was melancholy, and there was a sound of casting-out, in the rattling of the iron-links, and the grating of the bolts and staples under Miss Abbey's hand. As she came beneath the lowering sky, a sense of being involved in a murky shade of Murder dropped upon her; and, as the tidal swell of the river broke at her feet without her seeing how it gathered, so, her thoughts startled her by rushing out of an unseen void and striking at her heart.

Of her father's being groundlessly suspected, she felt sure. Sure. Sure. And yet, repeat the word inwardly as often as she would, the attempt to reason out and prove that she was sure, always came after it and failed. Riderhood had done the deed, and entrapped her father. Riderhood had not done the deed, but had resolved in his malice to turn against her father the appearances that were ready to his hand to distort. Equally and swiftly upon either putting of the case, followed the frightful possibility that her father, being innocent, yet might come to be believed guilty. She had heard of people suffering Death for bloodshed of which they were afterward proved pure, and those ill-fated persons were not, first, in that dangerous wrong in which her father stood. Then at the best, the beginning of his being set apart, whispered against, and avoided, was a certain fact. It dated from that very night. And as the great black river with its dreary shores was soon lost to her view in the gloom, so, she stood on the river's brink unable to see into the vast blank misery of a life suspected, and fallen away from by good and bad, but knowing that it lay there dim before her, stretching away to the great ocean, Death.

One thing only was clear to the girl's mind. Accustomed from her very babyhood promptly to do the thing that could be done—whether to keep out weather, to ward off cold, to postpone hunger, or what not—she started out of her meditation, and ran home.

The room was quiet, and the lamp burnt on the table. In the bunk in the corner her brother lay asleep. She bent over him softly, kissed him, and came to the table.

"By the time of Miss Abbey's closing, and by the run of the tide, it must be one. Tide's running up. Father at Chiswick, wouldn't think of coming down, till after the turn, and that's at half after four. I'll call Charley at six. I shall hear the church-clocks strike, as I sit here."

Very quietly she placed a chair before the scanty fire, and sat down in it, drawing her shawl about her.

"Charley's hollow down by the flare is not there now. Poor Charley!"

The clock struck two, and the clock struck three, and the clock struck four, and she remained there, with a woman's patience and her own purpose. When the morning was well on between four and five, she slipped off her shoes (that her going about might not wake Charley), trimmed the fire sparingly, put water on to boil, and set the table for breakfast. Then she went up the ladder, lamp in hand, and came down again, and glided about and about, making a little bundle. Lastly, from her pocket, and from the chimney-piece, and from an inverted basin on the highest shelf, she brought half-pence, a few sixpences, fewer shillings, and fell to laboriously and noiselessly counting them, and setting aside one little heap. She was still so engaged, when she was startled by:

"Hal-loa!" From her brother, sitting up in bed.

"You made me jump, Charley."

"Jump! Didn't you make me jump, when I opened my eyes a moment ago, and saw you sitting there, like the ghost of a girl-miser, in the dead of the night?"

"It's not the dead of the night, Charley. It's nigh six in the morning."

"Is it though? But what are you up to, Liz?"

"Still telling your fortune, Charley."

"It seems to be a precious small one, if that's it," said the boy. "What are you putting that little pile of money by itself for?"

"For you, Charley."

"What do you mean?"

"Get out of bed, Charley, and get washed and dressed, and then I'll tell you."

Her composed manner, and her low distinct voice, always had an influence over him. His head was soon in a basin of water, and out of it again, and staring at her through a storm of toweling.

"I never," toweling at himself as if he were his bitterest enemy, "saw such a girl as you are. What is the move, Liz?"

"Are you almost ready for breakfast, Charley?"

"You can pour it out. Hal-loa! I say? And a bundle?"

"And a bundle, Charley."

"You don't mean it's for me, too?"

"Yes, Charley; I do, indeed."

More serious of face, and more slow of action, than he had been, the boy completed his dressing, and came and sat down at the little breakfast-table, with his eyes amazedly directed to her face.

"You see, Charley dear, I have made up my mind that this is the right time for your going away from us. Over and above all the blessed change of by-and-by, you'll be much happier, and do much better, even so soon as next month. Even so soon as next week."

"How do you know I shall?"

"I don't quite know how, Charley, but I do." In spite of her unchanged manner of speaking, and her unchanged appearance of composure, she scarcely trusted herself to look at him, but kept her eyes employed on the cutting and buttering of his bread, and on the mixing of his tea, and other such little preparations. "You must leave father to me, Charley—I will do what I can with him—but you must go."

"You don't stand upon ceremony, I think," grumbled the boy, throwing his bread and butter about, in an ill-humor.

She made him no answer.

"I tell you what," said the boy, then, bursting out into an angry whimpering, "you're a selfish jade, and you think there's not enough for three of us, and you want to get rid of me."

"If you believe so, Charley,—yes, then I believe too, that I am a selfish jade, and that I think there's not enough for three of us, and that I want to get rid of you."

It was only when the boy rushed at her, and threw his arms round her neck, that she lost her self-restraint. But she lost it then, and wept over him.

"Don't cry, don't cry! I am satisfied to go, Liz; I am satisfied to go. I know you send me away for my good."

"O, Charley, Charley, Heaven above us knows I do!"

"Yes, yes. Don't mind what I said. Don't remember it. Kiss me."

After a silence, she loosed him, to dry her eyes and regain her strong quiet influence.

"Now listen, Charley dear. We both know it must be done, and I alone know there is good reason for its being done at once. Go straight to the school, and say that you and I agreed upon it—that we can't overcome father's opposition—that father will never trouble them, but will never take you back. You are a credit to the school, and you will be a greater credit to it yet, and they will help you to get a living. Show what clothes you have brought, and what money, and say that I will send some more money. If I can get some in no other way, I will ask a little help of those two gentlemen who came here that night."

"I say!" cried her brother, quickly. "Don't you have it of that chap that took hold of me by the chin! Don't you have it of that Wrayburn one!"

Perhaps a slight additional tinge of red flashed up into her face and brow, as with a nod she laid a hand upon his lips to keep him silently attentive.

"And above all things mind this, Charley! Be sure you always speak well of father. Be sure you always give father his full due. You can't deny that because father has no learning himself he is set against it in you; but favor nothing else against him, and be sure you say—as you know—that your sister is devoted to him. And if you should ever happen to hear any thing said against father that is new to you, it will not be true. Remember, Charley! It will not be true."

The boy looked at her with some doubt and surprise, but she went on again without heeding it.

"Above all things remember! It will not be true. I have nothing more to say, Charley dear, except, be good, and get learning, and only think of some things in the old life here, as if you had dreamed them in a dream last night. Good-by, my Darling!"

Though so young, she infused into these parting words a love that was far more like a mother's than a sister's, and before which the boy was quite bowed down. After holding her to his breast with a passionate cry, he took up his bundle and darted out at the door, with an arm across his eyes.

The white face of the winter day came sluggishly on, veiled in a frosty mist; and the shadowy ships in the river slowly changed to black substances; and the sun, blood-red on the eastern marshes behind dark masts and yards, seemed filled with the ruins of a forest it had set on fire. Lizzie, looking for her father, saw him coming, and stood upon the causeway that he might see her.

He had nothing with him but his boat, and came on apace. A knot of those amphibious human-creatures who appear to have some mysterious power of extracting a subsistence out of tidal water by looking at it, were gathered together about the causeway. As her father's boat grounded, they became contemplative of the mud, and dispersed themselves. She saw that the mute avoidance had begun.

Gaffer saw it, too, in so far as that he was moved when he set foot on shore, to stare around him. But, he promptly set to work to haul up his boat, and make her fast, and take the sculls and rudder and rope out of her. Carrying these with Lizzie's aid, he passed up to his dwelling.

"Sit close to the fire, father, dear, while I cook your breakfast. It's all ready for cooking, and only been waiting for you. You must be frozen."

"Well, Lizzie, I ain't of a glow; that's certain. And my hands seemed nailed through to the sculls. See how dead they are!" Something suggestive in their color, and perhaps in her face, struck him as he held them up; he turned his shoulder and held them down to the fire.

"You were not out in the perishing night, I hope, father?"

"No, my dear. Lay aboard a barge, by a blazing coal-fire.—Where's that boy?"

"There's a drop of brandy for your tea, father, if you'll put it in while I turn this bit of meat. If the river was to get frozen, there would be a deal of distress; wouldn't there, father?"

"Ah! there's always enough of that," said Gaffer, dropping the liquor into his cup from a squat black bottle, and dropping it slowly that it might seem more; "distress is forever a-going about, like sut in the air—Ain't that boy up yet?"

"The meat's ready now, father. Eat it while it's hot and comfortable. After you have finished, we'll turn round to the fire and talk."

But, he perceived that he was evaded, and, having thrown a hasty angry glance toward the bunk, plucked at a corner of her apron and asked:

"What's gone with that boy?"

"Father, if you'll begin your breakfast, I'll sit by and tell you."

He looked at her, stirred his tea and took two or three gulps, then cut at his piece of hot steak with his case-knife, and said, eating:

"Now then. What's gone with that boy?"

"Don't be angry, dear. It seems, father, that he has quite a gift of learning."

"Unnat'ral young beggar!" said the parent, shaking his knife in the air.

"—And that having this gift, and not being equally good at other things, he has made shift to get some schooling."

"Unnat'ral young beggar!" said the parent again, with his former action.

"—And that knowing you have nothing to spare, father, and not wishing to be a burden on you, he gradually made up his mind to go seek his fortune out of learning. He went away this morning, father, and he cried very much at going, and he hoped you would forgive him."

"Let him never come a nigh me to ask me my forgiveness," said the father, again emphasizing his words with the knife. "Let him never come within sight of my eyes, nor yet within reach of my arm. His own father ain't good enough for him. He's disowned his own father. His own father therefore disowns him for ever and ever, as a unnat'ral young beggar."

He had pushed away his plate. With the natural need of a strong rough man in anger, to do something forcible, he now clutched his knife overhand, and struck downward with it at the end of every succeeding sentence. As he would have struck with his own clenched fist if there had chanced to be nothing in it.

"He's welcome to go. He's more welcome to go than to stay. But let him never come back. Let him never put his head inside that door. And let you never speak a word more in his favor, or you'll disown your own father, likewise, and what your father says of him he'll have to come to say of you. Now I see why them men yonder held aloof from me. They says to one another, 'Here comes the man as ain't good enough for his own son!' Lizzie—!"

But, she stopped him with a cry. Looking at her he saw her, with a face quite strange to him, shrinking back against the wall, with her hands before her eyes.

"Father, don't! I can't bear to see you striking with it. Put it down!"

He looked at the knife; but in his astonishment still held it.

"Father, it's too horrible. O put it down, put it down!"

Confounded by her appearance and exclamation, he tossed it away, and stood up with his open hands held out before him.

"What's come to you, Liz? Can you think I would strike at you with a knife?"

"No, father, no; you would never hurt me."

"What should I hurt?"

"Nothing, dear father. On my knees, I am certain, in my heart and soul I am certain, nothing! But it was too dreadful to bear; for it looked—" her hands covering her face again, "O it looked—"

"What did it look like?"

The recollection of his murderous figure, combining with her trial of last night, and her trial of the morning, caused her to drop at his feet, without having answered.

He had never seen her so before. He raised her with the utmost tenderness, calling her the best of daughters, and "my poor pretty creetur," and laid her head upon his knee, and tried to restore her. But failing, he laid her head gently down again, got a pillow and placed it under her dark hair, and sought on the table for a spoonful of brandy. There being none left, he hurriedly caught up the empty bottle, and ran out at the door.

He returned as hurriedly as he had gone, with the bottle still empty. He kneeled down by her, took her head on his arm, and moistened her lips with a little water into which he dipped his fingers: saying, fiercely, as he looked around, now over this shoulder, now over that:

"Have we got a pest in the house? Is there summ'at deadly sticking to my clothes? What's let loose upon us? Who loosed it?"

CHAPTER VII.

MR. WEGG LOOKS AFTER HIMSELF.

SILAS WEGG, being on his road to the Roman Empire, approaches it by way of Clerkenwell. The time is early in the evening; the weather moist and raw. Mr. Wegg finds leisure to make a little circuit, by reason that he folds his screen early, now that he combines another source of income with it, and also that he feels it due to himself to be anxiously expected at the Bower. "Boffin will get all the eagerer for waiting a bit," says Silas, screwing up, as he stumps along, first his right eye, and then his left. Which is something superfluous in him, for Nature has already screwed both pretty tight.

"If I get on with him as I expect to get on," Silas pursues, stumping and meditating, "it wouldn't become me to leave it here. It wouldn't be respectable." Animated by this reflection, he stumps faster, and looks a long way before him, as a man with an ambitious project in abeyance often will do.

Aware of a working-jeweler population taking sanctuary about the church in Clerkenwell, Mr. Wegg is conscious of an interest in, and a respect for, the neighborhood. But, his sensations in this regard halt as to their strict morality, as he halts in his gait; for, they suggest the delights of a coat of invisibility in which to walk off safely with the precious stones and watch-cases, but stop short of any compunction for the people who would lose the same.

Not, however, toward the "shops" where cunning artificers work in pearls and diamonds and gold and silver, making their hands so rich, that the enriched water in which they wash them is bought for the refiners;—not toward these does Mr. Wegg stump, but toward the poorer shops of small retail traders in commodities to eat and drink and keep folks warm, and of Italian framemakers, and of barbers, and of brokers, and of dealers in dogs and singing-birds. From these, in a narrow and a dirty street devoted to such callings, Mr. Wegg selects one dark shop-window with a tallow-candle dimly burning in it, surrounded by a muddle of objects vaguely resembling pieces of leather and dry stick, but among which nothing is resolvable into any thing distinct, save the candle itself in its old tin candlestick, and two preserved frogs fighting a smallsword duel. Stumping with fresh vigor, he goes in at the dark greasy entry, pushes a little greasy dark reluctant side-door, and follows the door into the little dark greasy shop. It is so dark that nothing can be made out in it, over a little counter, but another tallow-candle in another old tin candlestick, close to the face of a man stooping low in a chair.

Mr. Wegg nods to the face, "Good-evening."

The face looking up is a sallow face with weak eyes, surmounted by a tangle of reddish-dusty hair. The owner of the face has no cravat on, and has opened his tumbled shirt-collar to work with the more ease. For the same reason he has no coat on: only a loose waistcoat over his yellow linen. His eyes are like the over-tried eyes of an engraver, but he is not that; his expression and stoop are like those of a shoemaker, but he is not that.

"Good-evening, Mr. Venus. Don't you remember?"

With slowly dawning remembrance Mr. Venus rises, and holds his candle over the little counter, and holds it down toward the legs, natural and artificial, of Mr. Wegg.

"To be sure!" he says, then. "How do you do?"

"Wegg, you know," that gentleman explains.

"Yes, yes," says the other. "Hospital amputation?"

"Just so," says Mr. Wegg.

"Yes, yes," quoth Venus. "How do you do? Sit down by the fire, and warm your—your other one."

The little counter being so short a counter that it leaves the fire-place, which would have been behind it if it had been longer, accessible, Mr. Wegg sits down on a box in front of the fire, and inhales a warm and comfortable smell which is not the smell of the shop. "For that," Mr. Wegg inwardly decides, as he takes a corrective sniff or two, "is musty, leathery, feathery, cellary, gluey, gummy, and," with another sniff, "as it might be, strong of old pairs of bellows."

"My tea is drawing, and my muffin is on the hob, Mr. Wegg; will you partake?"

It being one of Mr. Wegg's guiding rules in life always to partake, he says he will. But, the little shop is so excessively dark, is stuck so full of black shelves and brackets and nooks and corners, that he sees Mr. Venus's cup and saucer only because it is close under the candle, and does not see from what mysterious recess Mr. Venus produces another for himself, until it is under his nose. Concurrently, Wegg perceives a pretty little dead bird lying on the counter, with its head drooping on one side against the rim of Mr. Venus's saucer, and a long stiff wire piercing its breast. As if it were Cock Robin, the hero of the ballad, and Mr. Venus were the sparrow with his bow and arrow, and Mr. Wegg were the fly with his little eye.

Mr. Venus dives, and produces another muffin, yet untoasted; taking the arrow out of the breast of Cock Robin, he proceeds to toast it on the end of that cruel instrument. When it is brown, he dives again and produces butter, with which he completes his work.

Mr. Wegg, as an artful man who is sure of his supper by-and-by, presses muffin on his host to soothe him into a compliant state of mind, or, as one might say, to grease his works. As the muffins disappear, little by little, the black shelves and nooks and corners begin to appear, and Mr. Wegg gradually acquires an imperfect notion that over against him on the chimney-piece is a Hindoo baby in a bottle, curved up with his big head tucked under him, as though he would instantly throw a somersault if the bottle were large enough.

When he deems Mr. Venus's wheels sufficiently lubricated, Mr. Wegg approaches his object by asking, as he lightly taps his hands together, to express an undesigning frame of mind:

"And how have I been going on, this long time, Mr. Venus?"

"Very bad," says Mr. Venus, uncompromisingly.

"What? Am I still at home?" asks Wegg, with an air of surprise.

"Always at home."

This would seem to be secretly agreeable to Wegg, but he veils his feelings, and observes, "Strange. To what do you attribute it?"

"I don't know," replies Venus, who is a haggard melancholy man, speaking in a weak voice of querulous complaint, "to what to attribute it, Mr. Wegg. I can't work you into a miscellaneous one, nohow. Do what I will, you can't be got to fit. Any body with a passable knowledge would pick you out at a look, and say,—'No go! Don't match!'"

"Well, but hang it, Mr. Venus," Wegg expostulates with some little irritation, "that can't be personal and peculiar in me. It must often happen with miscellaneous ones."

"With ribs (I grant you) always. But not else. When I prepare a miscellaneous one, I know beforehand that I can't keep to nature, and be miscellaneous with ribs, because every man has his own ribs, and no other man's will go with them; but elseways I can be miscellaneous. I have just sent home a Beauty—a perfect Beauty—to a school of art. One leg Belgian, one leg English, and the pickings of eight other people in it. Talk of not being qualified to be miscellaneous! By rights you ought to be, Mr. Wegg."

Silas looks as hard at his one leg as he can in the dim light, and after a pause sulkily opines "that it must be the fault of the other people. Or how do you mean to say it comes about?" he demands impatiently.

"I don't know how it comes about. Stand up a minute. Hold the light." Mr. Venus takes from a corner by his chair the bones of a leg and foot, beautifully pure, and put together with exquisite neatness. These he compares with Mr. Wegg's leg; that gentleman looking on, as if he were being measured for a riding-boot. "No, I don't know how it is, but so it is. You have got a twist in that bone, to the best of my belief. I never saw the likes of you."

Mr. Wegg having looked distrustfully at his own limb, and suspiciously at the pattern with which it has been compared, makes the point:

"I'll bet a pound that ain't an English one!"

"An easy wager, when we run so much into foreign! No, it belongs to that French gentleman."

As he nods toward a point of darkness behind Mr. Wegg, the latter, with a slight start, looks round for "that French gentleman," whom he at length describes to be represented (in a very workman-like manner) by his ribs only, standing on a shelf in another corner, like a piece of armor or a pair of stays.

"Oh!" says Mr. Wegg, with a sort of sense of being introduced; "I dare say you were all right enough in your own country, but I hope no objections will be taken to my saying that the Frenchman was never yet born as I should wish to match."

At this moment the greasy door is violently pushed inward, and a boy follows it, who says, after having let it slam:

"Come for the stuffed canary."

"It's three and ninepence," returns Venus; "have you got the money?"

The boy produces four shillings. Mr. Venus, always in exceedingly low spirits and making whimpering sounds, peers about for the stuffed canary. On his taking the candle to assist his search, Mr. Wegg observes that he has a convenient little shelf near his knees, exclusively appropriated to skeleton hands, which have very much the appearance of wanting to lay hold of him. From these Mr. Venus rescues the canary in a glass case, and shows it to the boy.

"There!" he whimpers. "There's animation! On a twig, making up his mind to hop! Take care of him; he's a lovely specimen.—And three is four."

The boy gathers up his change, and has pulled the door open by a leather strap nailed to it for the purpose, when Venus cries out:

"Stop him! Come back, you young villain! You've got a tooth among them half-pence."

"How was I to know I'd got it? You giv it me. I don't want none of your teeth; I've got enough of my own." So the boy pipes, as he selects it from his change, and throws it on the counter.

"Don't sauce me, in the vicious pride of your youth," Mr. Venus retorts pathetically. "Don't hit me because you see I'm down. I'm low enough without that. It dropped into the till, I suppose. They drop into every thing. There was two in the coffee-pot at breakfast-time. Molars."

"Very well, then," argues the boy, "what do you call names for?"

To which Mr. Venus only replies, shaking his shock of dusty hair, and winking his weak eyes, "Don't sauce me, in the vicious pride of your youth; don't hit me, because you see I'm down. You've no idea how small you'd come out, if I had the articulating of you."

This consideration seems to have its effect on the boy, for he goes out grumbling.

"Oh dear me, dear me!" sighs Mr. Venus, heavily, snuffing the candle, "the world that appeared so flowery has ceased to blow! You're casting your eye round the shop, Mr. Wegg. Let me show you a light. My working-bench. My young man's bench. A Wice. Tools. Bones, various. Skulls, various. Preserved Indian baby. African ditto. Bottled preparations, various. Every thing within reach of your hand, in good preservation. The mouldy ones atop. What's in those hampers over them again, I don't quite remember. Say, human various. Cats. Articulated English baby. Dogs. Ducks. Glass eyes, various. Mummied bird. Dried cuticle, various. Oh, dear me! That's the general panoramic view."

Having so held and waved the candle as that all these heterogeneous objects seemed to come forward obediently when they were named, and then retire again, Mr. Venus despondently repeats, "Oh dear me, dear me!" resumes his seat, and with drooping despondency upon him, falls to pouring himself out more tea.

"Where am I?" asks Mr. Wegg.

"You're somewhere in the back shop across the yard, Sir; and speaking quite candidly, I wish I'd never bought you of the Hospital Porter."

"Now, look here, what did you give for me?"

"Well," replies Venus, blowing his tea: his head and face peering out of the darkness, over the smoke of it, as if he were modernizing the old original rise in his family: "you were one of a various lot, and I don't know."

Silas puts his point in the improved form of "What will you take for me?"

"Well," replies Venus, still blowing his tea, "I'm not prepared, at a moment's notice, to tell you, Mr. Wegg."

"Come! According to your own account I'm not worth much," Wegg reasons persuasively.

"Not for miscellaneous working in, I grant you, Mr. Wegg; but you might turn out valuable yet, as a—" here Mr. Venus takes a gulp of tea, so hot that it makes him choke, and sets his weak eyes watering; "as a Monstrosity, if you'll excuse me."

Repressing an indignant look, indicative of any thing but a disposition to excuse him, Silas pursues his point.

"I think you know me, Mr. Venus, and I think you know I never bargain."

Mr. Venus takes gulps of hot tea, shutting his eyes at every gulp, and opening them again in a spasmodic manner; but does not commit himself to assent.

"I have a prospect of getting on in life and elevating myself by my own independent exertions," says Wegg, feelingly, "and I shouldn't like—I tell you openly I should not like—under such circumstances, to be what I may call dispersed, a part of me here, and a part of me there, but should wish to collect myself like a gentle person."

"It's a prospect at present, is it, Mr. Wegg? Then you haven't got the money for a deal about you? Then I'll tell you what I'll do with you; I'll hold you over. I am a man of my word, and you needn't be afraid of my disposing of you. I'll hold you over. That's a promise. Oh dear me, dear me!"

Fain to accept his promise, and wishing to propitiate him, Mr. Wegg looks on as he sighs and pours himself out more tea, and then says, trying to get a sympathetic tone into his voice:

"You seem very low, Mr. Venus. Is business bad?"

"Never was so good."

"Is your hand out at all?"

"Never was so well in. Mr. Wegg, I'm not only first in the trade, but I'm the trade. You may go and buy a skeleton at the West End if you like, and pay the West End price, but it'll be my putting together. I've as much to do as I can possibly do, with the assistance of my young man, and I take a pride and a pleasure in it."

Mr. Venus thus delivers himself, his right hand extended, his smoking saucer in his left hand, protesting as though he were going to burst into a flood of tears.

"That ain't a state of things to make you low, Mr. Venus."

"Mr. Wegg, I know it ain't. Mr. Wegg, not to name myself as a workman without an equal, I've gone on improving myself in my knowledge of Anatomy, till both by sight and by name I'm perfect. Mr. Wegg, if you was brought here loose in a bag to be articulated, I'd name your smallest bones blindfold equally with your largest, as fast as I could pick 'em out, and I'd sort 'em all, and sort your vertebrae, in a manner that would equally surprise and charm you."

"Well," remarks Silas (though not quite so readily as last time), "that ain't a state of things to be low about.—Not for you to be low about, leastways."

"Mr. Wegg, I know it ain't; Mr. Wegg, I know it ain't. But it's the heart that lowers me, it is the heart! Be so good as take and read that card out loud."

Silas receives one from his hand, which Venus takes from a wonderful litter in a drawer, and putting on his spectacles, reads:

"'Mr. Venus,'"

"Yes. Go on."

"'Preserver of Animals and Birds,'"

"Yes. Go on."

"'Articulator of human bones.'"

"That's it," with a groan. "That's it! Mr. Wegg, I'm thirty-two, and a bachelor. Mr. Wegg, I love her. Mr. Wegg, she is worthy of being loved by a Potentate!" Here Silas is rather alarmed by Mr. Venus's springing to his feet in the hurry of his spirits, and haggardly confronting him with his hand on his coat collar; but Mr. Venus, begging pardon, sits down again, saying, with the calmness of despair, "She objects to the business."

"Does she know the profits of it?"

"She knows the profits of it, but she don't appreciate the art of it, and she objects to it. 'I do not wish,' she writes in her own handwriting, 'to regard myself, nor yet to be regarded, in that boney light.'"

Mr. Venus pours himself out more tea, with a look and in an attitude of the deepest desolation.

"And so a man climbs to the top of the tree, Mr. Wegg, only to see that there's no look-out when he's up there! I sit here of a night surrounded by the lovely trophies of my art, and what have they done for me? Ruined me. Brought me to the pass of being informed that 'she does not wish to regard herself, nor yet to be regarded, in that boney light!'" Having repeated the fatal expressions, Mr. Venus drinks more tea by gulps, and offers an explanation of his doing so.

"It lowers me. When I'm equally lowered all over, lethargy sets in. By sticking to it till one or two in the morning, I get oblivion. Don't let me detain you, Mr. Wegg. I'm not company for any one."

"It is not on that account," says Silas, rising, "but because I've got an appointment. It's time I was at Harmon's."

"Eh?" said Mr. Venus. "Harmon's, up Battle Bridge way?"

Mr. Wegg admits that he is bound for that port.

"You ought to be in a good thing, if you've worked yourself in there. There's lots of money going, there."

"To think," says Silas, "that you should catch it up so quick, and know about it. Wonderful!"

"Not at all, Mr. Wegg. The old gentleman wanted to know the nature and worth of every thing that was found in the dust; and many's the bone, and feather, and what not, that he's brought to me."

"Really, now!"

"Yes. (Oh dear me, dear me!) And he's buried quite in this neighborhood, you know. Over yonder."

Mr. Wegg does not know, but he makes as if he did, by responsively nodding his head. He also follows with his eyes the toss of Venus's head: as if to seek a direction to over yonder.

"I took an interest in that discovery in the river," says Venus. "(She hadn't written her cutting refusal at that time.) I've got up there—never mind, though."

He had raised the candle at arm's-length toward one of the dark shelves, and Mr. Wegg had turned to look, when he broke off.

"The old gentleman was well known all round here. There used to be stories about his having hidden all kinds of property in those dust mounds. I suppose there was nothing in 'em. Probably you know, Mr. Wegg?"

"Nothing in 'em," says Wegg, who has never heard a word of this before.

"Don't let me detain you. Good-night!"

The unfortunate Mr. Venus gives him a shake of the hand with a shake of his own head, and drooping down in his chair, proceeds to pour himself out more tea. Mr. Wegg, looking back over his shoulder as he pulls the door open by the strap, notices that the movement so shakes the crazy shop, and so shakes a momentary flare out of the candle, as that the babies—Hindoo, African, and British—the "human wariious," the French gentleman, the green glass-eyed cats, the dogs, the ducks, and all the rest of the collection, show for an instant as if paralytically animated; while even poor little Cock Robin at Mr. Venus's elbow turns over on his innocent side. Next moment, Mr. Wegg is stumping under the gaslights and through the mud.

THE CONTRAST.

WE sit at home, nor feel that they
Who fight upon the distant plain
Are falling faster day by day,
A harvest of the slain.

We lightly walk the busy street,
Where trade and gain roll swiftly on;
They march a battle-field to greet,
And die as it is won.

The trumpet calls them in the night
To die for Freedom; and the boom
Of cannon from the fortified height
Still calls them to their doom.

Unmoved we read of how they fell
To shield the starry flag from shame;
Dauntless through storms of shot and shell
In the red battle's flame!

Brave hearts are beating for us there
Amid the conflict's feverish breath:
This hour, what soldier's hurried prayer
Is said for you, in death.

They lie upon the lonely hill
Or blackened plain in dreamless sleep.
Their rest eternal! Never will
They wake, like us, to weep.

We rise each day to weary toil
And hourly strife—their work is done!
Their blood will consecrate the soil
Their lives so nobly won.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 20th of May. The military operations of the preceding month have been of such decided importance as almost entirely to engross public attention.

In the extreme South and Southwest the results have been decidedly unfavorable to the Union arms. The accompanying Map shows the region of the Red River, the scene of the disastrous failure of the expedition under General Banks. As noted in our previous Records, General A. J. Smith left Vicksburg on the 10th of March, entered the Red River, and captured Fort De Russey. Admiral Porter followed with a strong naval force, and took possession of Alexandria. Banks, with a strong force, proceeded by land. Then followed the actions at Cane River and Pleasant Hill, and the retreat of our forces to Grand Ecore, as noted in our last Record. The river was now falling rapidly, and the water was lower than has been known at that season for years. The gun-boats were detained by low-water above the rapids at Alexandria, several transports having been destroyed on the passage down to that point, where at the last accounts a large force was engaged in damming the river, so as to give sufficient depth to suffer the boats to pass the obstruction and regain the Mississippi. The army in the mean while continued its retreat from Grand Ecore to Alexandria, where it was at the latest date, May 4. While these operations were going on upon the Red River, a strong auxiliary expedition, under General Steele, had set out from Little Rock, Arkansas, with the design of uniting with Banks's column at Shreveport. About half the distance had been accomplished when intelligence reached him, at Camden, Arkansas, of the failure of Banks to reach Shreveport. He at once commenced his retreat, which was greatly harassed by the enemy, and his main column was compelled to destroy his trains and every bridge behind him. On the 30th of April, while crossing the Saline River, he was attacked by a body of the enemy under General Fagan; but the assault was repulsed. A portion of the enemy's cavalry, however, crossed the river above, and hurried on toward Little Rock, hoping to take it by surprise while the Union forces were at a distance; the movement was, however, unsuccessful. A train returning to Pine Bluff, under command of Colonel Drake, with an escort of three regiments, was attacked by a superior force of the enemy and captured. We lost nearly 2000 prisoners, four guns, and 240 wagons.—General Canby, lately in command of the fortifications at New York, has been appointed to the command of all the forces west of the Mississippi.

Another disaster has occurred to our arms in North Carolina. On the 17th of April a large body of the Confederates marched upon Plymouth, upon Albemarle Sound, near the mouth of the Roanoke River, which was held by our forces under General Wessels. A furious attack was made upon Fort Gray, its principal defense, which was repelled by the garrison, aided by the gun-boats. On the 18th four of the enemy's gun-boats and an iron-clad ram came down the Roanoke, passed the fort in the night, and attacked our fleet. Two of our boats, the Southfield and the Bombshell, were lost. The shots fired at the ram apparently inflicted no serious damage. The attack upon Plymouth was then resumed; the town itself was abandoned, the troops retiring into Fort Williams, which was assailed by storm, and captured after a desperate contest. The captures were about 1500 men. Among the garrison were two companies of North Carolina Volunteers, and a number of colored troops. It is said that the volunteers and the negroes were shot after surrender. This statement is, however, not confirmed with the same certainty as is the similar transaction at Fort Pillow, noted in our last Record.

Several minor engagements of no great importance have taken place in various quarters. But the main interest of the month has been concentrated upon the operations of the Army of the Potomac, which, under the immediate direction of Lieutenant-General Grant, has undertaken a forward movement against the Confederate army under General Lee, and toward Richmond.

The Union army had been concentrated near Culpepper Court House, about ten miles from the northern bank of the Rapidan; the Confederate army was mainly at Orange Court House, about twenty miles south, ten miles from the south bank of the Rapidan: the outposts and pickets of both armies reaching that stream, on either side. The order for the advance of our army was given on the morning of Tuesday, May 3. The crossing was effected during the day and the following night, mainly at Germanna and Ely's Fords, twelve and eighteen miles east of Culpepper. Instead of marching directly south upon Lee's strong position at Orange, and the intrenchments on Mine River a few miles distant, which Meade had found in November too strong to be assailed, and which were now doubtless still stronger, Grant's plan was to turn them upon their right; that is, to the east, and thus throw himself between these positions and Richmond. The effect of this movement would be that Lee must either come out of his intrenchments and defeat this advance upon open ground, or fall back toward Richmond. This line of advance would compel Grant to traverse the region locally known as the "Wilderness."

The "Wilderness" is a broken, sterile tract of country in Spottsylvania County, commencing not far from the south bank of the Rapidan, and stretching ten or fifteen miles in each direction. The region is intersected in every direction by gullies and ravines of no great depth, but with steep sides, interspersed here and there with swamps. The low hills and swells are covered with a thick growth of stunted pines, dwarf oaks, and underbrush, hardly reaching the height of a man, but so dense as to be almost impenetrable. The roads which straggle here and there, crossing and recrossing, are, with one or two exceptions, mere paths, impassable for the rudest vehicle even in good weather, and converted into quagmires by a few hours' rain. Here and there, at the intersection of these roads, is a tavern or store, with half a dozen rude dwellings grouped around it. Besides these, and here and there a solitary dwelling, the whole tract is almost bare of inhabitants. Chancellorsville, where the Army of the Potomac under Hooker suffered defeat in May, 1863, is near the eastern edge of this tract. The main action in that series of encounters is called by the Confederates "the Battle of the Wilderness." Across this desolate region Grant's army must pass in order to carry out the design of turning the works at Mine Run. That it would be attacked by the Confederates, whose intimate knowledge of the region would give them a decided advantage, was a probability which had to be taken into consideration in venturing upon the movement.

The army under the immediate lead of General Meade, Major-General Commanding—Lieutenant-General Grant, who accompanied it, taking the general direction of the whole series of combined movements—crossed the Rapidan in the course of Wednesday, May 4. The passage was made mainly in pontoon bridges, which had been thrown across during the previous night. It was effected without opposition, apparently before the enemy, some miles distant, were aware of the intention. The Fifth Corps, under Warren, and the Sixth, under Sedgwick, crossed at Germanna Ford; the Second, under Hancock, crossed at Ely's Ford; the Ninth, under Burnside, being held in reserve on the north bank. The army moved in light marching order, carrying six days' rations, leaving its train to follow after. That night the army encamped beyond the south bank of the Rapidan.

Early on Thursday morning, May 5, the line of march was taken up through the Wilderness. Lee being within striking distance, it was necessary to assume and maintain a line of battle fronting toward him—that is, toward the west—while the army at the same time pressed slowly southward. The line thus would have assumed a northwest and southeast direction, and according to the dispositions ordered, Sedgwick would have held the right, toward the northwest, Hancock the left, and Warren the centre. The movement had hardly begun, and the corps had only partly assumed their positions—the gap between Sedgwick and Hancock not having been filled by Warren—when it became evident that the enemy were approaching in force. Lee had chosen to dispute the turning rather than fall back. It is impossible, without the aid of maps and plans, to give a complete idea of the battles fought on that intricate field. The general scope and result may be readily apprehended. Lee repeated his favorite movement of hurling his troops in masses upon what appeared the weakest part of our lines. In this case it was at the outset clearly the centre. The attack was made by Ewell's and Hill's corps, first upon one point, and then in succession upon others. Several of these assaults were successful at the outset; in one, nearly a thousand prisoners and two guns were captured; but the Confederates were in the end foiled in each, and utterly failed in their purpose to break our lines or drive us back upon the Rapidan. The battle extended far into the night. The loss was heavy, probably about equal, on both sides; but the enemy took about 1000 prisoners, and lost about 300. Both armies lay on their arms upon their own part of the field. The result was indecisive; but Grant had gained a little in position, and in discovering the position of the enemy, and thus knowing in what direction to call the reserve under Burnside.

On Friday, the 6th, both commanders had resolved upon taking the offensive. The Confederates, who were now strengthened by Longstreet's corps, however, were a little the earlier, and repeated their tactics of the preceding day, with even more determination. On our part, also, the offensive was tried; and the lines of battle, irregularly formed among the dense thickets, swayed back and forward during the whole day—now at one point, and now at another. More than once it seemed that the enemy had succeeded in their purpose of breaking through our lines, but in each case they were finally repelled. The last and the most nearly successful of these attacks was made just at nightfall, when a furious dash was made upon our extreme right, which had remained for hours almost unassailed. Seymour's and Shaler's brigades, who were posted here, were swept away, and both generals captured. Seymour, who commanded at the disastrous battle of Olustee, in Florida, had shown the utmost gallantry during the day. The whole right wing was in fearful peril. If this had been crushed the entire army would have been severed from its supplies across the Rapidan, and unless the enemy had been checked by the artillery which had been posted in the rear, a ruinous defeat would have been almost inevitable. Sedgwick, however, rallied his forces and checked the enemy. In the gathering gloom they were probably unaware of the extent of their success; they were, moreover, exhausted by the terrible efforts which they had put forth during the day, and they withdrew under the cover of darkness. The whole battle had been a series of desperate assaults upon different parts of our line, successful at first, because, owing to his better knowledge of the intricacies of the ground, the enemy could in the outset bring a superior force upon the point of attack, and finally repelled when we could bring our forces to the defense. Night closed in, as the preceding one had done, upon an almost drawn battle. Still Grant had gained a little in position, inasmuch as he had edged a little out of the Wilderness into ground sufficiently open to allow his artillery to be brought somewhat into action on the succeeding day. The two days' battles had been fought wholly with musketry, and under such conditions of ground that they were something like a series of Indian bush-fights on a gigantic scale.

At daybreak on Saturday, the 7th, the battle was opened by a sharp fire of artillery from our right, which had been drawn back somewhat and strengthened. No response was elicited; skirmishers were thrown out, and then a general advance was ordered; and though there was sharp skirmishing, the lack of regular opposition showed that Lee had abandoned his attempt at forcing our lines, and was falling back. Grant found that they were retiring in perfect order, ready to halt and give battle at any favorable point if hardly pressed. The bulk of both armies commenced their march southward, by roads nearly parallel, the immediate object of both being Spottsylvania Court House. The Confederates reached the point first, and took up a strong position, which had apparently been previously fortified.

On Sunday, the 8th, there was sharp fighting, though no general battle.

Monday, the 9th, opened comparatively quietly. The rations carried by the men were exhausted, and they were replenished from the trains which had come up. Meanwhile some changes had been made in the Union lines. Early in the afternoon the enemy made an unsuccessful assault on Wilcox's division, and there was sharp skirmishing at various points along the line. During the day the Union army suffered a severe loss in the death of General Sedgwick, who was killed by a sharp-shooter as he was directing the mounting of the artillery of his corps. Toward dusk Grant ordered an advance of a portion of his line, throwing several divisions across one of the branches of the Mattapony. There were, as before, alternate charges and repulses; at the close of which the Confederates held firmly their strong position around Spottsylvania Court House, their general line being almost a semi-circle, and ours opposite to it, presenting a similar form, of larger circumference.

Early on Tuesday morning, the 10th, the action was opened by a sharp cannonade, preparatory to a general attack, which was to be made along the whole line, especially on the centre. The contest on this day was more furious than on any previous one, and the results were equally indecisive, although they were upon the whole strongly in our favor.

Wednesday, the 11th, opened quietly, and on that morning Grant sent his first official dispatch to the Secretary of War. He said: "We have now ended the sixth day of very heavy fighting. The result to this time is very much in our favor. Our losses have been heavy, as well as those of the enemy. I think the loss of the enemy must be greater. We have taken over 5000 prisoners in battle, while he has taken from us but few except stragglers. I propose to fight it out on this line, if it takes all summer." Toward noon skirmishing was again resumed, and during the night the positions of the corps were changed, Hancock finding himself in front of the Confederate division under General Edward Johnson, who were strongly intrenched.

These works were charged at dawn of Thursday, the 12th, and carried with a rush, the whole division, with its commander, being made prisoners. During the day there was hard fighting along the lines, and at its close General Grant forwarded this dispatch: "The eighth day of battle closes, leaving between three and four thousand prisoners in our hands for the day's work, including two general officers, and over thirty pieces of artillery. The enemy are obstinate, and seem to have found the last ditch. We have lost no organization, not even a company, while we have destroyed and captured one division (Johnson's), one brigade (Dobbs's), and one regiment entire of the enemy."

On the 11th the weather, which had been fine, began to change, and soon settled into a storm, which rendered the roads almost impassable, and put a temporary stop to active operations in this quarter. The interval was improved by both commanders to strengthen their position by throwing up works, massing their forces, and hurrying forward reinforcements. These additions to the Union army are quite equal to the losses sustained in the whole series of actions; and there is every reason to believe that the Confederates have not been less strongly reinforced. The latest accounts, which are dated on the 18th, report that the battle had just been renewed, near Spottsylvania Court House; but as we close our Record on the morning of the 20th of May, no definite intelligence of the result has appeared.

Of the forces engaged in this series of battles, and of the losses upon each side, it is impossible to speak with any approach to accuracy. All that can be said is that each army numbered from 100,000 to 200,000 men, and that the losses are great on both sides. From the nature of the fighting, it is probable that the killed and wounded on each side are not far from equal, while we have by far the greater number of prisoners.

While these operations were going on near the Rapidan an important auxiliary movement was made from Fortress Monroe. General Butler, embarking a strong force, went up the York River to West Point, in order to induce the enemy to suppose that he intended to land there, and assail Richmond by marching across the Peninsula. The attention of the forces at Richmond having been drawn to that direction, Butler descended the York and sailed up the James, and disembarked his whole force at and near City Point, about fifteen miles in a direct line from Richmond, upon the opposite bank of the river. This was on the 5th of May. Beauregard at this time was supposed to be near Petersburg with a strong force. One object of this movement of Butler was to prevent him from joining Lee, by cutting the railroad. On the 9th of May Butler announced to the Secretary of War that General Kautz, with 3000 cavalry from Suffolk, had "burned the railroad bridge at Stony Creek, below Petersburg, cutting in two Beauregard's forces at that point;" that he had intrenched himself, destroyed many miles of railroad, and got a position which, with proper supplies, he could hold against the whole of Lee's army; that Beauregard, with a large portion of his command, had been left south by the cutting of the railroad by General Kautz; that he had beaten the portion which had reached Petersburg, after a severe fight; and that "Lieutenant-General Grant will not be troubled by any further reinforcements to Lee from Beauregard's forces." This dispatch appears to have been too sanguine. Since its date there has been severe fighting on the James River, and Butler appeared before Fort Darling, which commands the approach by water to Richmond, ostensibly with the purpose of laying regular siege to it. On the 16th the Confederates made a sortie from the fort, and after a severe contest forced Butler back to his intrenchments, with considerable loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. It is stated that this demonstration on Fort Darling was a feint to detain the Confederate forces near Richmond from reinforcing Lee. But the late reports from this quarter lack official sanction.

In the mean time the cavalry of Grant's army, under General Sheridan, made a bold diversion. Setting out from the position near the Wilderness on the 9th of May, they rode around the right flank of the enemy, and reached the North Anna River in the evening. At Beaver Dam three trains of cars and a large amount of stores were destroyed, and the railroad torn up for several miles. Sheridan then dashed toward Richmond, crossed the Chickahominy, and penetrated the exterior defenses of the Confederate capital. Near Yellow Tavern he encountered a strong body of cavalry, commanded by General J. E. B. Stuart, the most dashing of the Confederate leaders: in the action which ensued Stuart was killed. He then recrossed the Chickahominy, and after destroying the bridges, and inflicting serious damage, joined Butler's command. This is the most extensive cavalry raid of the war.

A portion of our army in Western Virginia, under General Sigel, met with a severe repulse on the 15th of May, at Rood's Hill, near Mount Jackson, in the Valley of the Shenandoah. He appears to have rashly marched to attack the enemy under Imboden, who fell back until Sigel found himself opposed to a superior force, who drove him back with considerable loss.

Of scarcely less importance than the operations of the Army of the Potomac are those simultaneously undertaken by the Army of the West under General Sherman. The army advanced from Chattanooga upon the Confederates under J. E. Johnston, who were posted at Dalton, Georgia, about 40 miles, and at Resaca, some 15 miles further, to the south. On the 7th of May General Thomas occupied Tunnel Hill, 10 miles north of Dalton; while Sherman struck by a flank movement at Resaca. On the 16th he attacked Johnston, who was strongly fortified at Resaca, and after a severe battle drove him out, with the loss of 1200 prisoners and 10 guns. The loss of Resaca compelled the evacuation of Dalton, and the whole army of Johnston fell into a rapid retreat southward toward Rome. Johnston, being still pressed, continued his retreat, abandoning Rome and Kingston, where he was expected to make a stand. He appears to be falling back to Atlanta, the most important point in Central Georgia, and the seat of large manufactories of arms and munitions. Although the accounts from this quarter are bare outlines, they indicate that thus far the movement of Sherman has been decidedly successful.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

For some time past there has been a dispute between Spain and Peru. It was asserted that outrages had been committed upon Spanish subjects residing in Peru. At length, on the 14th of April, the Spanish Admiral commanding on the coast took formal possession of the Chincha guano islands, in the name of the Queen of Spain. This action is of special importance, from its being accompanied by an intimation that the Spanish Government was reasserting its ancient claims, which had not been invalidated by the years during which they had been in abeyance. This claim, if persisted in, amounts to a declaration that the recognition of the independence not only of Peru, but, by implication, that of all the South American States formerly subject to Spain, is invalid; and that Spain is at liberty, if she sees fit, to re-establish her sovereignty.

EUROPE.

The Danes have met with another disaster in the capture of Düppel, which fell into the hands of the Prussians on the 18th of April. The Diplomatic Conference, the object of which is to settle the Dano-German difficulty, has assembled in London, all the great Powers being represented. Little hope is entertained that any satisfactory result will be attained.

In the British House of Lords a sharp debate took place on the 29th of April in relation to the measures of the Government in seizing the rams alleged to have been built for the Confederate Government. The Earl of Derby, in a long and elaborate speech, condemned the entire action of the Government in this matter. Earl Russell replied at length, defending the course of the Government. He said that it was every way desirable to maintain relations of amity with the United States. That the Messrs. Laird, the builders of these vessels, had it in their power to commit Great Britain in hostilities with the Northern States, and that it was only the vigilance of the Government which prevented this from having been done. These men and some others, he said, in continuation, "have done every thing in their power, by fitting out ships, by engaging in contracts for supplying vessels of war to the other belligerent, to give to the United States a just cause of war against this country. What I have been apprehensive of is giving the United States just cause of war; that we should commit such acts that the United States can truly say, 'You, professing to be neutral, are in fact at war with this country, and are carrying on hostilities with us under the guise of friendship and peace.' The only thing with which I should be disposed to reproach myself in the present case is the degree of credulity with which I received the assurances that were made that the iron-clads were not intended for the Confederate States." Earl Russell closed by expressing the hope that the result of the contest in America would be that "that sin, that crime, that detestable state of slavery would be forever abolished from among civilized nations."

It is announced that the iron-clad Alexandra is to be given up to her owners; and almost simultaneously the Confederate cruiser Georgia appears at Liverpool, her crew are ostensibly discharged, and it is reported that the vessel is to be sold. It is strongly suspected that the crew are to be re-enlisted for the Alexandra, and that this powerful vessel will slip out to sea, to prey upon our commerce.

Garibaldi, after having been received in England with the utmost enthusiasm by all classes, and having accepted invitations to visit many of the principal towns, suddenly left the country. The reason publicly assigned was that his physician thought his health would be endangered by the fatigue and excitement of these receptions. But it is more than suspected that his departure was in consequence of the request of the Government, made on the representations, or rather demands, of the French Emperor, who saw in this visit a revolutionary purpose.

Editor's Easy Chair.

SINCE our last month's chat the three hundredth anniversary of Shakespeare's birth has passed. It was not a universal celebration in this country like that of Burns's centenary, four years ago. We have other interests now, and in the profound hush that precedes a great conflict which must be memorable in history, it was not surprising that we could not pause long, or very impressively, to remember the birthday of a poet. Yet there was nothing better said on that day than what Judge Hoar of Massachusetts said, that we were settling now to which branch of the old race, the older or the younger, Shakespeare truly belongs. The great principles of English civilization are at stake upon this Continent. We are in the van of the fight. Shakespeare is the great English name; and if we vindicate more fully English liberty and manhood, we may more justly claim that the poet is ours. Shakespeare belongs to the best Englishmen; and they are the best Englishmen who most triumphantly establish human liberty.

In New York a Shakespeare movement began quietly on that day which will, without doubt, end pleasantly and honorably. The corner-stone of a monument was laid in the Central Park, with a modest and apt speech from Judge Daly, the recitation of a poem by Mr. Wheatley, and the proper tapping with the trowel by Sir Falstaff Hackett. The ceremony was thus symbolic of the universal and professional interest in Shakespeare. The project has been most simply and wisely begun. Hitherto such demonstrations have ended with the magnificent overture. Where, for instance, is the Cooper monument? What an overture there was! The late Dr. Griswold was the deus ex machina. Webster presided. Bryant delivered the oration. Irving attended. Every famous man in the land wrote a letter. The splendid Tripler Hall glittered with the fine assembly. All the trumpets blew. And the monument? "The boy! oh, where was he?" The monument is not yet visible.

The Shakespeare Memorial has fallen into wiser hands. They will quietly collect the sum, not very large—say twenty thousand dollars—necessary for the work. There will be a national committee of literary celebrities; a working central committee; a noble monument, and a triumphant festival of dedication. At least we hope so. And then, when the greatest name in our English literature is honored by a visible memorial in the Park, let us hope that the genial patriarch of American letters, to whom the island, crowned by the Park, was so especially dear, Diedrich Knickerbocker, Geoffrey Crayon, will also be commemorated by a statue which shall recall the brisk alert figure with which the city was so long familiar.

The festival of St. Shakespeare was not without honor in other cities besides New York. In Detroit there was an excellent celebration, combining speeches and tableaux. In Utica a banquet with speeches took place. In Boston there was a private dinner with much scholarly discourse. Among the memorabilia of the day here and in Europe are several good stories; as for instance that of the sober, thoughtful New England farmer who heard from a neighbor that England would probably make the seizure of Slidell and Mason the occasion of war. The neighbor said that great preparations were making; fleets getting ready; soldiers under orders; universal tumult of excitement.

"And England is really going to make war upon us?" said the silent farmer at last.

"It certainly looks so."

"Then Lord Lyons is welcome to my copy of Shakespeare," was the fervid indignant reply, as if the poet were the umbilical cord that had hitherto held us fast to our mother. A new declaration of independence: "When in the course of human events it becomes clear that England is going to be false to herself, then Shakespeare is tarnished by having been an Englishman."

In Paris Louis Napoleon forbade the Englishmen to have their Shakespeare celebration, but permitted it again at the last moment. It is to such an arbitrary will that the honor of England has been sold. But the most amusing incidents were in England itself. At Carlisle the mayor, Mr. Caleb Hodgson, was asked to assist in some way toward the tercentenary celebration, and answered, with the gravity and wisdom of Dogberry, "Shakespeare was a clever man, but might have turned his talents to better advantage!" The Spectator thereupon remarks that Mr. Mayor Hodgson has rendered unconscious service to the Shakespearian cause, for he has enabled all his townsmen to understand Justice Shallow. And the worshipful mayor has a worthy following, for one of the citizens of Carlisle issued a manifesto, ending: "Let us support our worthy mayor and all who are conscientiously concerned, against theatrical entertainments as seductive and dangerous, and take no part in the celebration of the birthday of a mere literary stage actor." Ten to one that citizen keeps a copy of Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy on his parlor table.

Of the great festival at Stratford there have been copious accounts in the English periodicals. But at this present writing we are yet to learn how far the political troubles of the moment, the presence of Garibaldi, the meeting of the Conference, the remarkable attitude of France, the popular assemblies in London, may have affected public opinion so as to paralyze interest in the celebration. In the city of London itself the jealousies of literary cliques seem to have extinguished all heartiness and unanimity of action. Dear old John Bull! Living in a globe of glass, why will you persist in heaving paving-stones?

THE yearly exhibition of the National Academy of Design dovetailed with that of the Metropolitan Fair. It is, or was, an excellent collection of pictures, not so large as in many previous years, but of a higher uniform character. The room, Derby's Gallery, has unfortunately been entirely ruined by division into a series of little chambers, and the contrast with the airy brilliant gallery of the Fair, or with itself of three years ago, was most disheartening. Let us hope that in the new academy at the corner of Twenty-third Street and the Fourth Avenue, which touches the bustling city with Venetian grace, there will be one spacious splendid gallery, and not a suit of chambers, to hang the pictures in. If there is a little space gained by the division there is an immensely valuable effect lost. Nor will any one but the unlucky artist have reason to grieve if the smaller space shall exclude some of the many wretched pictures which yearly seek admission.

Or are there no such things as wretched pictures? For that is the question really suggested by the circumstances which have attended some criticisms of the spring. Or again, if by any chance there be poor pictures, has any body the right to say so? Where is the line to be drawn? Are we gentry of the pen to have no opinion at all of pictures, or are we never to express it? It is certainly incredible that sensible men and good fellows should take such a ground, and yet it is undeniable that it has been taken. Now let us at once fully understand and state the total absurdity of such talk. You dear Titian and Velasquez and Rubens and Raphael, you can no more maintain such rubbish than you can offer us roses and poppies to smell, and try to prevent our saying that the roses smell sweet and the poppies do not. Here are you nimble fellows scaling the walls of the Hesperidian orchard and holding up the fruit as you return. You hold it up and ask us to look. We do look; all mankind looks, and lo! some of the apples are specked; some are gnarly; some are green; some are rotten to the core; some are pure gold. Do you think we are going to hurrah for the rot as we do for the gold; or do you think we don't know which is one and which the other? If you say that, you confess that the fruit is no fruit at all. If you say that, you confess that art is not art. Who made Shakespeare's fame? The poets? The scholars? The playwrights? No, not at all. It was made by the people, by the great universal heart of man to which he, and all artists, address themselves. Who made Raphael's fame? The painters? Read the story and see. Madonna of Foligno, Madonna of San Sisto, are they famous because the painters praised them, or because their lofty beauty touched the same heart that would have been touched by the living charm? When you show a picture, you appeal to the finest emotions of the average man, not to the technical skill of the expert, and you will be judged accordingly. When Bryant publishes "Thirty Poems," is this Easy Chair, or any other, under any kind of obligation to say that they are beautiful, or to hold his tongue? Exactly the reverse. He is under a very especial obligation to say that they are not beautiful, if he thinks so: for he has undertaken to chat honestly with his readers about any current interesting topic. And if this Chair should say—the Chair being the judge—that Bryant was a slovenly, inaccurate, slip-slop singer, the gentle reader would probably laugh, and say that either the good Easy Chair was a wag or knew as much of poetry as a bat of music. And why would the gentle reader say so? Because the poems are addressed to him, although he is not a poet. They appeal to the human heart, and that will inevitably and of right declare its verdict.

Now, will any of our friends the artists imagine Mr. Bryant waiting upon the Easy Chair after it had expressed such an opinion of his poems, and saying: "You wretched mass of carved wood and cushions, what right have you to say that my poems are not good? Who the vinegar cruet are you, that you should set up to correct the public taste and pass judgment upon your betters? What the poker and tongs does an Easy Chair know of poetry? You envious old scraggy piece of furniture, you have spoiled the sale of at least five hundred copies of my book! Therefore you are a thief, a highway robber, as well as a charlatan, and I defy you to mortal combat." Could any thing be sadder or more absurd? The poet sings. The Easy Chair stops his ears and cries "Horrible!" and thereupon the poet breaks all his four legs for him. Well, let us suppose a painter paints. The spectator says, "Whew!" and thereupon the painter sulks and behaves in the way for which small children in petticoats are castigated and sent to bed. If this is the kind of lesson which is to be taught at the beautiful new academy on the Fourth Avenue we hope the pupils may be few. If the artists seriously intend to dispute the right and duty of the public to express their honest opinions about the pictures which they pay for seeing they are likely to be seriously disappointed.

The pictures in the Exhibition of this year seem to this individual Chair, as it said, of a higher average merit than usual: and this, notwithstanding the absence of many of the most noted hands. Among the landscapes a picture of the Autumn Woods and Fields, by M'Entee, is one of the most felicitous and poetic works we have seen. It is neither mannered nor extravagant. It is of no school, but that of the simplest and most faithful interpretation of the sentiment of the scene, achieved not by any theoretical use of means, but with a clear understanding of the power of the means at any artist's disposal, and their relation to the facts he wishes to reproduce. The difficulty, in this view, of Mr. Farrer's Buckwheat Field, is, that the artist is evidently overpowered by a certain theory; as, for instance, that, as nature produces certain effects by a certain distribution and coloring of infinite detail, the artist, in order to render that effect, must imitate the details. The defect of such a theory is that it requires what is impossible. The detail of nature can not be imitated. Still further, a certain degree of detail may be partially imitated, but without conveying in the least degree the spirit and sentiment of the scene; while all detail may be deliberately rejected, and the very effect sought be admirably achieved. For instance, there is a picture by Diaz, representing the plunge of a pack of hounds through a forest, of which Mr. Hicks made a masterly copy in Paris. There is scarcely a discernibly elaborated detail in the picture. A smutch of the pallet-knife may have done much of the work; and yet the wavering, glancing movement of the dogs is perfectly rendered. Instinctively you listen for the hunter's horn, and step aside to make room for the flying deer. You are caught up at once into the spirit of the scene. But vainly will you look to find a solitary well-defined hair in a single dog's tail. On the other hand, we freely and gladly allow that we have seldom seen a more pathetic picture than the Stone-breaker, which was exhibited here a few years since, and which was of the extremest detail in its execution.

Elliott still maintains his ascendancy in portraiture. He has nothing this year quite so remarkable as his portrait of Fletcher Harper of two years ago. But, then, every work can not be his best. Hennessey has two or three of his careful, characteristic works, full of a conscience, sweetness, and freshness which are not only admirable for what they effect, but for what they promise. Nast's Moonlight after the Battle, with the dead heroes grouped around their gun, is remarkable for the triumph of the ennobling sentiment over the melancholy facts. Vedder's Sea Serpent is repulsive for the very reverse—a huge, loathsome snake, stretched at length among the high grass on the sandy sea-shore, successfully defying the summer day. It is the serpent, not the sky, that haunts the memory and teases the imagination. Yet the skill of the artist is shown by the positive repulsion of his work. It is an unmitigated serpent, and the eye hastens to escape as the foot would. Mayer's picture of The Sick Soldier and the Sister of Charity was hung too high, but it could not escape universal attention and admiration. It was partly due to the time, to our own war, and to the earnest attention and sympathy with which every form of camp life and suffering is regarded. But the work is tenderly and truthfully done, the patient resignation of the soldier, the sisterly sweetness of the nurse, the sobriety and subordination of all the accessories make it a very interesting work.

We could talk a great deal of the pictures, but an Easy Chair gets easily garrulous, and must stop. How strange it was in those silent, pleasant rooms to think of the Rapidan and the great work doing there, and of how many a brave man at that very moment was ready to clasp his hands and listen to the soft voice of the charitable Sister! We learn the names of some of our heroes; but of the multitudes who stand firm until they fall, who leave home and family that all our homes may be secure and all our families happy, the names can never be known. J. S.— says that he never passes a wounded soldier in the street without lifting his hat to him. Yes, and many a heart salutes where no outward sign is made.

THE fourth volume of Carlyle's "Life of Frederick the Great" (just issued by the Harpers) is a most captivating and exasperating book. There is a sublime audacity in holding up such a figure as that of Frederick, and challenging, or rather defying, the admiration of mankind. With all the magnificence of style, the masterly use of English, which gives a new idea of its power and picturesqueness, with all the learning and overwhelming wit, pathos, and sarcasm, with all its wonderfully incisive and creative strokes, its lucid combinations and perpetual interest, the book fails to arouse any especial interest in its hero or sympathy for him, and you feel, in the very splendor and tumult of the treatment, that the author is fully aware of it. From the magnificent frame the portrait stares at you, hard, cold, mechanical. The man was a good soldier probably; but even by his eulogist's own showing, even through his incessantly pelting sneers at all other contemporary monarchs, it is clear that Frederick had no more call to be a king of men than any other man who wore a crown at the same time. The whole unmatched magazine of wit is exploded at Voltaire, at the British Government, at the French court, at Saxony and Austria—they are all zanies, harlequins, noodles, innocents, imbeciles, unfortunates; but while you hurry, breathless, and shouting with glee, and smiling, and scolding, up and down the pages, you are ready to rejoice as much in the success of the hero's enemies as in his own; nor can the utmost art of genius make you see how mankind are to gain by Frederick's triumphant theft of Silesia from Maria Theresa. Nothing told of his private life is in the least interesting or touching. The erudite Dryasdust and the patient Smelfungus explore the dust-bins and dive into the shot rubbish, as Carlyle delights to call it, and rescue the important fact that Frederick the Great sat upon the side of his bed while he pulled on his breeches, and smeared his uniform coat with snuff, and restored to a poor country schoolmaster the money which had been taken from him by the royal custom-house officers. Now the value of details in biography is incalculable; but when the most skillful composing and arranging of them fails to impart the least lustre of human interest to the person concerned they become a terrible testimony.

We have a right to assume that so thorough and accurate a student as Carlyle found nothing important to tell us of the condition of the people under the sway of this king of men, or he would have mentioned it. But of what may be called Prussia, of that national life which is the measure of all government, we do not get a single glimpse. Prussia apparently is Potsdam, the palace at Berlin, and Silesia. The author is writing the life of a king, indeed, but how can you do that without telling us of the kingdom? The elaborate episode about the schoolmaster, for instance, leaves the impression that Prussia was as entirely subjugated to the whims of one man as any African tribe of which Captain Speke tells us. Was this the fact? And if so, will Carlyle, or any other doctor of the cynical church, tell us why, because that one man was the son of another unparalleled for criminal willfulness, and was himself merely a military will, he should have been clothed with such tremendous power? Could there be any real justification for it but the wisest possible use of that power? And could that appear, except in the constant improvement of the people concerned? What has the world gained by the resounding feats of Frederick the Great? That is the question; and now, at the end of four magnificent volumes, of astonishing power in many ways, there is not the least hint of an answer, or of the intention of an answer, or even of the conception that there ought to be an answer.

If we are to accept this elaborate and delightful work, for such it unquestionably is, merely as a monument of literary genius, very well. Then we feast, and are thankful. But we can not forget that Carlyle hurls foul scorn at "literary works," and we have no right to accuse him of intending to do only what he vehemently ridicules. If it be a contribution to the history of the eighteenth century only—amen: it is the most brilliant ever made. But that is not a satisfactory account of it. When a man like Carlyle surveys the whole field of human history, and selects one conspicuous figure to depict, he must do it because he feels that, either as example or warning, the work is worth doing. He means to tell the truth certainly; but what is the truth he tells in this instance? Is it that Frederick the Great was an admirable man or otherwise? One or the other he must have been, or Carlyle would not concern himself with his story. But thus far we have exhibited to us a rigid soldier heaving Europe in order to keep his hold upon Silesia; marching and countermarching with a thundering tread; doing the most abominable deeds, for which, Carlyle informs us, that Frederick has no explanation to make; and so far as can be gathered, doing it all without the least advantage to a human being, and at an infinite cost of life and money. Does any reader gather from this book that life, liberty, and property were more secure under this King than they would have been without all his tremendous campaigning? Does Europe, does human civilization, owe him any debt? To Napoleon Bonaparte it owes the ending of the French terror, and the Code, as well as a universal loosening of the superstition in the divinity which doth hedge a king. Napoleon made himself a monarch, but he freed mankind by that very fact from monarchical traditions; while the aid which Frederick did not care to give to Louis Fifteenth he would very gladly have given to Louis Eighteenth. But Frederick seems to have been, according to Carlyle, first-rate in nothing but soldiering, while the ability to govern men wisely requires very different powers from those which are needed to command armies successfully.

Yet whatever you may think of Frederick or of the judgment which Carlyle passes upon him, it is impossible not to recognize the amazing power and fascination of this work. Carlyle can never be a name unclouded in our regard because of his harlequinade upon our great struggle. But he must always be one of the memorable names and powers in English literature.

"A LOVER OF THE BEAUTIFUL," who sends us his name, sends from Osh Kosh, Wisconsin, a striking suggestion upon the naming of Gates in the Central Park—a subject which was touched by the Easy Chair a month ago. He addresses his communication through us to the Commissioners of the Park, saying: "I have in my occasional visits to the Park enjoyed so much pleasure that I should be glad to reciprocate the kindness that I feel New York by its Central Park has already done for me."

Assuming, writes our correspondent, that the Union is to be preserved in a way that shall be satisfactory and beneficial to all, ought there not to be a "Union Gate," and in connection with it, at a suitable distance, a "Union Grove," in which each State shall be represented by a group of its native and most characteristic trees, the associations of which would be so pleasing to the thousands of citizens of every State who will hereafter visit the Park, and who will thus find a bit of their homes there and sit under their familiar trees? "With me," he adds, "this local attachment is so strong that, for the sake of gratifying it, I would most cheerfully undertake to furnish you gratuitously a reasonable number of trees from my own adopted Wisconsin; and I can scarcely doubt but what the same thing would be done by citizens of every State in the Union, and that all would feel a commendable pride in so doing."

He proposes to leave the arrangement of the groves to competent landscape artists; but he suggests that the ground set apart for these "miniature United States" should correspond in some manner to the form and size of each State, the lakes, large rivers, etc., being indicated by gravel or sand walks. He thinks that the ground might be laid out in a large circle, with Washington and its trees in the centre. Immediately around this a circle of the thirteen original States, and beyond this another circle of the remaining States.

It is an ingenious and patriotic plan, but we fear that it is more fanciful and curious than picturesque or practicable. Obviously the space required would be more than could be spared in the area of the Park, and the arrangement would interfere with the broad simplicity of the design of the whole Park. Yet the hint of the groups of various trees might be wisely adopted in some form, if indeed it be not already contemplated by the Commissioners. We should all gladly see, for instance, how kindly the California pines would take to the soil of Manhattan Island. But as the country extends, it is possible that the change of climate between the natural habitat of the trees and their new nursery might so dwarf and diminish them, that the citizen from the Pacific would be only sadly reminded how far he was from his home.

We are very glad that our little word has produced so ingenious a response, and we shall have pleasure in presenting any other view so clearly conceived and stated as that of our friend in Osh Kosh, which, as he suggests, has been duly sent to the Board.

EVERYBODY, writes a friend at the West, has his picture taken; and since the photograph is so cheap and universal, everybody will always continue to have it taken. If the invention had been earlier "every old house, museum, palace, castle, and cottage, would be full of old likenesses; and among them would be the photograph of Luther when he left his father's house for the University, and one at Worms later in life; one of Shakespéare given to Miss Hathaway during their engagement; one of Bonaparte when at the military school: one of Washington when he returned from his western survey: there would also be one of Abraham Lincoln taken at a Mississippi village, where his flat-boat was detained a day. But could we identify these pictures? Not one in a thousand would have on it the name and the date."

This is the pregnant text upon which our friend is sure that the Easy Chair could preach two or three columns. But it preaches itself. It is so obvious a duty that we should hope it needed no enforcing, although we know very well that it is a duty often, and perhaps generally, left undone. We say that it needs no enforcing, because, when once fully stated, no argument or appeal can strengthen it. If you, good reader, when you next have a card taken, which you privately think is a caricature of your face, will write your name and date upon it, you will really increase its value. And to enlarge the exhortation, please also date exactly all your notes and letters. It is not enough to write Thursday, or June 20, at the top or bottom. That kind of date has no meaning next year or the year after, and it costs very little trouble to put the figures of the year. The whole subject, brethren, falls under the general head of method and order. A very little care would convert a slattern into a neat Phillis, and a shuffling, shambling, confused, and lazy conduct into a prompt and effective one. A place for every thing, and every thing in its place, is one of the earliest copies upon which we all exercise our powers in pot-hooks. But it is a safe and saving legend for the whole of life. Precision is a habit as well as an instinct, and like all habits it can be cultivated and cherished. Date your notes; date your photographs, and put your name upon them: keep your papers, your letters, your bills, in order, and you will save time, temper, and trouble. So be it.

THE Easy Chair receives many letters, and can by no means answer nor even take notice of all. They are often personal, often confidential, often evidently the product of sentimentality and listlessness; but they are always welcome, as showing the sympathy between the Chair and its unknown friends, as well as giving it a profound glimpse into many moods and minds. They are from young and old, from married and unmarried, from men and women, and they show, upon the whole, such simplicity and rectitude, that another very good sermon might be preached from the Chair upon that text also.

In the long-run those books are pleasantest and most popular which make us think more kindly of human nature. The cynic, the skeptic, or the scoffer do not write their words upon the heart. As Shelley describes the charm of riding by the sea, and of the ceaseless delight of looking upon it—

"I love all waste
And solitary places, where we taste
The pleasure of believing what we see Is boundless, as we wish our souls to be—"

so that literature most permanently satisfies which justifies our deepest faith and highest aspiration. These little glimpses given us by the letters of which we speak give us a kindred pleasure. Will our correspondents believe it, and take this confession for the reply to their notes which otherwise we can not answer. They may be sure that all are received and read, and no kindly word or appeal or request is overlooked or forgotten.

WHATEVER the ultimate result may be of the tremendous battles of May in Virginia, it is vain to affect unconsciousness of the sorrow that has fallen upon so many homes in which this Magazine has long been a familiar monthly friend. The scope of the cause and the immensity of the struggle made that month probably the most important in our history. Upon both sides the valor was prodigious, and the tenacity of the contest showed the quality of the race contending. In no event of our annals have the youth and vitality of this country been so fearfully proved. The shock was terrific, but it was inevitable. It is weakness and folly to deplore the wars without which, at least thus far in God's Providence, error and wrong would prevail over the right. Every man would prefer a peaceable life, in amity with his neighbors and the world; but what man would buy peace with any kind of dishonor, or secure his own comfort by the sacrifice of his children's?

In so vast a strife as that which has desolated this country for three years, however right we may believe one side to be, and however wrong the other, it is impossible, as it is unmanly, not to recognize the persistent bravery with which each has been defended. It is our faith that in the long-run a generous, humane, and ennobling cause, whatever and wherever it may be, will triumph. But we have no right to suppose that a man of just sentiments will be impervious to bullets, nor that a hundred resolved bad men may not overpower a dozen good ones, however resolute. So long as questions are debated with the tongue only we may trust to reason. But when they come to the decision of battle, we must remember that the appeal is to reason no longer. And when they have gone so far as to be submitted to battle, then battle and not reason nor justice will decide.

But for the sorrowful and suffering every where, for the hearts that ache and are broken, all good men will pray for the divine consolation.

THE Easy Chair can not possibly refuse his friends the gratification of reading this noble testimony to the gallantry of Americans:

"DEAR EASY CHAIR,—I am not like your Dorinda Number One, for I never was an 'object of interest.' I am simply Peggy, but I can testify to the truth of your remarks on the natural gallantry of the male sex. I am fifty-four years old, and have traveled alone, with very rare exceptions, since I was fourteen, on sloops, smacks, steam and canal boats; also horse boats, in stage-coaches, cabs, carriages of all kinds, rail-cars, both steam and horse, and omnibuses; but can not call to mind one instance of rudeness or unkindness: on the contrary, time would fail me to tell all the kindness I have received. I am and have been for the last twenty years twice the weight and bulk of ordinary women; but if I enter a crowded car I generally have a seat offered me; or if I propose to a gentleman to take a share of the seat with him he will offer to find another seat for himself; that I never will permit, if he will excuse my crowding him. I have made many pleasant acquaintances in that way, beguiled many tedious hours, and gained much useful information. Now, it is very easy to be polite to a young and pretty woman, but I could give many instances in the last twenty years of my life to show the gallantry of the male sex to women because they are women. But I will not tax your time or patience further unless you wish to hear individual instances of my experience, but will conclude by saying I agree with you in this, as I always have in all things since my acquaintance first began with you in Harper's Monthly No. 1, and has continued without interruption until the last. As I think you possess a goodly share of the gallantry of your sex, I feel assured you will excuse my presumption in addressing you as dear Easy Chair.

"PEGGY."

"P.S.—I mean by gallantry the reverence the best of men feel and show our sex."

Editor's Drawer.

THE following come to the Drawer from Missouri:

In the Davis County (Iowa) Circuit Court, several years ago, an action of slander was brought by A— against C—, damages claimed, $3000. The defendant employed Judge Faglin in his behalf, and soon after went to the State of Indiana on a visit, and there died. When the case was called, at the next term of court, Judge F., appearing for the defendant, filed the following answer:

"[A— vs. C—.] Comes now the defendant, and for answer to plaintiff's petition says that he is dead; that he died in Indiana on or about the 10th day of July, 185—, of fever and ague. He therefore asks that this suit may abate, and of this he puts himself upon the country."

The Court, at the suggestion of defendant's death, ordered the cause stricken from the docket. Judge F. walked out of the court-room, and finding some men standing together talking he walked up to where they were, and broke upon their conversation as follows:

"Gentlemen, I gained my case."

"What case, Judge?"

"The most important one in our court, A— against C—."

"How did you gain it?"

"My client died, Sir."

I WAS called upon to defend a criminal suit in Ozark County, Missouri, before Squire G—. My client was arrested upon complaint of one M— for stealing a cow. The justice had himself written the complaint, of which the following is a copy verbatim:

"{State of Missouri, } The defendant, Mike Johnson, {County of Ozark, } is accused of the crime of (Here state the offense) against the peace and dignity of the State, and contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided.

DANIEL MAIDEN.

"Sworn to, etc."

When the defendant was brought into court for trial I filed a motion to dismiss the case because the complaint did not charge him with any crime, that the words "Here state the offense" in the complaint was not charging a crime, etc. When I had concluded my short argument the Court, upon grave deliberation, overruled my motion, and as a reason for doing so said that he had "followed the form he found in the law book exactly, and that he had been told when he was elected to follow the words of the law." My client was held to bail for his appearance at the next Circuit Court.

A CORRESPONDENT in the Union army says:

Having received from the United States Christian Commission some reading matter among which were old Harper's Monthlies [he means Harper's old Monthlies], and being much pleased with the Drawer, I wish to become a contributor. I also thank the Christian Commission for the Magazines, especially the Drawer.

While on the retreat from Dandridge to Knoxville, Tennessee, January 15, 1864, I stopped at the house of an old woman on the road-side who was very loquacious. She commenced by giving me a history of the wrongs she had sustained from the armies—Rebs and Yanks, as she called them—and finally concluded by giving an account of a battle.

"Along come Longstreet's walk men, and along come Wolford's critter men, and they formed a line of fight right in my yard, and knocked over my ash-hopper that I wouldn't taken two dollars and a half for."

WHILE we were foraging in Sequatchie, Tennessee, after the campaign which ended with the battle of Chicamauga, our boys used to get up cotillion parties, etc., in the country, which were well attended by the ladies, both Union and Secesh, of the valley. The latter were very careful on such occasions about the language they used in the presence of the boys, lest they might offend them. One of the ladies stepped up to Wash (the fiddler) and said, very politely, "Will you be so kind as to play the Federal Doodle?"

I SEND you the following fact about Jim Blascum, the "cute darkey:"

A number of years ago there lived in the eastern part of Connecticut, not far from the Rhode Island line, a farmer by the name of Thomas T—. In his family he had a colored boy called Jim Blascum, whom he had taken to "bring up." Jim was employed in light farm-work during the summer, and did the chores and went to school in winter. He was the most inveterate little rogue in the whole town, and all the mischief perpetrated in the neighborhood was generally traceable to him.

One time, when Jim was about twelve years of age, his master had occasion to drive a lot of cattle down into Rhode Island, and took him along to assist him. The farmer stopped at a tavern in Coventry, on his route, to procure some refreshments, taking the little darkey in with him. In the bar-room T— encountered an old friend, who invited him to drink, and they immediately decided to have each a brandy sling, and ordered the bar-keeper to make them. Now this acquaintance, whose name was Will Davis, was a great talker, and was apt to become absent-minded when he got upon old times, as he did on this occasion; and just as he had reached the middle of a story the bar-keeper announced: "Your slings are ready, gentlemen." Each lifted his glass to his lips; but Will only took one sip, and then set it down, for he was too much interested in his story to drink more. Jim, with rolling eyes and glistening ivories, had stood directly behind Will, listening to his story; but as soon as he set down his glass the little darkey, with a sang froid that Newcomb might imitate to advantage, reached under his elbow, grasped the tumbler, quaffed the contents at a swallow, and replaced it on the counter. When Will had concluded and the laugh had "come in" (in which the bar-keeper, who had been a silent witness of Jim's cute manœuvre, joined with a zest that was unwarranted by the narrative itself) he turned to finish his sling. At the sight of the empty glass he looked first at the bar-keeper, then at his companion, exclaiming, "I have talked so fast that I drank that sling and didn't know it! Now we will go and look at your cattle."

I BELONG to the army of the Union in North Carolina. In January last I accompanied an expedition from Plymouth to Windsor, North Carolina, where a force of Georgia cavalry were encamped. We attacked them shortly after daylight; they fled, leaving in our possession their camp and equipage. Among the latter were their drums and brass musical instruments. After the excitement of the skirmish and pursuit was over, and we were returning to the Roanoke River to embark for Plymouth, the men, as usual on such occasions, were talking over the events of the morning, when one of them remarked,

"Those reb musicians will be court-martialed."

"What for?" asked some of the boys.

"Why the Regulations say that 'retreat' shall be beat at sunset, but those fools beat it in the morning."

OUR regiment took part in the expedition under General Foster to Goldsborough, North Carolina, in December, 1862. One day, as we were advancing, and brisk skirmishing was going on in front, a wounded rebel was carried to the rear by a party of contrabands. I stopped a moment to look at the man, and said to one of the negroes, "Is that man badly hurt? Will he live?" The darkey replied: "Mas-sa, he's shot fru de body. He can't live to save his life!"

THE South still furnishes food for the Drawer:

Mr. Collins was a young Methodist minister, of more than average ability, with reverence large, self-esteem small. Being appointed to a certain circuit in the Georgia Conference, he became possessed with a dread of preaching in the hearing of his presiding elder, the Rev. Dr. Pierce, since made a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. This elder was, in Mr. Collins's opinion, the great man of his Conference, if not of the whole Methodist Connection. Dr. Pierce, who had heard flattering accounts of the young man's promise, made various efforts to hear Mr. Collins, all of which were persistently defeated by the ingenuity of the diffident minister.

On one occasion Mr. Collins received word from his presiding elder that he would be present at a certain appointment. The intelligence was not overwhelming to the young minister, since Dr. Pierce would, of course, occupy the pulpit.

The day and hour of the appointment arrived. Mr. C., with a beating heart, sat in the rude pulpit, the expectant congregation sat on their uncushioned seats, the women talking over their gardens and poultry and children and ailments, while the men discussed the prospects of the cotton and rice crops;

but no Dr. Pierce had appeared. The minister consulted his watch with nervous frequency. Five, ten, fifteen, twenty minutes past the hour for the service to begin, and still the presiding elder had not arrived. The people gradually subsided into silence, and sat with sober visages, indicating that they were ready to receive their spiritual food. At length a brother who usually raised the tunes started, in a clear, confident voice, the voluntary—

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand."

This brought in all the younger men who had been lingering outside. At the conclusion of the hymn, Dr. Pierce not yet appearing, no other course was left for the anxious minister but to inaugurate the services. He read a very long chapter with great deliberation, lined a hymn of seven stanzas, and in his prayer remembered at length every cause of every church, all nations, and all classes. People's knees stiffened, their limbs fell asleep—indeed comfortable naps were taken by some; while several plethoric and several rheumatic members of the congregation slyly arose from their knees during the prayer and resumed their seats. Amens, at first so fervently and so vociferously uttered, were after a time heard at alarmingly distant intervals, and at length ceased altogether until the minister uttered the final Amen, when there was a general and most hearty response from every quarter of the church. One panting sister, as she resumed her seat, remarked, behind her fan of turkey-tailed feathers, to a neighboring sister, that she found a dozen good stopping-places for Brother Collins before he got through.

But the presiding elder hadn't arrived although he had been given such generous time, and Mr. Collins saw that he must preach. So he arose, took his text, and timidly entered upon his sermon, furtively watching the door, thinking all the while—"Perhaps Dr. Pierce will come yet," and wondering what he should do in that event. In the process of his sermon he entered upon a description of the devil. "Dr. Pierce may come yet," said the speaker to himself, as he proceeded in his description of that evil being, who goes about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. In the midst of the description the church-door opened, and Dr. Pierce entered.

"Oh! bless me! there he is now!" exclaimed Brother Collins, throwing up his hands and growing very white, and then sinking on the pulpit-bench.

The effect upon the audience of this startling announcement may be imagined.

A VERY clever contributor sends three anecdotes:

Governor H—— was a Virginian, and as a protégé of General Jackson was appointed by him Territorial Governor of Michigan. His F. F. V. ways and notions not being exactly agreeable to the democracy over whom he was sent to rule, they gave him notice to quit, which was sanctioned by the President, and he was transferred to the Land Office at Green Bay, where, as Register, he served Uncle Sam until his patron went out of office. He then offered himself to the people of Wisconsin as a candidate for the Territorial Legislature; and after pressing his claims in a long and very ingenious speech, intended to suit all parties at Green Lake, he wound up with, "Gentlemen, these are my sentiments; and let me assure you they are the sentiments of an honest man—an honest politician. But, gentlemen, if they don't suit you, they kin be altered!"

REV. MR. H—— was stationed at Appleton, Wisconsin, and was very much annoyed on the first Sabbath by the whispering and other improper conduct of some young gentlemen present. He stopped his discourse, and fixing his eyes upon the offenders, said: "I very much dislike to reprove any one in a congregation where I am not acquainted; as I am afraid of making as great a mistake as Brother R—— once made at F——. While preaching his first sermon he was very much disturbed by the misconduct of an individual in the congregation, who, though several times reproved by Brother R——, only behaved the worse for it through the whole sermon." As Brother R—— was leaving the church after the services one of the brethren accosted him with, 'Brother R——, didn't you know that man you reprov'd to-day was a fool?' It is needless to say the nuisance was abated.

PAT FINEGAN's wife was a very vixen, and gave him no peace of his life. One day, after a quarrel, in which he was ejected from his shanty by his better-half, he enlisted as a volunteer. Being accosted by an acquaintance with—"Well, Patrick, they say you are going in for the war." "No, no," said he; "I am going for pace!"

MANY incidents have been recorded to illustrate the power of imagination, but the following has never been in print:

One of the first traders in our town was Jonas M——, who was something of a wag, and whose jokes were often of the kind termed practical. His store was frequented by the young people of the town, who enjoyed his fun and his stories. Every trader in those days dealt in the ardent; and among other customers Jonas had one, an old fellow named Meshach H——, who came quite regularly for his grog. Seeing him coming in one evening, as usual, Jonas said to the by-standers, "Now we will have some fun! I will bet a bottle of wine that I will get old H—— drunk on sweetened water."

"Taken."

"Meshach," says the trader, "go to the pump and get a pail of cool water, and I will give you something to drink." Delighted at the proposal he started off, and while absent a decanter was filled with water, and molasses added sufficient to color it. Old age, and an almost unremitted use of "Santa Cruz" and "Jamaica," had somewhat deadened the old man's sense of taste, and on his return he drank his glass without discovering the deception. It had an effect on his mind also, and he began to be social and talkative. "Have another glass, Meshach;" and another glass was taken, and another, until he became quite merry and loquacious, and the company of course were equally so. The old man had every appearance of intoxication. He would invariably, when spending his evenings at the store, fall asleep, and sit snoozing in his chair until the time came to shut up the shop. This evening was not an exception; and while sitting in his chair asleep, Jonas, with the help of a companion, carried chair and sleeper quietly out of the door, and placed them down on the sidewalk. It was a chilly evening and dark, and the cold soon slightly roused the sleeper. Now Meshach had a young "sprig," who, in honor of his sire, had been christened Meshach, but was more familiarly called "Mish." As the cold began to revive the old man—his senses gradually returning, but still somewhat obfuscated—he bellowed forth, "Mish! Mish! I say: shut the door! Shut the door, you rascal!"

The laughter of the company awakened him, and he made his way home as well as he could in his situation.

• A CALIFORNIAN writes to the Drawer :

G—— P—— is an inveterate practical joker. Lying in bed pretty late in the morning, he is very much annoyed by the whistle of a steam-mill close by, and, to play a joke on the engineer, concluded to muzzle the whistle. He asked the owner if muzzling the whistle would cause any accident, and was answered in the negative. The owner let the men into the secret, and a look-out was kept. Our hero made his appearance with a bundle of rags and strings, creeping cautiously upon the shed roof to the whistle. Reaching the spot, he looked all round to see if he had it all to himself. With a big grin on his phiz, he reached his hand up and commenced stuffing in the old rags. At that moment the signal was given, and up went the valves, whistle, and blower, and off the shed rolled our hero, into a pile of coal-dust and ashes, thinking he bursted the whole concern, and started on the run amidst the shouts of all hands in the mill. It has been said of him since that he would go five miles around rather than go by a mill with a whistle on.

A CORRESPONDENT in Missouri says :

We have this winter been having "Mite Societies" and festivals for the benefit of the poor in our town, and one lady (Mrs. B——) was distributing food and other necessities to the needy. Among others she went to Mrs. Y——, whose family were said to be almost starving. She found them without sufficient clothing, without wood, and not a morsel of food in the house.

"Well, Mrs. Y——, what do you need most? what would you like to have?"

Mrs. Y—— meditated seriously a moment, then her face brightened, and she exclaimed,

"Well, I always did want a head-dress; they're so becomin'!"

An Elmira subscriber sends this contribution to the Drawer :

Doctor Wiggins, of our little city, can make just as much display of his learning as any Doctor who has a good deal more of it, and can use just as big words as any one of the faculty between Elmira and New York. Being called as a witness on a murder trial here a few years ago, where the plea of insanity was put in by the defense, he was cross-questioned in regard to his medical knowledge, when he informed the jury, among other things, that the human brain was in two parts, viz., the brain proper, and the membrane.

WE have a faithful contraband (writes a lady) who has lived with us since his birth, and is very much devoted to us. He is "Union" in sentiment, but is silent or pretends to rebelism when his mistress, who is a rebel, is by, for fear of offending her. One day last summer, about the time several ladies in this part of the State had been banished, a company of soldiers, headed by Lieut. —, was passing. One of the soldiers called out to Jim, who was looking at them, "Boy, what are your folks?" Jim scratched his head a moment, very much perplexed, and anxious not to compromise his mistress, said, at length, triumphantly, "They's while folks, Sah." Their united yell of laughter was deafening, and pleased Jim very much. Another soldier then called out, "What are you, boy?" Jim looked around, found his mistress was in hearing, and replied, "I, Sah? I's a nigger!" They didn't ask Jim any more questions, but gave "three cheers for the contraband;" and Jim walked off with the satisfying comment, "Takes dis nigger to outdo white folks."

A FRIEND related the following to me not long ago :

Jake, a contraband of theirs, was notorious for "going by the rules of contrariness," as he expressed it. When rebel soldiers were by Jake was strong Union, and when Federals he was a violent Secesh. One day Jake was in the yard when a company of Federal soldiers passed by. A soldier told him to hurrah for the North; without any hesitation Jake yelled, "Hurrah for Dixie!" The soldier angrily said, "Hurrah for h—ll, you fool!" Jake looked around to see if the way was clear, and roared, "Every fellow for his own country, Sah!" and skedaddled in haste.

A SERGEANT in the army writes to the Drawer of the tricks the privates play on their officers sometimes :

A good story is told of Lieutenant-Colonel Rose, 26th Indiana Volunteers. After the fall of Vicksburg the division of which his regiment formed a part made a raid into the interior of Mississippi. They marched without any transportation whatever; not even did the Colonel's mess take their cook along, but, fastening a coffee-pot and frying-pan to their saddles, and stowing three days' rations away about their persons, proceeded to do as other soldiers do, i. e., do for themselves.

The command had bivouacked for the night; the camp-fires were lighted, and every thing bore the appearance of business. Colonel Clark kindled his fire, filled his coffee-pot, and was making other preparations for supper, while Colonel Rose got some coffee from his saddle-bags, put it in a tin cup, and with a bayonet proceeded to mash it. The coffee, being damp from sweat, did not grind to his satisfaction; so, in his dilemma, he appealed to the boys to know how they managed it. The boys, ever glad to get a joke at an officer's expense, replied, "Wet it, Colonel—wet it," and passed on, hardly able to suppress their risibles, while the Colonel actually got his canteen and wet the stubborn coffee. You can imagine how easily the coffee mashed when soaked.

FROM one of the county jails in Massachusetts an unfortunate gentleman writes to the Drawer. How a reader of the Drawer managed to get into jail we can not conceive. Perhaps he is the keeper of it, or the chaplain. He says :

In one of the county jails in the State of Massachusetts I have the misfortune to be confined. My friends are in the habit of sending me Harper's Monthly; and thinking that a little original incident that occurred here might interest some of your readers, and find a place in the Drawer, I send the following :

We have a prisoner here who prides himself on being the best-educated man in jail. One of the prisoners being sick, and not expecting to recover, a priest was sent for to administer the right of extreme unction. After the ceremony had been performed Jones came into the cook-room looking as wise as a judge, and said, "Well, that poor fellow has had the rite of supreme injunction administered, and is all right." In spite of jail rules, and in spite of the subject, the house was in a roar.

A BARBER was confined here for not being able to control his appetite. The first night he was locked in his cell says he to the turnkey,

"Are all the outside doors fast?"

"Yes. Why do you ask that question?"

"I should be afraid to stay here were they not."

It was so ludicrous he was soon a favorite with the officers, and never was locked in his cell after.

FROM our youth up we have been in the habit of reading your Drawer, and not having seen any thing therein from Eau Claire, Wisconsin, feel it our duty to contribute the following:

We have in our midst a person of some pretensions who styles himself "ye editor" of our county paper, Stout by name, who has just returned from a trip to Washington and a visit to Old Abe. We also have among us one Heath, who is Clerk of the Circuit Court. It so happened that a farmer brought a load of fresh fish—bass and suckers—to market, when said Heath "pitched in" and bought a fine string of bass. Our friend Stout also bought a string of fish, but not being "on time," was obliged to take up with suckers.

Heath having business to attend to in town, left his string of bass with a friend. Soon Stout passing by, and seeing Heath's string of bass hanging up, thinks to perpetrate a fine joke on him, so substitutes his string of suckers for the string of bass, which he takes home and duly hands over to the cook, who prepares the sweet morsel which greatly tickleth the palate of "ye editor." But who can depict the astonishment of Heath when he finds his beautiful bass turned to suckers! Soon, however, the miracle is explained.

"Verily," says Heath, "I'll fix him!"

A few days thereafter the agent of the American Express Company met Stout, and informed him of the arrival of an express box to his address. Stout finds the box marked and labeled in the most elaborate style of the express-man's art, pays one dollar and a half charges, shoulders the box and lugs it to his office. Very soon thereafter he receives a visit from Heath and numerous of his intimate friends, who find him just resurrecting his old friends the suckers from their untimely grave, and acknowledges himself "just a little sold!"

FEELING indebted to the Drawer for many a hearty laugh, and being desirous of reciprocating, even in a small way, I send you the following, which goes to show how totally unqualified are some of the employés of the Government who receive their appointments through political favoritism.

Patrick M'C—, of Brooklyn, having made himself useful to the party, was rewarded for his services by a position as engineer in the heating department of the Capitol at Washington—a berth worth some fifteen or eighteen hundred dollars per annum, which he held during Buchanan's Administration. Now there is not a day that passes but that there are more or less sight-seers at the Federal Metropolis, and among the first places they visit is the Capitol, particularly during the sessions of Congress. In the winter of 1859, among those who paid a visit to that noble structure, and admired its many beauties, was a very intelligent gentleman from Boston. After having minutely inspected the statuary and interior decorations of the upper floors, he was curious to know the modus operandi of heating buildings of such large dimensions, and for that purpose was directed to the Engine-Room, where he encountered our friend, Patrick M'C—, who, being anxious to make a favorable impression upon strangers, readily gave them such information as he possessed about the engine department. The visitor was particularly struck with the beauty of the engine, which is really a fine specimen of mechanical skill and ingenuity. After admiring its workings for a few minutes, he inquired of Patrick how many horse-power it was. "Horse-power!" ejaculated Patrick, looking at the stranger with perfect astonishment; "why, there is no horse-power about it—it goes by steam!"

In Colorado Territory we have a correspondent who writes:

At the last District Court held in this Territory, Hon. Allen Bradford presiding, I was foreman of the United States Court jury. An honest Dutchman, Jan Jakes, lives on a farm near the road, and keeps a tavern, where detachments of officers and soldiers pause often to refresh. Jan was brought up for selling whisky to soldiers, and plead guilty, but said: "Mr. Shudge, I dought every pody trinks, and sell de wiskey to every pody!" "Well," said the Judge, "as you did not know it was against the law, I will fine you ten dollars and let you off." "Dat is coot, Mister Shudge, but I is got no money." As Jan was known to be honest, he was allowed to depart; and in half an hour he came back with a roll of bills in his hand, and said, "Mister Shudge, I pay you now. I vins forty tollars from vun officer, and I danks you vunce more: coot-by, Mister Shudge!"

THESE are very good from the army:

As one of the brigades of the Reserve Corps which came up to the rescue of General Thomas at Chickamauga was marching through Athens, Alabama, a bright-eyed girl of four summers was looking at the sturdy fellows tramping by. When she saw the sun glancing through the stripes of red and on the golden stars of the flag, she exclaimed, clapping her hands, "Oh, pa! pa! God made that flag!—see the stars!" A shout deep and loud went up from that column, and many a bronzed veteran lifted his hat as he passed the sunny-haired child, resolving, if his good right arm availed any thing, God's flag should conquer.

Mrs. —, the accomplished and beautiful wife of a volunteer officer, tells the following:

When she was at the Louisville Hotel, while our army was gathering strength to spring upon Bragg at Bardstown, a little boy, whose parents were noted for their secession sympathies, was dangling by the neck over the baluster a toy, known in the nursery vocabulary as a "limber-jack," exclaiming between his little teeth, "There now, old Abe, I told you I would hang you!" giving, as he spake, the string a vindictive jerk. This lady, who was standing by, said, "Johnnie, I'll report you as a rebel, and have you put in the military prison." He quickly drew up his extempore gallows, put the cord into his pocket, and running up to her, said, "Oh, please, don't tell! It's not Mr. Lincoln, it's a limber-jack; I was only playing hanging Yankees!"

EVERY one in our Division has heard of Solomon. He is the General's master-of-horse, a Frenchman by birth, and has never yet been able to obtain the slightest conception of the power of our language. While the brigade to which he is attached was lying at Stone's River, fifteen miles from Nashville, Solomon had occasion to go to the city. As he was starting the General said, "Solomon, bring me Nashville time." About night Solomon returned, after paying his respects to many of the doggeries on the way, loitering, as was his custom. As soon as he arrived he went to the General, taking out his watch with an important air, saying, "It was just un quartier un tree o'clock when I leeve ze seetie, then I stop mine vatch, so he keep the reeght time."

"But what is the time now?" asked the General. "Ah! dat I know not. You sais breeng ze Nashville time; I breengs him eexsactly!"

ON another occasion some one reported to the Brigade Adjutant that Solomon had called him a fool. The Adjutant took him good-humoredly to task about it. "You knows, Add-ju-tant, I neever say him, for I neever speak what I dink!"

COLONEL B—, of the Eighteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, a son of ex-Governor B—, of New York, is a brave officer, and beloved by his entire command.

During the siege of Vicksburg officers as well as privates became careless of dress, and none more so than Colonel B—, and he so extremely careless that the line officers took the matter in hand, and prevailed upon the Colonel to "dress up," as the Eighteenth had so distinguished itself in battle, it was surely to be one of the "honored" to enter the city proper after the fall, and "the boys" did not care to be ashamed of their Colonel's external appearance on such an occasion. Accordingly the return boat brought a blue suit "fit for a Colonel."

The line officers, elated at the change of dress, gave a supper in honor of the event. Colonel B— was seated at the head of the table. During the feast a "gray-back" was observed making his way up on the sleeve of the Colonel's new coat, and his attention being called to it, very coolly for a moment viewed it, as if for a grand strategic movement, when he deliberately unbuttoned his vest, seized the "gray-back" between his thumb and finger, and plunged it inside his vest, exclaiming with an oath as he did so, "Don't you know your place? Go back where you belong!" Those who know the Colonel can imagine the effect.

A GOLD-HUNTER in Idaho Territory writes to the Drawer:

We have an eccentric magistrate holding forth at the present time in Bannock, who frequently furnishes some staple for fun for a whole week to every disciple of Blackstone in town. Not long since he was occupied in hearing a case which was of sufficient interest to attract a considerable crowd. During the progress of the case he began to grow very fidgety and nervous over the argument of counsel on some knotty point; and finally, unable to restrain his impatience longer at the length of time taken by the learned gentlemen of the long robe, and still not venturing to administer a rebuke to them, he turned quickly and shortly around to a couple of spectators who were whispering in an undertone in a corner of the room, with a big oath: "Can't you keep still?" As soon as the case closed, to make amends for his involuntary breach of the dignity of his own court, he fined himself $5 for contempt, entered the fine upon the docket, and religiously paid the amount into the school fund, where the law of the Territory provides all fines collected by him shall go.

A NOTARY PUBLIC in California sends the following:

The late Squire Wright, of whose eccentricities you have formerly spoken, in regard to his sentencing a man to the penitentiary, after a preliminary examination, on the charge of horse-stealing, and who once decided a suit of Major Bidwell's by a horse-race, did a thing once of which I never saw any public mention. A fellow was arrested on a charge of cattle-stealing and brought before the Squire, who, giving a severe look at the "subject" before him, asked,

"How do you answer the charge of stealing Neal's cattle? Do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Not guilty," replied the prisoner, in a faltering voice.

"You're a big liar!" roared the exasperated magistrate, and immediately bound him over to answer the charge at the Court of Sessions.

A QUEER genius, named George Alexander, better known as "Stutterin' Aleck," died over in Washoe a few months ago. He had been a sergeant in the army in Mexico, and was at one time an "orderly" in and about the tent of General Taylor. A few days before the battle of Monterey a Mexican scout was captured and brought into the presence of "Old Rough and Ready," who having occasion to interrogate the scout, told Aleck to find him an interpreter.

"An inter-ter-ter-preter? What's th-that, General?" stammered the orderly.

"Why," roared old Zach, "find me some one that can speak Spanish, you booby!"

"General, t-t-try the p-p-p-risoner," says Aleck; "he's n-n-never spoke nothin' but Sp-p-p-anish all his life!"

THE criticisms and comments of would-be connoisseurs are among the most amusing incidents of an hour's lounge in Art galleries. One which we heard at the Sanitary Fair is too good to be lost:

The contributions of artists for the benefit of the Fair were marked on the frame "Pro Patria." A very knowing man asked one of the attendants, "Who painted that picture?" and received for answer, "An Irish artist not yet much known." The critic, looking closely at the frame, read, "Pro Patria," and remarked, "Oh! Patria; yes, he is comparatively unknown, but he is fast coming into notice!"

MANY years ago there resided in Versailles, the seat of justice of Ripley County, in this State (Indiana), a man named William Skeen. He was noted for being of rather extreme corpulency, was quite illiterate, and kept the principal "tavern" in the village. He had a goodly share of this world's gear, and withal was generous and humane—never behind his peers in bestowing tangible relief upon every object of charity that was worthy. It so happened that the people of his precinct elected him Justice of the Peace on a certain occasion. Not long after he was installed into office, one of his constituents prosecuted another to recover a cow which the plaintiff averred the defendant unlawfully retained, and which belonged to him. A writ of replevin was issued, and a notice served upon the defendant to appear before the Squire, at a certain time, to show cause why he should not deliver up the animal. The hour for the trial of the right of property came. Both parties appeared, and the cause was tried. Nothing unusual occurred during this important ceremony, and at the close of the pettifoggery the Court decided that the right of property was in the plaintiff. The spectators began to disperse, and the Justice was entering up his judgment, when he heard the defendant say to a friend behind him, "Well, there was nothing said about the calf, and I won't give that up, no how!" This was a sort of a "poser" to the Squire; but he stopped writing, and sat as if in a deep study for some moments. Directly he let drop his pen, and jumping up he caught the refractory individual by the throat, and giving him a violent "throttling," exclaimed, "Give up that calf, too, you scoundrel, or I'll choke you to death!" The poor fellow was nearly frightened out of his senses, and as soon as he could get breath he incoherently ejaculated, "I will, Squire! I will!" After this exhibition of the manner in which Squire Skeen enforced justice in his court, no one ever dared to quibble or prevaricate while doing business before him.

THE following is from a New Brunswick correspondent:

DEAR DRAWER,—I don't know how it is that we Provincials so seldom show in your department. It can't be because of our not appreciating a good thing, as I can assure you Harper's is as eagerly sought for here, under the Cross of St. George, as in any part of the "land of Abraham." I inclose you the latest in these parts:

John F—— is a barber, not long from across the big pond, and, unfortunately for his own good, too much addicted to the flowing bowl. He was a bachelor, but in a fit of insanity got married, and found, when too late, that hers wasn't a congenial spirit by any means. The honey-moon wasn't well over before she seceded, à la Floyd, carrying off the crockery and spoons. However, some good-natured friend interfered and brought her back again; but the secession had destroyed John's confidence in her, and "good words" were seldom the household order of the day. Previous to his marriage he had always kept up the supply of hot water for his customers by the use of a spirit-lamp; but finding this rather expensive, he now sent to the kitchen for hot water when he wanted it. A customer entered one day, and took his seat in the big chair for a shave. Remarking that the spirit-lamp was absent, he asked John how the hot water was procured. "Oh, no trouble at all now," said he; "the wife keeps me always in hot water!"

AN Army Chaplain writes:

I have long owed you a debt which, month after month, I have delayed paying. My conscience smites me, and I can withhold just dues no longer. I always read you first when I get a new Harper. Just now I am a soldier—"nothing but an enlisted man;" though at home I was a clergyman, and, in fact, am now pastor of a church in New Hampshire, on a three years' leave of absence. God bless that people for their patriotism in sparing their pastor for a time, whom they wouldn't dismiss!

Several years ago, while at the Academy, several members of my class were together one evening, enjoying a cozy chat, and among the number was one quiet fellow, very green in appearance, but withal a fellow of a good deal of mother-wit. We will call him Hal. The topics of conversation were various. After a while one of our number picked up Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy, and, turning over the leaves, read a few lines here and there. Soon he came upon the subject, "Marriage," and read (I quote from memory, and may not have it correct), "Seek a good wife of thy God, for she is the best gift of his Providence.".... "If thou art to have a wife of thy youth, she is now living upon the earth, therefore think of her, pray for her."

Hal looked up with a quiet twinkle in his eye, and said, "Boys, let's have a prayer-meeting!"

AN officer in the First Maine Cavalry says that he has enjoyed the Drawer for so many months it is a duty to offer a few items for consideration:

While our regiment was attached to General Hartsuff's command, Colonel Allen appropriated Surgeon B——'s tent, using it to shelter his mess-table. Surgeon B—— indignantly resented the act, and addressed a communication to General Hartsuff, setting forth the injustice of the deed, and adding, "that he had not so much as a fly to interpose between his head and the starry-decked heavens above him."

The communication was returned, through the regular channel, with this indorsement:

"Colonel Allen will cause a fly to be interposed between the Doctor's head and the starry-decked heavens above him."

ANOTHER: After Lee recrossed the Potomac last summer, our regiment had a sharp fight with Stuart's cavalry at Shepherdstown, Virginia. Most of our men were dismounted, and fighting under the cover of trees and inequalities of the ground.

One of the boys from Company E, a fellow full of jest as he was of life, exclaimed to his comrades, "Do you see that tall, lank-looking reb with a straw hat on? Now keep your eye on him, and see him jump." He fired, and as the smoke arose he leaped into the air, exclaiming, "By thunder! the wrong boy jumped that time."

He was borne from the field cursing that lean reb who stood edgewise.

A CORRESPONDENT in Kickapoo, Illinois, says:

In the western part of the State there lives a queer stick by the name of Starkey, who works for the farmers round about when he works at all. Upon one occasion he hired to an Englishman who usually kept two or three hired men. Starkey made his appearance in due season for breakfast, and the Englishman, as usual, brought up from the cellar the morning's rations of whisky in a very large mug—what he supposed sufficient for a "nip" for "all hands." In consideration of Starkey's being the "new hand" he handed him the mug first. Starkey, nothing loth, drained it without stopping to take breath. The Englishman, amazed at the fellow's "capacity," said, ironically, "Have some more, Mr. Starkey?" "Oh no," said Starkey, innocently; "I never takes big drams, like some folks!"

THEY have a Wabash College in Indiana, from which State this comes:

Judge B—— is a good lawyer, and quite eminent for the clearness of his head and the correctness of his judicial decisions, but he loves fun as well as the law, and sometimes is unable to repress his humor even on the bench. While he was holding court at W——, some years since, the prosecuting attorney brought in an indictment for "winning and losing," and inadvertently had written, "did unlawfully loose." A motion was made to quash, on the ground that the indictment did not charge the commission of a criminal act—as, it was urged, a man might lawfully be as loose as he pleased. "Oh," said the Judge, with a look which almost put you in possession of the joke before he uttered it, "he was probably playing on the 'Double O.'"

GENTLEMEN who wear full beards needn't read this: In the town of M——, Massachusetts, where I taught school while in college, there was a clergyman of very light complexion, who was always clean shaven. One Sunday he "exchanged" with a neighboring minister, whose complexion and hair were black as coal. He wore a full beard, quite long, and his locks hid his ears. Seated in the pulpit his head only was seen above the desk by a little girl, who eyed him very sharply, all the while nestling up closer and closer to her mother. After a few moments she raised herself in the seat so as to get her lips near her mother's ears, and without once removing her eyes from the minister, she eagerly whispered, as though in a great deal of fear, "Mother, mother, is that Satan?"

THE first preaching I did was in one of the hill-towns of New Hampshire, where the Society was so feeble that they made no attempt to support preaching except during a few months in the summer. I spent my first Seminary vacation with them. Many of the inhabitants had probably never entered a "Meeting-house" a dozen times in their life. Among this number was one who, on a beautiful Sabbath morning, thought it would be a fine idea to go and hear the "young minister." So he arrays himself in his best. But unfortunately he comes late; and, it being a cool day, the doors are closed. But, nothing disconcerted, he walks boldly up to the door, and thinking for the moment that the etiquette of the house is the same as his neighbor's, he gives three loud raps. But he has no sooner rapped than he thinks he has made a mistake, which bewildered him, and his first idea is to take to his heels, which he did. The worshipers were of course startled at the unusual sound of rapping, and one of the deacons near the door started out to see what it was. He was just in time to see a pair of coat-tails flying round the corner, and thinking mischief was brewing, he followed. He soon found the man behind a pile of boards, trembling like an aspen-leaf. The deacon rather angrily demanded what he was about. "I was a-frinking of what I hadn't orter been frinking on!" was his only reply.

ONE of my friends, a lady whom the Muses visit sometimes, told me some of her earlier experiences in writing poetry. Two short poems of hers had been printed, entitled respectively, "A Stray Waif," and "Searchings for Truth." Shortly after an aunt of hers visited at her father's, and the poems were duly read, admired, and commented upon. Her uncle coming in before the visit was concluded, the lady remarked, in the course of conversation, "Here's some of Mary's poetry, husband; don't you want to read it?" "Ah, indeed!" said he; "what is it about?" "Oh," replied auntie, abstractedly, "'A Stray Wolf,' and 'Stretching the Truth!'" Fancy the feelings of the poetess.

In the village of Barnettston, Massachusetts, lived, a few years ago, a maiden lady who rejoiced in the cognomen of "Aunt Hepsy." She was a very worthy lady, but years had made her very deaf, which gave rise to some ludicrous misunderstandings on her part. One time the minister was making her a pastoral call, and in the course of it asked her how long she had enjoyed religion. His astonishment was not small when she answered, at the top of her voice, as her manner was, "Goin' on fifteen year! Sometimes it's better, and sometimes it's worse!" She thought he had asked her how long she had been deaf.

A FRIEND in the pine woods on the shores of Grand Traverse Bay, Michigan, writes:

In our little would-be-if-it-could city (composed of two score slab shanties, half that number of houses, and five hundred stumps), lives a decidedly original character, of the name of Lawton, commonly called "Old Lawton" for short. A very estimable man he is, no doubt, but his peculiarity is slowness; an earthquake couldn't start him from a walk. One morning, while he was eating breakfast, his house was discovered to be on fire on the roof, and the flames making considerable head-way. No ladder was to be found on the premises, and old Lawton, putting on his hat, proceeded deliberately to one of his neighbors who lived some little distance away in search of one. Arriving, he knocked, and being admitted, the following conversation took place:

"Good mo-o-o-rnin', Mr. A——."

"Good-morning, Mr. Lawton. Walk in."

"Pretty cold this mornin'."

"Yes, 'tis rather frosty. Take a chair."

"Wa'al, I can't stop long"—taking a seat as he spoke. "I cum to see if I could get that ladder of yourn a little while, Mr. A——. My house is on fire, and I hain't no way of gittin' onto the roof."

"Take that ladder and start, you —— fool!" shouted Mr. A——, springing from his chair and rushing out of the house.

He and the ladder were at Mr. Lawton's before that enterprising individual had measured half the distance. The house was saved, but it wasn't old Lawton's fault.

ONE of our up-the-Sound friends furnishes the following:

"Dead-beat" is the euphonious term applied to any individual who, under the plea of destitution of the needful, seeks to travel by rail or steamer without rendering an equivalent in current funds. A case of this kind recently came to our notice, in which two feminine "dead-beats" were cleverly outwitted.

Not many months since Sam S——, the popular and fun-loving clerk of a favorite river steamer, while collecting tickets from the passengers, discovered that two well-dressed females on deck were not only unsupplied with tickets, but also without money—according to their own story. Sam politely but unsuccessfully attempted to persuade them that they must be wrong; mentioned that he had met with just such cases before, and always found that they were mistaken, etc. But his appeals, though ranging "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," were fruitless; the fair but somewhat unscrupulous travelers continued to affirm impecuniosity. Leaving them for a while, Sam finished his round, and sought in the depths of his office to excogitate a plan for ensnaring the enemy. His inventive and ever-fertile genius soon devised an expedient. One of the women was Irish, the other native (and probably "to the manner born"), with an infantile "dead-beat" in her grasp. Seizing a Webster Unabridged, which lay in the office, Sam attached to the cover an improvised paper cross, and with this formidable document under his arm majestically approached the Emeraldine.

"Madam," said Sam, "do you observe this Catholic Bible which I have in my possession?"

"Sure I do," was the reply.

"Well, then, if you have no money you must swear to it. Put your right hand on that cross, and make oath to the truth of what I repeat to you."

Madam tremblingly placed her hand on the cross.

"You do solemnly swear," commenced Sam, in a sepulchral voice, "that the contents of this book are true, to the best of your knowledge and belief; that you haven't got any money now; that you never had any, and nev—" At this point our Catholic friend precipitately withdrew her hand; the oath was getting too strong for her aroused and guilty conscience. The relentless Sam sternly insisted upon the completion of the oath; but the now wailing Hibernian, not daring to comply, vainly endeavored in various ways to evade the issue. Finding her tormentor inexorable, she suddenly recollected that she had "a friend" on board who would perhaps lend her the amount needed. "No doubt of it," said Sam; "never knew it to fail; these friends always happen along just in the nick of time. I'll give you just one minute to see your friend, and shall then call on you for the money. Returning at the expiration of the minute, the dollar and a quarter was handed over, and pocketed in triumph by Sam.

The other woman, who had been suspiciously watching the proceedings, was not to be so easily managed. Sam saw at a glance that she was impervious to "oaths" of any description or in any quantity: he must change his tactics. "My friend," said he, "if you haven't any money you must give me some proof of it. Turn your pockets inside out." "But I can't; I have got my baby." "Oh, I'll take your baby," responded Sam—and take it he did. "Now empty your pockets." The pockets were emptied without revealing any money. "Never mind," remarked Sam, condolingly, "I'll keep the baby; my wife has been wanting one for some time, and will consider this cheap at a dollar and a quarter. Au revoir!" And off he marched with his prize, and intrenched himself in his office. The babe, not fully appreciating the desirableness of this change of base, began to squall. Sam trotted it on his knee and tried to assuage its sorrows, but in vain; the more he trotted, the more vehemently did it lament, and clutch at Sam's spectacles. At length, in considerable disgust, he placed it on the floor. A knock at the door interrupted Sam's contemplation of his newly-found treasure. Unlocking the door, he saw (as he expected) the mother of the child, who told him that fortunately she had met a friend who, having known her "in better circumstances," had kindly loaned her a dollar and a quarter. "Precisely," said Sam, as she handed him the money. "I thought so all the time. Take your infant and be happy. I wouldn't be hired to touch it again!" The discomfited female retired with her offspring, and Sam, lighting a cigar, smoked in calm satisfaction at the result of his strategy.

SOME twelve or fifteen years ago, away down in Vermont, lived a minister, a most excellent man—as Down East ministers are wont to be—but somewhat nervous withal, and easily annoyed by any interruption when he was in the pulpit. One Sabbath morning he had commenced services, and proceeded as far as reading in the Scriptures, the lesson happening to be a chapter in Exodus, when two dogs of vicious dispositions meeting in the aisle had a disagreement, and appeared to be on the point of settling matters by a canine duel; which led the minister to interpolate a passage in his reading which was not down in the Book, and with rather curious effect. Imagine the astonishment of a devout New England audience on hearing their pastor read a verse of Scripture like the following:

"And he spake unto Moses saying— Brother Sandford, turn those dogs out of the house!"

An audible smile developed itself among the younger ones; and even some of the "pillars of the church" had no small difficulty in preserving a "Sabba'-day" expression of countenance.

VENANGO COUNTY, Pennsylvania, is the scene and seat of the following incidents, for which we are indebted to a friend:

P——, now on the bench, and for five years before one of the foremost practitioners, was very tart, and somewhat addicted in his younger days to profanity, albeit his only vice. He once conducted a cause in ejectment which took some days. The jury brought in the verdict against him. His client was absent from the court-house at the rendition of the verdict, but coming in immediately after found P—— with his head down on the counsel-table, much dejected. The client nudged him, and asked how his case went. Said P——, without looking up, "You lost it." Said the client, "I will not let it stop there; I have an idea in my head." P—— replied, glancing sideways, without raising his head from the table, "Keep it there, keep it there. It is some — rascally one, I warrant you!"

P—— and G—— and T——, all subsequently on the bench, were traveling the "Wild Cat Circuit." The roads were not passable then, and have got no better since. The night was dark as pitch or stack of black cats, and the storm was wild. The lightning and thunder and crashing of trees were terrible. P—— couldn't refrain from his habit of swearing. G—— was more reverential, and begged P—— to stop his comments; said he, "We might be struck down at any moment." Said P——, "I don't care; we would never need to travel this — road again!"

WHEN in the Legislature a constituent sent me the following bill to have passed. It does not occur to me that it ever became a law; but of that, from circumstances daily occurring, I ought not to be too sure. The author of it "still lives," and if he knew I sent it to you my days might not be "prolonged in the land." Here it is:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same:

"That All wemin that is now Married to a second husband or a third husband, tha shall not Receive anny intrist from tha Raille Estaite of tha first husband; and if she be Married to a third husband she shall not Receive anny intrust from hur second husbands Raille Estaite, and tha Monney that those Married wemin is drawing the intrist of shall be Davided Among the Ahrs that is intitlled to it. SALLY.—“Oh, Betsy, ain't things awful high? Pep'-mint Taffy four cents an ounce, and only three Round Hearts for a penny!”

BETSY.—“And only think! Peanuts two cents a measure, and half of them bad!”

MARY.—“Now, Will, does this dress become my style?”

WILL.—“Capitally, on the whole. That lilac organdie, with flowers à disposition, harmonizes with your complexion: and the tournure gives you just the right degree of embonpoint.”

MAMMA.—“Well, dear, you shall decide. What view will you select?”

MAUD.—“Oh, a three-quarter view, by all means. That brings out the outline, you know; and if the chiaro-oscuro is well managed will do the best justice to my peculiar style of beauty.”

THE WILD BULL OF EQUATORIAL AFRICA.

A CLUB-MAN IN AFRICA.*

MOST men go to Africa to look for fame, or for the sources of the Nile, or for new cotton-fields, or for heathen to convert; Mr. Winwood Reade, who describes himself as a young man about town, went for his pleasure. Some Englishmen go to the sea-side for amusement, some to Norway, and some to Paris; but Mr. Reade must needs go as far as the West Coast and the famous Bight of Benin, of which an old sea-rhyme reports, that

Where a hundred went in."

Some men find amusement in hunting deer, and some in tiger shooting; but Mr. Reade had read Du Chaillu, and nothing would satisfy this man about town but the novel sensations of a gorilla-chase. He is a traveler who takes life as he finds it, and has even a taste for savagery.

Mr. Reade reached the African coast by way of Madeira—where he bought a picture of the Virgin, an embroidered collar, and some feather flowers—and Teneriffe, where, wishing to hire a horse to ride into the country, a pony was led out from the stable, through the bedroom and best parlor, into the street. His only excursion was to a mildewed town, Laguna, in which the most remarkable sight to a traveling club-man was the extraordinary fatness of the fleas. When we add that in the next chapter he calls the sea a "monotonous and over-rated element," and declares dinner the great event of the nautical day, the reader will perceive that an habitué of the London clubs is after all but a man, subject, like the commonest mortals, to weariness and hunger. As you approach the West African coast life in a little ill-furnished steamer is not enchanting. "At half-past eight," says Mr. Reade, "we used to sit down to a breakfast of edible cinders. We had tea and coffee; but as the tea was usually made in yesterday's coffee-boiler, and vice versa, choice became a mere matter of form. At twelve we spoiled our dinner with cheese and biscuits, and at four o'clock the cook spoiled it again. At ten all the lights were put out, and each man retired to his oven." That is a day in the tropics. "If pleasure is one's object in traveling," remarks this philosopher of the clubs, "every purpose is answered by reading a volume of adventures, drinking a cup of strong tea, and allowing one's imagination to wander. Thus one can make charming discoveries; and the custom is common enough; but to shackle the ethereal explorer with a vile body which savages can detain, and malaria enfeeble, is one of those vulgar errors which only young foolish men fall victims to." It is not many men who can own so gracefully to the possession of youth and folly.

Mr. Reade has not a high opinion of the people or the country he visited. Englishmen seldom have, unless the country is England and the people John Bulls. At Sierra Leone he found the negroes speaking broken English, not more religious or honest than the average run of a London crowd, as profane as sailors, and as litigious as English squires; and having been persuaded at Exeter Hall that they were a set of black saints, he was much disappointed. He does not tell us what the Sierra Leonites thought of him; but as his first adventure among them was to assist—to the extent of looking on—at a violation of the revenue laws, no doubt they judged him but "so so." "I went ashore," he writes, "with two French traders, one of whom carried a very heavy and suspicious-looking carpet bag, the other an open box of cigars. On the quay we were confronted by two custom-house officers (colored).

"One of these made a movement toward the carpet bag, which was intercepted by the gentleman with the cigars.

"'I assure you,' he said, politely, 'that I have brought them ashore simply for my own smoking.'

"A negro's attention, like a child's, is riveted by the least thing which is held up before it. The two officials immediately closed upon the cigars; the carpet bag progressed rapidly toward the town.

"'You see,' continued the Frenchman, speaking with great deliberation, 'that there is only one pound here. They are a hundred and ten to the pound. Would you like to count them, gentlemen?'

"The carpet bag turned a corner.

"'I buy them,' continued the French trader, keeping his eyes fixed upon the huge orbits of the negro's, 'from a gentleman with whom I am personally acquainted, and—'

"'But where is de oder gentleman wid de—'

"'And I can assure you that they are really excellent.'

"'But wher'm oder—'

"'As I told you before, gentlemen, I am not at liberty to sell them, but I shall be most happy to present you each with one. Will you give yourself the trouble to take one, Sir?'

"He crammed one into each of their hands, and having favored them with a few more urbane speeches and with a quantity of bows, left them to the enjoyment of their small gratuity, and me to the suspicion that they were little better than Continental douaniérs.

"The next day was Sunday, and in the morning I had a valise carried up to the house to which I had been invited. When I offered the man sixpence, the ordinary fee, he demanded an extra sixpence 'for breaking the Sabbath.'

He complains that their dress is somewhat "loud;" that they imagine themselves to be genuine Englishmen, which would be an unpardonable offense in any body; and that a negro jury is pretty sure to decide against a white man. Some of his stories of Sierra Leone jury-trials read curiously like tales of Irish Justice, and perhaps are equally true. In fact, if we may believe Mr. Reade, the blacks of this English colony are quite as disagreeable as ignorant Englishmen, and in precisely the same way. When he comes to Liberia our traveler moralizes on republics; he prefers monarchies—being a Briton—and remarks, in justification of his taste, that "the earth should be a reflection of heaven, and heaven is an empire"—with colonies, Mr. Reade?

The steamer stopped at Cape Palmas to take in a crew of Kramen, the handybillies of this coast, men of immense strength, tractable savages, great pickpockets, gluttons, drunkards; fond of their mothers, their country, and the flesh of dogs. Of these dissipated giants Mr. Reade chose five, to serve him as a boat's crew in his exploration of African rivers. They were called Smoke-Jack, Dry Toast, Cockroach, Pot-o'-Beer, and Florence Nightingale; received five dollars per month, a red cap, and a blue flannel shirt; and came aft every day to ask the name of their employer and inquire after the health of his near relatives. Such is African breeding.

At Cape Coast Castle, where poor Letitia Landon died and was buried, he asked to be shown her grave. "My companion answered by pointing to my feet, and I found I was standing on the grave of L. E. L."

The King of Ashantee is prohibited by law from having at any time more than three thousand three hundred and thirty-three wives; his government must therefore be called a limited monarchy; and it appears to have some features in common with other monarchies. The tax-gatherer is found in every market-place; there is even an income tax; the country has turnpikes, if we may believe Mr. Reade; there are revenue officers; and by a singular law, if a cock crows it is forfeited to the crown—for which reason the "bird of morn" is ingeniously muzzled in Ashantee. As for law and lawsuits, think of this: "A man has a fowl killed by another man's dog. After three years have elapsed he enters his indictment, suing not only for the fowl itself, but for the eggs which it would have laid, and for the chickens which it would have hatched in those three years." Surely, Dahomey needs but a few "modern improvements" to make of it a first-class monarchy.

From Dahomey the steamer turned off to Fernando Po, a cheerful island, where the bite of an insect is often fatal, and a gentleman bitten on the leg by a mosquito had to suffer amputation. The English on this coast have a habit of drinking brandy-and-water, of which the consequences are fatal, though our traveler was assured every where that no white man could exist on the coast without it. It appears to be as fatal to drink as to remain sober, though "society" does not acknowledge the fact, nor dilute its brandy.

At last, and by a roundabout way, made pleasant to the reader by much delightful gossip and some useful information, Mr. Reade arrived at the Gaboon, the trading station, which, as Mr. Du Chaillu's readers will remember, was that enterprising hunter's head-quarters.

Of Mr. Du Chaillu's friends, the Mpongwe, Mr. Reade tells us not much that is new, but he gives them the same character, of shrewd and unscrupulous traders, which his predecessor gave. Here is a story of a pilot and interpreter which is too characteristic to be omitted:

"Krinji was the salaried pilot and interpreter of the local government. He could speak Dikälë, Shekani, and Panwe or Fanh, the three dialects of the interior, as well as French, English, Spanish, and Portuguese. But when a negro is talented white men suffer. A new commandant having arrived in the Gaboon, he made the usual complimentary visit to King George, a powerful chieftain across the water, one of whose subjects had run away with Krinji's wife. Preparations having been made for a big palaver, the following conversation ensued in full native council.

"COMMANDANT. King George, the king of my country has sent me to take care of this river. I have come to bid you good-day. I hope that we shall be friends.

"KRINJI (interpreting). King George, the commandant says he has heard that one of your people has taken away my wife. He says that you must send her back directly.

"KING GEORGE. Your wife is nothing to me. Tell the commandant I can not trouble myself about a little palaver like that.

"KRINJI. King says he is very much pleased to see a great white man like you. He would like very much to be your friend.

"COMMANDANT. Tell the king I am very much pleased to hear those words. If he takes care of the French so that they have good trade, I will take care that he does not remain unrewarded. It is only by promoting peace and concord that our mutual interests will be benefited.

"KING GEORGE. What does he say?

"KRINJI. He says strong words. He says, Are you blind, that you do not see the men he has brought here with guns and swords? If you do not bring my wife very quickly here, he will make all your people dust, and your town ashes.

"KING GEORGE (to his men). Go out and get your guns. If there is trouble, kill Krinji first, but do not hurt the great white man.

"COMMANDANT. What are they all running out for?

"KRINJI. The king has told them to kill a sheep for your dinner. They run quickly because they love you.

"COMMANDANT. Oh, tell the king if I stop to dinner I shall lose the tide. I must go now.

"KRINJI. Well, King George, I ask the white man not to be angry about my palaver. You are my friend, and I do not wish to see you dead. So he says that he will go now, but if you do not send my wife in three days he will bring a ship with big guns to burn your town.

"The commandant, on hearing afterward how he had been tricked, was too much amused to be angry; but matters became more serious when Krinji, piloting a man-of-war, ran her aground, that he might have opportunities of plunder. A warrant was issued against him; he disappeared, and probably victimized the human race in some other quarter of the coast."

We must here mention that the great desire of Mr. Reade's heart was to shoot a gorilla. Alas, he had to leave Africa with this desire unsatisfied. His first sight of the great ape was at the Gaboon; he writes: "One day Mongilomba came and told me that there was a fresh-killed gorilla for sale. I went down to the beach, and saw it lying in a small canoe which it almost filled. It was a male, and a very large one. The preserved specimen can give you no idea of what this animal really is, with its skin yet unshriveled and the blood scarce dry upon its wounds. The hideousness of its face, the grand breadth of its breast, its massive arms, and, above all, its hands, like those of a human giant, impressed me with emotions which I had not expected to feel. But nothing is perfect. The huge trunk dwindled into a pair of legs, thin, bent, shriveled, and decrepit as those of an old man."

Here we may as well conclude the account of Mr. Reade's experiences of the gorilla. He ascended the Muni and the Fernand Vaz, explored in a somewhat too hasty manner the hunting ground of Mr. Du Chaillu; saw several dead gorillas, and the tracks and marks of living ones; heard the roar of one which ran away from him; but never got a shot at one. His experiences and observations, so far as they go, confirm in a remarkable manner the correctness of Mr. Du Chaillu's statements; he names the same kings, and tribes; he vouches for the cannibalism of the Fans, once smiled at as an incredible tale; he dined with Quengueza, and hunted with the Bakalai. What he saw with his own eyes proved his predecessor's narrative true; but he declines to believe that Mr. Du Chaillu himself shot gorillas. He believes that no white man has ever encountered the great ape; and he does not at all give credit to Mr. Du Chaillu's accounts of his experiences in that kind. His argument on this subject appears to us to have no weight at all. It amounts to just this: Mr. Reade, who remained in the gorilla country a few weeks, did not succeed in seeing or shooting one of these animals. Therefore he asks us to believe that Mr. Du Chaillu, who devoted nearly three years to their chase, had no better fortune.

But this disappointed gorilla-hunter has much else to tell us of; how he dined on monkey à l'odika—odika being a rich, dark, vegetable gravy, obtained from the kernel of the wild mango; and the monkey stew combining "the delicacy of a pullet and the rich savor of a hen-pheasant;" how he breakfasted on another dish, which tasted like a mixture of yellow soap and red pepper, and was as unpleasant as his dinner the day before had been delightful; how he was caught in a hurricane, and passed a dreadful night in the forest, wet through, and in momentary fear of being crushed beneath a falling tree; how he passed some feverish days in the cabin of a palm-oil trader, whose drunken captain persuaded him that all the crew were drunk, and himself alone sober and trust-worthy; while the mate pleasantly cautioned him, "Sir, Mr. Reade, if the captain gives you medicine, you ask him to drink a little himself first." The West African tragedy enacted on board this Liverpool bark (with real daggers and genuine poison) is a sombre story, which we shall not spoil by re-telling here.

He made a tour among the Fans, finding the women more charming than the men, and himself an object of so great curiosity that the enterprising Mpongwe fellow who piloted him might have made a fortune by exhibiting him for a small remuneration. A cannibal is not necessarily a ferocious creature, he says, but owns that, while with them, he never suffered those near him to get very hungry. A veteran Fan assured him, with a smile at the question, that "they all ate men," and volunteered the information that man was good—"like monkey, all fat." This gentleman confined himself to a diet of prisoners of war. Some people, he said, ate witches, but for his part he did not think them wholesome. When our traveler had cross-examined the Fan for some time he, in turn, took up the question and asked Mr. Reade why the white men took so much trouble to send for people to eat. "Were the black men nicer than white men to eat?" Then this white man saw for the first time that he, too, was thought a cannibal. "My answer," he says, "was dictated by a motive of policy. I said that the flesh of the white man was a deadly poison; and so not being able to eat one another we were obliged to send to this country."

He assisted at a slaughter of elephants, which had been penned up, and were killed with spears and guns; and then sailed for the Fernand Vaz, where he visited Ngumbi, the capital and residence of Mr. Du Chaillu's famous friend Quengueza, whose daughter, Ananga, a pretty savage if we may believe Mr. Reade, waited upon him and made love to him. Here for a short while he led a life as free, charming, and novel as Melville's in Typee.

"As I was seated in my house," says Mr. Reade, "the door opened, and a beautiful girl entered, accompanied by Oshupu. She was tall and finely moulded, her hands and feet exquisitely small, her complexion of that deep warm bronze color, which is as different from the animal blackness of the Coast negroes as it is from the sickly yellow of the Hindoos. Her eyes were large, and filled with a soft and melancholy expression. She came gracefully toward me, and, holding out her hand, murmured in a soft voice, Mbolo. This young lady was an emblem of hospitality. She told me, through Oshupu, that the king, her father, had ordered her to attend upon me in person (for that is the highest honor that can be paid to a guest); and, having asked me if I was pleased with the arrangements of the house, she smiled and went out.

"We spent hours every day in each other's company. It is impossible to imagine a more delicious study than this pretty savage afforded me. I found her as chaste, as coquettish, and as full of innocent mischief as a girl of sixteen would have been in England. In a little while I found myself becoming fond of her.

"At daybreak every morning she presented me with a cup of tea, which Oshupu had taught her to make, and with cakes made of ground-nuts and plantains pounded together. When I came back from the forest, worn out and dispirited, Ananga was there to receive me, and to bathe my wearied feet. She would bring me my dinner, which she had cooked with her own hands, like the daughters of the ancient Patriarchs. She would stand by me all the while; for she would let no one wait on me but her; and, by devouring me with her looks, would anticipate all my wants.

"When I had finished my dinner, we would sit side by side, and I would look at my face in her eyes—the only mirror which I possessed. One day Ananga reproached me with being artificial. What made me wear so many clothes? she asked, with inexpressible scorn. I replied that it was one of the foolish fashions of my country. And was it a fashion of my country, she asked, to wear the hair of a wild beast on my head, and to paint my face white? On my replying that Njambi had thought fit to create me with these deformities, she uttered a cry of derision, and, taking hold of my hair, pulled it severely. When it did not come out, her eyes dilated, and she looked at me in stupefaction. Then, wetting her finger, she rubbed my cheek with it, and fled in terror to my interpreters. They laughed at her uproariously, and she came back in a shamefaced manner, and sat beside me without speaking. One day I put my hands in my pockets. The sudden disappearance of two important members filled her with dismay; but, when I explained the phenomenon, she went into convulsions of delight. Nothing would now content her but diving her hands all day long into these wonderful 'holes,' as she called them; and she used even to hold soirées, to which her numerous sisters were invited. I was made to put my hands in my pockets at least fifty times an evening; and my hands themselves were passed from one to the other, and examined by these young philosophers, as if they were newly-discovered fossils."

Was ever a young gentleman about town so pleasantly situated before? The King of the Rembo showed our traveler the fashions of the country; he attended at a grotesque exhibition called a gorilla-dance of which he gives a picture. Surely the charmer sitting at his side is not the pretty Ananga? He hunted, also; and one day came upon the tracks of a gorilla, and heard the monstrous beast passing through the forest, but he was not favored with a shot at it, or at any of its kind. When he attempted to leave Ngumbi, it pleased the mighty Quengueza to say no; and when Ananga's lover went off in spite of the royal commands, he was overtaken and brought back. Do not imagine that the princess was about to institute a suit for breach of promise of marriage. Her lover had promised nothing, except a great number of trinkets, which he had already given; and, moreover, on the Rembo women do not sue.

"Would you like to come with me to my country?" asked the traveler of his princess, the evening after his forcible return, and received for reply: "I am a bundle; if my father tells you to take me, I am taken; if my father tells you to leave me, I am left. Man is the master."

But on this evening he was curious to learn why she loved him, as she confessed, with such blushes as a princess may blush, better than any of her own people.

"‘Why do you love me better than black men, Ananga?’"

She hesitated to answer. "At last she said faintly that she loved me better than them, she could not tell why. But I made her fond of me; perhaps it was some fetich which I had given her. She was only a poor black girl; how was she to know all the arts of a great white man?"

"Ah, thought I, not without a little self-complacency, love is indeed a fetich which no philosopher can define, and which may be concealed in a look, in a smile, in a word; which—

"Ananga's musical laugh interrupted my meditations. She was chattering something to Mafuk with vast noise and volubility. Now savages can not speak without a pantomime of eyes and hands, which often renders language superfluous. Ananga was touching her beads and cloth, glancing at me, and laughing immoderately.

"‘What is she saying, Mafuk?’ said I.

"My grave tone warned Ananga. She said something in a low, quick tone to Mafuk; but as she put her fingers on her lips at the same time, I easily guessed the meaning of her words.

"‘She is asking you not to tell me, Mafuk; but I am your master: do what I order you.’"

"Mafuk, alarmed by my apparent knowledge of Mpongwe, and by my imperious tone, confessed what Ananga had just said, viz., that she thought a white face very ugly; that having her face wetted with a man's lips was very improper, and not nice at all; and, finally, that she only liked me because I had a fine canoe and servants, and because I had given her plenty of beads and some fine satin-stripe cloth.

"Upon this," adds Mr. Reade, "I went into the house of the slaves, and began to take down some words of the Mchâgâ dialect."

It was not without ingenious shifts, nor without danger, that he at last escaped from Ngumbi.

It was Mr. Reade's fortune to go to St. Paul de Loanda in an empty slaver; he landed after a tedious passage of fifty-six days, which would have been made by a steamer in four days. He had no friends at St. Paul, no letters of introduction, and three and sixpence in his pocket. He went ashore hoping to find letters at the Consul's office, but was told that they had just been sent back to Fernando Po. Luckily the Consul, Mr. Gabriel, was a gentleman, and lent him a hundred pounds, furnished with which our man about town projected an excursion into the interior.

St. Paul de Loanda is not a charming place. The streets are ankle-deep with sand, the public buildings are all decaying, or in statu quo; oxen are stalled in the college of the Jesuits. The town is garrisoned with convicts, who are kept from mutiny by a low diet; if they nevertheless commit crimes, they are sent into the interior, where they catch fever and die. The Portuguese have fallen into the native fashion and keep seraglios; society is not of the best in St. Paul. In short, it is, though in a different sense, what Mr. Douglas said Vermont was, a good place to go away from.

Mr. Reade determined on a visit to the interior of Angola. He procured for guide a mysterious Swiss castaway—a clever fellow, master of a dozen languages, a good cook, and a cut-throat; for the rest, intelligent and industrious. The style of traveling in Angola is represented in the adjoining illustration. The hammock-bearers went off at a shuffling trot; the leader had a small stick in his hand, with which he beat time like a band-master, and howled:

Shove him on!
But is he a good man?
No, I think he is, a stingy fellow.
Shove him on!
Let him drop in the road, then.
No, he has a big stick;
Shove him on!
Oh matta-bicho! matta-bicho!
Who will give me matta-bicho?

Matta-bicho is a phrase meaning kill-worm. These people suppose that their entrails are tormented by a small worm, which it is necessary to kill with raw brandy. The mosquitoes of Angola are of a peculiarly malevolent species, says Mr. Reade. We remember that Dr. Livingstone made the same remark. Why, is a puzzle to our author and beyond his comprehension. Perhaps they get less to eat or drink. He remarks also that the alligators are more savage. Perhaps in that torrid and unbearable clime all animal nature becomes ill-tempered and vindictive.

The traveler is well cared for in Angola. At frequent intervals are found caravanserais—unfurnished hotels without a table d'hôte—where a policeman—think of a policeman in Africa!—makes the sojourners comfortable, and furnishes fire and water. The story of Joachim, the interpreter and steward, forms the most interesting episode in the journey to Ambaka; but we must leave this gentlemanly cut-throat to the readers of Mr. Reade's book. Suffice it to say that he had wit, elegance, a virtuous expression of countenance, and a fine tenor voice; that he understood excellently the mystery of cooking an omelette; and confessed to having murdered a rival in Switzerland.

In a country like Angola, if the annual rains set in a week later than the usual time, it becomes a serious matter to the animal inhabitants. Thus Mr. Reade found birds which had evidently perished from drought, and bees attacked their calabashes of water. On the tenth day they reached the goal of their journey, Ambaka, and put up at the house of one Senhor Mendez, a lawyer, rich, living in a shed, with an invalid wife bestowed in an outhouse. Senhor Mendez was an educated man, took an interest in European politics, and gravely inquired if the Russian war was yet over, and whether Lord Palmerston were yet alive. They sell raw-hide shoes at a shilling the pair in Ambaka, serve Champagne in liqueur glasses, and have an ugly habit of secret poisoning. They drink stale, musty tea, preferring it to excellent native-grown coffee; and once, at the table of Senhor Mendez, when Mr. Reade and Joachim were taking coffee, their host cried out to one of his poor relations, sitting at table, to make haste and finish his tea, and then drink some coffee; "so that"—turning to his guests with a considerate smile—"if you should be poisoned on the road, you may not think it was here." The Senhor was friendly; but one of his neighbors, at whose house our author was obliged to sleep, with ingenious malignity took the mosquito curtains from his bed, and left the "accursed Englishman" to unbearable torment.

On his return to Loanda Mr. Reade was seized with fever, and got away as fast as he could in a steamer to the Cape de Verdes, whence he traveled to the Senegambia, and visited the French, whom he found a jollier and more endurable people than the Portuguese. On the passage he interpolates a chapter on the great Congo Empire, which is pleasant reading though scarcely to be believed. However, if not true, it is "well found," and a history of the interior of Africa constructed in the same style would be a very amusing book.

The French carry their national habits with them into every country where they settle. When Mr. Reade landed in the Casemanche, at Goree, he went immediately to a pension, where he found a French sea-captain drinking absinthe at a little table, and a lieutenant trying on a new pair of patent-leather boots. He accepted an invitation to visit the interior with a French trader, at whose house, a hundred miles inland, he found a good library of the French classics; and a company of marabouts, who had crossed the continent as traders, and could tell our traveler many marvelous tales: of lions with long manes; of an antelope striped like a zebra—which he shot afterward—of a tribe of men on the Niger, who could live several hours under water, and caught crocodiles alive; and lastly, of the wonderful tree Self-fire, whose fruit explodes when ripe with a report like a musket-shot, and burns the tree, from whose ashes rises, phoenix-like, a new shoot. Moved by these stories he determined upon a journey still further inland, among the celebrated tribe of Mandingoes. Returning to the Casemanche on Christmas-eve, he was made home-sick by a sight of which an illustration will give the reader some idea, accompanied by the caroling, by negroes ignorant of English, of some old Christmas chants. This is a curious relic of a custom implanted here by the English when they possessed this region of the Senegal many years ago. The natives keep it up without knowing, or caring for, its meaning.

The next morning he enjoyed a breakfast which was certainly eccentric. His French friends had made great preparations to keep up Christmas. They began this meal with snails, brought from France in barrels filled with flour, which preserved them admirably. These were accompanied by oysters torn from trees. The fish consisted of African soles, carp, and mullet. To these followed gazelle cutlets; two small monkeys, served cross legged, with liver sauce; stewed iguana—a lizard, and a dish much admired; roasted crocodile eggs; some slices of smoked elephant, a rarity from the interior; a few plates of fried locusts, and some land crabs previously fattened; the breasts of a manatee or sea-cow, the mermaid of old sailors; a dish of boiled alligator, which had a taste between pork and cod, with a musky flavor added; and finally some hippopotamus steaks. The dessert consisted of pine-apples, oranges, roasted plantains, silver bananas, pawpaws, and “a variety of fruits which had long native names, curious shapes, and without exception a nasty taste.”

After such a breakfast dinner was impossible—so it formed the only meal of the day. He tells some remarkable stories of the dog-faced baboon—a fierce animal, which attacks man without fear, and has been known, it seems, to carry off women, concerning which trait Mr. Reade gives a curious story on apparently good evidence. In this part of Africa game is plentiful, though the gorilla is not found there. And what is more, he relates an apparently well-authenticated ghost-story, in which the ghost of an unlucky surgeon Beale was seen by a dozen persons on a dozen different occasions. This occurred at Macarthy's Island on the Gambia. From there he went to the Senegal; of the customs of the Fullahs, the Mohammedan tribe found there, he gives a full and very interesting account.

Among the French, who are settled in the country, or who garrison it, cleanliness is a boon not obtainable without personal effort; at the Governor's table every guest cleaned his own plate, and Mr. Reade tells a ghastly story of dining with a friend, and catching the young scamp who waited on the table cleaning the plates by licking them with his tongue. The red ants in this country are very fatal to houses, wooden chests, paper, elephants, leopards, and even Scotchmen; a few years ago they ate up a gentleman of this nation, who had unfortunately taken a bottle of brandy too much.

The Senegal and Gambia are subject to great floods, in which the waters cover all the surrounding country, and cause such scenes as that which he has depicted in an illustration. All the beasts of the forests, tamed by fear, crouch, terror-stricken, together upon the highest points of land. Such a scene gives one to understand under what influences the animals entered the ark of Father Noah. Sergeant Boivin told him that once, during a flood, he came upon a little island in the watery waste, where were found amicably reposing together two lions, a leopard, some monkeys and hyenas, two antelopes, and a wild boar. The Sergeant confessed without a blush that “all of these they killed without difficulty.”

In this region he heard of a female Napoleon, concerning whose exploits he has some remarkable incidents to tell. This Amazon, the Queen of the Jagas, is said to have been brave as the lion was supposed to be before Dr. Livingstone exploded him. She is reported to have ordered a massacre of all male children, and attempted to found an Amazon empire; she had a cruel habit of dining on her lovers; and finally a prudent lover—if there are such beings—poisoned her. Those who choose may believe this story of the Queen of the Jagas, which is told at considerable length, and is amusing even if scarcely credible. Nor will the reader skip the chapter devoted to the fabulous monsters of Africa—the roc, the unicorn, and the tailed men, concerning whose existence there are various stories, gathered up by the industrious club-man. Concerning the tails of the Niam-Niams, he cites the evidence of one Mahammah, who had seen them, and describes the caudal appendage as about forty centimetres in length, and two or three in diameter—and without hair. The owners of these tails are cannibals, live in holes in the rocks, go naked, are of a deep black, file their teeth, and make fire by means of a stone which they find in their country. They fight with clubs, bows and arrows, and assegais; cultivate rice and corn, and some fruits; have woolly hair; and are killed by their neighbors because they have tails. Mr. Reade gives a good deal of very interesting information concerning these people.

Finally, says Mr. Reade, “I found that a tour in Africa, where one is always on the move, is as expensive as traveling in Europe. I also began to observe that the little dwelling which I sent from Providence was getting sadly out of repair. I was what the French call fatigué, and we ‘used up.’ I resolved to return.”

THEODOSIA BURR.

NEW YORK does well to celebrate the anniversary of the day when the British troops evacuated the city; for it was in truth the birthday of all that we now mean by the City of New York. One hundred and seventy-four years had elapsed since Hendrick Hudson landed upon the shores of Manhattan; but the town could only boast a population of twenty-three thousand. In ten years the population doubled; in twenty years trebled. Washington Irving was a baby seven months old, at his father's house in William Street, on Evacuation Day, the 25th of November, 1783. On coming of age he found himself the inhabitant of a city containing a population of seventy thousand. When he died, at the age of seventy-five, more than a million of people inhabited the congregation of cities which form the metropolis of America.

The beginnings of great things are always interesting to us. New Yorkers, at least, can not read without emotion the plain, matter-of-fact accounts in the old newspapers of the manner in which the city of their pride changed masters. Journalism has altered its modes of procedure since that memorable day. No array of headings in large type called the attention of readers to the details of this great event in the history of their town, and no editorial article in extra leads commented upon it. The newspapers printed the merest programme of the proceedings, with scarcely a comment of their own; and, having done that, they felt that their duty was done, for no subsequent issue contains an allusion to the subject. Perhaps the reader will be gratified by a perusal of the account of the evacuation as given in Rivington's Gazette of November 26, 1783.

New York November 26:—Yesterday in the Morning the American Troops marched from Haerlem, to the Bowery-Lane—They remained there until about One o'Clock, when the British Troops left the Posts in the Bowery, and the American Troops marched into, and took Possession of the City, in the following Order, viz.

1. A Corps of Dragoons
2. Advanced Guard of Light Infantry.
3. A Corps of Artillery
4. Battalion of Light Infantry.
5. Battalion of Massachusetts Troops,
6. Rear Guard

After the Troops had taken Possession of the City, the GENERAL [Washington] and GOVERNOR [George Clinton] made their Public Entry in the following Manner:

- 1 Their Excellencies the General and Governor, with their Suites, on Horseback.
- 2 The Lieutenant-Governor, and the Members of the Council, for the Temporary Government of the Southern District, four a-breast.
3. Major General Knox, and the Officers of the Army, eight a-breast
4. Citizens on Horseback, eight a-breast.
5. The Speaker of the Assembly, and Citizens, on Foot, eight a-breast

Their Excellencies the Governor and Commander in Chief were escorted by a Body of West-Chester Light Horse, under the command of Captain Delavan.

The Procession proceeded down Queen-Street [now Pearl], and through the Broadway, to Cape's Tavern.

The Governor gave a public Dinner at Fraunces's Tavern; at which the Commander in Chief and other General Officers were present.

After Dinner, the following Toasts were drank by the Company:

1. The United States of America.
2. His most Christian Majesty.
3. The United Netherlands.
4. The King of Sweden.
5. The American Army
6. The Fleet and Armies of France, which have served in America.
7. The Memory of those Heroes, who have fallen for our Freedom.
8. May our Country be grateful to her military children.
9. May Justice support what Courage has gained
10. The Vindicators of the Rights of Mankind in every Quarter of the Globe
- 11 May America be an Asylum to the persecuted of the Earth.
12. May a close Union of the States guard the Temple they have erected to Liberty.
13. May the Remembrance of THIS DAY be a Lesson to Princes.

The arrangement and whole conduct of this march, with the tranquillity which succeeded it, through the day and night, was admirable! and the grateful citizens will ever feel the most affectionate impressions, from that elegant and efficient disposition which prevailed through the whole event.

Such was the journalism of that primitive day. The sedate Rivington, for so many years the Tory organ, was in no humor, we may suppose, to chronicle the minor events of the occasion, even if he had not considered them beneath the dignity of his vocation. He says nothing of the valiant matron in Chatham Row who, in the impatience of her patriotism, hoisted the American flag over her door two hours before the stipulated moment, noon, and defended it against a British provost officer with her broomstick. Nor does he allude to the great scene at the principal flag-staff, which the retiring garrison had plentifully greased, and from which they had removed the blocks and halyards, in order to retard the hoisting of the stars and stripes. He does not tell us how a sailor boy, with a line around his waist and a pocket full of spikes, hammered his way to the top of the staff, and restored the tackling by which the flag was flung to the breeze before the barges containing the British rear-guard had reached the fleet. It was a sad day for Mr. Rivington, and he may be excused for not dwelling upon its incidents longer than stern duty demanded.

The whole State of New York had been waiting impatiently for the evacuation of the City. Many hundreds of the old Whig inhabitants, who had fled at the entrance of the English troops seven years before, were eager to come again into possession of their homes and property, and resume their former occupations. Many new enterprises waited only for the departure of the troops to be entered upon. A large number of young men were looking to New York as the scene of their future career. Albany, which had served as the temporary capital of the State, was full of lawyers, law-students, retired soldiers, merchants, and mechanics, who were prepared to remove to New York as soon as Rivington's Gazette should inform them that the British had really left, and General Washington taken possession. As in these days certain promises to pay are to be fulfilled six months after the United States shall have acknowledged the independence of a certain Confederacy, so at that time it was a custom for leases and other compacts to be dated from "the day on which the British troops shall leave New York." Among the young men in Albany who were intending to repair to the city were two retired officers of distinction, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, a student at law, and AARON BURR, then in the second year of his practice at the bar. (JAMES KENT and EDWARD LIVINGSTON were also students of law in Albany at that time.) The old Tory lawyers being all exiled or silenced there was a promising field in New York for young advocates of talent, and these two young gentlemen had both contracted marriages which necessitated speedy professional gains. Hamilton had won the daughter of General Schuyler. Burr was married to the widow of a British officer, whose fortune was a few hundred pounds and two fine strapping boys fourteen and sixteen years of age.

And Burr was himself a father. THEODOSIA, "his only child," was born at Albany in the spring of 1783. When the family removed to New York in the following winter, and took up their abode in Maiden Lane—"the rent to commence when the troops leave the city"—she was an engaging infant of seven or eight months. We may infer something of the circumstances and prospects of her father when we know that he had ventured upon a house of which the rent was two hundred pounds a year. We find him removing, a year or two after, to a mansion at the corner of Cedar and Nassau streets, the garden and grapery of which were among the finest in the thickly-settled portion of the city. Fifty years after he had still an office within a very few yards of the same spot, though all trace of the garden of Theodosia's childhood had long ago disappeared. She was a child of affluence. Not till she had left her father's house did a shadow of misfortune darken its portals. Abundance and elegance surrounded her from her infancy, and whatever advantages in education and training wealth can procure for a child she had in profusion. At the same time her father's vigilant stoicism guarded her from the evils attendant upon a too easy acquisition of things pleasant and desirable.

She was born into a happy home. Even if we had not the means of knowing something of the character of her mother, we might still infer that she must have possessed qualities singularly attractive to induce a man in the position of Burr to undertake the charge of a family at the outset of his career. She was neither handsome nor young, nor had she even the advantage of good health. A scar disfigured her face. Burr—the brilliant and celebrated Burr—heir of an honored name, had linked his rising fortunes with an invalid and her boys. The event most abundantly justified his choice, for in all the fair island of Manhattan there was not a happier family than his, nor one in which happiness was more securely founded in the diligent discharge of duty. The twelve years of his married life were his brightest and best; and among the last words he ever spoke were a pointed declaration that his wife was the best woman and the finest lady he had ever known. It was her cultivated mind that drew him to her. "It was a knowledge of your mind," he once wrote her, "which first inspired me with a respect for that of your sex, and with some regret I confess, that the ideas you have often heard me express in favor of female intellectual power are founded in what I have imagined more than in what I have seen, except in you."

In those days an educated woman was among the rarest of rarities. The wives of many of our most renowned revolutionary leaders were surprisingly illiterate. Except the noble wife of John Adams, whose letters form so agreeable an oasis in the published correspondence of the time, it would be difficult to mention the name of one lady of the revolutionary period who could have been a companion to the mind of a man of culture. Mrs. Burr, on the contrary, was the equal of her husband in literary discernment, and his superior in moral judgment. Her remarks, in her letters to her husband, upon the popular authors of the day, Chesterfield, Rousseau, Voltaire, and others, show that she could correct as well as sympathize with her husband's taste. She could enjoy the wit of Voltaire without being perverted by his scoffing. She relished all of Chesterfield except the "indulgence," which Burr thought essential. She had a weakness for Rousseau, but was not deluded by his sentimentality. She enjoyed Gibbon without stumbling at his fifteenth and sixteenth chapters.

The home of Theodosia presents to us a pleasing scene of virtuous industry. The master of the house, always an indomitable worker, was in the full tide of a successful career at the bar. His two step-sons were employed in his office, and one of them frequently accompanied him in his journeys to distant courts as clerk or amanuensis. No father could have been more generous or more thoughtful than he was for these fatherless youths, and they appeared to have cherished for him the liveliest affection. Mrs. Burr shared in the labors of the office during the absence of her lord. All the affairs of this happy family moved in harmony, for love presided at their board, inspired their exertions, and made them one. One circumstance alone interrupted their felicity, and that was the frequent absence of Burr from home on business at country courts; but even these journeys served to call forth from all the family the warmest effusions of affection.

"What language can express the joy, the gratitude of Theodosia!" writes Mrs. Burr to her absent husband, in the fifth year of their marriage. "Stage after stage without a line. Thy usual punctuality gave room for every fear; various conjectures filled every breast. One of our sons was to have departed to-day in quest of the best of friends and fathers. This morning we waited the stage with impatience. Shrouder went frequently before it arrived; at length returned—no letter. We were struck dumb with disappointment. Barton [eldest son] set out to inquire who were the passengers; in a very few minutes returned exulting—a packet worth the treasures of the universe. Joy brightened every face; all expressed their past anxieties, their present happiness. To enjoy was the first result. Each made choice of what they could best relish. Porter, sweet wine, chocolate, and sweetmeats made the most delightful repast that could be enjoyed without thee. The servants were made to feel their lord was well; are at this instant toasting his health and bounty. While the boys are obeying thy dear commands, thy Theodosia flies to speak her heartfelt joy—her Aaron safe—mistress of the heart she adores, can she ask more? Has Heaven more to grant?"

What a pleasing picture of a happy family circle is this, and how rarely are the perils of a second marriage so completely overcome! It was in such a warm and pleasant nest as this that Theodosia Burr passed the years of her childhood.

Charles Lamb used to say that babies had no right to our regard merely as babies, but that every child had a character of its own by which it must stand or fall in the esteem of disinterested observers. Theodosia was a beautiful and forward child, formed to be the pet and pride of a household. "Your dear little Theo," wrote her mother in her third year, "grows the most engaging child you ever saw. It is impossible to see her with indifference." From her earliest years she exhibited that singular fondness for her father which afterward became the ruling passion of her life, and which was to undergo the severest tests that filial affection has ever known. When she was but three years of age her mother would write: "Your dear little daughter seeks you twenty times a day; calls you to your meals, and will not suffer your chair to be filled by any of the family." And again: "Your dear little Theodosia can not hear you spoken of without an apparent melancholy; inasmuch that her nurse is obliged to exert her invention to divert her, and myself avoid to mention you in her presence. She was one whole day indifferent to every thing but your name. Her attachment is not of a common nature."

Here was an inviting opportunity for developing an engaging infant into that monstrous thing, a spoiled child. She was an only daughter in a family of which all the members but herself were adults, and the head of which was among the busiest of men.

But Aaron Burr, amidst all the toils of his profession, and in spite of the distractions of political strife, made the education of his daughter the darling object of his existence. Hunters tell us that pointers and hounds inherit the instinct which renders them such valuable allies in the pursuit of game; so that the offspring of a trained dog acquires the arts of the chase with very little instruction. Burr's father was one of the most zealous and skillful of schoolmasters, and from him he appears to have derived that pedagogic cast of character which led him, all his life, to take so much interest in the training of protégés. There was never a time in his whole career when he had not some youth upon his hands to whose education he was devoted. His system of training, with many excellent points, was radically defective. Its defects are sufficiently indicated when we say that it was pagan, not Christian. Plato, Socrates, Cato, and Cicero, might have pronounced it good and sufficient: St. John, St. Augustine, and all the Christian host would have lamented it as fatally defective. But if Burr educated his child as though she were a Roman girl, her mother was with her during the first eleven years of her life, to supply, in some degree, what was wanting in the instructions of her father.

Burr was a stoic. He cultivated hardness. Fortitude and fidelity were his favorite virtues. The seal which he used in his correspondence with his intimate friends, and with them only, was descriptive of his character and prophetic of his destiny. It was a Rock, solitary in the midst of a tempestuous ocean, and bore the inscription, "Nec flatu nec fluctu"—neither by wind nor by wave. It was his principle to steel himself against the inevitable evils of life. If we were asked to select from his writings the sentence which contains most of his characteristic way of thinking, it would be one which he wrote in his twenty-fourth year to his future wife: "That mind is truly great which can bear with equanimity the trifling and unavoidable vexations of life, and be affected only by those which determine our substantial bliss." He utterly despised all complaining even of the greatest calamities. He even experienced a kind of proud pleasure in enduring the fierce obloquy of his later years. One day, near the close of his life, when a friend had told him of some new scandal respecting his moral conduct, he said: "That's right, my child, tell me what they say. I like to know what the public say of me—the great public!" Such words he would utter without the slightest bitterness, speaking of the great public as a humorous old grandfather might of a wayward, foolish, good little child.

So, at the dawn of a career which promised nothing but glory and prosperity, surrounded by all the appliances of ease and pleasure, he was solicitous to teach his child to do and to endure. He would have her accustomed to sleep alone, and to go about the house in the dark. Her breakfast was of bread and milk. He was resolute in exacting the less agreeable tasks, such as arithmetic. He insisted upon regularity of hours. Upon going away upon a journey he would leave written orders for her tutors, detailing the employments of each day; and, during his absence, a chief topic of his letters was the lessons of the children. Children—for, that his Theodosia might have the advantage of a companion in her studies, he adopted the little Natalie, a French child, whom he reared to womanhood in his house. "The letters of our dear children," he would write, "are a feast. To hear that they are employed, that no time is absolutely wasted, is the most flattering of any thing that could be told me of them. It insures their affection, or is the best evidence of it. It insures, in its consequences, every thing I am ambitious of in them. Endeavor to preserve regularity of hours; it conduces exceedingly to industry." And his wife would answer: "I really believe, my dear, that few parents can boast of children whose minds are so prone to virtue. I see the reward of our assiduity with inexpressible delight, with a gratitude few experience. My Aaron, they have grateful hearts." Or thus: "Theo [seven years old] ciphers from five in the morning until eight, and also the same hours in the evening. This prevents our riding at those hours."

When Theodosia was ten years old Mary Wollstonecraft's eloquent little book, "A Vindication of the Rights of Woman," fell into Burr's hands. He was so powerfully struck by it that he sat up nearly all night reading it. He showed it to all his friends. "Is it owing to ignorance or prejudice," he wrote, "that I have not yet met a single person who had discovered or would allow the merit of this work?" The work, indeed, was fifty years in advance of the time; for it anticipated all that is rational in the opinions respecting the position and education of women which are now held by the ladies who are stigmatized as the Strong-minded, as well as by John Mill, Herbert Spencer, and other economists of the modern school. It demanded fair play for the understanding of women. It proclaimed the essential equality of the sexes. It denounced the awful libertinism of that age, and showed that the weakness, the ignorance, the vanity, and the seclusion of women prepared them to become the tool and minion of bad men's lust. It criticised ably the educational system of Rousseau, and, with still more severity, the popular works of bishops and priests, who chiefly strove to inculcate an abject submission to man as the rightful lord of the sex. It demonstrated that the sole possibility of woman's elevation to the rank of man's equal and friend was in the cultivation of her mind, and in the thoughtful discharge of the duties of her lot. It is a really noble and brave little book, undeserving of the oblivion into which it has fallen. No intelligent woman, no wise parent with daughters to rear, could read it now without pleasure and advantage.

"Meekness," she says, "may excite tenderness, and gratify the arrogant pride of man; but the lordly caresses of a protector will not gratify a noble mind that pants and deserves to be respected. Fondness is a poor substitute for friendship.".... "A girl whose spirits have not been damped by inactivity, or innocence tainted by false shame, will always be a romp, and the doll will never excite attention unless confinement allows her no alternative.".... "Most of the women, in the circle of my observation, who have acted like rational creatures, have accidentally been allowed to run wild, as some of the elegant formers of the fair sex would insinuate.".... "Men have better tempers than women because they are occupied by pursuits that interest the head as well as the heart. I never knew a weak or ignorant person who had a good temper.".... "Why are girls to be told that they resemble angels, but to sink them below women? They are told that they are only like angels when they are young and beautiful; consequently it is their persons, not their virtues, that procure them this homage.".... "It is in vain to attempt to keep the heart pure unless the head is furnished with ideas.".... "Would ye, O my sisters, really possess modesty, ye must remember that the possession of virtue, of any denomination, is incompatible with ignorance and vanity! Ye must acquire that soberness of mind which the exercise of duties and the pursuit of knowledge alone inspire, or ye will still remain in a doubtful, dependent situation, and only be loved while ye are fair! The downcast eye, the rosy blush, the retiring grace, are all proper in their season; but modesty being the child of reason can not long exist with the sensibility that is not tempered by reflection.".... "With what disgust have I heard sensible women speak of the wearisome confinement which they endured at school. Not allowed, perhaps, to step out of one broad path in a superb garden, and obliged to pace, with steady deportment, stupidly backward and forward, holding up their heads and turning out their toes, with shoulders braced back, instead of bounding forward, as nature directs to complete her own design, in the various attitudes so conducive to health. The pure animal spirits, which make both mind and body shoot out and unfold the tender blossoms of hope, are turned sour and vented in vain wishes or pert reprimands, that contract the faculties and spoil the temper; else they mount to the brain, and sharpening the understanding before it gains proportionable strength, produce that pitiful cunning which disgracefully characterizes the female mind—and, I fear, will ever characterize it while women remain the slaves of power."

In the spirit of this book Theodosia's education was conducted. Her mind had fair play. Her father took it for granted that she could learn what a boy of the same age could learn, and gave her precisely the advantages which he would have given a son. Besides the usual accomplishments, French, music, dancing, and riding, she learned to read Virgil, Horace, Terence, Lucian, Homer, in the original. She appears to have read all of Terence and Lucian, a great part of Horace, all the Iliad, and large portions of the Odyssey. "Cursed effects," exclaimed her father once, "of fashionable education, of which both sexes are the advocates, and yours eminently the victims. If I could foresee that Theo would become a mere fashionable woman, with all the attendant frivolity and vacuity of mind, adorned with whatever grace and allurements, I would earnestly pray God to take her forthwith hence. But I yet hope by her to convince the world what neither sex appears to believe, that women have souls."

How faithfully, how skillfully he labored to kindle and nourish the intelligence of his child his letters to her attest. He was never too busy to spare a half-hour in answering her letters. In a country court-room, in the Senate-chamber, he wrote her brief and sprightly notes, correcting her spelling, complimenting her style, reproving her indolence, praising her industry, commenting on her authors. Rigorous taskmaster as he was, he had a strong sense of the value of just commendation, and he continued to mingle praise very happily with reproof. A few sentences from his letters to her will serve to show his manner.

(In her tenth year.)—"I rose up suddenly from the sofa, and rubbing my head, 'What book shall I buy for her?' said I to myself. 'She reads so much and so rapidly that it is not easy to find proper and amusing French books for her; and yet I am so flattered with her progress in that language that I am resolved she shall, at all events, be gratified. Indeed I owe it to her.' So after walking once or twice briskly across the floor, I took my hat and sallied out, determined not to return till I had purchased something. It was not my first attempt. I went into one bookseller's shop after another. I found plenty of fairy tales and such nonsense, fit for the generality of children nine or ten years old. 'These,' said I, 'will never do. Her understanding begins to be above such things;' but I could see nothing that I would offer with pleasure to an intelligent, well-informed girl nine years old. I began to be discouraged. The hour of dining was come.

'But I will search a little longer.' I persevered. At last I found it. I found the very thing I sought. It is contained in two volumes octavo, handsomely bound, and with prints and registers. It is a work of fancy, but replete with instruction and amusement. I must present it with my own hand."

He advised her to keep a diary, and to give her an idea of what she should record he wrote for her such a journal of one day as he should like to receive.

Plan of the Journal.—"Learned 230 lines, which finished Horace. Heigh-ho for Terence and the Greek Grammar to-morrow. Practiced two hours less thirty-five minutes, which I begged off. Howlett (dancing-master) did not come. Began Gibbon last evening. I find he requires as much study and attention as Horace; so I shall not rank the reading of him among amusements. Skated an hour; fell twenty times, and find the advantage of a hard head. Ma better—dined with us at table, and is still sitting up and free from pain."

She was remiss in keeping her journal; remiss, too, in writing to her father, though he reminded her that he never let one of her letters remain unanswered a day. He reproved her sharply. "What," said he, "can neither affection nor civility induce you to devote to me the small portion of time which I have required? Are authority and compulsion then the only engines by which you can be moved? For shame, Theo. Do not give me reason to think so ill of you."

She reformed. In her twelfth year, her father wrote: "Io triumphe! there is not a word misspelled either in your journal or letter, which can not be said of one you ever wrote before." And again: "When you want punctuality in your letters, I am sure you want it in every thing; for you will constantly observe that you have the most leisure when you do the most business. Negligence of one's duty produces a self-dissatisfaction which unfits the mind for every thing, and ennui and peevishness are the never-failing consequence."

His letters abound in sound advice. There is scarcely a passage in them which the most scrupulous and considerate parent could disapprove. Theodosia heeded well his instructions. She became nearly all that his heart or his pride desired.

During the later years of her childhood, her mother was grievously afflicted with a cancer, which caused her death in 1794, before Theodosia had completed her twelfth year. From that time, such was the precocity of her character, that she became the mistress of her father's house and the companion of his leisure hours. Continuing her studies, however, we find her in her sixteenth year translating French comedies, reading the Odyssey at the rate of two hundred lines a day, and about to begin the Iliad. "The happiness of my life," writes her father, "depends upon your exertions; for what else, for whom else, do I live?" And, later, when all the world supposed that his whole soul was absorbed in getting New York ready to vote for Jefferson and Burr, he told her that the ideas of which she was the subject that passed daily through his mind would, if committed to writing, fill an octavo volume.

Who so happy as Theodosia? Who so fortunate? The young ladies of New York, at the close of the last century, might have been pardoned for envying the lot of this favorite child of one who then seemed the favorite child of fortune. Burr had been a Senator of the United States as soon as he had attained the age demanded by the Constitution. As a lawyer he was second in ability and success to no man; in reputation, to none but Hamilton, whose services in the Cabinet of General Washington had given him great celebrity. Aged members of the New York bar remember that Burr alone was the antagonist who could put Hamilton to his mettle. When other lawyers were employed against him Hamilton's manner was that of a man who felt an easy superiority to the demands upon him; he took few notes; he was playful and careless, relying much upon the powerful declamation of his summing up. But when Burr was in the case, Burr the wary, the vigilant, who was never careless, never inattentive, who came into court only after an absolutely exhaustive preparation of his case, who held declamation in contempt, and knew how to quench its effect by a stroke of polite satire, or the quiet citation of a fact, then Hamilton was obliged to have all his wits about him, and he was observed to be restless, busy, and serious. There are now but two or three venerable men among us who remember the keen encounters of these two distinguished lawyers. The vividness of their recollection of those scenes of sixty years ago shows what an impression must have been made upon their youthful minds.

If Hamilton and Burr divided equally between them the honors of the bar, Burr had the additional distinction of being a leader of the rising Democratic Party; the party to which, at that day, the youth, the genius, the sentiment of the country were powerfully drawn; the party which, by his masterly tactics, was about to place Mr. Jefferson in the Presidential chair after ten years of ineffectual struggle.

All this enhanced the éclat of Theodosia's position. As she rode about the island on her pony, followed at a respectful distance, as the custom then was, by one of her father's slaves mounted on a coach-horse, doubtless many a fair damsel of the city repined at her own homelier lot, while she dwelt upon the many advantages which nature and circumstances had bestowed upon this gifted and happy maiden.

She was a beautiful girl. She inherited all her father's refined beauty of countenance; also his shortness of stature; the dignity, grace, and repose of his incomparable manner, too. She was a plump, petite, and rosy girl; but there was that in her demeanor which became the daughter of an affluent home, and a certain assured, indescribable expression of face which seemed to say, Here is a maiden who to the object of her affection could be faithful against an execrating world—faithful even unto death.

Burr maintained at that time two establishments, one in the city, the other a mile and a half out of town on the banks of the Hudson. Richmond Hill was the name of his country seat, where Theodosia resided during the later years of her youth. It was a large, massive wooden edifice, with a lofty portico of Ionic columns, and stood on a hill facing the river, in the midst of a lawn adorned with ancient trees and trained shrubbery. The grounds, which extended to the water's edge, comprised about a hundred and sixty acres. Those who now visit the site of Burr's abode, at the corner of Charlton and Varick streets, behold a wilderness of very ordinary houses covering a dead level. The hill has been pared away, the ponds filled up, the river pushed away a long distance from the ancient shore, and every one of the venerable trees is gone. The city shows no spot less suggestive of rural beauty. But Richmond Hill, in the days of Hamilton and Burr, was the finest country residence on the island of Manhattan. The wife of John Adams, who lived there in 1790, just before Burr bought it, and who had recently traveled in the loveliest counties of England, speaks of it as a situation not inferior in natural beauty to the most delicious spot she ever saw. "The house," she says, "is situated upon an eminence; at an agreeable distance flows the noble Hudson, bearing upon its bosom the fruitful productions of the adjacent country. On my right hand are fields beautifully variegated with grass and grain, to a great extent, like the valley of Honiton, in Devonshire. Upon my left the city opens to view, intercepted here and there by a rising ground and an ancient oak. In front, beyond the Hudson, the Jersey shores present the exuberance of a rich, well-cultivated soil. The venerable oaks and broken ground, covered with wild shrubs, which surround me, give a natural beauty to the spot, which is truly enchanting. A lovely variety of birds serenade me morning and evening, rejoicing in their liberty and security; for I have, as much as possible, prohibited the grounds from invasion, and sometimes almost wished for game laws, when my orders have not been sufficiently regarded. The partridge, the woodcock, and the pigeon are too great temptations to the sportsmen to withstand."

Indeed the whole island was enchanting in those early days. There were pleasant gardens even in Wall Street, Cedar Street, Nassau Street; and the Battery, the place of universal resort, was one of the most delightful public grounds in the world—as it will be again when the Spoiler is thrust from the places of power, and the citizens of New York come again into the ownership of their city. The banks of the Hudson and of the East River were forest-crowned bluffs, lofty and picturesque, and on every favorable site stood a cottage or a mansion surrounded with pleasant grounds. The letters of Theodosia Burr contain many passages expressive of her intense enjoyment of the variety, the vivid verdure, the noble trees, the heights, the pretty lakes, the enchanting prospects, the beautiful gardens, which her daily rides brought to her view. She was a dear lover of her island home. The city had not then laid waste the beauty of Manhattan. There was only one bank in New York, the officers of which shut the bank at one o'clock and went home to dinner, returned at three, and kept the bank open till five. Much of the business life of the town partook of this homely, comfortable, easy-going rural spirit. There was a mail twice a week to the North, and twice a week to the South, and many of the old-fashioned people had time to live.

Not so the younger and newer portion of the population. We learn from one of the letters of the ill-fated Blennerhassett, who arrived in New York from Ireland in 1796, that the people were so busy there in making new docks, filling in the swamps, and digging cellars for new buildings, as to bring on an epidemic fever and ague that drove him from the city to the Jersey shore. He mentions, also, that land in the State doubled in value every two years, and that commercial speculation was carried on with such avidity that it was more like gambling than trade. It is he that relates the story of the adventurer, who, on learning that the yellow-fever prevailed fearfully in the West Indies, sent thither a cargo of coffins in nests, and that no room might be lost filled the smallest with gingerbread. The speculation, he assures us, was a capital hit; for the adventurer not only sold his coffins very profitably, but loaded his vessel with valuable woods, which yielded a great profit at New York. At that time, also, the speculation in lots, corner lots, and lands near the city was prosecuted with all the recklessness which we have been in the habit of supposing was peculiar to later times. New York was New York even in the days of Burr and Hamilton.

As mistress of Richmond Hill Theodosia entertained distinguished company. Hamilton was her father's occasional guest. Burr preferred the society of educated Frenchmen and French women to any other, and he entertained many distinguished exiles of the French Revolution. Talleyrand, Volney, Jerome Bonaparte, and Louis Philippe were among his guests. Colonel Stone mentions, in his Life of Brant, that Theodosia, in her fourteenth year, in the absence of her father, gave a dinner to that chieftain of the forest, which was attended by the Bishop of New York, Dr. Hosack, Volney, and several other guests of distinction, who greatly enjoyed the occasion. Burr was gratified to hear with how much grace and good-nature his daughter acquitted herself in the entertainment of her company. The chief himself was exceedingly delighted, and spoke of the dinner with great animation many years after.

We have one pleasant glimpse of Theodosia in these happy years, in a trifling anecdote preserved by the biographer of Edward Livingston, during whose mayoralty the present City Hall was begun. The mayor had the pleasure, one bright day, of escorting the young lady on board a French frigate lying in the harbor. "You must bring none of your sparks on board, Theodosia," exclaimed the pun-loving magistrate; "for they have a magazine here, and we shall all be blown up." Oblivion here drops the curtain upon the gay party and the brilliant scene.

A suitor appeared for the hand of this fair and accomplished girl. It was Joseph Alston of South Carolina, a gentleman of twenty-two, possessor of large estates in rice plantations and slaves, and a man of much spirit and talent. He valued his estates at two hundred thousand pounds sterling. Their courtship was not a long one; for though she, as became her sex, checked the impetuosity of his advances and argued for delay, she was easily convinced by the reasons which he adduced for haste. She reminded him that Aristotle was of opinion that a man should not marry till he was thirty-six. A fig for Aristotle, he replied; let us regard the ipse dixit of no man. It is only want of fortune or want of discretion, he continued, that could justify such a postponement of married joys. But "suppose," he added, "(merely for instance) a young man nearly two-and-twenty, already of the greatest discretion, with an ample fortune, were to be passionately in love with a young lady almost eighteen, equally discreet with himself, and who had a 'sincere friendship' for him, do you think it would be necessary to make him wait till thirty? particularly where the friends on both sides were pleased with the match."

She told him, also, that some of her friends who had visited Charleston had described it as a city where the yellow-fever and the "yells of whipped negroes, which assail your ears from every house," and the extreme heat, rendered life a mere purgatory. She had heard, too, that in South Carolina the men were absorbed in hunting, gaming, and racing; while the women, robbed of their society, had no pleasures but to come together in large parties, sip tea, and look prim. The ardent swain eloquently defended his native State:

"What!" he exclaimed, "is Charleston, the most delightfully situated city in America, which, entirely open to the ocean, twice in every twenty-four hours is cooled by the refreshing sea-breeze, the Montpelier of the South, which annually affords an asylum to the planter and the West Indian from every disease, accused of heat and unhealthiness? But this is not all, unfortunate citizens of Charleston; the scream, the yell of the miserable unresisting African, bleeding under the scourge of relentless power, affords music to your ears! Ah! from what unfriendly cause does this arise? Has the God of heaven, in anger, here changed the order of nature? In every other region, without exception, in a similar degree of latitude, the same sun which ripens the tamarind and the anana, ameliorates the temper, and disposes it to gentleness and kindness. In India and other countries not very different in climate from the southern parts of the United States, the inhabitants are distinguished for a softness and inoffensiveness of manners, degenerating almost to effeminacy; it is here then, only, that we are exempt from the general influence of climate: here only that, in spite of it, we are cruel and ferocious! Poor Carolina!"

And with regard to the manners of the Carolinians he assured the young lady that if there was one State in the Union which could justly claim superiority to the rest in social refinement and the art of elegant living it was South Carolina, where the division of the people into the very poor and the very rich, left to the latter class abundant leisure for the pursuit of literature and the enjoyment of society:

"The possession of slaves," he owns, "renders them proud, impatient of restraint, and gives them a haughtiness of manner which, to those unaccustomed to them, is disagreeable; but we find among them a high sense of honor, a delicacy of sentiment, and a liberality of mind, which we look for in vain in the more commercial citizens of the Northern States. The genius of the Carolinian, like the inhabitants of all southern countries, is quick, lively, and acute; in steadiness and perseverance he is naturally inferior to the native of the North; but this defect of climate is often overcome by his ambition or necessity; and, whenever this happens, he seldom fails to distinguish himself. In his temper he is gay and fond of company, open, generous, and unsuspicious; easily irritated, and quick to resent even the appearance of insult; but his passion, like the fire of the flint, is lighted up and extinguished in the same moment."

Such discussions end only in one way. Theodosia yielded the points in dispute. At Albany, on the 2d of February, 1801, while the country was ringing with the names of Jefferson and Burr, and while the world supposed that Burr was intriguing with all his might to defeat the wishes of the people by securing his own election to the Presidency, his daughter was married. The marriage was thus announced in the New York Commercial Advertiser of February 7th:

"MARRIED.—At Albany, on the 2d instant, by the Rev. Mr. JOHNSON, JOSEPH ALSTON, of South Carolina, to THEODOSIA BURR, only child of AARON BURR, Esq."

They were married at Albany because Colonel Burr, being a member of the Legislature, was residing at the capital of the State. One week the happy pair passed at Albany. Then to New York; whence, after a few days' stay, they began their long journey southward. Rejoined at Baltimore by Colonel Burr, they traveled in company to Washington, where, on the 4th of March, Theodosia witnessed the inauguration of Mr. Jefferson, and the induction of her father into the Vice-Presidency. Father and child parted a day or two after the ceremony. The only solid consolation, he said in his first letter to her, that he had for the loss of her dear companionship, was a belief that she would be happy, and the certainty that they should often meet. And, on his return to New York, he told her that he had approached his home as he would "the sepulchre of all his friends." "Dreary, solitary, comfortless. It was no longer home." Hence his various schemes of a second marriage, to which Theodosia urged him. He soon had the comfort of hearing that the reception of his daughter in South Carolina was as cordial and affectionate as his heart could have wished.

Theodosia now enjoyed three as happy years as ever fell to the lot of a young wife. Tenderly cherished by her husband, whom she devotedly loved, caressed by society, surrounded by affectionate and admiring relations, provided bountifully with all the means of enjoyment, living in the summer in the mountains of Carolina, or at the home of her childhood, Richmond Hill, passing the winters in gay and luxurious Charleston, honored for her own sake, for her father's, and her husband's, the years glided rapidly by, and she seemed destined to remain to the last Fortune's favorite child. One summer she and her husband visited Niagara, and penetrated the domain of the chieftain Brant, who gave them royal entertainment. Once she had the great happiness of receiving her father under her own roof, and of seeing the honors paid by the people of the State to the Vice-President. Again she spent a summer at Richmond Hill and Saratoga, leaving her husband for the first time. She told him on this occasion that every woman must prefer the society of the North to that of the South, whatever she might say. "If she denies it she is set down in my mind as insincere and weakly prejudiced." But, like a fond and loyal wife, she wrote, "Where you are there is my country, and in you are centred all my wishes."

She was a mother too. That engaging and promising boy, Aaron Burr Alston, the delight of his parents and of his grandfather, was born in the second year of the marriage. This event seemed to complete her happiness. For a time, it is true, she paid dearly for it by the loss of her former robust and joyous health. But the boy was worth the price. "If I can see without prejudice," wrote Colonel Burr, "there never was a finer boy;" and the mother's letters are full of those sweet, trifling anecdotes which mothers love to relate of their offspring. Her father still urged her to improve her mind, for her own and her son's sake, telling her that all she could learn would necessarily find its way to the mind of the boy. "Pray take in hand," he writes, "some book which requires attention and study. You will, I fear, lose the habit of study, which would be a greater misfortune than to lose your head." He praised, too, the ease, good sense, and sprightliness of her letters, and said truly that her style, at its best, was not inferior to that of Madame de Sévigné.

Life is frequently styled a checkered scene. But it was the peculiar lot of Theodosia to experience during the first twenty-one years of her life nothing but prosperity and happiness, and during the remainder of her existence nothing but misfortune and sorrow. Never had her father's position seemed so strong and enviable as during his tenure of the office of Vice-President; but never had it been in reality so hollow and precarious. Holding property valued at two hundred thousand dollars, he was so deeply in debt that nothing but the sacrifice of his landed estate could save him from bankruptcy. At the age of thirty he had permitted himself to be drawn from a lucrative and always increasing professional business to the fascinating but most costly pursuit of political honors. And now, when he stood at a distance of only one step from the highest place, he was pursued by a clamorous host of creditors, and compelled to resort to a hundred expedients to maintain the expensive establishments supposed to be necessary to a Vice-President's dignity. His political position was as hollow as his social eminence. Mr. Jefferson was firmly resolved that Aaron Burr should not be his successor; and the great families of New York, whom Burr had united to win the victory over Federalism, were now united to bar the further advancement of a man whom they chose to regard as an interloper and a parvenu. If Burr's private life had been stainless, if his fortune had been secure, if he had been in his heart a Republican and a Democrat, if he had been a man earnest in the people's cause, if even his talents had been as superior as they were supposed to be, such a combination of powerful families and political influence might have retarded, but could not have prevented, his advancement; for he was still in the prime of his prime, and the people naturally side with a man who is the architect of his own fortunes.

On the 1st of July, 1804, Burr sat in the library of Richmond Hill writing to Theodosia. The day was unseasonably cold, and a fire blazed upon the hearth. The lord of the mansion was chilly and serious. An hour before he had taken the step which made the duel with Hamilton inevitable, though eleven days were to elapse before the actual encounter. He was tempted to prepare the mind of his child for the event, but he forebore. Probably his mind had been wandering into the past, and recalling his boyhood; for he quoted a line of poetry which he had been wont to use in those early days. "Some very wise man has said," he wrote,

"Oh, fools, who think it solitude to be alone!"

This is but poetry. Let us, therefore, drop the subject, lest it lead to another, on which I have imposed silence on myself." Then he proceeds, in his usual gay and agreeable manner, again urging her to go on in the pursuit of knowledge. His last thoughts before going to the field were with her and for her. His last request to her husband was that he should do all that in him lay to encourage her to improve her mind.

The bloody deed was done. The next news Theodosia received from her father was that he was a fugitive from the sudden abhorrence of his fellow-citizens; that an indictment for murder was hanging over his head; that his career in New York was, in all probability, over forever; and that he was destined to be for a time a wanderer on the earth. Her happy days were at an end. She never blamed her father for this, or for any act of his; on the contrary, she accepted without questioning his own version of the facts, and his own view of the morality of what he had done. He had formed her mind and tutored her conscience. He was her conscience. But though she censured him not, her days and nights were embittered by anxiety from this time to the last day of her life. A few months later her father, black with hundreds of miles of travel in an open canoe, reached her abode in South Carolina, and spent some weeks there before appearing for the last time in the chair of the Senate; for, ruined as he was in fortune and good name, indicted for murder in New York and New Jersey, he was still Vice-President of the United States, and he was resolved to reappear upon the public scene, and do the duty which the Constitution assigned him.

The Mexican scheme followed. Theodosia and her husband were both involved in it. Mr. Alston advanced money for the project, which was never repaid, and which, in his will, he forgave. His entire loss, in consequence of his connection with that affair, may be reckoned at about fifty thousand dollars. Theodosia entirely and warmly approved the dazzling scheme. The throne of Mexico, she thought, was an object worthy of her father's talents, and one which would repay him for the loss of a brief tenure of the Presidency, and be a sufficient triumph over the men who were supposed to have thwarted him. Her boy, too—would he not be heir-presumptive to a throne?

The recent publication of the "Blennerhassett Papers" appears to dispel all that remained of the mystery which the secretive Burr chose to leave around the object of his scheme. We can now say with almost absolute certainty that Burr's objects were the following: The throne of Mexico for himself and his heirs; the seizure and organization of Texas as preliminary to the grand design. The purchase of lands on the Washita was for the threefold purpose of veiling the real object, providing a rendezvous, and having the means of tempting and rewarding those of the adventurers who were not in the secret. We can also now discover the designed distribution of honors and places: Aaron I., Emperor; Joseph Alston, Head of the Nobility and Chief Minister; Aaron Burr Alston, heir to the throne; Theodosia, Chief Lady of the Court and Empire; Wilkinson, General-in-Chief of the Army; Blennerhassett, Ambassador to the Court of St. James; Commodore Truxton (perhaps), Admiral of the Navy. There is not an atom of new evidence which warrants the supposition that Burr had any design to sever the Western States from the Union. If he himself had ever contemplated such an event, it is almost unquestionable that his followers were ignorant of it.

The scheme exploded. Theodosia and her husband had joined him at the home of the Blennerhassett, and they were near him when the President's proclamation dashed the scheme to atoms, scattered the band of adventurers, and sent Burr a prisoner to Richmond, charged with high treason. Mr. Alston, in a public letter to the Governor of South Carolina, solemnly declared that he was wholly ignorant of any treasonable design on the part of his father-in-law, and repelled with honest warmth the charge of his own complicity with a design so manifestly absurd and hopeless as that of a dismemberment of the Union. Theodosia, stunned with the unexpected blow, returned with her husband to South Carolina, ignorant of her father's fate. He was carried through that State on his way to the North, and there it was that he made his well-known attempt to appeal to the civil authorities and get deliverance from the guard of soldiers. From Richmond he wrote her a hasty note, informing her of his arrest. She and her husband joined him soon, and remained with him during his trial.

At Richmond, during the six months of the trial, Burr tasted the last of the sweets of popularity. The party opposed to Mr. Jefferson made his cause their own, and gathered round the fallen leader with ostentatious sympathy and aid. Ladies sent him bouquets, wine, and dainties for his table, and bestowed upon his daughter the most affectionate and flattering attentions. Old friends from New York and new friends from the West were there to cheer and help the prisoner. Andrew Jackson was conspicuously his friend and defender, declaiming in the streets upon the tyranny of the Administration and the perfidy of Wilkinson, Burr's chief accuser. Washington Irving, then in the dawn of his great renown, who had given the first efforts of his youthful pen to Burr's newspaper, was present at the trial, full of sympathy for a man whom he believed to be the victim of treachery and political animosity. Doubtless he was not wanting in compassionate homage to the young matron from South Carolina. Mr. Irving was then a lawyer, and had been retained as one of Burr's counsel; not to render service in the court-room, but in the expectation that his pen would be employed in staying the torrent of public opinion that was setting against his client. Whether or not he wrote in his behalf does not appear. But his private letters, written at Richmond during the trial, show plainly enough that, if his head was puzzled by the confused and contradictory evidence, his heart and his imagination were on the side of the prisoner.

Theodosia's presence at Richmond was of more value to her father than the ablest of his counsel. Every one appears to have loved, admired, and sympathized with her. "You can't think," wrote Mrs. Blennerhassett, "with what joy and pride I read what Colonel Burr says of his daughter. I never could love one of my own sex as I do her." Blennerhassett himself was not less her friend. Luther Martin, Burr's chief counsel, almost worshiped her. "I find," wrote Blennerhassett, "that Luther Martin's idolatrous admiration of Mrs. Alston is almost as excessive as my own, but far more beneficial to his interest and injurious to his judgment, as it is the medium of his blind attachment to her father, whose secrets and views, past, present, or to come, he is and wishes to remain ignorant of. Nor can he see a speck in the character or conduct of Alston, for the best of all reasons with him, namely, that Alston has such a wife." It plainly appears, too, from the letters and journal of Blennerhassett, that Alston did all in his power to promote the acquittal and aid the fallen fortunes of Burr, and that he did so; not because he believed in him, but because he loved his Theodosia.

Acquitted by the jury, but condemned at the bar of public opinion, denounced by the press, abhorred by the Republican party, and still pursued by his creditors, Burr, in the spring of 1808, lay concealed at New York preparing for a secret flight to Europe. Again his devoted child traveled northward to see him once more before he sailed. For some weeks both were in the city, meeting only by night at the house of some tried friend, but exchanging notes and letters from hour to hour. One whole night they spent together, just before his departure. To her he committed his papers, the accumulation of thirty busy years; and it was she who was to collect the debts due him, and thus provide for his maintenance in Europe.

Burr was gay and confident to the last, for he was strong in the belief that the British Ministry would adopt his scheme and aid in tearing Mexico from the grasp of Napoleon. Theodosia was sick and sorrowful, but bore bravely up and won her father's commendation for her fortitude. In one of the early days of June father and daughter parted, to meet no more on earth.

The four years of Burr's fruitless exile were to Theodosia years of misery. She could not collect the debts on which they had relied. The embargo reduced the rice-planters to extreme embarrassment. Her husband no longer sympathized with her in her yearning love for her father, though loving her as tenderly as ever. Old friends in New York cooled toward her. Her health was precarious. Months passed without bringing a word from over the sea; and the letters that did reach her, lively and jovial as they were, contained no good news. She saw her father expelled from England, wandering aimless in Sweden and Germany, almost a prisoner in Paris, reduced to live on potatoes and dry bread; while his own countrymen showed no signs of relenting toward him. In many a tender passage she praised his fortitude. "I witness," she wrote, in a well-known letter, "your extraordinary fortitude with new wonder at every new misfortune. Often, after reflecting on this subject, you appear to me so superior, so elevated above all other men; I contemplate you with such a strange mixture of humility, admiration, reverence, love, and pride, that very little superstition would be necessary to make me worship you as a superior being; such enthusiasm does your character excite in me. When I afterward revert to myself, how insignificant do my best qualities appear! My vanity would be greater if I had not been placed so near you; and yet my pride is our relationship. I had rather not live than not be the daughter of such a man."

Mr. Madison was President then. In other days her father had been on terms of peculiar intimacy with Madison and his beautiful and accomplished wife. Burr, in his later years, used to say that it was he who had brought about the match which made Mrs. Madison an inmate of the Presidential mansion. With the members of Madison's Cabinet, too, he had been socially and politically familiar. When Theodosia perceived that her father had no longer a hope of success in his Mexican project she became anxious for his return to America. But against this was the probability that the Administration would again arrest him and bring him to trial for the third time. Theodosia ventured to write to her old friend, Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, asking him to interpose on her father's behalf. A letter still more interesting than this has recently come to light. It was addressed by Theodosia to Mrs. Madison. The coldest heart can not read this eloquent and pathetic production without emotion. She writes:

"MADAM,—You may perhaps be surprised at receiving a letter from one with whom you have had so little intercourse for the last few years. But your surprise will cease when you recollect that my father, once your friend, is now in exile; and that the President only can restore him to me and his country.

"Ever since the choice of the people was first declared in favor of Mr. Madison, my heart, amid the universal joy, has beat with the hope that I, too, should soon have reason to rejoice. Convinced that Mr. Madison would neither feel nor judge from the feelings or judgment of others, I had no doubt of his hastening to relieve a man whose character he had been enabled to appreciate during a confidential intercourse of long continuance, and whom [he] must know incapable of the designs attributed to him. My anxiety on this subject has, however, become too painful to be alleviated by anticipations which no events have yet tended to justify; and in this state of intolerable suspense I have determined to address myself to you, and request that you will, in my name, apply to the President for a removal of the prosecution now existing against AARON BURR. I still expect it from him as a man of feeling and candor, as one acting for the world and for posterity.

"Statesmen, I am aware, deem it necessary that sentiments of liberality, and even justice, should yield to considerations of policy; but what policy can require the absence of my father at present? Even had he contemplated the project for which he stands arraigned, evidently to pursue it any further would now be impossible. There is not left one pretext of alarm even to calumny; for bereft of fortune, of popular favor, and almost of friends, what could he accomplish? And whatever may be the apprehensions or the clamors of the ignorant and the interested, surely the timid, illiberal system which would sacrifice a man to a remote and unreasonable possibility that he might infringe some law founded on an unjust, unwarrantable suspicion that he would desire it, can not be approved by Mr. Madison, and must be unnecessary to a President so loved, so honored. Why, then, is my father banished from a country for which he has encountered wounds and dangers and fatigue for years? Why is he driven from his friends, from an only child, to pass an unlimited time in exile, and that, too, at an age when others are reaping the harvest of past toils, or ought at least to be providing seriously for the comfort of ensuing years? I do not seek to soften you by this recapitulation. I only wish to remind you of all the injuries which are inflicted on one of the first characters the United States ever produced.

"Perhaps it may be well to assure you there is no truth in a report lately circulated that my father intends returning immediately. He never will return to conceal himself in a country on which he has conferred distinction.

"To whatever fate Mr. Madison may doom this application, I trust it will be treated with delicacy. Of this I am the more desirous as Mr. Alston is ignorant of the step I have taken in writing to you, which, perhaps, nothing could excuse but the warmth of filial affection. If it be an error, attribute it to the indiscreet zeal of a daughter whose soul sinks at the gloomy prospect of a long and indefinite separation from a father almost adored, and who can leave unattempted nothing which offers the slightest hope of procuring him redress. What, indeed, would I not risk once more to see him, to hang upon him, to place my child on his knee, and again spend my days in the happy occupation of endeavoring to anticipate all his wishes.

"Let me entreat, my dear Madam, that you will have the consideration and goodness to answer me as speedily as possible; my heart is sore with doubt and patient waiting for something definitive. No apologies are made for giving you this trouble, which I am sure you will not deem irksome to take for a daughter, an affectionate daughter thus situated. Inclose your letter for me to A. J. Frederic Prevost, Esq., near New Rochelle, New York.

"That every happiness may attend you, is the sincere wish of

"THEO. BURR ALSTON."

This letter was probably not ineffectual. Certain it is that Government offered no serious obstacle to Burr's return, and instituted no further proceedings against him. Probably, too, Theodosia received some kind of assurance to this effect, for we find her urging her father, not only to return, but to go boldly to New York among his old friends, and resume there the practice of his profession. The great danger to be apprehended was from his creditors, who then had power to confine a debtor within limits, if not to throw him into prison. "If the worst comes to the worst," wrote this fond and devoted daughter, "I will leave every thing to suffer with you." The italics are her own.

He came at length. He landed in Boston, and sent word of his arrival to Theodosia. Rejoiced as she was, she replied vaguely, partly in cipher, fearing lest her letter might be opened on the way, and the secret of her father's arrival be prematurely disclosed. She told him that her own health was tolerable; that her child, then a fine boy of eleven, was well; that "his little soul warmed at the sound of his grandfather's name;" and that his education, under a competent tutor, was proceeding satisfactorily. She gave directions respecting her father's hoped-for journey to South Carolina in the course of the summer; and advised him, in case war should be declared with England, to offer his services to the Government. He reached New York in May, 1812, and soon had the pleasure of informing his daughter that his reception had been more friendly than he could have expected, and that in time his prospects were fair of a sufficiently lucrative practice.

Surely now, after so many years of anxiety and sorrow, Theodosia—still a young woman, not thirty years of age, still enjoying her husband's love—might have reasonably expected a happy life. Alas! there was no more happiness in store for her on this side of the grave. The first letter which Burr received from his son-in-law after his arrival in New York contained news which struck him to the heart.

"A few miserable weeks since," writes Mr. Alston, "and in spite of all the embarrassments, the troubles, and disappointments which have fallen to our lot since we parted, I would have congratulated you on your return in the language of happiness. With my wife on one side and my boy on the other, I felt myself superior to depression. The present was enjoyed, the future was anticipated with enthusiasm. One dreadful blow has destroyed us; reduced us to the veriest, the most sublimated wretchedness. That boy, on whom all rested; our companion, our friend—he who was to have transmitted down the mingled blood of Theodosia and myself—he who was to have redeemed all your glory, and shed new lustre upon our families—that boy, at once our happiness and our pride, is taken from us—is dead. We saw him dead. My own hand surrendered him to the grave; yet we are alive. But it is past. I will not conceal from you that life is a burden, which, heavy as it is, we shall both support, if not with dignity, at least with decency and firmness. Theodosia has endured all that a human being could endure; but her admirable mind will triumph. She supports herself in a manner worthy of your daughter."

The mother's heart was almost broken.

"There is no more joy for me," she wrote. "The world is a blank. I have lost my boy. My child is gone forever. May Heaven, by other blessings, make you some amends for the noble grandson you have lost! Alas! my dear father, I do live, but how does it happen? Of what am I formed that I live, and why? Of what service can I be in this world, either to you or any one else, with a body reduced to premature old age, and a mind enfeebled and bewildered? Yet, since it is my lot to live, I will endeavor to fulfill my part, and exert myself to my utmost, though this life must henceforth be to me a bed of thorns. Whichever way I turn the same anguish still assails me. You talk of consolation. Ah! you know not what you have lost. I think Omnipotence could give me no equivalent for my boy; no, none—none."

She could not be comforted. Her health gave way. Her husband thought that if any thing could restore her to tranquillity and health it would be the society of her father; and so, at the beginning of winter, it was resolved that she should attempt the dangerous voyage. Her father sent a medical friend from New York to attend her.

"Mr. Alston," wrote this gentleman, "seemed rather hurt that you should conceive it necessary to send a person here, as he or one of his brothers would attend Mrs. Alston to New York. I told him you had some opinion of my medical talents; that you had learned your daughter was in a low state of health, and required unusual attention, and medical attention on her voyage; that I had torn myself from my family to perform this service for my friend."

And again, a few days after:

"I have engaged a passage to New York for your daughter in a pilot-boat that has been out privateering, but has come in here, and is refitting merely to get to New York. My only fears are that Governor Alston may think the mode of conveyance too undignified, and object to it; but Mrs.

Alston is fully bent on going. You must not be surprised to see her very low, feeble, and emaciated. Her complaint is an almost incessant nervous fever."

The rest is known. The vessel sailed. Off Cape Hatteras, during a gale that swept the coast from Maine to Georgia, the pilot-boat went down, and not one escaped to tell the tale. The vessel was never heard of more. So perished this noble, gifted, ill-starred lady.

The agonizing scenes that followed may be imagined. Father and husband were kept long in suspense. Even when many weeks had elapsed without bringing tidings of the vessel, there still remained a forlorn hope that some of her passengers might have been rescued by an outward-bound ship, and might return, after a year or two had gone by, from some distant port. Burr, it is said, acquired a habit, when walking upon the Battery, of looking wistfully down the harbor at the arriving ships, as if still cherishing a faint, fond hope that his Theo was coming to him from the other side of the world. When, years after, the tale was brought to him that his daughter had been carried off by pirates and might be still alive, he said: "No, no, no; if my Theo had survived that storm, she would have found her way to me. Nothing could have kept my Theo from her father."

It was these sad events, the loss of his daughter and her boy, that severed Aaron Burr from the human race. Hope died within him. Ambition died. He yielded to his doom, and walked among men, not melancholy, but indifferent, reckless, and alone. With his daughter and his grandson to live and strive for, he might have done something in his later years to redeem his name and atone for his errors. Bereft of these, he had not in his moral nature that which enables men who have gone astray to repent and begin a better life.

Theodosia's death broke her husband's heart. Few letters are so affecting as the one which he wrote to Burr when, at length, the certainty of her loss could no longer be resisted.

"My boy—my wife—gone both! This, then, is the end of all the hopes we had formed. You may well observe that you feel severed from the human race. She was the last tie that bound us to the species. What have we left?... Yet, after all, he is a poor actor who can not sustain his little hour upon the stage, be his part what it may. But the man who has been deemed worthy of the heart of Theodosia Burr, and who has felt what it was to be blessed with such a woman's, will never forget his elevation."

He survived his wife four years. Among the papers of Theodosia was found, after her death, a letter which she had written a few years before she died, at a time when she supposed her end was near. Upon the envelope was written, "My husband. To be delivered after my death. I wish this to be read immediately, and before my burial." Her husband never saw it, for he never had the courage to look into the trunk that contained her treasures. But after his death the trunk was sent to Burr, who found and preserved this affecting composition. We can not conclude our narrative more fitly than by transcribing the thoughts that burdened the heart of Theodosia in view of her departure from the world. First, she gave directions respecting the disposal of her jewelry and trinkets, giving to each of her friends some token of her love. Then she besought her husband to provide at once for the support of "Peggy," an aged servant of her father, formerly housekeeper at Richmond Hill, to whom, in her father's absence, she had contrived to pay a small pension. She then proceeded in these affecting terms:

"To you, my beloved, I leave our child; the child of my bosom, who was once a part of myself, and from whom I shall shortly be separated by the cold grave. You love him now; henceforth love him for me also. And oh, my husband, attend to this last prayer of a doting mother. Never, never listen to what any other person tells you of him. Be yourself his judge on all occasions. He has faults; see them, and correct them yourself. Desist not an instant from your endeavors to secure his confidence. It is a work which requires as much uniformity of conduct as warmth of affection toward him. I know, my beloved, that you can perceive what is right on this subject as on every other. But recollect, these are the last words I can ever utter. It will tranquilize my last moments to have disburdened myself of them.

"I fear you will scarcely be able to read this scrawl, but I feel hurried and agitated. Death is not welcome to me. I confess it is ever dreaded. You have made me too fond of life. Adieu, then, thou kind, thou tender husband. Adieu, friend of my heart. May Heaven prosper you, and may we meet hereafter. Adieu; perhaps we may never see each other again in this world. You are away, I wished to hold you fast, and prevented you from going this morning. But He who is wisdom itself ordains events; we must submit to them. Least of all should I murmur. I, on whom so many blessings have been showered—whose days have been numbered by bounties—who have had such a husband, such a child, and such a father. Oh pardon me, my God, if I regret leaving these. I resign myself. Adieu, once more, and for the last time, my beloved. Speak of me often to our son. Let him love the memory of his mother, and let him know how he was loved by her. Your wife, your fond wife,

THEO.

"Let my father see my son sometimes. Do not be unkind toward him whom I have loved so much, I beseech you. Burn all my papers except my father's letters, which I beg you to return him. Adieu, my sweet boy. Love your father; be grateful and affectionate to him while he lives; be the pride of his meridian, the support of his departing days. Be all that he wishes; for he made your mother happy. Oh! my heavenly Father, bless them both. If it is permitted, I will hover round you, and guard you, and intercede for you. I hope for happiness in the next world, for I have not been bad in this.

"I had nearly forgotten to say that I charge you not to allow me to be stripped and washed, as is usual. I am pure enough thus to return to dust. Why, then, expose my person? Pray see to this. If it does not appear contradictory or silly, I beg to be kept as long as possible before I am consigned to the earth."

MISSING.

MISSING! missing the record said,
But whether living, or whether dead,
No one knew, no one could tell;
They saw him with his sword in hand,
They heard him give the stern command
To "Forward! charge!" then as the swell

Of waves that break along the beach
They dashed into the deadly breach,
Their bayonets like a wave of steel!
Undaunted by the battle shock—
Enclouded in the cannon smoke,
They still pressed on for woe or weal.

Right up into the cannon's breath—
Right up into the jaws of death,
They hewed their way with steel and lead,
Till when the tide of battle turned,
And up the east the round moon burned
To look upon a sea of dead.

The tide of battle may have swept Him o'er the ditch—a prisoner, kept Alive and guarded by the foe;
He may be wounded—suff'ring pain,
Uncared for, on the dreary plain;
Wounded? Or missing? Dead? Ah no!

If dead, he died a patriot's death;
If dead, he used his latest breath
To urge the shatter'd column on—
The latest motion of his hand
To steady on his wavering band
To battle till the day was won.....

O God! how long is our suspense?
But great, O God! our recompense
For all this sorrow, blood, and woe!
Our Hope is sure; serene our Faith
To battle on through Life and Death
Till Victory crowns us, o'er the foe!

THE MILITARY HOSPITALS AT FORTRESS MONROE.

THE HAMPTON HOSPITAL.

THERE are thousands in our land who have had, and who still have, friends sick and wounded in the general hospitals of the United States. Many a patriotic father has his heart torn with anguish as he reads the name of his own son in the list of the wounded. Many a heroic mother, who girded her son with her own hand for this most holy war for human rights, can not sleep at night as she thinks of her loved boy, bleeding, languishing, far away from friends, in the wards of a hospital. It is indeed a sad lot. And yet few of these sorrowing ones have any conception of the abounding comforts which the Government has provided for its stricken soldiers—comforts generally vastly greater than could possibly be enjoyed at home. The writer, having had the opportunity to visit many of our hospitals, and having become thoroughly acquainted with the vast hospitals established at Old Point Comfort, has thought that he would render humanity a service in giving in this widely-circulated Magazine a detailed account, with full illustrations, of the treatment which a grateful nation has provided for its sick and wounded defenders.

I.—LOCATION.

The James and York rivers, running nearly parallel to each other for a distance of about forty miles, and emptying into Chesapeake Bay near its mouth, form a peninsula, now rendered forever memorable by the casualties of war. The land is generally a fertile plain, beneath sunny skies, and enjoying a genial clime which neither Tuscany nor Florence can rival. Its winters are just cool enough to invigorate the frame, but never to impede the movements of the plow. There are few spots on the globe more attractive. When the energies of freedom shall have felled its forests and drained its marshes, and spread over its beautiful expanse villages and schools and churches, it will not be easy to find upon our continent another region more desirable for a home. At the end of this peninsula, jutting out into the majestic bay, there is an almost island of about a hundred acres, connected with the main land by two narrow strips of sand. This island is the site of Fortress Monroe, the strongest and most capacious fortification of our country, embracing, with its massive walls, its moat, and its water batteries, about seventy acres. Its ramparts frown with the most formidable enginery of war which military art has as yet constructed. At the present writing General Butler, commandant of this department, has his head-quarters in one of the fine mansions within the fort. And in this connection I can not refrain from saying, that, after having spent several weeks in exploring this whole department, and seeing every where the impress of General Butler's administrative energy, I must regard him as one of the most extraordinary executive officers which any age has produced.

Crossing the narrow sand bar from the fortress, along the plain for the distance of a mile and a half, through a wilderness of tents, and swarming soldiers and cavalry encampments, and groups of happy contrabands, with horsemen galloping to and fro, and enormous wagons drawn by six mules, and bursts of music from bugles and martial bands, and floating banners, and rattling musketry from young troops learning the art of war in all the varieties of battle, one comes to a large and splendid edifice called the Chesapeake Hospital. It rises three stories above a high basement. Its lofty dome, surmounted by the hospital flag, can be seen from far. Its broad veranda, massively pillared, looks out upon a harbor which has scarcely a rival on this globe, where our whole navy might ride safely, and which God made not for a petty State but for a majestic nation. In the distance are seen the estuaries of the James and the Elizabeth rivers, and the heavily-wooded shores of Newport News and Sewall's Point. A quarter of a mile beyond, their spacious gardens joining, is the United States General Hospital, Hampton. These two spacious hospitals, recently united under the same Surgeon-in-charge, Dr. E. M'Clellan, may now be regarded as essentially one. Still they are in some respects so dissimilar as to require individuality of description.

II.—BUILDINGS.

The Hampton Hospital consists of a very picturesque village of about thirty cottage houses, each 125 feet long and 25 feet in width. These buildings are placed, as soldiers would say, en échelon, forming a triangle, embracing within its spacious area a lawn of many acres, traversed by walks and lined by young shade trees. The hand of taste has scattered here and there beds of blooming shrubbery and of flowers. Most of these cottages are called hospital wards, containing fifty beds each. These spacious rooms are open to the ridge, which is 18 feet high, and are well warmed and thoroughly ventilated by ridge ventilation. Each one is lighted by twenty-four windows, and is kept in a state of perfect neatness which the most accomplished New England housewife can not excel.

The advantages of the cottage form of the wards are manifest. There are no stairs to climb. The ventilation is perfect. There are no impure exhalations ascending from the rooms below to those above. The patients from their cots can look out from the numerous windows upon the verdant lawn, the foliage, the flowers, the sparkling sea. The convalescents can easily reach the grass, and the rose-buds, and the shade. In case of fire the sick and the wounded can instantly be removed.

There are also many advantages in having the sick collected together. It is only on some momentous occasion, as after a great battle, that these wards are entirely full. There may be usually ten, fifteen, or twenty in a room. The soldiers, accustomed to the most social life known upon earth, would be very lonely in separate rooms. In the ward they are company for each other. The vast majority of them are not seriously sick. They are continually getting well and leaving. The hospital ward is by no means ordinarily that scene of suffering and of misery which many suppose. The annexed view is not a fancy sketch, but was taken on the spot by photography. This hospital has held eighteen hundred men in its tents and wards. Perhaps two or three hundred may be able to be sauntering over the grounds. Some are sitting up in their beds reading; others talking or singing, or playing chess or checkers. Several hundreds may sit down together at the dining-table. The wounded man, whose honorable wound is healing, and who is soon to be discharged to go home to his friends, is often the happiest of men. The sick man, who is getting well, sees a smile in every blade of grass, and hears a song of joy in every whisper of the breeze.

A general hospital is indeed a little city by itself, containing all the choicest appliances of civilized life. In addition to the wards for the patients we have here another long cottage edifice, 175 feet long by 25 feet wide, called the Medical Officers' Quarters. This building is cut up into a series of compartments 10 feet wide, and extending across the edifice 25 feet. The apartment thus formed is divided into a bedroom and sitting-room, with a central door. Here many of the officers connected with the hospital have their homes.

This building also contains a kitchen and dining-room for the occupant families. There is another building, of the same size, called The Non-Commissioned Officers' Quarters, where the stewards, female nurses, and other attendants reside. This also contains, besides the general steward's store-house, a kitchen, and a dining-room for the non-commissioned officers. Just in the rear of these, at the base of the triangle, there is another long building, containing the hospital office, which consists of the private office of the surgeon in charge; the general office, where the patients come if they wish to see the doctor; the linen room; the hospital post and express office; and the printing-office. In the centre of the triangle are two long commodious buildings occupied as kitchens and dining-rooms for the patients. There is also a camp of hospital tents just outside of the triangle, containing one hundred beds. These tents, which are much sought for by the convalescents, are floored and warmed, and in all respects rendered exceedingly comfortable. This pleasant little cluster of eleven tents is called The Convalescents' Camp. In addition, to make up the tout ensemble of this compact little hospital village, we have the Dead-house, the Coal-yard, the Negro Quarters, the Bathing-houses, the Store-houses, and the Stables. The sketch at the head of this paper will give the reader a very clear idea of the general appearance and arrangement of the buildings. A little to the left of the scene represented is the country seat of the late President John Tyler. His parlor is now used as a school-room for contraband children. The remainder of the house is occupied by the Rev. Mr. Stone and his interesting family of ladies from the North, who are doing what they can to confer the blessings of education upon a race just emerging from barbarism. A little beyond this is the former mansion of the late United States Senator Mallory. He is now, it is said, a member of the rebel Congress. His broad acres are confiscated, and many of them, included in the hospital farm, are bearing abundant food for the invalid soldiers of the Union. His residence offers a very commodious dwelling for the surgeon in charge of these hospitals.

III.—GENERAL ORGANIZATION.

The administration of this important institution is simplified and facilitated by three divisions. Each of these divisions is presided over by a hospital steward. The first or General Steward has charge of all the wards, clothing, and condition of the patients. Twice each day, at 9 o'clock in the morning and at 11 o'clock at night, each ward is inspected, that no abuse may steal in. This steward also reports daily respecting the clothing, the linen room, the laundry, the storehouses, and the fidelity of the male and female nurses. There is then the Commissary Steward, who has charge of the kitchens, dining-rooms, preparation of food, and serving of food to the patients. He is present at the meals, inspecting the quality and quantity of the food which is served. The Dispensing Steward has charge of the apothecary's shop, and the issue of medicines and hospital stores. He is responsible for every prescription sent to the patients; must prepare all important ones with his own hand, and must keep all poisons under lock and key. Each of these stewards has from two to three assistants. The apothecary's shop would be regarded as a first-class shop in any city of our land, containing all the medicines in common use, of the purest quality, and all approved stimulants.

Captain Allen Sheppard, of the Veteran Reserve Corps, is in command of the military and police force of the Hampton Hospital. He has a camp of convalescents, has charge of the armory, attends to the patrols, and in case of any internal disturbance or external assault could promptly bring quite a formidable force into the field.

The washing of the hospital is done by contraband washer-women, more than one hundred of whom are often employed. The sketch on the next page represents a group of these women who, having collected their burdens, are retiring, carrying their bundles of ten dozen each upon their heads.

IV.—MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

We now come to the soul of hospital life. The one great object of all these complicated appliances is the relief of sick and wounded men. The success of the hospital, consequently, depends upon the skill and fidelity of the Medical Department. Sickness of every possible kind, and wounds of every conceivable variety, are to be treated in its wards. Men of the widest diversity of character and antecedents; the mother-loving boy, pure-minded, delicate, heart-broken; the wretched, hardened, friendless vagrant, floating like a drift log on life's stormy sea; the devout Christian, and the reckless sinner, all are crowded together in these wards. Man is a compound being of body and soul, matter and mind. These two act and react upon each other. A troubled mind will ruin the body. A diseased body will wreck the spirit. Every wise physician recognizes this complicate nature of man. Dr. E. McClellan, the distinguished surgeon in charge of these hospitals, alike appreciates the wants of the physical and the intellectual man; he is alike solicitous that appropriate medicine should be provided for the body and for the mind. It is needful that one intrusted with responsibilities so great should be endowed with a mind of liberal culture, should possess high scientific and professional skill, and should be capable alike of grasping comprehensive plans, and of superintending minute details. That Dr. McClellan enjoys, to an unusual degree, these gifts and attainments probably every co-operator with him in the institution will testify. He is also surrounded with a corps of conscientious, sympathizing, and accomplished practitioners. The most deadly wound, the most insidious disease, will, in these wards, find all that modern medical skill can furnish to give relief. The following list of the Hospital

WASHER-WOMEN.

Staff of the Hampton Hospital will show what ample provision the Government has made to meet every medical want of the patients:

ELY McCLELLAN, Assistant-Surgeon, U. S. A., in charge; ALLEN SHEPPARD, Captain Veteran Reserve Corps, Military Assistant; Rev. EDWARD ROE, Hospital Chaplain, U. S. A.; H. B. WHITE, Acting Assistant-Surgeon, U. S. A., Executive Officer; L. W. BLAKE, W. L. WELLS, I. S. HILL, J. B. KINSMAN, Acting Assistant-Surgeons, U. S. A.; C. S. WARD, Medical Cadet, U. S. A.

In every great institution of this kind it is indispensable that there should be some recognized head. Every army must have a commander. And the spirit of that commander, be it heroic or be it imbecile, will spread through the ranks. The Surgeon in charge is the Executive head of the hospital. He is responsible for its management, and can not delegate independent authority to any officer. From him goes forth the law through all the departments of the organization. To him are returned all reports, even of the minutest details; as the blood from the branching veins is brought back to the heart. Daily reports are made to him of all that transpires in each department.

The Chaplain is the spiritual father of the great household; the friend, the guide, the comforter of the tempted, the sorrowing, the dying. The first Napoleon, with his imperial all-grasping mind, appreciated more highly than any other military commander of whom we have record the exalted mission of the chaplain. He was the special and honored messenger of the Emperor himself; placed there by imperial power to carry the solace of religion to the couch of pain, and to report immediately to the Emperor if any of Napoleon's children—for his soldiers were his children—suffered neglect or wrong.

It is beautiful to see, in these hospitals, how harmoniously and fraternally the physician of the body and the physician of the soul co-operate. I do not speak the language of blind eulogy when I say that the Rev. Mr. Marshall of the Chesapeake, and the Rev. Mr. Roe of the Hampton Hospital, are extraordinary men—extraordinary in their adaptation to the work to which God has called them. Joyfully and successfully they press on in their arduous toil, ever sustained by the countenance of the surgeon in charge.

The Executive officer of the Hampton Hospital, Dr. White, assumes command of the hospital during the temporary absence of Dr. McClellan. He has been connected with the hospital from its foundation, is familiar with all its details, and has acquired a reputation for energy, ability, and sympathetic kindness which any man might envy. I shall be pardoned for this minuteness of detail. I am not writing to compliment the officers of this hospital, but to soothe the anxieties of thousands of parents and wives whose loved ones are perhaps now, or may soon be, patients in these wards.

One doctor is assigned to every two wards, which together contain one hundred beds. The physicians not only see that the men receive proper medical treatment, but that they also have suitable food and clothing. The food for the day is prescribed for the patient as well as the medicine. The following "Diet List" will show the variety from which a selection may be made for those whose failing appetites call for delicacies:

Chicken Soup.	Rice and Milk.
Mutton Soup.	Boiled Potatoes.
Beef Soup.	Baked Potatoes.
Oyster Soup.	Tea with Milk.
Beef-Steak.	Coffee.
Ham.	Boiled Milk.
Eggs, boiled hard.	Cocoa.
Eggs, boiled soft.	Farina.
Milk Toast.	Corn Starch.
Buttered Toast.	Crackers.

Each doctor, in rotation, performs the duty of medical officer of the day, and is required to examine all patients received into the hospital during the twenty-four hours, to assign them to their wards, to see that they are immediately and comfortably provided for, and to notify the proper surgeon of their arrival. He also inspects each ward at 9 o'clock in the morning, and again at 11 o'clock at night, to see that the nurses are all faithfully at their posts. There are also, besides an ample supply of male nurses, abundantly provided with every conceivable convenience which a sick man can want, and with strong and experienced arms to move the patients as they may require, four female nurses to perform those functions which woman's gentle hand can accomplish so much more gracefully than the rougher hand of man.

V.—THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The mail is received every morning. The postmaster makes out a list of the letters to be distributed, and gives to the ward master of each ward the letters he is to distribute, and takes from him a receipt for them. He gives the letter to the patient, and, for all registered letters, takes from him a receipt, which receipts are carefully filed. The same care is exercised in reference to boxes received by Express. The boxes are examined in the presence of the man to whom they are directed, simply to see that no intoxicating liquors are introduced. A large amount of money is sent through the office. Each pay-day the man takes his money to the postmaster, who furnishes him with an Adams Express envelope. The patient places his money in it, in the presence of the postmaster, and seals the envelope. It is then taken to the Company, who give a receipt for it, which is handed to the patient.

There are many minor details of these great establishments, such as the printing-office, the knapsack house, the arsenal, to which we can only make this brief reference. The printing-office is found to be a very great convenience.

VI.—THE AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Connected with the Hampton Hospital there is a farm and gardens, consisting of a hundred acres of fertile land. The soil is light and easily cultivated. The farming and gardening afford very pleasant and healthful employment for the numerous convalescents. The following list of seeds sown, and of the amount, will give the practical farmer and gardener some idea of the variety and abundance of fresh vegetables which will be at the disposal of the patients. There were sown on these broad and fertile acres, this spring, $3\frac{1}{2}$ bushels of beans, 4 pounds of beets, 2 pounds of cabbage seed, $1\frac{1}{2}$ pound of carrots, 2 ounces of celery, $1\frac{1}{2}$ pound of cucumbers, 3 bushels, shelled, of sweet corn, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a pound of lettuce, 2 pounds of musk-melon, 2 pounds water-melon, 2 pounds of onions, 7 barrels of onion bulbs, $\frac{1}{2}$ pound of parsnips, 6 bushels of pease, $\frac{1}{4}$ pound of pepper, 225 bushels of potatoes, 5000 sprouts of sweet-potatoes, $1\frac{1}{4}$ pound of radishes, $\frac{1}{2}$ pound of oyster plant, $\frac{3}{4}$ pound of spinach, 2 pounds of squash, $\frac{3}{4}$ pound of tomatoes, 3 pounds of turnip seed. In addition to this an acre of land is devoted to strawberries of the best varieties known, and as the plants multiply the beds will increase, and this luscious fruit will be provided in the utmost profusion. The hospital is indebted to the patriotic liberality of R. H. Allen & Co., of New York; F. Bell, Esq., of Newark; Messrs. Peter and J. G. Roe, of Cornwall, New York; and John R. Caldwell, of Newburg, for liberal donations of seed. J. G. Roe, Esq., of Cornwall, New York, has sent 250 cuttings of the choicest variety of currants; which cuttings I have just been admiring, as every one in this genial soil is now vigorously and rejoicingly pushing out its leaves. When it is remembered that these hospitals, when full, consume from fifty to one hundred bushels of potatoes each week, the necessity for the abundant supply of vegetables thus provided for will be apparent. The same kind friends have also offered to supply, without cost, an abundance of raspberry and grape vines, and fruit trees, and roses, and shrubbery.

The fences which inclose these spacious fields are of rough rails. The tasteful skill of the chaplain, the Rev. E. P. Roe, to whom the hospital is very much indebted for this agricultural energy, is converting these unsightly rails into lines of beauty, unsurpassed by any blooming hedge of old England. The morning-glory and the cypress vine thrive here with wonderful luxuriance, putting forth flowers in the greatest profusion. The fence will soon be entirely covered with a dense back-ground of dark green, enlivened with bursting buds of the most brilliant colors. Thus the military farm will be appropriately girdled with breast-works, ramparts, and bastions of gorgeous flowers.

In front of the officers' quarters, where the invalids are passing continually, an extensive flower-garden is laid out, which will be mainly under the superintending care of the ladies. The chaplain and several of the surgeons have their ladies with them. As I have visited their tasteful rooms, and sat at their united social table, it has seemed to me that they formed about as enviable a circle as could be well found in this world of toil and care. There is no beam of sunshine so bright as that which flows from the consciousness of a useful life. It is well that flowers should adorn the parterres of such homes. And these flowers will bloom in none the less lovely hues, and will emit no less fragrant odors, because the pale, tottering, invalid soldier is cheered by their beauty, and his senses are refreshed by their perfume. It is for the soldier the ladies sow these seeds and guard these opening buds.

Dr. McClellan, the head of this establishment, endowed with energies which never tire, throws the support of his encouragement and the vigilance of his eye upon every measure promotive of the general good. And he has shown liberal economy in expending tens of dollars now, that he may save hundreds in the autumn. Between two and three thousand bushels of potatoes will be raised this year; melons and squashes by the wagon load. The demands of the hospital are such that every thing must be furnished by the ten and by the hundred bushels. Early in May the vegetable garden will begin to yield its fruits. From that time till the frosts of December the patients will receive an abundant supply with the morning dew upon them. The soil and climate are such that two crops each year can be raised on most of the land. After the early potatoes, beets, cabbages, corn, pease, and beans are off the ground their place can be supplied with turnips, winter cabbages, and cucumbers for pickles. In short, two-thirds of the farm will be under a second crop. The cavalry camps in the vicinity afford, for the present, an abundant supply of dressing for the land, so that there is no fear of exhausting the soil.

The labor of the farm is just now mainly performed by the contrabands. They are docile, easily taught, and very fair workmen when under good superintendence. With them the intellectual faculties have so long been cruelly compelled to lie dormant that they feel the necessity of some directing mind. It is the uncontradicted testimony of all who have had any experience with them as laborers that they will not only make an industrious, self-supporting, and thrifty portion of our population, but that they will greatly assist Northern enterprise and mind in truly developing this splendid country. Nothing but the curse of slavery could have so long kept it in its present state of barbarism.

I must not omit to mention, among the laborers on this farm, one worker who ever excites my admiration and sympathy. It is a splendid black stallion, jet black, the perfect model of a horse. The noble animal, "Frank," is from North Carolina, and was once the pride of the State. He was compelled to carry a traitor upon his back in the war rebels waged against our flag. He was an animal of such fiery spirit that it needed a Rarey to control him. At one time it became necessary to break open the stable at his head, and to secure him, with the greatest difficulty and danger, before he could be led out.

By the fortunes of war the noble steed was rescued from the ignominious service of traitors, and was brought under the protection of that star-spangled banner beneath whose folds he was born. But the hardships of war had broken down his constitution, and though he retained all his glossy ebony hue, and his symmetric beauty, he could no longer lead the fiery squadrons in the impetuous charge. Meekly he bears his fallen fortunes. As humbly he walks the furrow and draws the plow, no one has ever heard him make the slightest allusion to his former greatness, or to offer one word of repining in view of his present lowly lot. Whatever may be his undivulged feelings, those who now care for him and love him are saddened by the thought that a traitor's limbs should ever have bestrode an animal so noble. Silently he eats his oats; silently he plods along, ten hours a day, over the furrowed field. If his occasional companion in the plow is guilty of the slightest irregularity, gently and with dignity he reproves him by a bite upon the shoulder. Occasionally the bugle peal, which comes bursting from some military band, leads him, apparently for a moment, to forget himself. He seems to snuff the battle from afar. With ears and mane and tail erect, the proud war-horse stands before you. Then suddenly remembering that no sound can awake him to glory again, without a sigh, without a tear, he meekly bows to his humble toil. May man deal gently with you, noble "Frank!" May this luxuriant farm prove your "Hôtel des Invalides" till your life labor is done!

For the sake of the thousands who will perhaps read this sketch who have been patients in this hospital, I must not forget Sport, a coal-black dog with a white breast. Sport is truly loyal, and has always been so. He followed a loved master to the field. In the heady fight he lost his master and was himself wounded. Instinctively he came to the hospital. Though he brought no descriptive paper, Dr. M'Clellan received him kindly, and his wounds were soon healed. The grateful animal is now fairly established on the invalid corps, and seems oppressed with a weight of responsibility scarcely exceeded by that of the surgeon in charge. Every comer and goer he scrutinizes with an anxious eye; he inspects daily all his wards with such manifest fidelity that it has not been deemed necessary to exact from him any report. If any animal trespasses upon what Sport deems the sacred proprieties of the place, he never enters any complaint but assumes the responsibility of inflicting immediate and summary punishment upon the spot. Sport is treated with that deference which all true soldiers command. He is a scarred warrior of many battles, having passed through the entire Peninsular campaign under General M'Clellan.

VII.—THE CLERICAL DEPARTMENT.

Briefly I must allude to the vast amount of labor which one is surprised to find in this Department. 1. There is a report-book, in which every morning the number of men in the Hospital is recorded, and their condition and changes during the last twenty-four hours. A corresponding report is sent to the medical director. During the last two days two hundred patients have been discharged, and four hundred received. 2. A weekly report is issued to the Surgeon-General of the army, detailing the entire condition of the hospital, a copy of which is registered. 3. There is a book in which a copy is kept of all orders of police regulation or of internal administration of the hospital. 4. There is a book in which is registered every order, military or medical, which is received. 5. A copy is kept of all letters received in reference to patients, and the answers to those letters.

"SPORT."

6. There is what is called the indorsement-book, which contains a record of all papers received at the hospital, with the indorsement of a superior officer. 7. The book of requisitions contains a copy of all requisitions made for supplies of any kind for the use of the hospital, such as medicines, food, clothing, furniture, tools, etc. 8. The monthly abstract of commissary stores shows the number of rations drawn during the month, and the amount of articles of food purchased with the hospital fund.

This Hospital Fund deserves especial notice. The Government allows the hospital to draw a certain amount of food, called rations, for every patient in its wards. But sick men can not eat the full amount they are entitled to. As the surgeon in charge makes requisition only for the amount really needed, there is a constantly increasing supply left in the store-houses, to which the hospital is entitled. As the cost price of these rations is credited to the hospital there is thus a fund accumulated. The surgeon in charge can not draw for this in money, but he is entitled to call for its value in such delicacies, for the use of the hospital, as he may deem desirable. Take for instance the month of July, 1863. There were then 1800 men in the hospital. The fund that month amounted to $3930 71. The whole amount was immediately drawn for the use of the same men in such varied delicacies as the appetites of the sick crave, in fruits, jellies, preserves, etc. In addition to this the Sanitary Commission has come in with its refreshing supply of warm and comfortable clothing and of tempting food. It is made a matter of special care, in these admirably-conducted hospitals, that the fund shall not be left to accumulate, but that it shall be expended for the use of those by whom it has been saved. There is the Register of Deaths. A record is kept of the name, company, and regiment of all who die; also the date of their death, the nature of their wound or disease, and the number of the grave. An inventory is made of all the effects, including money, left by the man. A notice is immediately sent to the captain commanding his company, with an inventory of his effects and his descriptive list. An inventory is also furnished at the same time to the Adjutant-General at Washington.

When a man dies he is reverently robed for his burial, placed in a military coffin, on his breast there is laid a card with his name, company, and date of death. The same is also painted on the inside of the lid of his coffin and on the outside. Every soldier who dies in the hospital, black or white, is honored with a military funeral. An escort, with trailed arms, follow him to the grave; the chaplain performs the burial service, and the volley of musketry from his comrades proclaims that the tired soldier sleeps that sleep from which there is no earthly waking. A head-board with the name, company, and regiment of the man painted upon it, is always carried with the coffin and placed at the head of the grave.

The portrait on the following page of "Jacob," the grave-digger, will call up many sad recollections in the minds of the thousands who have seen him while engaged in his daily work.

THE GRAVE-YARD.

THE GRAVE-DIGGER.

"Nigh to a grave that was newly made
 Leaned a sexton old on his earth-worn spade,
 His work was done, and he paused to wait
 The funeral train through the open gate.
 A relic of by-gone days was he;
 His locks were as white as the foaming sea,
 And these words came from his lips so thin,
 'I gather them in! I gather them in!'"

A register is also kept of every descriptive list received at the hospital, and the date of its being sent away. The descriptive list is all-important to the soldier and his family. It contains the evidence of the money or the bounty to which he may be entitled. It is to a soldier what his account-books are to a merchant. A register is kept of all operations performed, and by whom; also a register of the name of every man discharged from service, with an account of the nature of the disease or of the wound which has disabled him.

As I have spoken above of the Diet List, it may be interesting to the reader to know what kind and amount of food is furnished to the patients. They are divided into three classes. First, there are the convalescents, who can safely eat the full amount of food which a healthy man requires. Secondly, there are those who are so feeble and whose appetites are so delicate that they need less hearty food, and not more than half the ordinary amount. The third class includes those who can take but little nourishment, and that of the most simple kind. For the sake of variety each day has its bill of fare. It is not necessary to copy the list for each day in the week. I will take the bill of fare for one day, Monday for instance:

1. FULL-DIET LIST.	2. HALF-DIET LIST.	3. LOW DIET.

Such is the food which the Government provides. With the hospital fund is purchased delicacies, such as eggs, preserves, fruits, poultry, etc. It is mainly on the field and on the march that the Sanitary Commission has come in like an angel of mercy, relieving an amount of suffering which no tongue can adequately tell. It has also replenished the wardrobe of the General Hospital with those garments which can comfort one in the chamber of sickness, and has brought many delicacies to the bedside of the patient.

VIII.—THE CHAPLAIN'S DEPARTMENT.

A hospital without a chaplain is a man without a religion, a body without a soul, a world without a God. No men on earth need the solace and the guidance of Christianity more than do the sick and sorrowing ones in the wards of a hospital. It is said that there are many unworthy chaplains in the American army, that there are some officers who will not have a faithful Christian minister in their regiment, and they consequently choose for their chaplain a corrupt boon companion. This may be, doubtless is so. But in a very extended visit through the lines of our army, from Baltimore to the borders of Florida, I have met many chaplains who were among the noblest of noble men; and it has not been my painful lot to meet with a single one who seemed to me to be unworthy.

It is, however, an alarming fact that in very large divisions of the United States army it is not considered genteel for commissioned officers to worship God. There are many officers who deem it beneath their dignity to pay any external respect whatever to the great arbiter of the destinies of men and of nations. They have "only a God to swear by, no God to pray to." There are many and noble exceptions. Some of the best men in the world are in our army, true soldiers of the Cross. Piety shines nowhere more brightly than in the camp.

We are engaged in the most momentous conflict which ever brought hosts together in the crash of arms. If God be not for us our cause is hopeless. And yet there are thousands of officers leading our armies who ignore the very being of that God. May He, who for the sake of five righteous men would save the ancient cities doomed to destruction, have mercy upon our land!

The Rev. E. P. Roe is chaplain of the Hampton, and Rev. James Marshall is chaplain of the Chesapeake Hospital. I say, for the comfort of those Christian wives and mothers who may have husbands or sons languishing in these wards, that two more faithful, tender, able, self-denying men can nowhere be found. I know them well. The soldier is to them a brother. That true spirit of universal fraternity which Christianity enjoins thoroughly imbues their souls. It would be to me, as a Christian father, had I a son in these wards, an unspeakable comfort to know that one of these warm-hearted ministers of Christ would daily visit his bed. I do not write this to eulogize these chaplains. I write it, weeping wife, weeping mother, to comfort you; you who have given your husband, your son, for the redemption of your country, and who think of him day and night languishing in these wards.

The Rev. Edward Payson Roe has in the Hampton Hospital a Sabbath morning Bible-class. It is well attended, and much interest is manifest as the men freely discuss the passages under examination. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon there is public worship, which is held in one of the spacious wards. Dr. M'Clellan, who lends to the labors of the chaplain his frank, energetic, cordial support, is now making efforts to have a chapel and a reading-room erected as soon as possible. We are on the eve, at the time of this writing, of great battles, and soon all these wards will be crowded to their utmost capacity with sick and wounded men.

The public services are well attended. There is a large church melodeon well played, and a choir led by the chaplain's orderly, E. S. Metcalf. There are ladies of the surgeons of the hospital and others in various ways connected with the institutions whose voices blend sweetly in these songs of Zion. There is also a singing school established, which is open to all who wish to attend. No wise physician can fail to see how important these measures are even as remedial and sanitary influences.

As the hospital is, like a hotel, constantly changing guests, the chaplain every Saturday evening passes through the wards, inviting all who feel inclined to attend worship the next day. As he was one evening engaged in this service a wounded soldier looked up from his pillow and said:

"Chaplain, I would give a great deal if I could go to church to-morrow; but I can not get up. I have not heard the word of God preached since I have been in the army."

"Then," said the chaplain, "if you can not come to us it is our duty to come to you."

He accordingly put the question to vote if they would like to have a brief service of eight or ten minutes there, for those who could not leave their beds. It is seldom that a sick man will turn away from such an offer. They all desired it. Since that time there has been a brief service held in each ward when the sick were able to bear it every Sabbath evening. I recently attended one of these meetings. It was touching in the extreme. The long ward with its rows of beds was dimly lighted with a few candles, revealing the languid forms and pale faces of many sufferers. Noiselessly the little group of Christian worshippers came. They took their stand in the centre of the room. A hymn was gently, plaintively sung,

"Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

A brief portion of Scripture was read, "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in me." A few soothing remarks, in subdued tones, were uttered. Then another hymn of sweetest melody floated through the dim and silent apartment; the familiar words,

"When I can read my title clear To mansions in the skies," must have fallen almost like angel melody upon the ears of those who had so often joined in the same song in the Sabbath-schools and churches of their far-distant homes. This simple service, as broad as Christianity itself, was alike welcomed by all parties. And it is worthy of especial notice that two Roman Catholic soldiers expressed most emphatically their gratification. The whole exercise occupied but about ten minutes. Then the little band of Christ's ministering disciples noiselessly withdrew.

From ward to ward the sacred choir moves on. As the melody of divine song floats through these dim halls, more impressive far than any vaulted cathedral aisles, men partially asleep, men semi-delirious may be seen rising up in their beds, and looking around in pleased surprise, wondering whence the charming strains could come. Many a war-scarred, toil-worn soldier could be seen wiping the tear from his eye. The chaplain is always careful to consult the surgeon in charge of each ward, to ascertain if, in his judgment, any in the ward are so sick as to be injured by the excitement of the service. If so, that ward is for that evening omitted.

On Monday and Tuesday evening there is a prayer-meeting in one of the vacant wards of the Hampton Hospital, which is at present used as a chapel. The Chesapeake Hospital has a beautiful chapel, of which I shall speak hereafter. Last Tuesday evening I attended the prayer-meeting. The room was filled with soldiers. More devout and orderly attention to the exercises could not possibly have been paid. Many of the ladies of the attendant surgeons were present; and the music, instrumental and vocal, was very spirited. The occasion was one which, in all its solemnity, can not easily be effaced from the memory.

The chaplain has entered into a distinct arrangement with the ward-master and the nurses that whenever a patient expresses a wish to see him, at whatever hour of the day or of the night, he shall be immediately sent for. The chaplain is very particular upon this point, insisting upon it that there shall be no hesitation or delay in a request of this nature. Men are daily being brought into the hospital, often hundreds in a day, in all stages of disease and prostration, and suffering from every conceivable variety of wounds. It is consequently impossible for the chaplain, even in the exercise of the most unwearied vigilance, to learn personally the precise condition of them all. Moreover, men who are very sick often do not wake up to a true realization of their condition until a few hours, or even moments, before their death.

A short time ago a soldier from Vermont, apparently a frank, noble-hearted young man, was very sick. Not apprehensive of any danger, he rather repellantly, though respectfully, received the approaches of the chaplain. Suddenly his disease assumed a dangerous form, and at midnight he was told by his physician that he must die before the morning. The unexpected intelligence plunged his soul into the wildest tumult of distress. It was the night succeeding the Sabbath. Earnestly he sent for the chaplain and begged for his prayer. It was one of the most solemn scenes of earth; the still hour of midnight; the dim light of the nurse's lamp; the long, dusky outline of the hospital ward; the shadowy figures of the nurses moving noiselessly about; and the spectral forms of the patients rising up in their beds to listen to the dying, agonizing cry of a man passing to the judgment—all this presented a picture upon which even angels must have gazed with awe. Pain and dread were pictured upon the face of the dying sufferer. Though the death-rattle was in his throat his prayers for pardon woke every sleeper, and brought down the solemnities of eternity into the precincts of time. The words of Christian solace seemed in some degree to soothe the perturbed spirit of the sufferer as he was pointed to a loving Father and a dying Saviour. Convulsively clasping the hand of the chaplain, the soldier-boy died, exclaiming, in his last earthly utterance, "Dear Jesus, have mercy upon me!" Eighteen hundred years ago our blessed Redeemer said to a dying penitent, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Who shall say that the same loving Saviour did not listen to the penitential prayer, and receive to his arms the expiring soldier?

Another scene I will record, illustrative of the influence of Christianity in the hospital. A Christian soldier had long been sick, and had borne weakness, and pain, and absence from the friends he loved, with the most unrepining and cheerful submission. Unexpectedly his disease assumed an unfavorable turn, and it was manifest that his end was near. As the chaplain came to his bedside he found him dying, in excruciating pain of body, but peace and joy reigned in his soul. The only slight impatience he manifested was the occasional cry, in the midst of almost unendurable paroxysms of pain, "Heavenly Father, take me quickly!" One of the nurses, Mrs. Meacham, sat by his pillow, holding, with a sister's tender care, the head of the sufferer upon her shoulder. Other kind friends stood by his side, with experienced skill ministering to every want to which relief in this sad hour could be afforded. The death struggle was short, and the martyr soldier fell asleep in Jesus.

The female nurses make a special endeavor always to be with the dying. There is no dying man who, in memory of his mother, does not love to look up upon woman's loving face, and to feel the pressure of woman's gentle hand as he passes through the dark valley. So far as my observation extends the patients in this hospital, without exception, express themselves grateful for the abounding provision which is made for their wants both of body and of mind.

The present chaplain of Hampton Hospital is making vigorous efforts to secure a varied and interesting library; not merely a religious library—man can not live by bread alone—but such a library of entertaining reading, religious, historical, biographical, as will help to beguile the weary hours of an invalid. We have only to recall our own experience to realize the value of an entertaining book when we are confined to our bed or our room. The patients were continually calling for something to read, and there were but few books to be found. It is true that the Rev. Mr. Paylen, who was on duty with Dr. McClellan for more than a year, and who performed his duties as a noble Christian man, making himself the friend and companion of the patients, and who at length was compelled to leave this field of labor through the failure of health, had commenced collecting a library, with the efficient co-operation of Dr. McClellan. But for several months after he left no chaplain had been appointed, and these books had become mostly scattered or lost. Gladly would the patients give a part of their dinner for a book. When passing through the wards, and finding so many playing cards—which game the experience of all ages teaches us it is almost impossible to play without falling into gambling—he was almost invariably met by the apology, "We have nothing else to do." But now an admirable supply of books is beginning to flow in. The Christian Commission, with expansive views and open-handed munificence, is sending, through the chaplains, to the soldiers every where food for the mind. One who visits the army meets at every point the footprints of this noble charity. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the benefits which the Christian Commission is conferring upon our army. The hospital library forming here is greatly enriched by liberal donations from S. B. Caldwell, Esq., of Brooklyn, New York; W. E. Dodge, Jun.; L. M. Ferris, Jun.; and N. Sands, Esq., of New York city. Other distinguished gentlemen have promised soon to send in valuable contributions.

It is the design of Dr. McClellan to have a library-room erected in the rear of the chapel which is soon to be built. There it is hoped that the various religious papers, now so numerous and so ably conducted, will be on file. The most important daily papers and monthly periodicals will invite the soldier to the reading-room. The sides of this room are to be shelved for books. A large number of old magazines, containing the most interesting variety of reading, have been bound. The Messrs. Harper and the Messrs. Appleton have very generously offered any of their publications, at half price, for the hospital. Messrs. Carter, Carleton, and Randolph have made offers nearly similar. The chaplain is now sending, through funds obtained from friends, for quite a list of the most valuable issues of these publishing-houses. All books are carefully labeled, the borrower's name is registered, and the book must be returned before another can be taken, and within a week.

A pleasant scene occurred in one of the wards the other day, which beautifully illustrates hospital life. There was a young soldier painfully wounded. In Kilpatrick's celebrated raid, when near Richmond, his knee was dreadfully shattered by a bullet. With almost superhuman fortitude he kept his saddle for thirty hours without medical aid. He at length reached the hospital, and for weary weeks was a helpless sufferer upon his cot. One day the youthful wife of the chaplain went in with an entertaining book to read to him at his bedside. There were many patients in the ward. As she read one drew near, listening and lingering, and then another, and another, until she was surrounded by a silent, attentive group, whose sorrows and pains were for a time beguiled by the charms of a wild and wondrous tale.

Though these hospitals, under the care of Dr. McClellan, are doubtless managed with more than ordinary ability, there are unquestionably many others, which it has not been my privilege to visit, which are conducted essentially on the same principles. I spent a few days at a small hospital at Morehead City, North Carolina, under the care of Dr. J. B. Belangée, which is a perfect gem. Never have I seen in this country or Europe an establishment of its kind which surpassed it. It certainly approaches very near perfection.

Thus far I have spoken mainly of the Hampton Hospital. The Chesapeake Hospital, which is situated at its side, separated only by a narrow creek, which is crossed by a bridge and a railroad, may now be considered as a branch of the same institution, as both are under the same surgeon in charge, Dr. McClellan. Dr. George Bayles, Acting Assistant-Surgeon, is the very efficient executive officer of this institution. The Chesapeake Hospital is a very essential, almost a necessary adjunct to the Hampton. Its main building is far more imposing in its architectural structure. Its situation is enchanting, almost beyond description. Its well-furnished apartments afford exceedingly attractive rooms for officers who seek seclusion. Its broad, majestic veranda presents a promenade where beauty only meets the eye. The building is provided with every comfort. One of Ericsson's caloric engines fills massive tanks near the roof with water, so that there is an abundant supply in each story for bathing-rooms and all other wants. This building will probably hereafter be mainly used for sick and wounded officers. The building was originally erected for a young ladies' school. It was used for that purpose until the madness of treason desolated the homes of Virginia.

In the admirable picture which accompanies this description, and which is from the artistic pencil of Dr. Bayles, there is exhibited the main building, the star-wards, and the chapel. The whole hospital, with its external wards and well-provided tents, will accommodate between eleven and twelve hundred patients. There is also a picturesque group of tents upon the ground which accommodate two companies of the Veteran Reserve Corps. These men, about 150 in number, are detailed to perform guard duty, to enforce police regulations, and to serve as attendants in every department of the institution.

Captain J. R. Stone is the efficient commander of this force.

If in the evening of any day you go into the wards of one of the hospitals in Flanders you will see, by the dim light of the tall tapers, the Flemish nuns, called Beguines, religiously consecrated as nurses for the sick. As they noiselessly glide about, in their dark dresses and their white cowls, you are oppressed as by the apparition of something unearthly—as though corpses, in their grave-clothes, had come to minister to the sick and the dying. But they are noble women, gentle nurses, who, perhaps with hearts saddened by some irreparable grief, have offered themselves, with monastic rigors of self-denial, as living sacrifices to God to serve humanity. They deserve the world's respect and love.

The "Sœurs de la Charité," in France, have bound themselves with vows still more severe, to renounce all the pleasures of life save the pleasure of relieving distress. These "Sisters of Charity" who, after a year's novitiate, take upon themselves irrevocable vows, are seen every hour of the day and of the night gliding among the beds of all the hospitals in Paris and in France.

The consecrated nurse, in her black gown and white hood, is a ministering angel amidst heart-rending scenes. Every generous spirit will render her the homage of respect and affection.

Our own hospitals have their Sisters of Charity, who with zeal not less ardent, with love not less pure, with self-sacrifice not less Christ-like, bathe the brow, and wash the feet, and dress the wounds, and close the eyes in death of their brother-man. To my heart they are nearer and dearer, in that they are not nuns but women. As I have seen some mother-loving boy look up from his pillow, upon a face beaming with kindness, and say, "Mother;" as I hear them called by the affectionate terms of "Lady" or "Sister;" as I have seen them smiling through their tears, triumphing over sleeplessness and exhaustion, and performing duties the most painful the mind can contemplate, I feel that no country upon this globe, and that no age of this world, and that no form of religion has produced a nobler class than that of the philanthropic women of Protestant America. In our hospitals can be found not a few ladies of wealth and culture—women who can minister better at the bed of sickness because their hearts are kept warm, and all their sympathies are enlivened, by the influences of social life.

In the Chesapeake Hospital there are, at the present time, five ladies who would be classed in Flanders as Beguines, and in France as Sisters of Charity. They are Mrs. Mary B. Dully—who is chief of the department of nurses—Miss Ella Wolcott, Miss J. E. Bently, Miss Mary A. C. Johnson, and Mrs. D. W. Holt. This number will soon be increased. A great battle is soon expected, and all the wards are prepared for the awful results which even victory must secure. Mrs. Ann Burtis is the very efficient head of the nurses' department in the Hampton Hospital, having served there, with great acceptance, from the time of its organization.

The chaplain of this hospital, the Rev. James Marshall, has devoted all the enthusiasm of his nature to making provision for the intellectual and spiritual wants of the patients. The subjoined sketch will show the beautiful chapel he has reared through the contributions of liberal friends in the North. Attached to the chapel is a reading-room, of the interior of which we also give a sketch. Here the soldier can come at any hour and have access to many of the leading periodicals of the day. There is a good supply of valuable books in all the various branches of literature, theology, and science. These can be taken into the wards, being carefully charged to the one who takes them. As I was examining the library, accompanied by Mr. Marshall, he pointed me to the bound volumes of Harper's Magazine, as a curiosity, saying that there were no books sought for so eagerly as those. Though they had evidently been used with the utmost care, every page gave evidence of the interest with which it had been perused. The volumes stood there proudly, in military array, like war-worn veterans. Rev. Mr. Marshall has been connected with this hospital two years. He has consecrated the dew of his youth to the noble work of soothing pain, of cheering the disconsolate, of feeding Christ's lambs, of guiding wanderers to the fold. The cassock, the frock, the bare or sandaled foot, the cloister, and the beads add no lustre to such heroism.

Hampton Hospital was organized on the 14th August, 1862. The first patients were received from the Army of the Potomac in its march from Harrison's Landing to reinforce General Pope's army. From that time to the 26th of April, 1864, the number of patients received and treated has been 6540. Of these 216 have died; 1049 have been discharged, but on account of disability have been transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps, or to serve in other hospitals; 4491 have been cured and returned to duty; 784 now remain in hospital.

Three days after writing the above sentence the numbers in the hospital were swollen to over two thousand, sent from the Yorktown army, stripping for the fight. It is not improbable that within a few days five thousand wounded men may be sent to these grounds. The Chesapeake Hospital will accommodate about twelve hundred. But in times of great emergency many more must be crowded into its wards. The following picture of patients from Yorktown, landing at the wharf in Hampton, is taken from the life. By the kindness of Dr. McClellan the group was arrested for a moment that the artist might photograph the scene.

I write these closing lines in one of the most beautiful mornings of early May. My window at the Chesapeake opens upon the green and velvety lawn, sprinkled with sheep. Beyond is the bay smooth as glass crowded with gun-boats and transports. Every ship upon the mirrored waters seems to float double—keel meeting keel. Our gorgeous banner, drooping from the flag-staff, scarcely opens its folds. The bleating of the sheep, the plaintive cry of the sea-bird, the enchanting beauty of ocean and sky and land, all present a scene which Eden could hardly have rivaled. What a happy world might this be if man would be the brother of his fellow-man!

A few leagues from this peaceful spot nearly three hundred thousand men are mustering all their energies for the gage of battle. Foul treason would destroy our nation, and with it destroy the hopes of humanity. Patriotism has listened to the cry of imperiled liberty, and sadly, yet resolutely, has abandoned all the congenial walks of an industrial life and girded herself for the conflict. The dreadful crash of arms soon must come. These floors may then be crimsoned with dripping blood. These beds may all be filled with the pallid, the maimed, the dying; these wards may then resound with the sighs of those who shall never see father or mother, brother or sister, wife or child again. The rooms are all ready; the beds are all made; the surgeon's tools are all polished and keenly sharp; the bandages are all prepared; the surgeons, the nurses, the attendants are waiting at their posts. The awful hour soon must come. It is dreadful! O Lord, how long! how long!

BRINGING IN PATIENTS.

THE BEND.

IT hardly deserved the name of village, but was only a cluster of houses, hiding in the thick woods which filled the valley and crept upward on either side to cover the Tennessee hills. The lumber-merchants had found out these forests, caring little, indeed, for the peace of their untrodden wilds, or the beauty of their gnarled boughs, which were festooned with the growth of rich, rank mosses, and caught the sunlight here and there through the dense foliage. But the trunks were large and sturdy, and the little stream which wet their roots flowed toward the city, so, one by one, the houses of the settlers dotted the clearing, and the timber floated lazily down the river.

Two or three farmers, agents, and directors from Knoxville, together with the workmen both black and white, comprised the little colony. It was growing, however, and in its pride boasted a red building with large front windows, filled with apples and calico, butter, tin-ware, flour, sugar, candy, and rum, which it dignified by the title of "store."

This was the trysting-place of all lovers and gossips, all politicians and loafers; it was the Opera; it was Exchange; it was Broadway for the settlement.

They were gathered there as usual on the evening of which I speak, and Richard Deane, who stood among them waiting for his turn to complete a purchase, watched them idly, taking little or no interest in their proceedings, except to keep an eye on two or three of his men who would soon unfit themselves at the rum-counter for to-morrow's work if he did not interfere. The women, in their green-checked sun-bonnets, were clustered around a new pattern of calico which the last boat had brought from the city. The young people enjoyed their flirtations out on the steps, whither they had repaired "to see the sunset." The men lounged against the counter and flour-barrels, smoking their pipes. He found himself listening at last to their conversation, which had grown somewhat loud, and jarred against his ear.

"There hain't never been such times up to the Bend sence I've ben here," said a rough voice. "All the bisness a'most stopped, and perwisions risin' agin a fellar's grit, dreadful; and draftin' goin' on within ten mile on us, and says I to Melindy, says I, 'Wher's to come the end?'"

"Where, indeed?" piped an old woman's voice from the calico corner. "We shall all die like the Injins in cold bloody murder, with them battles and sojers tearin' through the country and we shet up here atween the mountains."

"They could starve us clean out as easy as that," said another, snapping her fingers by way of illustration, so that her brass thimble rolled off on the floor and was lost to view among the barrels.

"And 'tain't Tennessee as is to blame for it, nuther," growled a half-drunken workman, as he watched it roll.

Deane stooped to pick up the thimble, then sat down to whittle at a pine stick, without taking any part in the conversation. The men looked askance at him among them, for Mr. Deane was a director and held with some respect, then went on talking.

"They were agoin' to stan' up fur their own, they were; and hadn't a man a right to his own niggers without them tarnal Abolitionists stepping in to say he shouldn't"—this from the Aristocrat of the Bend, who boasted an inheritance of two negroes, whom he carried with him on exhibition wherever he went, to the great envy of the settlers. His sentiments were loudly echoed. One man upheld him enthusiastically. "He would like to see them derved Yankees whipped out o' these mountains—every scoundrel of 'em."

Deane had whittled his stick to such a point that it broke in his hands; he threw it away and looked up at the speaker, with his eyes flashing.

"If there's any shame in you, Joe Carey, your cheeks ought to blush for that."

"Why now, really?" replied the man, with a coarse laugh, "do you think so, Mr. Deane? What should I be ashamed on?"

"Of being a traitor to the best Government that ever protected thankless rebels so many years as ours has."

"I'm a traitor, am I, Mr. Deane?"

"You heard what I said," he replied, quietly. There were whispers of "he's a Yankee" passing from mouth to mouth. He looked up and smiled. "Yes," he said, "I am a Yankee."

"And an Abolitionist?" said some one in a louder tone.

"And an Abolitionist."

"I wish you was along with 'em, you'd find out which be traitors then, Mr. Deane," said Joe Carey, sullenly.

Deane silenced him with a look. He then took his package and went out of the store, stopping to leave directions with a group of men about to-morrow's work.

There was one girl on the steps who looked up into his face timidly as she moved aside to let him pass. She was a slight, shrinking creature, with a sun-bonnet almost concealing her freckled face with its bands of dark reddish hair, its timid mouth, and large hazel eyes.

She had stood just in the doorway, leaning against the open blind, for a long time, with the sunset painting bars of golden light through it on her dark dress, but never reaching her face, which was turned away toward Richard Deane all the time he talked. He had seen her earnest gaze once, and had nodded to her with a kind smile; then he forgot she was there.

She watched him now as he stood talking to the men out by the pump, straightening his manly figure, and tossing the hair back from his forehead to let the wind cool it. She might have stood so five minutes, it might have been fifteen, she could not tell, when she was startled by a pull at her sleeve. It was a little negro boy, who stood there grinning from ear to ear.

"Why, Tom, what do you want?"

"She say Misse Hetty come home right off short." And the boy jerked his thumb over his shoulder to indicate the origin of the command.

"Yes," replied the girl, "I'll come." Her face, which had brightened a moment ago like one taking in the charm of a beautiful picture, relapsed into its old lifelessness. Bidding the boy follow her in an humbled tone, as if she had no right to give a command, she sighed, went down the steps slowly, and walked away.

Seeing that Tom did not follow her, she turned round to call him. He was standing on the steps with Joe Carey, whose eyes, fixed on Deane, were gleaming wrathfully through the shaggy hair which fell over his forehead.

"Tom!"

"Yes, I'se comin', Misse Hetty."

She moved along a step or two, but Tom remained stationary. So she spoke again, this time peremptorily.

"Lor', Misse Hetty, what a hurry you am in!" said Tom, rolling his eyes, and putting his hands in his pockets. "Missus said I was gwine for to get some rope to halter de nag—t'other's broke."

"Tom, come this minute!"

"And der's some 'bacca, too, as Massa's been in de most distress for—I'se got dat to get."

Poor Hetty gave up in despair, and was turning away without him, when Carey, who apparently had not noticed the boy before, stopped in the midst of his sullen talk with the Aristocrat and the drunken workman, who were smoking at the door, and giving the boy a kick which landed him in the sand below, told him, with an oath, "to go 'long with his mistress, and not be sneakin' round him."

Tom picked himself up, looking rather crest-fallen for the moment, but there was a sly wink in his eye as he walked meekly by Hetty's side which she noticed.

"Tom, what does ail you?" she said.

"Lor', nothin', Misse Hetty. I was a sinful nigger to be botherin' you—I'se respectable now."

But though he followed her obediently, he rubbed his hands with such apparent delight, and chuckled and rolled his eyes so mysteriously, that Hetty felt serious fears for the genuineness of his repentance, and was just delivering him a little lecture on it, in her grave way, when she heard footsteps behind them, and almost before she knew it some one had taken her heavy bundle from her hand and was walking by her side.

"Six quarts of meal—and you such a little thing! Tom, you ought to be ashamed of yourself to let Miss Hetty carry such a bundle."

"Dat's a fac'," said Tom, solemnly. "If you'll gib it to me I'll go it cross lots, and run wid it all de way to make up 'counts square."

And, good as his word, Tom seized the bundle, and with a broad grin at Hetty, intended probably for confession of sin, started off, and was soon over the wall and out of sight.

"Well, Hetty, your aunt doesn't give you any rest, does she?"

"Oh yes, Sir, sometimes. I ain't her own, you know. I do wish once in a while—"

"Well, what is it?"

"Oh, nothing, Sir. I didn't mean to trouble you, only sometimes I should like it to see a picture or something to show me what mother was like."

"Poor little thing!" And Deane looked at her compassionately as she walked so meekly by his side, with her face hidden in the shadow of her bonnet. She looked up at last in a half-frightened way.

"I—I don't know what made me, Mr. Deane. I didn't mean to talk so; it was very wrong in me, and then I had so much else to say to you—how could I be so selfish?"

His merry laugh did not drive away the cloud on her face.

"Perhaps you'll think me very silly," she said, with her head drooping a little, "but I am afraid. I wish you needn't have to talk about the war and all that. If you'd seen Joe Carey—"

"What of him?" said Deane, carelessly.

"Oh, such a look as he had when you went out to the pump there! I don't know—they're all so dreadful rough they wouldn't mind doing any thing, and every body here hates the North. They don't seem to mind the old flag one bit. Uncle talks so sometimes about—about men who feel as you do that I can't bear it. And then I get thinking—"

"That I shall be spirited off by those fellows some night? Why, Hetty, what a foolish little creature?"

Something in his bantering tone brought a change into her face—it was partly pain, partly resolve; and when she spoke again it was with a womanly firmness in her voice.

"I knew you would say so. I don't know very much about these things, but I am quite sure you are not safe here."

Deane's face grew grave, but he was not thinking of the words she said; it was only a certain soothing in her quiet tones that stirred to the surface some thoughts that had been hidden.

"Hetty," he said, suddenly, "I can't stand this much more, they goad me so with their traitorous words; it must end."

"End?" turning her face up in a frightened way.

"I must go away from here. If I could get up North among loyal people I should be happy."

Hetty stooped to pick a daisy, and began pulling it to pieces nervously; she made no answer.

"If I could only fight!" he went on, passionately—"if I could fight! It seems so hard." Unconsciously he held out his right hand, with its mutilated finger, looking as if he loathed it for standing between him and his country's need.

In a moment Hetty had snatched it in both of hers, and bent her face over it so that it was wet with her hot tears. The young man stood amazed.

"Hetty! what ails you?"

"Don't speak so—scold me, blame me, send me out of your sight! I know what you are thinking—I did it all; it is my fault that you are unhappy, and you would have made such a brave soldier! Oh, Mr. Deane, I wish you had never seen me!"

The girl's slight frame shook with some uncontrollable emotion. He tried in his wonder to soothe her, the truth dawning gradually in his mind. He remembered what he had long forgotten—how his hand came to be the maimed thing it was. It was the very first day he was ever at the Bend when he was hunting for a place to board. He had found this little girl—she was so very small, and, indeed, no more than a little girl in years then—he had found her trying in vain to split a large log of wood—far too large for her feeble strength—and he had taken the hatchet in his kindly way to help her. The child thanked him shyly, but showed so strong a wish to learn to do the work herself, "because," she said, "aunt often sent her to make kindling," that, to please her, he had steadied the log while she made another attempt on its hard surface. Her little hands, however, were trembling and awkward, and the hatchet came sharply down on his own. He remembered how, even in his pain, he had noticed the pale terror of her face, and how she did not shriek and run away as most children would have done, but, binding her apron around his hand, she led him into the house and called for help.

That was the way he had found out her uncle, Silas Blunt, and there he had boarded ever since. He had never dreamed the little thing would take that accident to heart so after all these years.

"Hetty, why, Hetty, don't!" he said, putting his hand gently on her shoulder. "I wasn't thinking of you; indeed I had quite forgotten how I was hurt. I supposed you had."

Forget! She did not tell him how many nights she had cried herself to sleep over it up in her little chamber in the loft. She only looked into his face in a hopeless way, as if she wondered he did not hate her, and said, fiercely dropping her arm by her side as if she would will it useless,

"I wish it had taken off my hand!"

"Why, little Hetty"—Deane was really sorry for the girl—"you mustn't talk so—indeed you mustn't. I never have a thought of blame for you; how could I?"

She shook her head sadly; she was so persistent in these fancies.

"Come now, Hetty," he went on, with a laugh, "don't let us think any more about these disagreeable things; what do you think of my plan of going North and getting some good business and a pleasant home?" His voice was so strong and full of hope her own seemed to catch its cheer.

"I think you know best, Mr. Deane. I think perhaps you're right. There won't be much business here if the war keeps on long."

"What a practical little head you have, Hetty! but supposing I shouldn't get work any where else?"

"You? Oh, Mr. Deane!"

She turned her eyes up to his with a sort of worship like a dumb brute's in them; you see it sometimes in these women whose patient lives are outwardly so commonplace. To look at their timid faces, to see how a word, a look, a touch could guide them, you would think only of a brook which sparkled in the sunshine, or moaned in the shade, as the case might be. But there may be deep waters there, and the current may be strong.

Deane laughed at her credulity.

"Why, Hetty, I don't seem to every body as I do to you; I shouldn't be every where what I am here; I should only be a common man—a very common man," he repeated musingly. But if you had seen his eye kindle, and the involuntary straightening of his tall form, you would have agreed with Hetty in thinking that, whatever place he might take in the proud world of which she knew nothing, his own honest manhood was a crown of glory to him.

He read this in her face, though she said nothing, and, pleased for the moment, as any man would be with an innocent vanity, he took her hand in a caressing way and patted it gently.

"You are a silly little thing," he said. Just then they were startled by a vision of Tom coming suddenly from behind the thicket which grew by the wall.

"Der ain't no more cross lots to go ober," he said, apologetically; "so I'se come on de street and I'se gwine respectable now, Misse Hetty;" and without stopping to take breath, he ran on down the dusty road, tossing his bundle in the air, and catching it on his feet as it came down to the imminent danger of its contents.

Hetty dropped Deane's hand quickly when she saw this apparition, with something very like a blush on her freckled cheeks; but they were hidden under her bonnet and he did not see it.

They walked on, quietly talking of him and his new plans, till they reached the house. Somehow Deane always felt better, and his future looked brighter for such a talk. She had such a quiet, sensible way of putting things—this little creature!

They found Tom sitting outside the yard the perfect picture of despair. The bundle with its broken paper lay at his feet, and the meal was scattered on the grass. He looked up with a rueful countenance, rolling his eyes at Hetty.

"Lor', I didn't mean to do dat ar—I didn't, true as Gospel! I tought I'd cotch it, and my foot stuck trough de paper. Land o' Goshen!

I dersent tell she. I'd lieber fight de Phlisstins 'long wid Goliah, I had." Hetty, repressing a smile at this remarkable Scriptural allusion, reproved the boy for his carelessness, then said she would do the best for him she could and take the bundle to her aunt herself. The delighted Tom was voluble in his thanks, assuring her repeatedly "dat he'd never be disrespectable agin!"

She had a fancy for the boy, and often saved him from the lawful results of his mad capers.

She and Deane replaced the meal in its bag as best they could, and, with a last kindly warning to Tom against the recurrence of like accidents, went into the house.

Hetty went directly to her aunt to intercede for Tom, patiently heard herself blamed as usual for a long category of faults, beginning with her delay at the store, and finally ending with Tom. She attempted little or no reply, took off her bonnet, and went about her evening work in the listless way habitual to her. But Mrs. Blunt was not pacified.

"I've left all them dishes for you," she said, angrily; "you've dawdled long enough for one night, and must make up for it; and you must jest see to Richard Deane's supper yourself, for when I slave myself to death for any fine gentleman that don't get his meals at Christian hours like the rest on us, my name won't be Lucindy Blunt."

Then having announced her intention of spending the evening at a neighbor's, and repeating her directions sharply, Mrs. Blunt put on her bonnet and shawl and disappeared, more than ever impressed with a sense of Hetty's unworthiness and ingratitude, and the credit it was to her to give a home to her sister's child.

If she had seen the dull face brighten and glow with pleasure I think she would have come directly back, taken off her bonnet, and prepared Mr. Deane's supper herself.

Hetty called him when it was ready, into the kitchen of course, this was the fashion at the Bend. Silas Blunt being well to do in his small way, ranking indeed next to the Aristocrat by virtue of the ownership of Tom, the house boasted a little close room with a wooden sofa on rockers, two or three chairs, a large rag mat of varied colors in the middle of the floor, and on it a small round table, ornamented with a Bible, one or two stray copies of the "Farmer's Almanac," and a cook-book, which room was honored by the name of "parlor."

Hetty had a secret wish that to-night—it might be the last night she should ever get Mr. Deane's supper herself—she might spread a snowy cloth on that little round table, and open the windows of that dark room and let him enjoy his evening meal for once, away from the stifling kitchen and the fumes of her uncle's pipe floating in from the backdoor steps, which she knew were so unpleasant to him.

But against the "powers that were" she never thought of rebelling. She closed the door that her uncle's rough voice and tobacco-smoke might be as far away as possible, opened both the windows to let the air blow freshly through the room, and set the little table between them. After all it was not unpleasant, Deane thought, as he sat down to his simple meal. There was a stray jasmine vine which Hetty had trained outside the window, and the wind tossed its yellow blossoms to and fro, filling the air with fragrance. There was a bit of it Hetty had laid by his plate, too, and she herself looked, not pretty, he said to himself, marking her old-fashioned little figure, her sun-burned face and reddish hair. But she had such quiet ways, such a pleasant smile, moreover she was so thoughtful in all her little cares for his comfort. What a pity the girl was so plain; she would make such a nice wife for some honest, prosperous wood-cutter some day. Just as he was thinking so she stepped in front of the window to dip a glass of water for him from the pail. As she stood with her head bent a little the evening light fell through the yellow jasmine, touching her hair. He saw how heavy it was, and how beautiful its golden red could be. Her profile, too, was fair and girlish in relief against the western sky.

"Hetty," he said, suddenly, "I wonder if you'll miss me any when I'm gone."

She raised her eyes, dark and liquid again with that dumb look: he wondered that he had never known before that she had beautiful eyes. They grew dim as he watched her, still standing in the light. Then she moved away from the window with a low, nervous laugh, saying, in her timid way, that "it wasn't any matter."

Mr. Deane ate the rest of his supper in silence. Hetty at last began to wash up the tea-things in the twilight. He did not join the smoking-company which Silas Blunt and one or two of his neighbors were holding on the backdoor steps, for in their traitorous talk he could have no part nor lot. Hetty knew this was the reason he did not go, but still it pleased her to have him sit quietly in the corner where he could watch her at her work, talking over the new life he should find in the free North, under the flag he loved. It would not be much longer—he might never talk so with her again, and a few hot tears came all unbidden. But she wiped them away in the dark, and he did not see them.

Presently they heard Silas knocking the ashes out of his pipe, and he came in, followed by his wife.

"Hetty, you lazy thing, light the candle!" said her aunt, throwing herself into a chair, while Mr. Blunt grumbled because he could not find the dipper. Somehow Deane could not bear to hear Hetty scolded to-night, so, to divert attention from her, he began talking to the two, and at last told them of his intention to leave the Bend.

"Wa'al, ef ever I see a Lincolnite true grit you're one on 'em," said the astonished Silas in his heavy way.

"Now you don't say so, Mr. Deane!" and appalling visions came to Mrs. Blunt of the loss of this valuable boarder and his prompt payments.

"Hetty! Hetty! do you hear this? Where is the girl?"

Hetty was not to be seen; she had slipped away and gone up stairs to bed.

The next two weeks passed quickly. Deane was very busy making his last arrangements with the men, and instructing his successor who had been sent down from Knoxville a few days before the time fixed for his departure. This man, however, was not to board at Silas Blunt's, and Hetty was secretly glad, for he was a coarse, ill-featured person, and a rebel besides, and she felt she could not see him in Mr. Deane's place somehow.

They were hard days for Hetty, these last before he went. The poor little thing could not have said what ailed her. She did not know why it was that all the yellow sunshine which lay in thick golden bars on the kitchen floor should seem so cold, why she did not like to hear the robins sing, nor why she cried herself to sleep every night with such bitter tears. She knew why her lip trembled sometimes when Mr. Deane came home to supper and spoke a few kind words to her, or when she helped him in some preparation for his journey—it was because he was going away and she should never see him again. But it couldn't be that which she cried over at night, for she was such a little useless thing she had no right to mind his leaving her, and what had that to do with the sunlight and the robin's song?—they were just the same whether he were there or not.

And so the last day came, and she had seen Joe Carey come with a wagon to drive his trunk to the nearest station, where it might be sent by railroad, asking, with his eyes gleaming through his shaggy hair, if Mr. Deane calc'lated to go in his own boat to-night? Mr. Deane had said "yes;" and she watched Joe drive away the precious trunk, seeing him stop just on the edge of the woods to talk with two or three rough-looking men—strangers they were at the Bend; and when she heard their loud laughter, thinking how glad Joe was to get rid of Mr. Deane, the rebellious tears sprang quickly to her eyes, and she turned away, trying very hard not to hate him.

The sun set at last, large and fiery red; the twilight crept out of the woods, and the moon rose silently behind the purple hills. It was then that Deane came up to the house to take his bag and say "Good-by." He had parted from his men, with some of them pleasantly, for he had been a kind master, but he had noticed the thankless rebel look on so many faces that it was with little regret he left them and the old life he and they had led together.

He had given some last kindly advice to the ubiquitous Tom, who had followed him all day as if he feared to lose sight of him, had obtained from him the boy's invariable form of a solemn promise that he "would be respectable" to Miss Hetty in future, and had watched him run away into the woods brushing his shirt-sleeve across his eyes. He had shaken hands with Silas and

Mrs. Blunt, and left the farm-house to look for Hetty. He found her standing at the gate.

"Well, Hetty," he said, cheerfully, "I am going."

"Aren't you early? the moon is hardly up."

"No. My boat is up the river, I shall have nearly a mile's walk, and it will be bright moonlight by that time and grand sailing; the wind is just right."

He hesitated, hardly caring to say he must go. Hetty stood playing nervously with her apron strings with her head bent.

"Well," he said, at length, "it is time I started; don't forget me, Hetty, I shall think of you. This is a lonely life you lead. I haven't forgotten what you said to me one day about your mother, but you must keep up good courage."

Courage! This was just the word she wanted now, wanted so much more than he guessed. The sound of it stopped the quiver on her lips, and she folded her hands quietly.

"And then," said Deane, in a bright way, "you will marry some good man that will make you happy one of these days."

She started, a burning blush reddening her face and neck, so deep it was that he saw it by the faint light the moon sent over the hills. She hid her face on the gate, and for a moment she made him no answer. Of course, Deane thought, it was quite natural, any girl would do so, and she was so young and timid besides. He smiled.

"I didn't mean to bother you, Hetty, just as I was going off; I won't say it again, you foolish little thing, but I shall think it just the same. And, Hetty, I want to be like a good brother to you, and you mustn't mind writing me about it when the time comes, and don't forget me, will you? I shall miss you, little girl; well, good-by!"

He took her hand and kissed her gravely on the forehead, as was quite natural and very kind in him, Mrs. Blunt thought, looking through the "parlor" window.

The young man had not thought it would be so hard to leave this little thing with her sad eyes and her patient face turned so mutely up to his. He felt suddenly how he should miss her gentle ways and voice, and walked away sadly.

"Hetty!" called her aunt from the house, in a tone somewhat softened of its usual asperity. She started from her posture at the gate. She had been leaning over it, with her eyes fixed on the path to the woods and the dark form that entered their shadow.

"Well, aunt?"

"You'd better run down to the store and get some coffee, there ain't a scrap for breakfast."

Hetty obeyed silently; it was better she should have this errand though she longed for nothing so much as stillness; it was better so.

She felt no fear at being alone after dark on this solitary walk; indeed she never thought of it as solitary, nor did she pause and shrink from passing through the group of men collected round the doorway of the store. This was the way among the girls at the Bend; they were quite safe, for there is a certain chivalry that exists among the coarsest men dwelling in such a place as that, with only the grand woods and the silence of the hills forever about them. All of beauty that can touch their rude natures makes the voice of womanhood more clear.

But of this Hetty was not thinking. She walked on mechanically, like one in a dream, yet with rapid step. Her purchase made, avoiding the curious tongues of the women in the store, and the eyes of the men on the steps who watched her idly, she made her way among them and out into the road. On every side she heard of Richard Deane: it seemed as if scarcely any thing else was said by the curious and excited people. But she did not linger at the sound, only feeling a vague impatience that every body must have his name on their lips—the name which she would whisper over softly when she could creep into his desolate room that night, and see if it would not help her to cry and get rested. Her cheeks were flushed, her eyes dry and burning. She had but one thought, to get home, to be alone, any where, that she might be still and think.

Suddenly her nervous walk was stopped by the apparition of a boy apparently playing "stick-knife" in the grass just at her side. He was making wonderful evolutions in the air at each turn of the knife, greatly to the amusement of a group of men who stood smoking at some little distance, yet near enough to see him. It proved to be Tom.

"Why, Tom!"

"Hush, Misse Hetty, not so loud; dey am watchin' me. I say I play stick-knife, an' dey look. I'se been an' done waitin' for you. Don't be scared. Dat ar—" Here Tom leaped high in the air, coming down on his hands and feet, tossing his head and rolling his eyes, while he jerked out the words, "Joe Carey."

Hetty started.

"I'se gwine to—dey ain't all gone yet. Dey's gwine to meet him at de ford."

Tom stopped to roll over and fall down a banking near with the most remarkable agility. The men behind laughed in a drunken way. He came back, shaking off the dust.

"Dey'd kill me if dey knowed I'd telled yer." Here he drove his knife into the grass up to the handle. "De fac' is, Joe Carey an' dem men as has ben hangin' round wid him, dey're after Massa Deane. Dey'll find him at de Ford, an' jes' cotch him."

"What? What will they do?"

Tom finished a series of three somersaults, the last one ending at her feet.

"Dey might string him up, or duck him under—no tellin'," was his cheering reply.

"What can I do? I must rouse the men;" and poor Hetty turned as if she would call them.

Tom stood up, closing his knife.

"No, neber, Misse Hetty," he said, under his breath. "Dey'll kill me sure, and half ob 'em wouldn't stir to help a Yankee nohow. You run down to de ribber and hail him. I'll be dar when it's respectable to be gwine—short off." And Tom walked away, whistling, to the store.

Hetty for a moment stood motionless; her limbs refused to carry her; she thought she should have fallen. It was only dizziness; for it passed away, and she resumed her former pace to deceive the people till she should be out of their sight. It grew quite clear to her in a moment. Joe Carey had planned revenge on his master ever since that talk in the store. Mr. Deane was alone and unarmed, she thought; she could get no help from her thankless townsmen in time to be of use. All remained with her; she alone could save him. Turning a corner where she would be out of sight, her quick walk broke into a run. Throwing off her shawl and bonnet with a fierce impatience, she flew over the fields, over the brooks and fences, as if she were a wild thing—on, on, with her hair unbound now, and streaming in the wind, to the river—on, on, with her eyes dilating, her breath coming in gasps, to the river. Only the river; that became her one thought. If she could reach it in time—if it might not be too late!

She came to it at last, out of the darkness and the windings of the great forest lying before her, broad and still in the moonlight. She stood on the bank and looked down, then up. Nothing was to be seen but a sheet of silver, nothing to be heard but the faint ripple of the water against a little shelving beach on which she stood. She shuddered and cried out in her agony; she waded out knee-deep in the cold water; she looked down, then up; she listened for the plash of oars. The woods beyond were dark and still; the hills above her were dim against the night sky; the shadows of the leaves lay floating and tremulous on the river, and the little waves which broke against the rocks sparkled in the light. The wind, too, rustled hoarsely through the forest, and a startled bird in the branches which hung over her head chirped mournfully—nothing more.

The girl paced up and down the river-side, scarcely knowing what she did; breaking through the thick underbrush that tore and scratched her hands, climbing to the edge of the rocks which jutted into the stream, holding her breath to listen, her little hands striking fiercely at her heart, as if she would tear it out to still its loud throbbings; yet her eyes never moved from the bright waters. The fall of every twig became the sound of oars; the flash of every distant rock in the moonlight a sail; the moan of the wind that swept over the ford below turned into the cry of one in mortal pain; the scream of some night-birds in the depth of the forest was hollow laughter in her ears.

She had heard dark stories of the way men who loved their country and her freedom were treated in this fair Southern land. There was one man within ten miles—it was only a month ago—a loyal man; he was found one morning in the woods, and his little children cried and tried to waken him.

A whisper, too, was going about the country of men who watched at railroads and boat-landings—men with faces that would pale at nothing. Two of these had been seen with Joe Carey to-day.

And she so alone, so helpless; the sky so still and cold; the great woods so voiceless; and the river so fair, with no sight or sound to break the silence of its beauty.

She knelt down upon the sand, turning her poor white face up to the stars. No sound came from her lips; but in the clasping of her hands was a prayer so great that it could not be uttered.

As if in answer to it, the sound of oars broke suddenly and distinctly on her ear, then stopped. Starting, she saw a sail just unfurling up the river—his sail; she knew it even in the dim light by the mark of a large blue star she had herself once sewed on it. He had liked it: for it reminded him of the flag, he said.

She did not cry out, but stood quite still, waiting till he should come nearer. At last she called his name, timidly at first, then louder. He took no notice. She called again. He did not hear. She could see his form now quite plainly, and he did not move to furl his sail; his face, indeed, was turned away from her. She called again. He sat still, idly playing with his oars.

The truth came to her suddenly. His motion was so swift, and the wind, catching his sails, made so much sound, that he could not hear her weak voice. He was coming on rapidly; he would soon be past her. She ran on down the bank, calling frantically and waving her hands, keeping ever between him and the danger to which he was swiftly flying. He made no answer, the sail flapped loudly in the breeze, and the boat came on.

At last her strained eyes saw the shadow of a curve in the river, beyond which she knew the Ford's shallow waters babbled over the rocks. Between her and it the branch of an old tree had fallen, and projected far into the stream. Her quick thought seized this hope—he could not fail to see her there.

In a moment she had torn off her heavy shoes and stockings—like a true girl of the Bend as she was, not forgetting even now her forest teachings—and then she was out on the branch clinging with her bare feet to its rough surface, never pausing to grow pale and shiver at the sight of the black water beneath, but with her eyes fixed steadily on the little boat which shot down the current like a thing of life.

Deane was startled then from his musing by her cry, and looking up he saw a little figure seeming almost to hang over the water; its face was so white, and its long dark hair streamed so wildly in the wind that for a moment that nameless fear, to which the bravest of us are at times subject, came over him, and his own manly cheek blanched a little, then flushed quickly.

The words he heard, however, showed him it was no supernatural evil he had to dread.

"Furl your sail quick—they'll kill you!" Hetty stood quite still, the branch swinging up and down with her slight weight as the boat shot by and the sail came down.

Suddenly she heard a new sound, of which she well knew the meaning—it was the crackling of the bough on which she stood.

She knew there was no return; she knew, too, that the impetus of the boat had been so great it might be moments before it could turn, row up against the current, and reach her.

"Home, for your life!" she cried, her thought even then first and only for him. Then she turned and looked once down into the depths so dark and still under her feet.

Whatever the girl's soul said to God as she looked up after this to His far, bright heavens, was spoken by silence. Deane, rowing against the current, his face paling as he neared her, and still the chances lessened that he would be in time, heard no cry. He only saw her standing where the bough swung lower and lower with her weight, her hands clasped upon her breast, her hair blown about her face, smiling out into the night as if she were content. He saw her eyes fixed on him, large and full of light, with something like triumph in them as her frail support dipped deep into the river, and the water came gurgling over her feet.

Again the branch bent, and cracked and broke; but with a spring which rocked his frail boat like an egg-shell Deane caught her as she sank.

She crouched down in the boat, and hid her face in her hands for a moment. He saw that she shivered, and tried to wrap her in his heavy coat.

"No," raising her head—"no, I'm not cold."

How all the triumph had gone from her eyes! How the heroism had faded from her smile! She was quite weak now, and trembled like a child. Deane would have had her rest against him as he rowed, but she would not.

"I can sit alone now," she said. He looked at her in wonder to see what a little lifeless thing she had become, and how she shrank at his touch.

"Hetty," he said, in a kind tone, "what does all this mean?"

She told him her story in a low voice, with her eyes turned away all the while from his.

A change passed over Richard Deane's face; he was no coward, but he knew the times and the men about him well enough to see the danger from which he had been snatched.

"And so, Hetty," he said at length, in a broken voice, "you periled your own life to save mine?"

She started a little, and leaning over the side of the boat wet her hands and put them to her cheeks with a sudden motion, as if to cool them.

"I didn't think much about that," she answered.

"Hetty"—and his eyes caught hers—"I have no words to thank you with."

"I want no thanks!" She spoke sharply; then her voice softened in a moment: "Don't, please, talk about it any more. I can't."

"Poor little thing! no wonder—she had been so frightened," Deane thought, and rowed on in silence.

Hetty sat motionless in the stern of the boat, her hands folded on her lap, the light touching her wet dress and the hair which lay so darkly on her shoulders, but her face always in the shadow.

So they pulled slowly against the current up the moonlit river, and the silence between them was unbroken. Deane noticed at last that Hetty looked steadily and somewhat fearfully into the thicket on the bank. His eyes followed her gaze. A figure was certainly there, moving stealthily through the bushes.

"There! I was right—it has come from clear down most to the Ford," she whispered, drawing near to him and clutching his arm. "See!"

The form came out now into a clear space among the rocks, and stopped opposite them.

"Hooray!" cried a well-known voice, "Joe Carey's done cotched dis time. He and de white trash 'long wid him is cussin' and swearin' round dar awful 'cause Massa Deane hain't come."

It was Tom. He had been watching far down the river to warn Mr. Deane if Hetty had failed. Before they could answer he had disappeared again in the woods, and they heard him whistling "Safe in de Kingdom" long after he was out of sight.

They reached the landing at last, and Deane, when he locked his boat, gave Hetty the key.

"I want you to keep the little Flag for your own to remember me by," he said. "I sha'n't try another boat-ride at present, I think. I shall go off quietly by railroad early to-morrow morning. Tom will drive me."

They came to the house, and were going in silently, when Hetty stopped and held out her hand.

"Good-by, Mr. Deane."

"Why I shall see you in the morning, sha'n't I? It isn't such an early hour after all—only half past five."

"Good-by," was all she said, still holding out her hand. Deane took it, surprised.

"Well, good-by; God bless you, little Hetty!"

Then she opened the door and went in.

Her room in the loft was very quiet, and she sat down on the bare floor with the rafters over her head, and a bit of moonlight falling through the little window on her white, motionless face. With her eyes looking far out into the woods where the river gleamed through the trees, and her hands still folded on her wet dress, she listened to Richard Deane's footsteps in the room below.

And so there came to Hetty the knowledge which comes to us all, sooner or later, when the master-hand touches us, which shall strike all the jarred notes and trembling chords of our life into harmony.

She saw what this man was to her. She was no longer the child with whom he sported; she was no more the girl with her blind worship of what stood so far above her. The blush of a woman had burned on her cheek that day before him. She loved him. It had been his thoughtless joke about her marriage which revealed this to her. She could have sunk to the ground for shame and agony, when he thought her only a foolish girl—shy, as all girls are, at the mention of such a thing.

She to dare to love him? She? so ignorant she was, with her homely face and awkward ways, whom he would think no more of an hour after he had left her. And he was so noble, so good, so high above her! If she might be only a poor little flower that could blossom for an hour at his feet, and make his way bright for him, even though he passed on and trod her in the dust! But no, such lowly perfume could never reach him in the unknown world into which he was going.

He would leave her, with all things about her, as if he had never been there. She would see the crowd gathered to gossip at the same old store; the boats would float idly on the hot river just the same; the men would come home from their work in the twilight, and she would stand no more at the gate to watch for him. The days with their round of work would go on at the farm-house. The lonely evenings would fall when she would be so tired—so tired, and his kindly smile would never come to rest her. If the hot tears came at sunset from thoughts of her loveless life, and dreams of her mother who would have loved her, his pleasant voice should never soothe her with its cheering.

And all the while he, in his new, happy life, would find no place for memories of the little quiet thing who set his suppers, and brought him fresh water from the spring at noon. Or even if he did think sometimes not unkindly of her, how would it be? She remembered his parting at the gate, how gentle and brotherly it was. He had even asked God to bless her; but then she had just saved his life; he was grateful. His heart too—his noble heart—was filled with pity for her. While hers—Oh that she had gone down into the bright waters looking into his eyes and smiling in her calm content, proud to die that he might live, glad to be at rest and know his last memory of her would be a gentle, perhaps a tearful one. She bowed her face in her hands, her slight form shivering as if with cold. There, crouched upon the floor with her head bent so low that her falling hair veiled her face, and hands, and breast, she sat till the moon sank behind the western hills.

"Well, Hester Reed!" was Mrs. Blunt's salutation the next morning as Hetty entered the kitchen, "these are pretty doin's! here it is five o'clock ironin' day, and I've been slavin' here alone ever sence half past four, and Richard Deane gone half an hour ago, wonderin' and botherin' round 'cause you wasn't down to see him off."

Hetty murmured some reply about being very tired after last night.

"Reely now, that was dreadful, wern't it?" said Mrs. Blunt, in a mysterious whisper, somewhat softened by the weary way in which Hetty went about her work. "If they'd caught him he'd ha' ben in the river this morning, and nobody the wiser. What are you a shiverin' for this warm morning?"

"I'm cold," said Hetty, and she turned to pour out her uncle's coffee.

"You jest go an' hunt up your bonnet and shawl, and them shoes this morning; for my part, I don't see the need of leavin' of 'em off, if you did have to run faster'n common."

"I will get them back safely, aunt."

Her face was very pale this morning, and she was very quiet over her work. Mrs. Blunt possessed herself of the idea that she would be sick—"fever'n ager, maybe, or cholery infantum, or some such thing," and poor Hetty was dosed with ginger-tea all day.

The matter of Mr. Deane's escape was quietly hushed up. Silas Blunt and his wife were too much in fear of being called "Lincolnites," and of Joe Carey's vengeance, to make it a subject of gossip; and as for Tom, he would as soon have thought of jumping into the river at once and saving Joe the trouble. So the rough strangers disappeared from the Bend. Carey lounged about his work in sullen silence, and all things went on as before.

Tom, though a little cast down at first by Mr. Deane's departure, was jubilant for days over his own sharpness.

"I neber did tink," he said one day, confidentially to Hetty, when she had watched him chuckling in silence for some minutes—"I neber did tink I was so respectable afore; now I done cotched Joe Carey! He didn't know I heard him on de steps de day you an' Massa Deane walk home togeder, when he say he like to see dat ar boss git his pay for de derved Yankee talk, an' he better look out some o' dese yere dark nights, and he neber see me follorin' him an' de white trash trough de bushes, while dey talk about de Ford and Massa Deane, and den go back to de store, an' swagger round peaceable as Job in de Scriptures."

It was about a week after Deane's departure when Hetty stood leaning over the gate one night when her work was done. Her aunt had "dropped in" to have a chat with the Aristocrat's wife, with whom she was on terms of intimacy, being entitled to this honor because she also was the "mistress of a nigger;" Silas was smoking as usual back of the house, where he could feast his eyes by the sight of his potato-patch, and so Hetty was quite alone.

The days had gone by so dreamily since Mr. Deane went away. The blue of the sky and the sunlight brightening the clearing, the ceaseless talk of the people who moved about her, their very forms, even her own face looking at her so white and dim from the bit of broken glass in her room, had seemed so unreal. She longed for something to start and waken her. Her mind in its weakened and morbid state had possessed itself of the idea that he could not escape the many dangers which the distracted condition of the State threw around him, and that into one or the other of them he must fall. This fear haunted her night and day. If she could only hear from him once just one word. But that could not be; she might never know as the years went on whether he lived to reach his bright Northern home.

A peculiar whistle from Tom started her just then, and she looked up to see him performing his favorite somersault on the grass. Something white dropped out of his jacket pocket at her feet. She stooped and picked it up. It was a letter directed to her in a large, clear hand. Now Hetty had never before in her life been the possessor of a letter, but it was not that which sent the quick color flushing her forehead, cheek, and neck.

"It come to de store," said Tom, "dis yere mornin'. Bress my soul! how dat ar Joe Carey kep' a speerin' at it, but I knows Massa Deane's big writin', an' I puts it in dis pocket short metre—dat ar ain't cussin', Misse Hetty; I find it in de hymn-book—an' I say, 'Yes, Sar, Misse Hetty hab a cousin in de Nort', an' she 'spect dis yere long time dat she gwine for to go in de kingdom;' an' den I walk out solemn, like Noah when he see de flood a comin' an' jump in de ark."

Hetty's trembling fingers hid the letter in her shawl, then, fearful lest Tom should perceive her agitation, and also in her conscientious little heart unwilling to lose such an opportunity to endeavor to Christianize him, she gave him a mild reproof for his falsehood.

"I'm much obliged to you, Tom, very much, but I am sorry you told a lie about it. What becomes of liars, Tom?"

"Lor', Misse Hetty," said Tom, rolling his eyes till nothing but the white was visible, "I knows about de bad place—you don' 'spect I'se fool enough to go dar so easy. I 'pented o' dat ar when I go out o' de store, short off."

Hetty smiled a discouraged smile, but thinking she had at least done her duty she turned away, leaving Tom to catch grasshoppers and dissect them in the cause of science without remorse.

She trod the path over the fields and through the woods to the river, the same path she had followed in her wild flight that night, the same river which had been so white in the moonlight with the starred sail gleaming upon it, the same which had rolled so blackly under her feet when she swung lower and lower into the water, with the leaves rustling above her and the boat pulling up against the current. She wondered, with a faint smile, if all this could have really been, as she sat down on the bank beside the broken bough to read her letter.

She took it out from under her shawl and slowly opened it. At first she could hardly see the writing. She brushed her little red hand over her eyes, however, and began. This was what she read:

"MY DEAR LITTLE FRIEND,—I fancy you have been conjuring up all sorts of visions of the fate that has met me since I left the Bend, if you have thought about me at all. You have seen me hung and stabbed and drowned by my rebel friends, captured by guerrillas, drafted into the Southern army, notwithstanding I can not fire their muskets with this finger, and every other misfortune that you could think of, you have planned for me. So, to relieve your mind, I have stolen a moment to write this note. The brave little girl who saved my life has surely the right to know that I have been still taken care of. I am safely in New York. My plans are uncertain; I shall probably go to New England. I am a happier man already for breathing this free air.

"I think of you often. May God watch over you, little Hetty, and make you very happy. Your friend,

"RICHARD DEANE."

Hetty read the simple lines over and over—so very simple, so kind and friendly they were; yet a warm color flushed her cheek and a grateful smile played on her lips. He was safe, he had thought of her; she pressed the precious paper which told her so to her lips, but with a sudden motion dropped it and hid her face.

She sat so a long time, never stirring. Who can guess what was in the girl's soul? Who can tell in what a sudden picture her future stood in her sight, how those few kindly words had touched all the desolate, homeless years which should be hers and made them pass one by one before her? Who can say how she listened for the wings of the Death-Angel, and what music there was in his coming, or with what a cry she shrank back from the pearly gates and streets of gold which he showed her, for she saw herself pale before God's throne "a saint companionless?" I tell you in the grief which came to this child there are heights and depths that can not be measured.

The sun went down at last, the hills grew warm in golden mist, the light slanted over the river and touched her, playing softly in her red-brown hair; she did not move or look up to see it. The twilight fell and deepened in the woods, and the river flowed in shadow.

Then it was that she bent over to look down into the water and see the white face that gazed up at her. She thought how it would look if it lay still and cold, far down among the reeds, with the night-winds rippling the water above it, and the stars smiling down at it out of the clear sky. They would not call her back to her lonely life; they would only pity her, and seeing how her pale, clasped hands held Richard's little note so tightly that the current could not take it from her, they would not wonder that, being weary, she had gone to sleep.

She bent lower over the water, she began to smile as the white image there beckoned to her more and more. Suddenly the wind bore to her ear these words so distinctly that she started as if at a voice from heaven:

"When through the deep waters I call thee to go
The rivers of sorrow shall not overflow;"

—then growing louder and more clear—

"For I will be with thee thy trouble to bless,
And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress."

The sound came from a distant camp-meeting up the river; it was a grand old Methodist tune; it woke all the echoes that slept in the woods, it rang out against the hills thrilling, exultant, triumphant without one tinge of doubt or fear.

Hetty started back from the river-brink trembling and cold; she turned her face up to the stars, her lips moving dryly, and while she prayed the strain grew rapturous:

"The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose
I will not, I will not desert to his foes;
That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake,
I'll never—no, never—no, never forsake!"

The sound died away, the echoes grew faint in the dark forest, and all the air was still. Hetty's cheeks were wet, her eyes still fixed on the sky.

"But I never had any body to love me," she cried, her hands tearing cruelly at her breast; "he was all I had."

Bowing her head she thought some one spoke to her.

"Mother!" she whispered.

She fancied that faces she dimly remembered in childhood were there and smiled, but they did not answer her. This voice which had spoken was sweeter, tenderer than that of father or mother.

"Here am I," she said.

Then she knew who it was. She knew He loved her. She felt Him very near to her. He said He would never leave her, nor forsake her. What more could she ask?

So, with Him for her Helper, Hetty took up patiently the life He had decreed to her. What the struggle was none but He knew, either then or at any other time.

Did you ever stand on the very threshold of your youth and see all its light quenched in the passing of a moment? Did you then grope in the dark, and fall in slippery places, and feel your way among thorns with not one human voice to answer your cry?

This girl's life had been so dwarfed, her heart and mind alike so dulled, who wonders at it? If you shut a flower in the dark do you think it strange that its leaves are pale, its petals hueless? What else could you expect of her? Why should she not yield to the touches which moulded her, and become at last what she saw others about her to be—a mere clod? Yet something in her nature had prevented this. Wherever there had been one spot of beauty or of love in her life she had clung to it, and her whole soul had grown warm beneath its light. Once, when a little child, she had found a half-starved dog in the woods, which she took home and made a pet of. The poor creature would never leave her, and she would kiss it, and cry on its neck for very joy—it was something to love.

Silas Blunt in a fit of passion threw the dog into the river. Then after a while a neighbor's child learned to cling to her, and twine its little arms about her neck, and kiss the smiles into her lips. It would have brought the tears to your eyes to see her grave, unchildish face grow warm and bright at the touch of the tiny fingers.

The little one died with its eyes smiling into hers, and there was nothing left but the grasses on its grave. When she grew older it was the hills which had been her little comfort. She would steal away to watch the shadows creeping down among them, the light flecking their tops and the pearl-edged clouds which canopied them till all the dull, working-look would fade from her face, her eyes grow soft and dewy, and the girl's soul—such as that which God pronounced "very good"—would awake as from a stupor and hear His voice talking softly with her.

And now her orphaned childhood was long gone, her orphaned girlhood had passed, and all that had slept within her had been roused only to struggle with the disturbing hand and meet her worse than widowed womanhood. And never was such lot met with braver heart. By the very bitterness of her contests with herself she grew stronger. Something of a woman's pride had been in her crushed soul after all. That taught her how to curb her sorrow. This great love she might not quell, but she would tame it into something so sacred that it should not shame her, nor make her unworthy of the kind memories of him to whom she gave it. Nothing helped to conquer her pain like the thought of pleasing him. No earthly aim was so dear as a patient training of herself to be what he would not be ashamed to acknowledge as his friend. Yet as time passed on, and his few brotherly letters ceased, even this changed; and what she had done for him she did at last for herself with a vague feeling that she would make herself worthy of every thought that was in her heart for him, and was proud that it could be so, thinking she did him no wrong.

So she plunged afresh into her old work. She swept and baked and ironed and sewed. She tried to drown her tears in the washing-tub, and throw all her energies into the dusting of a room. She studied, too, in the evenings alone in her room with her little inch of a tallow candle to light the puzzling pages. This was hard work, for Hetty did not like to study. It was her heart which taught her best, not her head. Neither had she any particular incitement here, for Richard Deane was no student, and would not care about such things in her. Still she pored very patiently over her books for a while, and it did her good. She took new pains also with her appearance, and wonderful was the change a little care could make. She would think sometimes with a very pardonable womanly feeling how she wished Mr. Deane could see her, now that she had altered.

But it was not only for herself that her heart was brave and her hand unfaltering. As the plot of the war thickened, and the armies swept down from the mountains, and there was the tramping to and fro of soldiers in the quiet valley, she found in the hospital near by, where they brought the poor fellows, rebels and Union prisoners alike, plenty of work for her willing fingers.

And so a year and a half passed away.

She was sitting one day quietly sewing at the kitchen door, her heart full of some of the scenes she had just witnessed among the convalescents, when they heard of the last Union victories that had made their beautiful valley free again. She remembered how their pale faces brightened, and what cheering there was from voices weak with suffering as they ran up the old flag on the hospital roof, and watched it catch the breeze, its stars bright against the blue of the sky, its broad bars glowing and warm in the sunlight. She smiled as she thought of the grasp of their hands and the tears in their manly eyes when she came to rejoice with them, and she thanked God that He had given her work to do when she had asked for it. She recalled the last year with her face growing grave. Yet there was on it an expression, if not of content, of something far better—the look of a soul at peace with God. She saw now how tenderly He had led her; how into her life, which He had made lonely forever, so much patient toil and trust had crept that had softened, like a veil, its hard outlines—outlines carved in marble, which Time could not efface. No, they could not be effaced. Even now, with the old instinct, she took up her daily cares with a vague idea of pleasing Richard resting upon them all.

The very gratitude with which her heart was filled, now that the country's song of triumph thrilled through the forests, and the Union soldiers passed proudly through the Bend—this very gratitude which should seem, she thought, to stand apart from her own poor history, only brought him nearer to her. He would once have been so pleased to see this day, and it was so long, so long since she had seen him. If he could smile upon her just once more before she died she would remember—she would talk to him like a little forest-girl who wished him well, even as a sister might, and he need never know!

The sewing fell from her listless hands, and her face, losing all the courage that the years had taught it, dropped upon her breast like the very Hetty of olden time.

It was then that a footstep startled her, and a voice, whose lightest accent she had not forgotten, spoke to her.

Looking up she saw him—the same manly form, the same honest blue eyes and kindly smile.

"Well, little Hetty," he said, and laid his hand upon her hair in the old caressing way. His lips might have touched her forehead even, but she started quickly, and stood up before him in her beautiful womanhood, so changed that he was dumb with surprise.

Her face after its first flush had paled a little, but her voice was very quiet in its welcome, and she held out her hand frankly to him.

"I little thought we should ever see you again, Mr. Deane." Not a tremor on her lips, not one moment's drooping of her clear brown eyes before his gaze.

"I thought you cared as little," he said, smiling good humoredly. "My letters—"

"Stopped coming six months ago," she said, quietly.

"No. I have written to you, Hetty; it is the mails that are at fault. I guessed as much, for I never heard from you."

There was surely a sigh of relief as he spoke. Hetty did not hear it. She said some pleasant thing about his letters, and then they sat down in the little kitchen to talk, both thinking as they did so of that night so long ago when she set his supper for him, and the air was sweet with the breath of the jasmine.

Richard Deane was puzzled. There was something so chilling in her friendly smile, so much dignity in her quiet manners, such music in her clear voice. She was utterly changed. The little freckled thing with her dulled, timid eyes whom he had left was gone. He saw in her place a beautiful woman's face, with clear, warm color in her cheeks; with her brown eyes grown soft and liquid; with golden lights playing in and out of her red-brown hair.

Two pictures of this girl had followed him in all his wanderings. One was of a slight form by the window dipping water from the pail for him, a delicate, girlish profile against the sky; yellow blossoms playing in the wind till they touched her hair; and then her eyes raised to his, dark with that dumb look.

The other was a figure which swung lower and lower into the water on a broken bough—a fearless figure, with hands clasped upon her breast, where her dark hair hung in masses, and a smile like one triumphant on her lips. He had always seen her so—now among the jasmynes, now on the moonlit river—always so.

Something of these two memories was mingled now in the woman before him. All the glimpses of beauty that he had dimly caught in the one were here, grown so bright that they dazzled him. He fancied also a touch of the triumph of the other hiding in the curve of her warm, red lips.

He watched her while they talked, a grave look creeping into his eyes, and his smile far less frequent. They seemed suddenly to have changed places. He grew confused before her, and spoke but little. She did not seem to notice it; she talked rapidly, her eyes sparkling, her cheeks flushed.

Tom broke in upon the scene at last, grinning broadly. Mr. Deane spoke to him in his frank, pleasant way. Tom grinned again. Indeed he seemed to have lost the power of speech or motion, and this was the only way left of testifying his approbation of the sight before him. Hetty, to help him out of his difficulty, asked,

"Tom, did you ever lose any letters of Mr. Deane's to me?"

"Me, Misse Hetty! I neber do dat ar. I jump in de Jordan and be ober wid afore I'se dat disrespectable."

"What do you suppose became of them, Tom?" said Hetty, laughing.

Tom put his elbow into his cap, and his stubby forefinger upon his forehead, and appeared to be in the deepest meditation.

"Ef you wants my 'pinion, Misse Hetty, it am jes' dis. I see Joe Carey, afore he go to de Sesechers, fotch out some letters ob de store, an' he put 'em in his pocket, an' I tink to meself dat ar's curus, 'Tom, it am, 'Tom, dat any body write to Joe, an' it's my 'pinion he hook 'em."

Hetty changed color. You are a foolish boy, Tom," she said.

But Tom was immovable. "Dat ar's my 'pinion," was all she could get out of him, and with another grin at Mr. Deane he backed out of the room and disappeared.

Hetty's uncle and aunt came in shortly after, and the afternoon passed in pleasant chat. Silas and his wife were of those sort of people who look discreetly to see which way the wind blows, so now they were as violent Unionists as they had been rebels before. Besides this, they really had a fancy for Deane, and were glad to be told of his home in Massachusetts—of the snug farmhouse, with the apple-orchard behind it, the garden sloping down to a little brook and patch of woods, the fields which, all summer, had been red with clover blossoms, and the tasseled corn which waved in the light. He looked at Hetty as he spoke of this, but she was busy getting supper, and he could not see her face.

After tea he said he should like to see the old woods again, so Hetty put on her bonnet and went with him. They came to a still place, where the green was soft under their feet, and where they could see the river through the trees, with his little boat, which Hetty had kept so sacredly, swinging at its mooring.

They sat down with the gray moss thick on the branches over their head and twining round the huge trunk against which they leaned. Flecks of light struck the trees in their ghostly dress, catching here and there the glow of faint autumn tints, and then were lost in the shadow of the forest. The birds sang among the leaves, and a rabbit crept out from the thick, rank undergrowth, coming timidly almost to Hetty's hand, which lay quite still, hidden among the high wood-grasses. She smiled at this, and looked up at Deane with some gay words on her lips, but something in his face stopped her.

"Hetty," he said, "you haven't asked me what I came here for."

"I hadn't thought," she answered.

"Would you like to know? it's a long story. Shall I tell you?"

She bowed her head, stooping to pick a bit of moss, which she pulled to pieces nervously.

"It's a long story, and yet I could tell it in a few words. Once there was a little forest-girl that I petted and played with, and she was always very kind to me. I went away after a while, and then I missed her, how much she doesn't know. I couldn't forget her face, nor her timid, gentle ways—she had such pretty ways! I didn't know I loved her for a long time. I couldn't tell why I was so lonely at my work, or why my farm was so cheerless. When I found out I came back to her, but, Hetty, she was gone—I had lost her. I found a woman in her place. She was very beautiful: her voice was very sweet and clear, and she was glad to see me. But she seemed very far off. I thought I should not dare to tell my love to her, or ask her to be my wife, and make my new home happy, and I loved her so much, God knows! You see the little Hetty, the child that cared for me, was gone. I could not find her. Do you think I ever shall?"

He looked at her as he spoke, but her head was turned away; he saw only the golden lights hiding in her hair, and the clasping of her little toil-worn hands upon her breast. What there was in the girl's face at that moment she could not show even to him. The only One who did see it knew how the years of patient waiting at last had blessed her. When she turned her eyes up to Richard's he saw that the child Hetty had come back—he had not lost her. She crept up to him and laid her head upon his shoulder with a long, long sigh, like one at rest after a hard day's toil. "I tried very long not to love you. I am so tired," she said.

When they walked home in the twilight that night Hetty asked him if he remembered Joe Carey.

"Yes, he went into the rebel army after I left, and was killed, I believe, wasn't he?"

"Yes, but Richard—"

"Well?"

"That isn't all, he—he wanted to marry me."

Richard Deane gave a long, low whistle.

"I see now," he said, "and I guess Tom was right about the letters after all."

THE SISTERS.

I.

THEY were two sisters, one was fair,
With yellow lights in her wavy hair.
The other was dark, and in her eyes
Lurked the sultry fire of Southern skies.
They both had lands, these sisters two,
Broad in extent and fair to view.
With towns and cities on hill and plain,
And rivers which flowed to greet the main.
The fields of the one with wheat and corn
Swayed in the breath of the wind at morn.
Her sons at the plow and anvil stood,
Or wielded the axe in the shady wood.
She built great ships that over the seas
Sped on the wings of the ocean breeze.
Fleets of these in her ports found room:
Her factories hummed with the busy loom.
There men and women, early and late,
Labored to earn the bread they ate.

Her children flocked to her schools to learn
Knowledge profound and Wisdom stern.

In the autumn months she stood in the field
Laden with fruits of the harvest's yield.

In granaries built through long years of peace
She gathered the wealth of the earth's increase.
And the winds which blew from her snowy hills
Were not more free than her people's wills.

II.

The swelling slopes of the other shone white
With cotton blooms in the hot sun's light.

Under the shade of ancestral trees
Her sons and daughters lived at ease.

Her dusky bondman, stalwart and strong,
Toiled in the field the whole day long.

Hard and sinewy were his hands,
His muscles were like to iron bands.

A modern Samson in strength was he Shorn of his glorious Liberty.

Sometimes a patient song of toil
Fell from his lips as he tilled the soil.

Sometimes at night his yearning eyes
Turned to a star in the Polar skies.

And a hungry longing for Freedom gave Wings to the feet of the dusky slave.

But pitiless blood-hounds on his track
With their deep-mouthed bayings drove him back.

In the foul market-place he stood
The bondman sullen and stern of mood.

And like a chattel was bought and sold—
A human being for so much gold,

Down the river:—afar on its wave;
What are wife and child to the slave?

O God! that such things ever had been,
And gained the sanction of Christian men!

III.

Then rose on the air a sudden cry,
Like thunder rolling along the sky.

From the burning lips of the North it came,
Rebuking her sister's sin and shame.

Stronger the dread tornado blew,
Darker the gathering tempest grew.

In senate chamber and halls of state
Loud and long was the hot debate.

Then the Northern sister called to her side
A man for his prudence noted wide.

But she of the South with fierce replies
Flashed defiance out of her eyes.

Then shouts of "War!" on the winds went forth—
"War!" from the South: "War!" from the North.

The trumpets blew, and the loud drums beat;
The dumb earth quaked with the tread of feet.

To-day the cannon thunder loud;
And yonder see the battle-cloud.

To-day earth's altar-steps are red
With precious blood of heroes shed.

Look on those swelling mounds that rise—
These are a nation's SACRIFICE.

May it atone in God's just sight,
And wash our garments snowy white,

And kindle in the East a ray,
The dawn of a broader, purer day!

Mr. William Shakspeare, At Home:

TERCENTENARY, APRIL 23, MDCCCLXIV.

SHAKSPEARE'S Tercentenary must hereafter be estimated by the world chiefly as a literary epoch. It has been the means of bringing out some scores of new works, new editions of old works, and, if not new facts, yet many lights for old facts, so that it is not too much to say that for the first time have we been brought within reach of any personal image of the poet. Photography has come into play to bring before us every paper connected with him; Palæography has ascertained which are real, which spurious; and Criticism has thoroughly sifted every contemporary line which has been supposed by any to have reference to him. As few of my readers will ever go through this mass of new works which "Mr. Wm. Shakspear of y^e Globe" has just written, through his thousands of amanuenses now living, and entered at Stationers' Hall this A.D. 1864, it will not be a superfluous work to give here briefly (alas, that it must always be briefly!) the sifted and actual knowledge that we have concerning this man—deferring probable but uncertain, and decidedly mythical, stories to later portions of this article, where they will be appropriate. It seems to me wisest to give the facts in chronological order.

Verstegan, in his "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence," says: "Breakspear, Shakespear, and the like, have been surnames imposed upon the first bearers of them for valour and feats of arms." A certain Mr. Shakespear of Snitterfield, four miles from Stratford, was "rewarded with lands and tenements" "for his faithful and approved service to the late most prudent prince Henry VII. of famous memory." It was probably one of his sons who in 1556 (Oct. 2) purchased the house in Henley Street now known as the birth-place of his son William Shakspeare. John Shakspeare was a glover and a farmer. In the same year (June 17) he was sued at court as a glover; and on November 19 he impleaded a neighbor for unjustly detaining 18 quarters of barley. It was probably in the following year that he married, for on the 15th of September 1558 there is a baptismal record of "Joan Shakspeare, daughter to John Shakspeare." His wife, Mary, was the youngest daughter by a first wife of Robert Arden, whose father had been groom of the chamber to Henry VII. In the year 1564 John Shakspeare was a member of the Common hall of Stratford, and did in that year as such affix his mark to a document of the hall. In the same year, was born his third child and first son WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE.* In the Stratford Register of Baptisms appears under date of April 26, "William, son of John Shakspere." As baptisms as early as convenient after birth were customary in those days his birthday has been fixed as the 23d, though it is quite possible that the fact of that being the day of the tutelary saint of England had something to do with the tradition. John Shakspeare enjoyed prosperity for some years. In 1568 he was promoted to the office of High Bailiff. In 1569 the Queen's players and the Earl of Worcester's players visited Stratford and performed in it; the former receiving nine shillings and the latter one for the entertainment out of the town's funds. 1571 John Shakspeare is alderman, and his son William goes to the free grammar-school then kept by Thomas Hunt, who is also curate of Luddington, a mile or two distant. 1573 and 1574 the "Earl of Leicester's players" and "my Lord Warwick's players" visit Stratford. 1575 Queen Elizabeth's grand historical visit to Kenilworth (thirteen miles from Stratford) attracted by the gorgeous pageantry of her welcome vast crowds from all mid-England. 1577 and the two following years furnish evidences of declining fortunes with John Shakspeare. He is irregular in attendance on borough meetings, mortgages land, and the sum of 3s. 4d. levied on him by the borough is "unpaid and unaccounted for." However in 1577 he is reported by Dethick, Garter King of Arms, to have had a pattern of his arms (a spear grasped by a falcon) engraved by Clarence Cooke, though he did not bear them until 1597. Just here come in surmises about William Shakspeare; that he was withdrawn from school; that he was apprenticed to a butcher; that he studied in a law office; and many other things, which have too often been given as history, but of which there is no shadow of evidence. The first definite notice that we have of him is in 1582, and is Shakspeare's marriage-bond. It was found by Sir Thomas Phillips in the Worcester registry in 1836. It bears date 28th November, 1582, and in it Fulk Sandalls and John Richardson, farmers, of Stratford, become bound in forty pounds (a sum at that time equal to over a hundred now in value) "that William Shagspere, one thone partie, and Anne Hathwey, of Stratford, in the dioces of Worcester, maiden, may lawfully solemnize marriage together," "with once asking

* We do not undertake to decide between the score of modes of spelling the poet's name. He himself undoubtedly wrote it Shakspere. In quoting from documents we follow the originals; elsewhere we simply adopt the more usual form, Shakspeare.—The portraits on the opposite page are those which have the best claim to genuineness. At the top is the Stratford bust, shown from three points of view. At the bottom is Droeshout's print from the folio of 1623. The small portrait below the bust is from an edition of the Sonnets published in 1640; it is apparently copied, with some alterations, from the Droeshout print. The one on the right is from the Chandos portrait, which can be traced back to the possession of Davenant (born 1605, died 1668), who is said to have claimed to have been the natural son of Shakspeare. The portrait on the left is said to have been painted by Cornelius Jansen.—For illustrations of the principal scenes and relics at Stratford connected with Shakspeare, see Harper's Magazine for September, 1861.

of the bannes." The document also bears the seal of R. H. (Richard Hathaway.) The very careful investigations made into this document in the light of the law customs of the time leave no doubt whatever that the marriage was made under urgency, and that the forty pounds were to indemnify the minister in case of fine for marrying with only once asking bans. The seal of R. H. gives a suspicion of coercion to the marriage also. And when we read in the Stratford register that in "1583, May 26th, Susanna, daughter to William Shakspeare" was baptized—this being about six months after marriage—the conclusion is forced upon us that Shakspeare, in marrying this woman, who was seven years his senior, atoned for the error of a passionate moment.

Ann Hathaway lived at Shottery, a mile from Stratford, and was without any claim to blood so gentle as that of the Ardens with whom Shakspeare was connected on his mother's side. In 1585 the Register of Baptisms mentions: "February 2. Hamnet and Judith, sonne and daughter to William Shakspeare." Thus before he has reached his majority he has a family about him, and his father's fortunes are failing; which probably, much more than any prosecution for deer-stealing, sends him to London. From this time Ann Hathaway disappears from this history until 1608. It was certainly about this time (1585) that he went to London, and highly improbable that he took his wife and children with him. The personal footprints of Shakspeare in London are very faint, the Ellesmere papers, alleging a connection with Blackfriars Theatre, and other things again discovered by Collier, having been proved barefaced forgeries. The sifting of the supposed contemporary notices of him have rendered it certain that the passage in Spenser's "Tears of the Muses" containing the line,

"Our pleasant Willy, ah! is dead of late," referred probably to Sir Philip Sidney (whom Spenser calls "Willy" elsewhere—a name at that time for any pastoral poet), certainly not to Shakspeare, who was unknown when it was published (1590), certainly not dead or retired. Of actually contemporary notices but one remains probable at this time, and this is in Greene's "Groatsworth of wit bought with a Million of repentance," in which it is nearly certain that it is Shakspeare who is stigmatized as "an upstart crow, beautified in our feathers, that with his tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you, and being an absolute Johannes Factotum, is, in his own conceit, the only Shake-scene in a country." This shows that in 1592 our poet was of sufficient consequence to excite the jealous ire of rivals. The charge of plagiarism probably refers to the fact that Greene's "Pandosto, the Triumph of Time" (1588) seems to have given the plot for the "Winter's Tale;" and Lodge's "Rosalind, Euphues's Golden Legacy" (1590) for "As you like it." The parody of the italicized passage in the quotation from Greene, on the line in the Third Part of Henry VI., Act i. Sc. iv., "Oh, tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide," is plain.

1596.—The burial entry of Stratford records: "1596, August 11th, Hamnet filius William Shakspeare." 1597.—"At the term of Easter, in the 39th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth," by "a plea of covenant" between "William Shakespere, gentleman," and "William Underhill, gentleman," the former became possessed of "one messuage, two barns, two gardens, and two orchards, with appurtenances, in Stratford-upon-Avon," for which he gave "to the afore-said William sixty pounds sterling." The house on this property had been built by Sir Hugh Clopton in the reign of Henry VII., and was called "the great house," but Shakspeare (æt. 33) called it New Place. In 1598 we find Shakspeare living in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, and in the list of actors in Ben Jonson's Every man in his Humor the poet's name stands first. At and from this time contemporary and generally complimentary notices of Shakspeare in verses and plays are frequent; and his own plays had a great popularity. There is no evidence, though much assertion, of his being a popular actor. Dr. Johnson's hypothesis of his holding horses at the door of the Globe Theatre is utterly baseless—the Globe being reached by boats. At just what time he went to Stratford to live it is impossible to say: his last appearance on the stage, of which there is any record, was in 1603, in Ben Jonson's Sejanus. But before this we find him mixed up with business affairs at Stratford: e.g. 1598 "Pd. to Mr. Shaxpere for one lod of stone x d." 1604. —Hamlet was this year published by James Roberts. In the "Accounts of the Revels at Court" the following entries appear:—

By the Kings Ma ^{tie} . players	Hallamas Day, being the first of Nov., A play in the banketinge House att Whitehall, called the Moor of Venis. (1604.)
By his Ma ^{tie} . players	The Sunday following, A play of the Merry Wives of Windsor. (Nov. 4, 1604.)
By his Ma ^{tie} . players	On St. Stevens night in the hall a play, Mesur for Mesur. (Dec. 26, 1604.) Shaxberd.
By his Ma ^{tie} . players	On Innosents night the play of Errors. (Dec. 28th, 1604.) Shaxberd.

In the same year (1604) we find William Shakspeare bringing an action against Philip Rogers, in the Court of Stratford, for £1 15s. 10d., the price of malt delivered to him at different times. 1605.—On the 24th of July of this year, "William Shakespere, of Stratford-uppon-Avon" bought from Ralph Hubande the unexpired portion of a 92 years lease dating from 1544, of the tithes of Stratford for the sum of £440—which was as much as thrice the same sum now—from which, as from many other circumstances carefully noted by his biographers, his comfortable pecuniary condition is justly argued. In this year too Augustine Philips, a fellow-actor at the Globe, bequeaths him in his will “a thirty-shilling peece in gold.” In the “Accounts of the Revels at Court” for the same year we have:—

By his Mat ^{ies} . plaiers	Betwin Newers day and Twelfe day a play of Loves labours Lost (1605)
By his Mat ^{ies} . plaiers	On the 7 of January was played the play of Henry the Fift (1605) Shaxberd.
By his Mat ^{ies} . plaiers	On Shrove Sunday, a play of the Marchant of Venis (Mar. 24th, 1605) Shaxberd.
By his Mat ^{ies} . plaiers	On Shrovetuesday, A play cauled The Marchant of Venis, againe commanded by the King's Ma ^{tie} . (Mar. 26th. 1605)

1606.—In a survey of Rowington Manor, William Shakspeare is noted as holding the house near New Place. 1607.—Susanna, æt. 24, Shakspeare's eldest daughter, was married to Dr. John Hall, of Stratford. On the last day of the same year the poet's youngest brother, Edmund, was buried at Southwark, entered on the register as “a player.” 1608, Sept. 9, the Stratford Register notes the burial of the poet's mother, “Mayry Shaxpere, Wydowe.” Oct. 16th the poet stands sponsor for his “godson William Walker” (to whom in his will he leaves “20s. in gold”). In the same year Hallam says “The Yorkshire Tragedy,” put on the stage in 1604, was published with Shakspeare's name; doubtless a trick, but showing that his name was a taking one with the public. It is in this year also that we meet once more the name of Shakspeare's wife. Thomas Whittington, shepherd to Richard Hathaway, dying, leaves in his will “unto the poor of Stratford 40s. that is in the hand of Anne Shaxpere, wyfe unto Mr. Wyllyam Shaxpere, and is due debt unto me, being paid to mine executor by the said Wyllyam Shaxpere or his assignees.” Old legal forms of bequests similar to this indicate that such dispositions were made of small sums where payment was never expected, or had been often refused. 1609.—“Shakesperes Sonnets. Never before imprinted. At London, by G. Eld, for T. T., and are to be sold by John Wright, dwelling at Christ Church-gate, 1609,” is the title of a small quarto which contains 154 Sonnets, and “A Lover's Complaint.” In the Stationer's entry T. T. is explained as Tho. Thorpe. March 15, Shakspeare issues against John Addenbrooke, Stratford, for £6 of debt and 24s. damages and costs; and, he not being found, prosecutes his surety Thomas Horneby on the 7th June following. 1611.—In a list of donations “colected towards the charge of prosecutyng the bill in parliament for the better repair of high waies &c.” Shakspeare's name is found. In the “Account of Revels at Court” are the following entries:—

By the King's players	Hallomas Nyght was presented att Whitehall before the Kinges Ma ^{tie} . a play called The Tempest (Nov 1, 1611)
The King's players	The 5th of November: A play called The Winter Nightes Tayle (1611)

1612.—The Stratford Burial Register contains: “February 4. Rich: Shakspere.”

1613.—A letter from Thomas Lorkin, dated “London, this last day of June 1613,” says: “No longer since than yesterday, while Bourbege his companie were acting at the Globe the play of Hen(ry) VIII., and there shooting of certain chambers in way of triumph, the fire catched and fastened upon the thatch of the house, and there burned so furiously as it consumed the whole house and all in lesse than two hours, the people having enough to doe to save themselves.” There is no evidence that any loss came to Shakspeare by this, or that any of his MSS. were lost.

1614.—John Combe, bailiff for the Earl of Warwick, died, and in his will bequeathed “to Mr. William Shackspere, five pounds.” In the Stratford Chamberlain's accounts we have for this year: “Item: for one quart of sack, and on quart of clarett winne geven to a preacher at the Newe Place, xx^d.” 1616, Feb. 10, Judith, the poet's youngest daughter, æt. 31, was married to Thomas Quincy, vintner, Stratford. And further on in this year we have on the Stratford Register this momentous entry:

1616. April 25. WILL. SHAKSPERE, Gent.

Of the circumstances of his death we know nothing. A tradition extant forty-five years after his death asserts, “Shakespear, Drayton, and Ben Jonson, had a merrie meeting, and itt seems drunk too hard, for Shakespear died of a feavour then contracted.” But this is mere tradition.

On the 3d of February, 1617, we know that Dr. John Hall, Shakspeare's son-in-law, was inhabiting New Place. But what of his wife? We have that singular interpolated clause of his will: “Item: I give unto my wief my second best bed with the furniture,” which Mr. Howard Staunton gives us too good reason to believe was in that day a method of showing contempt. But there is an intimation in the register of burial that she may have married again after Shakspeare's death: “Mrs. James” being coupled by a brace with “wife of William Shakespear,” by association with whom she at least had the grace or pride to wish to be remembered. Mr. James was a shoemaker of Stratford. Shakspeare's wife survived him seven years, and was buried by his side. The mystery of their relation will probably never be satisfactorily cleared away; but the evidence looks very much as if the poet had been unhappy in his domestic life.

The first edition of Shakspeare's works appeared in 1623, with a portrait by Martin Droeshout, representing him probably in the dress of one of his characters, Adam, and accompanying lines by Ben Jonson indicating its correctness as a likeness.

Now, reader, there is Shakspeare's life, if you choose to consider it that, and not, as some think, the mask of a life. Nay, do we not all feel, at every insignificant point of it, the presence of shadows? Has not each of us asked of him, as he of another,

"What is your substance, whereof are you made,
That millions of strange shadows on you tend?"

It is, brother-in-curiosity, up into the very region of these shadows, and to a week's play of hide-and-seek with them, that the great Tercentenary calls us. And I will suppose you all the more eager to go because it does not imply the removal of guineas from your pocket, which, I have reason to assure you, is the final test of Hero-worship.

Emerson declares us very clumsy writers of history, in that, concerning a man, we simply "tell the chronicle, parentage, birth, birth-place, schooling, school-mates, earning of money, marriage, publication of books, celebrity, death." Well, in the lack of more details, let it be recorded in future, as a chapter in Will Shakspeare's biography, that three hundred years after his death he was still powerful enough to stir as terrible a tempest as Ariel's in the theatrical and literary worlds of England; that he still magically evoked long ears on the heads of roaring Bottoms; that he was still potent to discover innumerable Shallows in England; and that Louis Napoleon's knees trembled at his ghost, and forbade it to appear in Paris. Vainly should I attempt to describe the epidemic fever which seized us here previous to this Festival. The Phelpsites glared on the Fechterites, and the programmes of Drury Lane were covered with such words about a foreigner's daring to play Hamlet over the grave of Shakspeare, that poor Mr. Fechter must have been beaten (morally) black and blue; for even at last he failed to appear. Then came the strife as to who should say or do the finest thing about Shakspeare that ever was said or done. One lady I heard of determined that nothing edible not mentioned by Shakspeare should come upon her table. Her husband, who had been fond of his omelet for breakfast, was much alarmed at this; but his wife relieved his heart by Anglicizing the viand into 'Amlet, and giving the A a broad Teutonic sound. A Stratford committeeman meets a London committeeman, and they shake hands in preparation for a Shakspearian duel.

STRATFORD. "Have you seen the morning's paper?"

LONDON. "Pah! paper! What's the use of a paper now? Shakspeare has written every thing down beforehand."

STRATFORD. "Stuff! Did Shakspeare write about that treadmill there?"

LONDON. "Certainly. 'Down, down! thou climbing sorrow!'"

STRATFORD (taking off his hat and wiping his forehead). "I really believe you're right. How plainly, too, he alluded to Garibaldi when he spoke of taking 'up arms against a See of troubles?'"

Of course we all laughed at these fever-stricken simpletons. I for one ventured, when the talk about Shakspeare became overpowering, to defend myself by telling the story of the manager in Memphis, Tennessee, who declared to Mr. Macready that "thet ere Shakespur was clean played out in Memphis." But, alas, it is only as people launched for a sea-voyage laugh at the first victims—with a laugh that frequently terminates gravely and grimly. Before I knew it, I found myself looking up old Shakspearian MSS. at the British Museum; then—a fatal sign—trying to read his will in its old lettering; until at length the fever was full on me and I on Stratford.

Whirled along now, past the towers of Windsor, past the minsters of Oxford, we pause not until we reach the porch of our temple—which happens to be a little station, manifestly built irrespective of Tercentenaries—and are intrusted, four hundred strong, with luggage, to Stratford's extra accommodating force of nine cabs, to be taken to our various quarters. Nevertheless, thou and I, reader, find ourselves, in some inexplicable way, snugly quartered in the Old White Lion Hotel, next door to the Birth-house of Shakspeare. We would indeed visit that house this very evening—the eve of the Festival—but it is forbidden: no lamp, nor fire of any kind, is ever allowed within those sacred walls, hot water in pipes being introduced from a neighboring house to keep the walls from suffering by dampness. So we lounge about the hotel, and find what characters we have about us.

Passing now into the smoking-room, we find a group with punch, pipes, and tobacco, who are listening to some profound physiognomical remarks from a young man on the bust of Shakspeare in the church. As we seat ourselves, one of the group leans over and whispers to us: "Look carefully at that face and head," says he, taking his pipe out of his mouth, and motioning with it toward the physiognomical speaker. We look. Again he whispers, "That, Sir, is a real descendant of William Shakspeare! You have only to look carefully to see the resemblance to the bust." Of course we look eagerly with our new light. Baldish at the top of the forehead the gentleman decidedly is; yes, and he has mustaches, undoubtedly, which are Shakspearian characteristics. But as his discourses proceed I, for one, have an impression that King John is preferable for style; and, in fact, find no difficulty in responding to the announcement of a steak in the dining-room, which room mine host of the White Lion has notably named The Tempest.

Bright and early next morning we enter the Shakspeare House, already filled with groups. An old lady, a young lady, and a policeman, for guides and guards, attend us. First of all, "you wish to see the room in which He was born." Of course. And yet one can not help remembering that this first room, now so guarded, was a few years ago a butcher's shop; and one half of the house was a public house, known as The Swan and Maidenhead. The idea of making this house into a shrine is one of very recent date. Up the old stair-way we grope, and presently stand in the room where the immortal Shakspeare was born.

The walls of the room are covered over with millions, one may say, of autographs. And among them all one may count on one's fingers those which recall any real name, these being pointed out by the old lady.

We now enter the Museum, and are shown, first, an old desk from the Grammar School, at which it is alleged the boy Shakspeare sat learning his "small Latin and less Greek," as Ben Jonson's line persists in putting it. Then we have, neatly carved in greenstone, the figure of the young man under the crab-tree, preserving the story which is always told with that of the deer-stealing, although not half so authentic. This legend relates that in the village of Bidford, seven miles below Stratford, two clubs used to meet, known as the Topers and the Sippers. The Topers enjoyed the highest reputation as masters of the art of drinking—that is, of drinking a great deal without getting drunk—and on one occasion challenged all England to drink with them on a Whit-Monday. Stratford accepted the challenge, and among those who went to the contest was Shakspeare. On arriving at Bidford, they found that the Topers had gone on a frolic to Evesham. The Sippers, however, took up the challenge, and conquered. Thoroughly muddled, the Stratfordians started homeward; but Shakspeare could not go farther than a certain crab-tree, where he lay in profound slumber until morning. He was awakened by a detachment of his comrades who wished to renew the contest; but Shakspeare, quite penitent, declined, alleging that he had already drank with

"Piping Peabworth, dancing Marston, Haunted Hillborough, hungry Grafton;
With dodging Exhall, papist Wixford, Beggary Broom, and drunken Bidford;"

referring to the villages around to which his opponents belonged. Apocryphal as this story is, it certainly was extant in 1790, and has been the means of labeling the surrounding villages. The old crab-tree perished by natural decay in 1824, and an old gate-post is now all that marks the spot. The room is shown at Bidford where the battle took place, and the old sign of the Falcon Inn associated with it is preserved in this Museum, with pieces of the crab-tree.

New Place, where the poet resided in his last years, was sold by the trustees of Lady Barnard, a descendant of Shakspeare, to Sir Edward Walker, and finally came to Sir John Clopton, who married Sir Edward's daughter. Sir John built a fine house in place of the venerable structure. Sir Hugh Clopton, Sir John's successor, afterward owned the place, and entertained the actors Garrick, Macklin, and Delane under the old mulberry-tree in the garden, which, according to tradition, Shakspeare himself had planted. In 1751 Rev. Francis Gastrell came into possession, and in a fit of anger at the number of people who came to see the mulberry-tree, cut it down. He also pulled down the house, to avoid paying poor-rates for a house he did not occupy; and soon afterward was forced by the wrath of Stratford to leave the place. His miniature is kept here for execration. The mulberry-tree was cut up into many relics and trinkets; some of which are preserved in this Museum, as also is a small vial with some of the mulberries. At New Place one now sees only a cellar, with an old well nearly filled up in the centre. Thorough excavations have of course been made there with the following results: 24 clay pipes, 3 old-fashioned thimbles, 1 knife, 1 fork, 1 button, 1 old candlestick. When my reader reflects what mouth may have been fed by that knife and fork, what lips may have held those pipes, what immortal pantaloons may have been fastened by that button, and that the candlestick (found, like truth, at the bottom of the well) might have held a light for the writing of Othello, he will pardon the enthusiasm with which I looked upon these relics. Another curiosity is a pair of stirrups—steel, with brass tops—which were found in the garden of the Shakspeare House itself, I believe, and are called "Shakspeare's stirrups;" but a matter of real interest is an old ring, found near Stratford church-yard by a workman. It is a gold signet-ring, inscribed with the initials W. S., with a true-lover's knot between the letters.

We now turn from the Museum; but ere we leave the Shakspeare House pass into the well-kept garden devoted to the nurture of such flowers and other plants as have been named in the works of the Poet. As we return we observe a London swell—an exasperated case of the same—who has entered with two magnificent young ladies. The first thing Milord does is to take out his superb gold pencil and move toward the wall, whereupon the old lady lays her hand upon his arm: "We don't allow visitors to write on the walls." "Oh!—ah!—why there are a great many written already." "Yes, but now we have a book for visitors' names." "But why don't you allow any more on the walls?" "Why, of course now and then we might get the name of some distinguished man, and that we would like; but, Sir, the most of people who want to write on the walls are people of no 'count at all, Sir—no 'count at all!" Whereupon Milord turns red, girls smile faintly, and the old lady passes to the next antiquity.

But we must now pause in our sight-seeing, for the time of the Grand Banquet, with which the Festival opens, is at hand. Thither we go, then, and are at once dazzled by the splendor of the scene. Long lines of tables, beautifully ornamented with flowers and figures. Saccharine Romeos, pasty Hamlets, iced Portias, on cake pedestals, make eye and palate juicy simultaneously. And the Bill of Fare seems to indicate that, after all, the secret of Shakspeare's genius lay in a transcendent gastronomy. We feasted on "a very, very peacock;" our bills, like Falstaff's, contained, "Item, a capon, 2s. 2d.;" we picked the "dainty duck" without any such terrible indigestion as the fat knight experienced at Herne's Oak; we conquered "the full-acorned boar." Then came the "queen of curds and cream." Meanwhile the butlers cried with obligation of pops, "He calls for wine; 'a health,' quoth he." Alcott used to tell us that we should breakfast on bowls of sunshine; but even he did not anticipate epic roasts and lyric flagons.

Looking at the long line of distinguished visitors present—i. e., those who were to make the speeches—I was sorry to see only one or two literary men, and those scarcely of the first class. Richard Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton) was the most notable of these. There was also Archbishop Trench. But chiefly there were Lords and Sirs. The Earl of Carlisle—a lively, gray-haired old man, with ribbons and stars on his breast—presided, and made a fair speech. Mayor Flower, of Stratford, made the heartiest address. An address from the institution founded in the "fatherhouse of Göthe," at Frankfort, richly engrossed with pictures of the birth-places of Göthe and Shakspeare, was presented; and felicitations from Russia were received. There were plenty of those sharp cries of agony which Englishmen call "cheers." The health of the American poets was proposed by a gentleman who evidently did not know the name of any author in America, but was gracious enough to declare that "they [the American poets] drew their inspiration from the same source with ourselves." And the company dispersed, pending a metaphysical argument by a German Professor, showing that Göthe, Shakspeare, and Homer had a kind of hypostatic unity. On the whole, I left the banquet more than ever impressed with the conviction that the fault of every English public dinner is its hopeless conventionality. Not more regularly does the clock-hand move round than it brings the toasts to the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the toast of the evening, the chairman, etc., etc., each bawled out by the liveried and white-cravatted beadle behind the chairman. There is no spontaneity—no fun. The speeches are simply cut-and-dried eulogies with appended quotations. The Queen is, of course, "born to command," and Alexandra "the glass of fashion and the mould of form," and Shakspeare "a man, take him for all in all," etc.

The second day of the Festival is Sunday, and those of us who do not go a-boating on the Avon, to be logically and theologically upset, or to walk along the banks and watch the beautiful swans, will hear the new Archbishop of Dublin (Trench) in the morning, and the Bishop of St. Andrews (Wordsworth, a relative of the poet) in the afternoon. I take my position in the crowded church, hear the service intoned, and the anthems sweetly sung by the little boys in white gowns; meditate on the humility of the noble family who sit in raised pews curtained off from the rest of the congregation, with coats of arms on the walls around them; observe the beadle, with his red coat, distinguished air, and long staff, who frequents the aisle, until at last the Archbishop enters upon a discourse in which Shakspeare—the gastronomic S., as I thought last night—appears before me as a saint. "O rare Ben Jonson!" why did you not tell us this? But in the afternoon I learn that he is not only a saint, but an especially English saint. He is the intensely national prophet and poet. So these Italians who admire his representations of Venice and Verona, and those scholars who find all ancient Rome in him, must be careful to remember that, after all, he is the beef-and-ale saint. Nevertheless I could not help reflecting that the greatest Hamlet of the stage is Fechter, the finest Juliet Stella Colas; on those telegrams from Russia, that address from Frankfort; and the celebrations that were then going on in America in homage to that genius which is a flower with hues from the sky bending over all nations, whose fragrance is the joy of the whole earth.

A better sermon it was when, after the Bishop was done, a group of men and women from all parts of the world gathered about the grave in the chancel to gaze on the features of the man who owned a shrine in each of them. The bust, which, with its carefully carved and colored clothing, undoubtedly presented Shakspeare as he appeared to his contemporaries, was, it will be remembered, painted white by poor silly Malone, just as his real mind and character had been by the Bishop's during the day. But it has now been pretty well restored to its original condition. It is very plain, however, that when Shakspeare died no fine tomb or bust was thought of. Yet it could not have been long after the publication of his works, seven years after his death, that all who had known the poet had reason to be proud of it. I remember well to have often seen an old grave-stone in the colonial parish church-yard at Fredericksburg, Virginia, on which it was written that beneath was the dust of one who had been "a pall-bearer at the funeral of William Shakspeare," that being the one thing memorable in a life which ended in the early part of the 17th century. As I read and re-read the well-known lines,

"Good frend for Jesus sake forbear," etc.,

I could scarcely wonder that poor Miss Delia Bacon believed that they contained a deeper sense, and I pictured her there at midnight, with lantern and pick, about to dig for the secret of the Baconian authorship of the plays—there with the shadow of lunacy closing upon her.

Monday morning shines bright and clear upon us. Let us use its first hours in strolling through the "Shakspeare Gallery;" for perhaps the most interesting feature of the Stratford celebration is, that it has brought together between four and five hundred of the finest pictures in England. The Queen, fortunately, had set the example by sending her magnificent painting, by Sir T. Lawrence, of John Philip Kemble as Hamlet; and, of course, the nobility followed, the result being a collection never again to be seen, and one worthy a journey over the Atlantic to see. Walking through these rooms we are thrilled with a sense of the fullness of that genius which, after filling all the moulds of its own art, had yet enough to enrich other arts with such pictures as these and such music as the Somernachtstraum music of Mendelssohn and "Coriolanus" of Beethoven.

Our first attraction is to the portraits of Shakspeare, of which there are thirty here, all claiming a degree of authenticity. We have here the courtly Shakspeare, whom aristocracy loves to think of as reading his plays to Queen Elizabeth; the scholarly Shakspeare, as thinkers love to enshrine him, "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," pen in hand, library around; and we have the theatrical Shakspeare as the followers of his art love to picture him. After closely examining these old paintings I am convinced that they have all branched off, under training of the above-named several conceptions, from the portrait in the Folio of 1623 (the Droeshout portrait), and the bust in the church. Three of these portraits are remarkable as giving the bard a long Puritanic face, strongly resembling Calvin's, and I can not help thinking that they date from the time when the Puritans began to claim this play-actor. What a tribute it is to the catholicity of the Bard that the Puritan, the Churchman, and the Catholic all claim him as of their faith! It is simply true that he painted them all without the bias of the parties of his age, and that they were included in his all-enfolding genius as they were in Nature, and for the same reason. Among other images I was somewhat interested in the alleged mask of Shakspeare, which has been of recent years intrusted to Professor Owen. It is said to have been purchased by a German nobleman (Kesselstadt) an ambassador in London, and a devotee of the theatre in Shakspeare's time. Max Müller certifies to the genuineness of its history as to date, and its being brought from London at that time. Owen and other men of ability believe it to be as the German family tradition asserts, the real mask of the dead Shakspeare. So does Fanny Kemble. Mr. Carlyle disbelieves it. If, as there is much reason to believe, the bust in the church was from a mask of Shakspeare, then the other is not; nevertheless it is a subject of interest and discussion. My belief is that, after all, we have no satisfactory likeness of Shakspeare other than that which is found in the first Folio, by the side of which Ben Jonson, who knew the poet best, wrote these lines:

This Figure, that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakspeare cut;
Wherein the Graver had a strife
With Nature, to out-doo the life:
O could he but have drawne his Wit
As well in Brasse as he hath lit
His Face; the Print would then surpasse
All, that was ever writ in Brasse;
But, since he cannot, Reader, looke
Not on his Picture, but his Booke. . . . B. I.

Turning now to other pictures, we are first of all moved to admire the superb painting sent by the Queen. Such a man as Kemble might have been created simply to interpret for mankind the noble forms conceived by Shakspeare. As he stands there with Yorick's skull in his hand he is Hamlet. But even more is the satisfaction with which we turn to look at Mrs. Siddons as The Tragic Muse, painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds. Sir Thomas Lawrence declared this to be the finest female portrait in the world. Sir Robert Harvey, an eminent patron of art in the last century possessed a valuable picture which Sir Joshua coveted. But there was a picture which Sir Joshua had painted on the hem of Mrs. Siddons's garment that Sir Robert coveted. Upon agreement Sir Joshua painted from it the present picture, a duplicate, and received in return for it that other which Harvey owned. It is in most perfect condition, and a picture that I could spend days gazing at. But we must hasten along these fascinating rooms where one may get to know so well the faces of Garrick and his wife, of the beautiful Mrs. Twiss, of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, of Foote, Kean, Macklin, Lady Hamilton, and a host of others, in many rich Shakspearian scenes, and each in their favorite character. How many do I know who would take delight in this painting by Briggs of Fanny Kemble dressing for her first appearance on the stage (in the character of Juliet), with Mr. and Mrs. Kemble and Mrs. Davenport about her? It is cruel to those who have not seen these pictures to dwell on them, so let me close with a mention of one sweet conception by Green, The Dream of Shakspeare. Partly it relates to the deer-stealing anecdote. Under a broad forest tree lies a noble youth asleep. By his side is the newly-slain deer. A hound pokes his nose close up to the youth's face, and danger follows close in the lowering face, peering between the bushes, of the game-keeper. This scene fills one-fourth of the picture, in the fore-ground. The young Shakspeare's face is meanwhile turned away from the deer and the keeper: and before him, in the bright or shadowy forms of a dream, there stretch those wondrous scenes and ideals which are in the future to be evolved from that brain. There see we the weird spirits of Macbeth, and the radiant pageant of the Tempest; passionate Juliet is awaking to the death of love; Hamlet stands like Fate beside blighted Ophelia. Ah—it is exquisite: any description would be poor to represent this painting which, not perhaps in the first class as to execution (though rich in coloring), is transfigured by its subject into pure beauty.

But now the time has come when we are to hear Handel's Messiah, that Oratorio with which England always opens festivals which it means shall be grand. To me the novelty of the performance was that I heard Sims Reeves in it. This dark little man, with his jet-black hair and mustache, is not very prepossessing; he has a heavy, used-up look, and makes a stiff bow. Doubtless he has sung in the "Messiah" more than any person living—unless it be Jenny Lind. But hark! what voice is that falling out of the sky? O may all I love hear ere they die Sims Reeves break forth with the strain "Comfort ye my people!" This dark little man is now bright and grand; and ere he has uttered that last cry allotted him in the Oratorio, "Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel," there is no chord within us that he has not surprised with emotions before unknown. In the evening we hear him again in a concert which is, in the musical direction, what the Shakspearian Gallery is in the pictorial; for here we have the music Shakspeare has inspired—the "singing leaves," as it were, which he has put forth in climbing to the clusters of his own proper fruit. Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Haydn, Schubert, Verdi, Macfarren, Shield, Arne, Horne, Stevenson, Stevens, Hatton, Bishop, Allridge, and Mellon have joined to come and lay this beautiful tone-wreath on his grave.

Tuesday has come—the day fixed for the excursion to Charlecote Hall. My companion for the excursion is Howard Staunton, Esq., editor of the Shakspeare Folio, a keen critic, very skeptical about Shakspearian anecdotes, but inclined to believe this one about the deer-stealing. In fact there are some very good reasons for crediting it. In the first place it seems certain that the poet meant a personal satire in the character of Justice Shallow, and the allusion in the opening scene of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" to the luce or pike-fish, for 700 years the device of the Lucy family, gives point to it.

But this story of the deer-stealing and the trial, which is too well known to call for repetition here, receives an indirect and droll confirmation in the fact that the affair is noted in the private family records of the Lucys, where I myself saw it told of Sir Thomas in MS.—"the same that prosecuted Shakspear for taking a buck from his park." Now this might be otherwise accounted for, if it was accompanied with any family pride in the association; but, incredible as it may seem, the Lucys have always had a ludicrously crabbed feeling toward Shakspeare! That blood will tell across three centuries may be judged by the fact that when it was suggested to the late Sir George Lucy that he should send a haunch of venison to the annual Shakspeare dinner of Stratford, he replied—"What! send venison to a dinner for a man that stole deer out of Charlecote Park? Never!" This was told me by one who knew it to be true. It is also in keeping with it that Charlecote Hall has never been open to Shakspearian visitors. The present representative of the family, Sir Spencer Lucy, a young unmarried man of 32, threw it open on this occasion; but rather, it would seem, because it would have been scandalous not to do so than for any better reason. It was a fine opportunity for a very wealthy country gentleman to have shown liberality, and it would have been creditable to his bonhomie to have provided a venison lunch; but instead of that none of the family were seen, and the house was filled with policemen who suggested so strongly those who pounced upon Shakspeare that a story went the rounds in the evening that a young gentleman, on being addressed by a policeman with a request that he would not touch a certain work of art, started back exclaiming, "I didn't steal it, Sir!" In vain might one look about Charlecote Hall for a Shakspearian picture, or even for the great Poacher's works: except the one MS. line mentioned there was no sign about him; and it is clear that a traditional unfriendliness to him has survived to this day in Charlecote Hall.

Four miles, under a blue sky, on the bank of the soft-flowing Avon—by a path fringed with "daisies pied and violets blue"—above us the lark singing "at heaven's gate"—on every tree "Philomel with melody;" thus did my friend and I walk to Charlecote Hall. As we turned then into the park we saw the deer—the descendants of those which the immortal poacher invaded—and a little further the policemen, the descendants, it may be, of those who pounced upon him in turn. Then came into view the beautiful old mansion, built in the form of the letter E, in honor of Queen Elizabeth, and approached through a noble Elizabethan gate.

Already merry groups were filling the Hall where the poet's trial occurred, and others were thronging the rooms where many fine paintings by old Italian and German masters are to be seen. I was exceedingly interested in a portrait from life of Charles I., and also in some ebony-and-ivory inlaid furniture (cabinets, chairs, and lounge), which Queen Elizabeth had presented to the Earl of Leicester, and which had come to the Lucys by purchase, from Kenilworth. Repairing then to the Church, a gem in its way, we saw the old marble tomb, representing Sir Thomas and his wife in a very fine but less enduring form than that in which his memory has been perpetuated in the old "justice of the peace and coram." What a relative thing transgression is! How many a poor fellow now in jail for poaching in Warwickshire might feel strangely affected at seeing these groups, not only of unofficial folk, but props of the law—of squires, of lords and ladies—examining the old fence which one of their number once broke through with admiration. All you have to do, poor fellows, is to smartly impale the man with your wit after stealing his deer: this makes all the difference between immortality and the next county assizes! The old fence around the park is, by-the-way, very curious, and is built now precisely as it was in the 12th century, when this family was first established here. It is built of rude unhewn slabs of timber, with single length-pieces fastened by wooden pins; and I noted an old kind of stile, unknown elsewhere, called "The Tumble-down," made of several mallets fitting into and falling upon one another, which lift up when one passes over.

But we must now return, for we must be ready to witness the first theatrical performance in the Pavilion. It is Twelfth Night—the comedy of cross-gartered Malvolio, and valiant Sir Andrew Aguecheek, the romance of faithful Viola. In walked a troop of Lords and Baronets, with the Earl of Carlisle at their head. They are all the pink of dignity as they march into the front seat. But wait a moment; the Poacher will invade their dignity! See there—already Lord Leigh is doubled up as by a cramp! Why is Sir Robert Hamilton smothering himself with that handkerchief? Hark! a snort and explosion—there is the Earl of Carlisle, his face red, eyes streaming, body doubled forward, hands holding his sides. Ah! my lords, just take off your stars and ribbons, and go down into the pit of Drury Lane, and the boys will ask you to "squeeze up," and the old woman offer you tuppence pop, just as if you were only a jolly play-going Englishman! But I will confess that it is enough to make the haggard face of Tragedy there smile, much less your dignities, to see Buckstone as Sir Andrew.

Wednesday morning finds me strolling through the green fields in the direction of Ann Hathaway's Cottage. The children are busy gathering daisies and cuckoo-pint (or butter-cup, since the failure of ornithology to prove that the cuckoo takes therefrom his daily dram); and it really seemed to me quite romantic to see the little Hathaways so engaged, until a little further on their comrades beset me with similar ones, not at all disinclined to exchange these bright-hued symbols of innocence for black pennies. The old cottage, far gone in decay, really shows nothing of interest except a woman who is descended from the Hathaway family. Signs enough of extreme age there are; and an old bench with high back, called "Shakspeare's Courting Seat." It was for a long time under the most beautiful shade in the garden, and it is very possible that the youth sat there with Ann; unless, indeed, he was fastidious about seats. Fancy a seat less than a foot wide, and a back almost straight up three feet!

Returning from poor Ann's home with these reflections I was quite in a mood for witnessing the leading play of the evening, Romeo and Juliet, with Stella Colas, who has made the character of Juliet her specialty. I had supposed that never again could I endure to see this play; and my only association with it was that of a sighing sentimental pair making love to each other in an impossible way in the presence of an improbable balcony. But when Stella Colas comes out into the moonbeams on that balcony she is like a star, and any thing but adoration from Romeo would be a hissable impertinence. "What awtewible haccnt," whispered Sir Snob. Snob!—"that accent is one of the realities of this performance: Juliet is ridiculous as an Englishwoman, and that balcony undiscoverable from London to John O'Groat's House; but spend a moonlit night in Verona, and if you were not a traveling island with a channel between you and the rest of mankind, you would know that Juliet's true language is not English, and you would be only too glad to have the illusion heightened by a delicate accent while you get the play in the only tongue you comprehend. Therefore whatever you, Sir Snob may say, or whatever Dr. Wordsworth may say about the intense nationality of Shakspeare, these flushing cheeks and falling tears around you are the criticism of the common heart, and they declare that this Frenchwoman is the only Juliet now on the stage!" After we have had our laugh at the Comedy of Errors, we go home to dream of Stella Juliet up in the sky, with her Romeo cut up into stars for the observation of herself and other tender astronomers.

Early next morning I visited the Red Horse Hotel, where Washington Irving so long resided, and was shown the poker with which he is associated. When he left this hotel the poker in his room was missed; and it was about a month afterward returned with the words "Geoffrey Crayon's Sceptre" engraved neatly upon it. The matron who showed it to me assured me that the majority of Americans who came to see it kissed it. The name of Irving is hallowed at Stratford, where he gained many friends. Among these was one of whom something more should be said in any account of this festival.

When they remembered that the Tercentenary of Shakspeare's birthday was approaching, and that a Festival at Stratford was necessary, the Stratfordians repaired to a certain gentleman, who had several times been their Mayor, and desired him to accept that office again, and help them, in that capacity, to conduct the matter to a successful issue. This gentleman, on whose shoulders the burden of the celebration and the honor of its success have been imposed, is one in whom there is every reason that Americans should feel a peculiar interest. Mr. E. F. Flower, Mayor of Stratford, was born in 1805. He is the youngest son of a distinguished agriculturist and politician, Richard Flower, who, in 1817, taking gloomy views of the prospects of England, sold his fine estate in Hertfordshire, Marden Hall, and emigrated with his family and many friends and laborers to the then far West of America, where he purchased a large track of land from the Government, laid out the town of Albion, and established the settlement in the southeast of Illinois known as the English settlement. There he and his companions did good service in bringing Illinois into the Union as a free State. His son shared all the perils and hardships which attended a journey to, and residence in, the far West at this time. He also, with his father, took an early interest in the slaves, and through their help many a poor fugitive gained his liberty. In his twentieth year Mr. Flower, the present Mayor, having recovered from a severe illness, returned to his native land and determined to remain. His education having been chiefly such as the hard battle of life gives, he addressed himself for the first few years to study, and during this time spent six months with Robert Owen and his friends at Lanark. One of his first pilgrimages was to the birth-place of Shakspeare, where his name stands on the book as "a citizen of the world." In Warwickshire he first met and, in 1827, married Celina, daughter of John Greaves, Esq., of Barford. He at first went into the timber trade and lost. In 1832 he set up a small brewery at Stratford and succeeded. Since then his life has gained compensation for all early hardships. He has seen an interesting family grow up around him, honored by all. He has been four times Mayor of Stratford. Mr. Flower has always retained his interest in America; and, since the breaking out of the war, has labored earnestly to give English opinion a right direction. Few Americans have visited Stratford without enjoying his hospitality. He is indeed a true nobleman. During the week of the Festival he kept open house, and the finest companies were daily entertained at his table. Many authors, actors, and others will remember the spirited companies and lively conversations which occurred at "The Hill," where every "reading" or tradition was discussed from day to day.

Another Shakspearian concert; a dramatic reading by an American lady, Mrs. Macready; a fine performance of "As you like it" by the Haymarket Company; and, on the last evening of the Festival, a grand Costume Ball of Shakspearian characters;—and this literary jaunt, this week's Shakspearian siesta, is over.

THE UNKIND WORD.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

CHAPTER III.

WHEN, on a fearfully wet and foggy night—the sort of night which, dreary any where, is unutterably dreary in Glasgow—the five forlorn travelers reached Jessie's home in Blythwood Square, they found that Mr. Raeburn had been five days absent from it—and, strange to say, that Maurice Wyvill had never made his appearance there at all!

After that first hour of unspeakable dread, ensued days and weeks of slow suspense and dull misery; lessened and relieved by accidental gleams of hope, for human nature can only endure a certain amount of pain, either temporarily throwing it off, or sinking under it entirely. For a while the excitement kept them up somehow; the perpetual uncertainty, the inquiries started in all directions, with no lack of ingenuity—or money either, for Uncle Raeburn came out then, generously and freely to a limitless extent, as close-fisted Scotchmen, when once touched, continually do. And there was the sympathy of friends, nay, even of common acquaintances, roused into friendship by the pitifulness of the story, which circulated far and wide, as such a mysterious and melancholy history was sure to do, rousing up to light a number of other stories, which people always hear of when something similar happens to themselves. Common the fact is not—thank Heaven!

in our civilized community, where "murder will out" however closely hid, and where any strange accident evokes universal publicity—yet many cases have happened, of individuals suddenly vanishing from the midst of friends and neighbors, with no likely reason for their disappearance, no clue to their possible fate; slipping out of the whirl of ordinary life as completely as if the earth had opened her mouth and swallowed them up—to be never heard of more.

Any who have undergone, or even come nigh unto, such an agony, will acknowledge that to weep over the saddest death-bed, to sit beside the most untimely grave—to be smitten as by a thunder-bolt with the tidings, mercifully made certain and sure, of some beloved one passing from the measurable distance of a foreign land into the immeasurable, yet, perchance, scarcely further distance of the land unseen—is actual happiness, compared to the calamity which befell the Wyvills and Raeburns—including Mr. Wyvill and Mr. Raeburn, no longer at variance now.

The blow fell heavy upon each and all, but heaviest upon those who were expected to feel it least—Jessie and Richard. The former took it quietly at first—indeed throughout; Jessie was always quiet. But the color faded, slowly and entirely, out of her pretty soft cheek; her small figure grew thin and spare: she seemed within a few months—nay, a few weeks—to wither up into a little old maid, who might have been any age between twenty and forty. And so she remained—and remains still.

For poor Dick, after the first excitement was over, when weeks, months, slipped by, and still Maurice was never heard of, he sank into the depression of utter repentance—say rather remorse, which is repentance with no hope of atonement. The last “unkind word,” which there was no unsaying now, and which perhaps had goaded Maurice on to that Glasgow journey in which, by some unknown means or other, he met his end, rested on the poor boy’s memory with a morbid weight. He harped upon it continually; nothing ever seemed to take it out of his mind: he seemed to feel almost as if he, and none but he, had been the death of his brother.

As a matter of course, Richard now took the place of eldest and only son. There was now no rivalry possible either at home or abroad, no jealousy of Maurice’s handsomer face or pleasanter manner, the inexpressible charm which made him, as is sure to be the case, more loved, because more lovable. All these things were forever passed away, and Richard would have given worlds to have had them back again in all their bitterness, if he could but have had Maurice also back once more.

It is good sometimes to be absent—better still, perhaps, to be dead—as regards our own imperfectness, and our equally imperfect friends. How they rise up and praise us for virtues we never possessed, and benignly pardon us for sins we never committed! How tender over our memories grow those who, living, worried our lives out, and might do the same again if we were alive to-morrow! Ay, in spite of the poet’s touching verse—more touching than true, perhaps—

“I think, in the lives of most women and men,
There’s a time when all would grow smooth and even,
If only the dead could find out when
To return and be forgiven.”

But whether he were dead or not, there was no need to forgive poor Maurice. In his short life of twenty years he had done little harm, and in his mysterious and terrible fate, any trifling faults he had were totally obscured and obliterated. He who, had he not been so suddenly and awfully snatched from among them, might have kept his place as an ordinarily good elder brother—full of failings, doubtless, but well-liked on the whole—was now exalted into a family idol. The sisters, who used to snub and scold him—the selfish father, who had neglected, almost ignored him—the brother, who had quarreled with him, almost daily, and yet could never get on without him—now mourned for Maurice with an anguish unrestrained, and worshiped him with a passionate love, the wilder and sadder that it came too late.

There never seemed to enter the family mind—what crossed strangers’ minds, and mouths too, not seldom; only, with the curious tenderness that any deep tragedy awakens in even the worldliest part of “the world,” nobody ever hinted it to the Wyvills themselves—that the lad might have been himself to blame in his disappearance. That, having fallen under some sudden temptation, he might have committed some ill deed, which made him dread to meet his father’s face: or, with the mingled thoughtlessness and selfishness of his age, might have taken a fit of boyish adventurousness, and shipped himself off somewhere to America or Australia—just for fun.

Of his being murdered there seemed far less probability, seeing he had little or no money about him. He had never appeared at the Glasgow Bank at all; and it was very unlikely any murder could have been committed, undiscovered, in that city, whither, with a fatal persistency, his family were convinced he had gone. They were the more settled in this belief by the additional evidence of the stoker of the Glasgow boat, who remembered—the captain remembered nothing—having that day spoken to a young gentleman—fair-haired and pleasant—who came and looked down into the engine-room; as, with an agony of fond recollection, they knew Maurice, who had a turn for machinery, was particularly fond of doing.

So, in all their searching, they never searched, or only very superficially, the mountains round the cottage, or the spot on the hill-road where Diarmid Beg had encountered the lad—of which encounter the fisherman now spoke very charily, believing it to be the youth’s fetch and “no himself ava.” And when, in the midst of winter—which fell very early that year—the tidings came, slowly as tidings always do come to these remote Highland regions, that the poor young Englishman had never been seen more, Diarmid and his neighbors, slow to take in new ideas, and equally slow to put them together, merely shook their heads with, “Eh, but it’s awfu’!” “The bonnie lad!” but made no inquiries of any kind.

So, in a little while more, the mountains wrapped themselves in their grand familiar winter snows, and the storms swept over the little lone cottage on the shore, where the family of the Wyvills had spent that merry month. And at last, when hope was dying, almost dead in their hearts—though the girls still resolutely refused to put on mourning—they left Scotland, and all went home together to Wyvill Court—without Maurice.

The strange story of the poor lost lad was talked of all that winter at Glasgow dinner-parties; and Jessie Raeburn was pointed at in church or in the street—she never went any where else—as, “Yon’s his cousin—his sweet-heart some say.”

But whether she was or was not Maurice’s “sweet-heart,” Jessie never betrayed, and nobody knew. She lived her ordinary life, faithfully doing its duties: attending to her uncle, and keeping his large splendid house in order, neither sinking into bodily illness nor mental depression. Only people noticed—the few people whose society she shared—that the hall-bell never rang—the parlor-door never opened—the handful of post-letters never arrived—without Jessie Raeburn turning with a start and a slight tremble of expectation—as if even yet, though weeks grew into months, and months into years, she had not given up all hope, but was patiently waiting on for him who never came.

CHAPTER IV.

WYVILL COURT lay on the western side of one of the most beautiful of the beautiful Yorkshire dales. It was a comparatively small estate, and the mansion was likewise small, built of the gray stone of the district, plain and old-fashioned within and without. For the Wyvills had been one of those ancient impoverished Roman Catholic families which are still found here and there in the wilds of the north country, poor and proud, clinging tenaciously to their ancestral faith, until the last owner, in giving up Catholicism, had sunk into that pitiful moral and mental condition only too common in the beginning of the present century, satirically called Nothingarianism.

But he was dead now, the grim, eccentric, selfish old man, who had broken his wife's heart, and never won, in the smallest degree, the hearts of his children. Yet, strange as it may appear, he never seemed to recover the blow to his pride—it could hardly be his affections—given by the disappearance or death, whichever people chose to call it, of his eldest son.

For Maurice Wyvill never came home. From that fatal 30th of September, when he was seen by Diarmid M'Diarmid hurrying down to meet the Glasgow boat, no light had been thrown on his mysterious fate. He was searched for every where; advertised for, periodically, in England, Scotland, and even the colonies; rewards large enough to have tempted any man, not his actual murderer, were offered for any clew to him, living or dead; but all in vain.

When, after a lapse of four years, the father died, many difficulties arose. Wyvill Court was strictly entailed, and until clear evidence could be obtained of the death of the eldest son the younger could inherit nothing. It was only by some ingenious legal arrangements, made to suit the emergencies of this novel and most painful case, and in the hope that Maurice, should he ever reappear, would act with the generosity befitting his character when a boy, that Richard was installed temporary master at Wyvill Court, maintaining his three sisters there upon the small income that was available. For Mr. Wyvill, like many other selfish men, had complicated all troubles by dying intestate, and the girls were wholly dependent upon the heir. So poor Dick, heir and yet not heir, cramped on all hands by innumerable perplexities, could only live on sufferance at his ancestral home, unable to take legal possession of it himself, and, worst of all, unable to adorn it, as his forefathers had always been eager to do, with a wife. For early marriages had long been the hereditary blessing, as the last late marriage had been the misfortune, of the Wyvill family.

Whether Richard wanted to marry or not he never betrayed. Since his brother's loss his natural reserve had grown to an almost morbid extent. He attempted no profession; perhaps he had the sense to feel he was not clever enough to succeed therein, and trade was impossible to a Wyvill. So, both during his father's lifetime and afterward, he "hung about" at home, shooting, fishing, or dabbling in agriculture, to which, if he had any bias at all, his taste inclined: he was a born country gentleman.

Almost his only absences from home were periodical visits, at long intervals, to Glasgow; but he never asked his sisters to accompany him, and was as incommunicative about his uncle and cousin, with whom he was supposed to stay, as he was about most other things. He was not a pleasant young man, and there seemed some curious twist in his nature, growing more perceptible every year, which made his sisters, while they respected him sincerely, find it difficult to love him; at least with that warmth of love which they had felt, or now believed they had, toward his elder brother.

A chapter since I said, and not untruly, that it is good sometimes to be absent—better still to be dead; that is, for the absent and the dead; but also, in a mysterious secondary sense, for the survivors. Many a man's death earns for him far more love, and exercises a far wider influence for good, than his life might have done. Ever since Maurice's—death they still refused to call it, but his—departure, the memory of him and the anguish of his loss had brought into his family a warmer, kindlier, softer atmosphere: more patience, more forbearance; more clinging together, as if they felt the slenderness of the links that bound them to one another, and walked always in the solemn shadow of that death which overhangs all mortal life; though, alas! we are so prone to forget it, so prone to live as though we were never to die.

The girls had been good girls to their old father until his death; they had nothing to reproach themselves with on that score; and when Jessie Raeburn had to follow their example, and devote herself exclusively and engrossingly to her old uncle, they did not reproach her, even though it prevented what, in the absence of all intimate female friends, they would very well have liked—visits to her at Glasgow, or her visits to them at Wyvill Court. There was scarcely an obvious reason for the fact—yet a fact it was—that ever since that Highland journey, with its terrible ending, Jessie and her cousins (excepting Richard) had never once met. And now little Jessie was Miss Raeburn of Blythwood Square and Woodhouselea, heiress to Uncle Raeburn's uncounted wealth, which, by some crotchet which no one either blamed or much wondered at, he had left to her, and her alone.

Her cousins, though they might have been a little disappointed, since they stood in exactly the same relationship to him, legally speaking, as herself, behaved very well. The Wyvill pride accepted its position, and was too proud to feel or to express envy, or to shrink from Jessie because she was rich and independent. They, poor girls, had scarcely wherewithal to clothe themselves, or to keep up any thing like the decent dignity expected from the Miss Wyvills of Wyvill Court; still less to suppose that any one in their own rank of life would marry them—though Emma and Jane were both handsome girls; but young men of this day have sometimes an eye to money, even in primitive Yorkshire dales.

At last a poor young parson came, who loved Emma, poor as she also was: and then the high spirit of Richard Wyvill, ay, and of Agnes too—the unselfish and motherly Agnes—writhed under new vexations. No settlements could be made; for who was to make them? So closely was the estate tied up—waiting the possible re-appearance of the heir (or his heirs; for who knew but that some son of Maurice's might one day make claim to the property?)—that it was with difficulty enough money could be got at to insure a decent marriage outfit to the daughter of the Wyvills of Wyvill Court. Emma could hardly have been married at all, had not Jessie Raeburn stepped forward and claimed her cousinly right liberally to portion the bride; doing it so sweetly, so delicately, that even Richard had not the heart to stand in the way. Possibly his own heart felt how cruel the position was, and responded to the earnest manner in which Jessie put the matter in her letter, which inclosed a check for several hundreds, addressed to Emma, in an envelope containing merely the well-known lines from Burns:

"O why should Fate sic pleasure have Life's dearest bands untwining?
Or why sae sweet a flower as Love Depend on Fortune's shining?"

It was on the occasion of this marriage that, after long years, Jessie revisited Wyvill Court.

Spring was creeping greenly over the bleak Yorkshire dale, and, in spite of the wild equinoctial winds, primroses were peeping out round the roots of the old oaks, and forget-me-nots blossoming in hundreds by the river—the bright, daring, rapid river, whose course could be tracked along the dale for miles and miles—when Jessie came, a woman of seven-and-twenty, to the house where she had last been as a mere child, patronized by the girls, and domineered over by the two boys. And with that uncomfortable-ness of expectation with which people who know themselves changed, and expect equal change in others, prepare for a meeting long delayed, desiring it, and yet wishing it over—did Agnes, Emma, and Jane Wyvill stand watching for the carriage in which their brother was bringing Jessie Raeburn to the old familiar place. It was visible at last, crawling up the steep road; and then a little figure, all in black, alighted, and toiled, Richard following though not assisting, up the weary half mile; but still the sisters were too nervous to do any thing but quietly wait.

"I wonder if she is altered?"

"Dick says, not much," observed Emma. "Dick likes her very much, I am sure; he always did. So did dear Maurice."

"Ah, yes! and she was very fond of Maurice."

"I wonder," remarked Emma again, with an acuteness doubtless born of her own happy lot, "whether Richard would like to marry Jessie. It has struck me so sometimes."

"Don't speak of such a thing," said Agnes, angrily—Agnes, in whom the sore circumstances of the family had sharpened and exaggerated a strong inbred pride. "What, she with all her money, and he with not a penny! He could not do it. If you ever hint at such folly, I shall wish we had never asked her here."

"I shouldn't call it folly, if he loved her and she loved him," cried Emma, spurred on to honest warmth by the thought of her own faithful and honest partner. "But, anyhow, I'll hold my tongue."

And then the traveler came close in sight, and the three ran out to meet her—the same Jessie who had kept house with them in that merry Highland cottage—wandered with them over mountain and moors—shared with them in that terrible home-coming, and in the weeks of agonized search for him who was never found: Jessie, so little changed that at sight of her face the old time came over them like a flood, and they all wept together—those three almost middle-aged women, as if they had been girls still, and all had happened but yesterday.

However, such emotion could not be very lasting: and after a few hours they put aside the unalterable past, and settled down into their present selves. Soon pleasant interests seemed to obliterate those so painful to dwell on. Emma was married—gayly, grandly: and after that, for a week or two longer, Jessie staid on—she seeming happy with them, and they trying their best to make agreeable to her the old-fashioned dreariness of Wyvill Court. Still, in some things it was a trying visit. When people have been parted for six years—moving in totally different spheres, and engrossed with totally distinct interests—a division, wider than either years or distance could effect, often comes between them. In vain the cousins rambled together through Wyvill Woods: gathered primroses and hyacinths, and tried to fancy themselves girls again—it would not do. Life's forward footstep has no returning. A new life may come—far higher than the past—richer, fuller, more heart-sufficing; but the old life comes never again.

It was almost a relief when—rather suddenly at last—Jessie said she must go home, and went: parting from the girls very affectionately: but still making no plans for another meeting—at least not immediately. When she was gone, Richard, who had throughout her whole visit kept himself rather uncomfortably aloof, sank into more than his usual reserve and taciturnity.

One marriage often makes more: and before the summer ended the young parson's best-man came back and courted the pretty bride-maid Jane. Again cousin Jessie insisted on making her wealth common property, and portioning the other sister—"exactly as Maurice would have done if he were here." So she expressed it in her letter, and repeated afterward when she came to Wyvill Court. But her visit this time was brief, embracing only the wedding-day and the day after. She said her "engagements" prevented her longer stay. And, after the first day, Agnes ceased to urge it. With all her sweetness there was about Miss Raeburn a degree of firmness, ill-natured people might say independence of character, which made it perfectly clear that she had, in small things and great, the power of making up her own mind and keeping to it. Besides, Agnes sometimes stealthily watched her brother Richard—his hard, set face; his nervous, restless manner—and she let Jessie Raeburn go.

It was the night after she was gone—the first night the brother and sister had ever spent together, they two alone—that Agnes first ventured, tremblingly, upon a subject which had caused her anxious thought for a long while. She did so with much hesitation—being a good deal afraid of it and of Richard: but any thing was better than suspense. Besides, lately, with her sharpened experience, she had felt so certain of one thing—of two things, bitterly conflicting with one another, and neutralizing any possibility of a happy future, or of matters going on much longer in the way they stood now—that she felt it more than her desire, her absolute duty, to try and speak out.

"Jessie will have about reached Carstairs by this time."

"Yes," said Richard, without looking up from his book.

"She seems extremely well and cheerful; and how young she looked in her bride-maid's dress—almost pretty. Didn't you think so?"

"Yes," reiterated the brother; and vouchsafed no more.

"Richard," said Agnes, repressing a wild spasm at her heart, "I have been thinking—I hope your marriage will be the next in the family. If you could find some nice pretty girl in your own position: neither too rich nor too poor—(though I would rather she were poor than rich: it would be dreadful if any body were to say a Wyvill married for money)—I should be glad, extremely glad, to give up my place here and see the family name kept up, the family happiness complete."

Agnes faltered—stopped; her heart was full. Richard replied not a word.

"I think it is time you married, Richard; I do really. Hitherto I knew you could not afford it; but now there is only me, and I shall cost you very little; I can live any where. You would be perfectly safe, even if Maurice did come back. And oh! Dick, I would so like you to be happy."

She went over and put her arms round his neck, and then all poor Richard's reserve broke down.

He told his sister—to her unutterable pain, grief, almost indignation—ay, even though she had guessed it before, but it looked so much blacker when condensed by his own confession from a cloudy conjecture into an absolute fact—that the only woman in the world who could make him happy was Jessie Raeburn.

"I have been fond of her all my life, and yet I couldn't ask her. Her horrible money!—five thousand a year I think it is. Agnes, I couldn't, you know."

"It is well you did not," said Agnes, sharply and sternly; "for she would never have married you. I am quite sure of that."

"Why not?" cried Dick, who was the sort of man that contradiction rouses always into resistance.

"I don't know—do not look at me so, for indeed I don't; and yet I am sure of it. You will never get her."

"I'll try!" said Richard, hoarsely; and began marching up and down the long, low, dark, oaken room in stronger emotion than Agnes had ever seen in him since the day of his brother's loss. "Upon my life and soul, I'll try!"

And nothing would persuade him otherwise. Agnes talked till near midnight—first persuasively, then contemptuously, then angrily—for her pride was up that any Wyvill, any brother of hers, should ask and be refused, as she felt certain would be the case; but Richard was utterly unmoved. He was determined to start for Glasgow the next morning.

"And if you do you are a fool—a mean-spirited, mercenary fool."

Richard's eyes blazed. "And, Agnes, do you know what you are? A selfish, mischief-making, wicked woman. I will go! though you and I should never see one another's faces again."

With that word he left her and returned not, though Agnes sat waiting a whole hour, and then crept up to her bedroom in an agony of tears.

"Oh, Maurice, Maurice!" she sobbed; and the bright, frank, boyish face of her lost brother came back through the clouds of many years fresh upon her tenacious memory, contrasting with the face of the brother who remained, set in all the hardness of unwonted hard manhood. "If Maurice were only here!"—He might have been: and nearer to her than she knew.

Shortly a light knock came to her door and Richard stood there with all his hardness gone, changed and softened to a degree that seemed almost miraculous.

"Agnes, I want to say good-night to you. There are only us two left now; don't let us quarrel. I must go to Glasgow to-morrow—it's killing me—till I know my fate, one way or another. But don't send me away in anger; don't let us part with an unkind word."

"Oh, Richard! I didn't mean it. Forgive me." And she hung upon his shoulder as she had never done before in all her days. "Do just as you like, and God bless you wherever you go."

CHAPTER V.

MISS RAEURN was sitting alone in the very handsome drawing-room of her very handsome house in Blythswood Square. It was dark, and the fire-light danced on her black velvet dress—she almost always wore black: ill-natured people said, because it made her look so "interesting." But these remarks were always made behind her back, and people well knew she would not have cared one pin, or altered either her mind or her costume one whit, even had she heard them. She had that self-possessed dignity which is very indifferent to public opinion on trivial matters, where indeed public opinion has no right to busy itself at all. She went on her way calmly: accustomed even from her teens to be sole mistress in her uncle's house, where she had now quietly become independent mistress of her own.

Young as she was, she had settled at once into the busy responsible life of a woman of property, who had evidently no intention of changing her condition by marriage. To the natural influence of wealth she added a personal influence very considerable, though exercised in a sweet and womanly way. All Glasgow knew her name well;—in charity, in society, in every good and generous work, Miss Raeburn was always sought for, and always easy to find. And it would be idle to say she did not enjoy her position—she did. A lonely woman must fill her heart and her time with something: Jessie accepted the lot which Providence had assigned to her, and made the best of it; bravely and cheerfully. It had its pleasures. She loved her independence, her power of doing good unquestioned and uncontrolled. Without being in the least ungentele or unlovely, she was already, in a degree, "old-maidish"—that is, she had sufficient strength of character to stand alone. Though barely eight-and-twenty, it never seemed to enter into her own head or that of any one else that she needed either protection or guidance. She was just Miss Raeburn, of Blythswood Square and Woodhouselea; and the idea of her ever becoming Mrs. Anybody seemed far distant, and very improbable, if not quite impossible.

She sat waiting for her carriage to be announced, reading by a small lamp the daily newspaper: until, her eye being caught by the date of it, she laid it down abruptly, and remained with her head sunk between her hands, gazing mournfully into the fire. No wonder, for the paper was dated 1st October: seven years since that first of October when she and her cousins had stood watching for Maurice along the mountain-road, and he never came.

"Seven years." She repeated the words, and then bent down, clasping her hands and stooping her head upon them; low down, as people are prone to do when some heavy wave of misery or sharp recollection breaks over them. "Oh my darling, my darling!"

Not a word more, nor a sob. Years had smoothed down and softened all things, all except the love which was absolute, sole, and undying. Some women have had such loves, quenched so far as earthly fulfillment goes, in earliest girlhood: yet surviving in another form to the very close of life—consecrated by death, or confirmed by total separation into a bond which, in the absence of any other, becomes as strong almost as marriage, being in truth the real marriage of the soul.

It might have been a great mistake—many wise, good, and loving persons may consider it so—that any woman should thus waste her life upon a mere dream: which, if she could have ended it, were far best ended. Yet people are but as they are made: and Jessie could no more have resigned her worshiped ideal of what Maurice was, and what he might have become, to sink to the reality of any of the excellent Glasgow gentlemen whom she was in the habit of meeting; could no more have exchanged that first and last love-kiss—young, passionate, mutual love—for the touch of any mortal lips, than a maid betrothed with all her heart to one man could ever put another man's ring on her finger, or pass as a bride into another man's home. It was not merely unnatural; it was impossible.

Yet no one could call Jessie Raeburn an unhappy or disappointed woman. Hers was no unrequited, misplaced, or unworthy attachment: from first to last it had been wholly sacred and wholly her own. Not one pang of bitterness, or remorse, or humiliation had mingled with its sorrow. Hardly like a regret, though full of the tenderest, most passionate remembrance, were the words, "My darling, my darling!" And then the momentary outburst passed: she sat, quietly and meditatively, waiting for the hour when she had to fulfill her evening engagement. For Miss Raeburn did not shut herself out of the world, but moved therein—playing her part well—yet letting the world peer neither smilingly nor pityingly into her inner life, which was, and ever had been, solely her own.

When the door opened she rose, gathering her rich Indian shawl round her, and moving in her usual composed graceful way across the floor, thinking it was the announcement of her carriage. But it was a visitor so unexpected that she quite started at the sight of him—pale, travel-stained, and agitated Richard Wyvill.

He fixed his eyes upon the little figure before him—the velvet gown, the dainty lace, the glittering diamonds; it had been Uncle Raeburn's delight to load his niece with diamonds. And Richard said, in his roughest manner: "Don't let me intrude. You were going out to dinner?"

"I was, but—oh cousin!" And a sudden agony of expectation, not dulled after even all these expectant years, thrilled through her. "Something has happened? What news do you bring?"

"I bring no news at all—nothing better nor worse than myself," said he, bitterly. "And, if you like, I will go away directly."

"No, no, I could not think of such a thing," she replied, with her hand upon the bell. But on second thought she went and gave her orders herself, thus allowing Richard time to recover his ill mood, and giving a brief minute of solitude to herself. For with a strange recurrence to the ever-abiding thought which underlaid all her life, she had fancied, oh, wild hope! that Richard's sudden apparition might be caused by tidings of Maurice. No, no! Again, for the thousandth time, the vain hope faded, and she said to herself: "It is the will of God."

Ay, it was. Never in our own way, but in His own way, does the Master grant us our heart's desire: and yet still we must "rest in the Lord."

In a few minutes Jessie came back to the drawing-room, cheerful and bright, the white gloves removed and the shawl, though the diamonds still glittered on her neck and in her hair.

"Well, Richard, I don't get a cousin to visit me every day, and so I have sent an apology to the dinner-party; and you and I shall dine together in peace and quietness."

"Thank you. It is very good of you," said Richard, his irritability soothed in spite of himself by her frank, familiar air, though it caused his heart to sink within him. What if his sister should prove right after all?

Still a kind of dogged determination impelled the young man to remain and carry out his intention: to face the worst; which could not be worse than much he had already suffered. But it was hours before he could find courage to say a word beyond the commonplace family talk, the habit of the cousins through so many familiar years. Jessie at last brought her pain upon herself by the sudden and very natural question—

"And now, Richard, tell me what brought you so unexpectedly to Glasgow?"

The moment she had said this she felt her mistake; felt that the crisis, which, with a generous woman's delicate ingenuity, she had contrived to stave off so long, had arrived. She could no longer save either her lover or herself from the half dozen desperate words, which, alas! would break the pleasant bond of a lifetime. For after this poor Richard never could be her cousin any more.

Rejected love is nothing new. Most women have had to inflict it, and most men to suffer it, at least once in their lives. It does to neither any incurable harm—that is, when the misfortune is simply a fatality. Only when a woman has willfully led a man on to love her, and denied him—or when he has swamped his honest dignity of honorable manhood in the ungovernable anguish of balked desire—need there be any irremediable bitterness in such a trial. But in either of these cases both will surely dree their own weird—a very sore one: and they deserve it.

Before Richard had half got out his words, he read his fate in Jessie's eyes. Yet they were very tender eyes—less compassionate than mutely entreating forgiveness, as if she herself must surely have done something wrong. But there was no doubt in them—none of that wavering uncertainty which in this, as in all other things, has destroyed so many a soul. She was perfectly sure of her own mind. She liked him, but she did not love him; and she made him plainly see it, as she had done from the very first. He acknowledged that himself. So, almost before they quite knew what had been said, or answered, the whole thing was over—entirely over and done.

Richard Wyvill was not a pleasant fellow—neither attractive in society nor very lovable in family life; but he was an honest fellow for all that. Deep at the core of his rough Yorkshire nature lay a keen sense of honor, a sound stability and faithfulness, which every one belonging to him was forced to appreciate. Jessie did to the full. And now that his bitter secret was out, the young man, in spite of all his disappointment, felt unconsciously relieved. Though Jessie had refused his love she had not wounded his pride. He saw that he was not degraded in her eyes; nay, more, that with a tenderness second only to the tenderness of love returned did she regard the faithful attachment which had followed her, unspoken, for so many years.

As to the money question, Richard's soreness on this head was forever healed. He felt instinctively that Jessie rejected him simply and solely because she did not love him; that had she loved him she would have thrown her paltry thousands at his feet, saying, "These are nothing—less than nothing—but I am worth a little; take me."

So, strange as it may appear, though he had just staked and lost what he then thought to be the one happiness of his life, the young man was not altogether miserable; for he still could respect himself and her. He neither dashed his hand to his brow and fled, nor fell on his knees in frantic entreaty, nor stamped about in anger, nor did any of the foolish things that young fellows are supposed to do under similar circumstances: he sat in his place, like an honest man who has given the best thing a man can give—his heart's love; which, though not accepted, had been neither mocked, nor trifled with, nor despised.

He was just considering whether he ought not now to depart, when a servant entered the drawing-room with a message. A man—"a Highlander—a wee bit camsteary-looking maunie—was wishing a word with the mistress."

"At this hour? What can he want?" said Miss Raeburn, surprised.

"Shall I go down and see?" asked Richard, perhaps a little glad to resume some shadow of the former familiar cousinly ways.

"Thank you," Jessie answered, glad too.

"He says he'll no speak to onybody but the mistress," interposed the old butler, who looked rather strange and perplexed.

"Then show him up here. My cousin and I will see him together."

The man entered, and hung at the drawing-room door, staring about him with bleary eyes; and when Richard asked him his name, he answered, somewhat hesitatingly, that he was "Diarmid M'Diarmid—Diarmid Beg, ye ken."

"Indeed I don't," Richard was answering sharply, when he saw Jessie spring forward.

"The man—you remember—whom Maurice met, who last saw Maurice."

"Ay, my leddy—just mysel'. And it's about him I come—the puir laddie. Ye'll no hae heard?"

Richard glanced at Jessie, who stood listening with lips apart, white and rigid as a stone statue. At once, by a sort of revelation, he knew why she had never loved him.

For an instant his human nature recoiled, and then the nobler half of the man conquered. To find his rival in his brother—his own dearly beloved and passionately regretted brother—this of all blows would be easiest to bear. Ay, even if Maurice came back and won her.

"What about him—is he alive?"

"Truly I canna weel say," replied the Highlander, "but, I fear me, na. Do ye no ken this, Sir?"

And Diarmid unfolded from out his plaid, slowly, like a fearsome thing that he was half afraid to handle, something—it was not easy at first to detect what, so covered was it with mildew, and damp, and moss. But on closer inspection the cousins recognized it as being a strong tin case, fastening with a spring, which Maurice had had made to contain his botanical or entomological specimens: he was very fond of collecting both. Outside, on a silver plate, he had had engraved—and it was legible still—his name and address: "Maurice Wyvill, Wyvill Court, Yorkshire."

"Where did you find that? Tell us quickly!" cried Richard.

And then M'Diarmid explained—not quickly, but they understood him somehow—that a few days since he had been belated on the mountains, in a spot that was seldom traversed—not once in several years, being very dangerous on account of the numerous holes, fissures in the rocks, narrow chasms so overhung with heather that a man might easily step upon it, and be plunged in a moment to the depths below. He, Diarmid, had done this—only, with the Providence which they say guards drunkards and young children, he had managed to crawl out, bruised and sobered, but still alive.

"It was just the Lord's mercy that I wasna kilt, like mony a better man; for at the bottom I found this, ye ken"—and he pointed to the tin case.

"Any thing else?" asked Richard, in a low, awe-struck voice.

"Banes. A when banes."

So the mystery was cleared up at last; and they knew that in this world they would never see Maurice more.

Jessie and Richard clasped hands and looked at one another, wistfully and long. Then both—the man as well as the woman—lifted up their voices and wept.

After a little while Richard sent Diarmid away down stairs, made Jessie sit down, and, kneeling beside her, opened, in the way they both well remembered, the concealed spring. Inside the case, and from its substantial workmanship most wonderfully preserved, was a little book, which must have been placed there—Maurice must have placed it himself—in the interval between his fall and his dissolution—as the slender and only chance of ever conveying information to his kindred of who he was, or how he died. For, carefully examined, it proved to be a psalm-book of Jessie's, which Jessie well remembered his carrying from church for her that Sunday. One of the mouldy leaves was still turned down at the 121st Psalm:

"I to the hills will lift mine eyes."

He had remembered them, then, in his last hour, and left this token for them, in the only way he could think of. He, the poor boy to whom had come no "aid;" whom "He that keeps Israel" had not kept, but, in the awful mystery of Omnipotent will, had suffered to perish here alone—the handsome, happy, loving, and beloved lad—to be found, after an interval of seven years, "a when banes."

Jessie sat dumb reading and repeating with soundless lips the words of the psalm, which seemed at first such a ghastly mockery. But slowly, with that agony of belief which forces itself upon the heart, not the reason, at an hour like this, when all the anchors of faith seem torn up, and the soul is ready to drift out blindly upon a Godless sea, there came into hers a miraculous comfort—the comfort that, for all they knew, he might also have had, dying forlorn and alone on the bleak mountain side.

And the more she dwelt on it the clearer this comfort grew. If during the few minutes or hours—thank God, they could not have been many!—that elapsed before consciousness left him, Maurice had had strength and courage to do this—to think of them all at home, to send them his last message, as it were—though he died, he had died nobly, calmly, in a manner not unworthy of their Maurice. And though, humanly viewed, it was a death so miserable that they dared not suffer their imaginations to dwell upon it, but passed at once to the thought of Maurice in heaven, with his sufferings ended, his new life begun—still, man's impotence is God's omnipotence. It might have been—and indeed appeared most likely, from the position in which the remains were found—that he died so peacefully that death felt to him no more than falling asleep, with the Everlasting Arms underneath him, and his head pillowed on the bosom of Everlasting Love.

"AND THEN M'DIARMID EXPLAINED," ETC.

Maurice's bones were laid, by common family consent, in a spot not far from the place they were discovered—the little mountain graveyard, where, during that merry month of September, they had all often leaped the low wall, and sat among the long grass, or read the inscriptions on the ancient stones. There, soon afterward, another stone was erected by Jessie Raeburn—she asked permission to do it and Richard allowed her—on which was recorded, in the simple Scotch fashion of kirk-yard memorials, Maurice's name, age, and how he died. Nothing more, except the words—incomprehensible addition to many readers, yet full of peace to her who sometimes sat and read it there—with the grand mountains looking on her, and the sea calm and blue, and the heavens shining overhead—"Psalm 121."

When all this was done Richard went back to his sisters, and they put on quiet mourning for a season. Then quietly still, without any obtrusiveness either of regret or congratulation, Richard Wyvill, Esq., of Wyvill Court, took lawful possession of his ancestral home.

I know it would be more pathetic, more in accordance with the feelings of young and poetic readers, if I were to state that Richard Wyvill never married, but remained all his days faithful to his first disappointed love. But such fidelity is rare in man, and well that it is so. By-and-by, when all hope of Jessie was at an end, Richard found a pretty, merry Yorkshire lass, who loved him—partly because he was so opposite to herself—loved him, and married him, and made him happy; so happy, that he could receive his cousin Jessie as Aunt Jessie in his household, for weeks together, without the slightest pain. And it is thought that some day his eldest son, Maurice Raeburn Wyvill, will inherit all the thousands that Jessie has to leave. For Wyvill Court is full of children, brought up rather differently from what the last generation were, with more of gentleness, less of impatience and rough disputing—in an atmosphere of sweetness and sunshine which, radiating from the elders, flows down to the younger ones, and makes of them, whatever else they may be, a family of love. For, thinking of Maurice, whose story is told from child to child till it becomes like one of the saintly chronicles of old—thinking of poor Uncle Maurice, how could they ever say to one another an unkind word?

WOMAN ON THE FARM.

AS long ago as A.M. 3625 a farmer named Furius Cresinus was accused of magic because he had better crops of corn than his neighbors. When brought to trial he produced, in defense, his well-worn implements and his sunburnt daughters, and declared that to the aid of these mighty sorceries alone he owed his success. In Rome's young days the kitchen-garden was always placed under the care of the mater-familias; and in Sparta, where heroes sprang from mothers no less heroic, the women tilled the land, while their sons and husbands were fighting the battles of their country.

The idea of women working on the farm is, therefore, by no means a new one. From those days to the present women have in various ways assisted in the cultivation of the soil; and the more barbarous nations (even Germany must be so classed in this respect) have availed themselves of such labor to the utmost. Among the North American Indians farming was done almost exclusively by the squaws. They tilled the soil with their rude implements, planted the seed, and gathered the crops; besides felling trees, cutting up the spoils of the hunt, dressing skins, pounding corn, doing the family-cooking, fishing, and embroidery; and oftentimes building the very wigwams for their lords and masters.

Count the women among the field-hands of the South, examine the records of the labor accomplished, and you will find that, taking the average, women stand nearly side by side with the men. Travel through portions of our Western country, and though you will not see the daughters of men turned into beasts of burden, as in some parts of Europe, you will see many a woman guiding the harrow or the plow. Indeed it is common, in some districts, to find the farmers' wives as thoroughly competent, and as conversant with the labor and business of the farm as their husbands.

I allude to these facts simply for the purpose of resisting, at the outset, the one grand clincher that is generally used to strangle each new-born proposition relative to women-farmers—that "they can not do it because they lack the requisite physique." "Fancy a woman," cries some gentle citizen, who never handled a garden tool in his life, "just fancy a woman digging, plowing, carting, pitching hay—why the thing is absurd!"

And yet, my dear, common-sense friend, much as you and I may deprecate the practice, it is exactly these things which thousands of women have done and are doing the world over; and if the custom did not prove profitable, where followed, your own solid wisdom will tell you it would have been abandoned long ago. Many a buxom arm, since the world began, has turned over the heavy soil and prepared it for the seed. Many a jolly farmer's wife is never so much herself as when, with old Dobbin, she chirrup and whips her way to market or mill, her wagon laden with produce which, mayhap, her own busy hands may have gathered. And as for pitching hay, why, one of the prettiest girls I ever saw could never leave home at haying-time, because her father said he couldn't "spare her then no how; for she was worth a brace of his idle boys for mowin' and pitchin'."

Only the other day I asked a farmer, who employs many "hands" during the busy season, which he had found to be the better workmen, the Irish or the German.

"Why, I can't say exactly as to that," he replied; "but I know, for weeding and planting, or even for pitching hay, the best day's work I get is out of Dutch Mary: she's a team, I can tell you."

"Indeed!" said I, highly delighted (for I belong to the persecuted and long-suffering sex); "and pray may I ask what wages you pay her?"

"Ahem!" stammered my friend: "well, the fact is, a woman's a woman."

Not having sufficient argumentative power to dispute this astounding proposition, I simply kept my eye upon him in silence, and he continued, after gracefully wiping his forehead with a bandana handkerchief:

"A woman's a woman, you see, and can't expect man's wages; still I pay her pretty well —pret—ty—well. Have you seen our hot-beds yet?"

"No," I replied, rather sharply. "How much do you pay Dutch Mary?"

"Oh! didn't I tell you?" said he, blushing as much as a man with a naturally red skin can blush. "Well, I give her thirty-eight cents a day."

"Why, Mr. —!" was my involuntary exclamation, "you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

So, of course, he mentally pronounced me to be a disagreeable, unladylike person, and got out of the way as soon as possible.

Not long ago a letter from H. C. Wright, of Pekin, Niagara County, New York, was read at a meeting of the Farmers' Club in New York; and as it bears strong testimony in favor of the present argument, I venture to transcribe a portion of it. Mr. Wright says:

"I am in the family of Marvin and Paulina Roberts, farmers, with three hundred and fifty acres of land, as good as any in the State. There are eight children—seven daughters and one son, the latter nine years old. They have been on this farm two years. . . . Their spring work was begun on the 19th of April; since which time four of the daughters, aged respectively 19, 15, 13, and 11, assisted by a niece aged 17, and by their mother, have accomplished the following labor: i. e., plowed 75 acres, dragged 100 acres three times, sowed broadcast 100, and rolled 100. More plowing has been done, but the above amount of labor has been done exclusively by the mother and the five young daughters. They have now growing 45 acres of wheat, 15 of winter and 30 of spring; 50 acres of oats; 30 acres of flax; and are to put in 10 acres of corn, 10 of beans, 8 of carrots, three-fourths of an acre of onions, and 10 acres of potatoes. To-day I saw one of the daughters, aged thirteen, plowing, holding the plow and driving her own team. During the day she plowed one acre and a half, the usual labor of a day in plowing. Last Saturday I saw two of the girls, one aged seventeen, the other fifteen, sowing wheat, broadcast, and their sowing was done as well as any one would do it. I saw another, aged thirteen, dragging, and another, aged nineteen, rolling, and another piling and burning brush with her father. These daughters have the care of their own teams. One of them, who is seventeen, is detailed to do the house-work this season. She is as good at plowing, sowing, dragging, and rolling as any of them. The house-work is considered by them the hardest and most difficult to perform. They all prefer the outdoor farm-work. . . . During the two years over fifty acres have been cleared of bushes, stumps, and roots, and this has been done mainly by the mother and daughters. I can not now enlarge upon the results of this effort of a woman to train her daughters to be practical farmers, as to their physical, intellectual, or moral development. These speak for themselves. No one who knows the family, and the facts connected with their efforts to point out the way to woman to an independent, honest, and honorable subsistence, can have any misgivings as to what those results will be. They will be good, and only good. Already the example of this mother and daughters most beneficially affects the region around them."

Last spring a friend bought a country place near Elizabeth, New Jersey. The house was new and fine, but the bare, stony, and uncultivated grounds about it forbade the thought of his family finding a home there, even for a summer, until something in the way of improvement should be accomplished. What did he do? Send a surveyor and half a dozen gardeners to the spot forthwith? No: his daughter, a young and lovely girl, went there, taking with her a strong-armed workman, and directing all her energies to the task, in time caused the spot to blossom as the rose. The land was cleared, tastefully laid out in wide graceful paths, and flower-studded bits of green, relieved by well-chosen shrubs; while further from the house orderly rows of "highly respectable" vegetables engaged to make themselves "generally useful" to the family during the approaching summer.

I saw the young lady not long afterward, and hardly knew which to admire most, her musical skill or her agricultural achievements, her ladylike, gentle bearing or the energy that had enabled her to trudge about amidst the dirt and stones, superintending Pat's labors, and making things presentable generally.

During a recent conversation with an officer of one of the prominent horticultural societies of our country (late its president, and himself an authority in all horticultural and floricultural matters) the subject of rural effects came under discussion.

"The finest specimen of landscape-gardening I have ever seen in this country," he remarked, "is the modest little country seat belonging to Mrs. J——, of Pennsylvania; that is, where the art, while availed of to the utmost, is yet rendered less apparent. She is an enthusiastic admirer of Downing, and probably followed his ideas in some particulars; yet the designing and general arrangement are all her own. There is no twisting nor straining of nature, no artificial hillock constructed for the evident purpose of winding a road over it, no crude attempt at startling effect: simply an appreciative adaptation of art to the natural configuration of the land; and the effect is truly charming."

When Lafayette visited the mother of Washington at Fredericksburg he found her busily engaged in weeding her flower-garden. Many another woman whom the world reveres has grown lovelier and purer while engaged in simple out-of-door work; and many a one, going further, with new strength born of sorrow, has carried on a farm after her husband's death, and managed its affairs with prudence and ability.

From the earliest period in the annals of our race woman has aided, not only by her labor, but by her counsel, in the cause of Agriculture. To an Empress of China we are indebted for the mulberry-tree and the rearing of silk-worms; and, according to a recent writer, "the laws which Osiris gave to Egypt were not as valuable to that country as those precepts in agriculture, those instructions in embankments, irrigation, and draining, which Isis, his Queen, gave to the Egyptians, and which enabled them to derive so much benefit from the deposits of the Nile."

To return: woman can do farm-work, for she has done it, and is doing it still in nearly every part of the world. Granted that she does it at a heavy cost, for extreme physical labor is a destroyer of beauty and the finer powers of thought with either sex; still, we must remember that in most cases the alternative would not be repose, but either pinching want or uncongenial work of some kind. Woman, however, is especially adapted to the lighter branches of agriculture, and while her "big brother" has stronger muscles and a harder frame than she, it is undesirable that she should devote herself to the heavy manual labors of the farm. Besides, American women (simply through generations of inactivity and too luxurious living, and not because God meant them to be so) are not so well fitted for severe work as the German or Indian women are, though there are many of them that can do it, if they must or wish to (I insist upon that). Why, then, bring forward the "clinch" as an invariable answer to every query concerning woman on the farm? Does every male farmer spend his strength in manual labor, or does he hire sinewy arms to do the needed work? Does he employ great, stout men to pick his small fruits, or does he select those whom he knows are better suited to the task, because their touch is less rough, and their movements more nimble? Can not women do all such work better than men? In short, can they not take part in one-half, nay, two-thirds of the labor of the farm—planting, trimming, grafting, gathering, tying up bushes, training vines, weeding, drilling, designing, and a hundred other things besides? Are not these labors less exhausting than the washing, ironing, cooking, and sewing, which so many women must and do accept as their appointed work in life?

I say yes. And far more potent voices than mine say "yes" again and again; for they come from women who practice what they preach (which, entre-nous, I don't, always). Cheering affirmatives come from Paulina Roberts and her daughters, and from those two stout-hearted ladies who did so well on their "farm of four acres;" they come from that woman (I forget her name) who made a fortune within a few years on her own farm out West; they come from the dozens of women farmers who have told their noble experiences to the world through the Englishwoman's Journal; and they come from just such a one as I have in my mind now—a brave, beautiful woman, who, wishing to earn an honorable livelihood, accepted the position of overseer on a gentlemen's farm not fifty miles from New York.

In the first place, she planned and superintended the arrangement of his grounds, and he paid her for it. She "studied up" on barns, advised him as to the proper construction of his own, and took honest pay for her knowledge. She attended to the thorough under-draining of his land, the rotation of his crops, the improvement of his wood, the preparation of his lawns; in fact, is head and hands for him, as far as his place is concerned, and makes her honest living by that same. She is a superb horse-woman, and every morning rides over the grounds and gives her directions to the workmen. At stated periods she pays them their wages, and (wonderful to relate!) keeps a clear, unblotted record of her expenditures, and is in every way a faithful steward to her employer.

Yet this woman makes no noise in the world; is not "strong-minded," in the offensive sense of the term; has lost none of her feminine delicacy; and half of her friends do not know what her real business is. They only know that she lives in the country, and is very active and much interested in outdoor affairs; that she loves nature, and, above all, has the brightest eyes and rosiest cheeks in the world.

It must be admitted that such cases are rare in this country; but in Great Britain it is not uncommon for women to take charge of a farm and conduct it successfully. In England ladies take pride in a knowledge of agricultural matters, and attend meetings and shows, and in so doing their influence is admitted to be beneficial.

An American gentleman, lately traveling in England, was surprised at the interest manifested by women of all ranks in agriculture. The Duchess of Portsmouth, whom he visited, evinced perfect familiarity with the minutest details of farm management, and while showing her American guest over the Duke's large estate, explained to him all the various processes of cultivation employed.

"There are those, we fear," says Mr. Downing in his Essay on Feminine Taste in Rural Affairs, "who fancy that there is something rustic, unfeminine, and unrefined about an interest in country out-of-door matters. Would we could present to them a picture which rises in our memory at this moment, as the finest of all possible denials to such a theory. In the midst of the richest agricultural region in the Northern States lives a lady, a young unmarried lady; mistress of herself, of some thousands of acres of the finest lands, of a mansion which is almost the ideal of taste and refinement. Very well. Does the lady sit in her drawing-room all day to receive visitors? By no means. You will find her in the morning on horseback, or driving a light carriage with a pair of spirited horses. She explores every corner of the estate; she visits her tenants, examines the crops, projects improvements, directs repairs, and is thoroughly mistress of her whole estate. Her mansion opens into the most exquisite garden of fruits and flowers, every one of which she knows by heart. And yet this lady, so energetic and spirited in her enjoyment and management in out-of-door matters, is, in the drawing-room, the most gentle, the most retiring, the most modest of her sex."

In brief, it is now an established fact that women may take an active interest in agriculture, may pursue the art for a living, without being precisely like Tennyson's

"Eight daughters of the plow, stronger than men,
Huge women, blouzed with health, and wind, and rain,
And labor."

So, my dear lady readers, take courage. If you are poor, and believe with Dr. Johnson's friend, that you "must live," and you like agriculture in the abstract, don't be afraid to undertake it practically. There is land enough "out West," if you can not afford it nearer home; or, if you already live in the West, and by a strange law of human nature think you must move somewhere else to find your golden gain, why, come East. There is work for you here. Try it alone, or club together, half a dozen of you, and show the folks that the thing can be done. Study the subject thoroughly; expect to meet and to conquer difficulties; don't undertake too much at first, and don't gossip about each other—and you will succeed. The preserving and 'canning' of certain fruits and vegetables comprises an extended field of labor in itself, and is freely open to you.

You can cultivate grapes exclusively, and help the light wine temperance cause, or you can raise any of the small fruits, or dwarf pears and apples, flower seeds, choice plants, sorghum—any thing, in short, that you choose.

Go to work with stout hearts, clear heads, and steady hands, and join the van.

Then in time the wail of that ceaseless chorus,
"Stitch! Stitch! Stitch!"

may die away; and more fearful sounds may also be stilled—the sobs of those who, weary and despairing, spurned by man and, oh! more than all, by woman, have been driven to that which their souls loathe for the sake of bread.

When to that wild cry of thousands of homeless women, "Work! Work! give us work!" comes back the echo WORK—not in a weird whisper from the world's hollow places, but in a practical shape—the women farmers may feel that their labors have not been solely for themselves, nor in vain.

Heaven speed the day!

DENIS DUVAL.

BY WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

CHAPTER VIII.

DENIS AT SEA.

I PROMISE you there was no doubt or hesitation next Sunday regarding our good rector's opinions. Ever since the war with America began, he had, to the best of his power, exhorted his people to be loyal, and testified to the authority of Cæsar. "War," he taught, "is not altogether an evil; and ordained of Heaven, as our illnesses and fevers doubtless are, for our good. It teaches obedience and contentment under privations; it fortifies courage; it tests loyalty; it gives occasion for showing mercifulness of heart; moderation in victory; endurance and cheerfulness under defeat. The brave who do battle victoriously in their country's cause leave a legacy of honor to their children. We English of the present day are the better for Crecy, and Agincourt, and Blenheim. I do not grudge the Scots their day of Bannockburn, nor the French their Fontenoy. Such valor proves the manhood of nations. When we have conquered the American rebellion, as I have no doubt we shall do, I trust it will be found that these rebellious children of ours have comported themselves in a manner becoming our English race, that they have been hardy and resolute, merciful and moderate. In that Declaration of War against France, which has just reached us, and which interests all England, and the men of this coast especially, I have no more doubt in my mind that the right is on our side than I have that Queen Elizabeth had a right to resist the Spanish Armada. In an hour of almost equal peril, I pray we may show the same watchfulness, constancy, and valor; bracing ourselves to do the duty before us, and leaving the issue to the Giver of all Victory."

Ere he left the pulpit our good rector announced that he would call a meeting for next market-day in our town-hall—a meeting of gentry, farmers, and sea-faring men to devise means for the defense of our coast and harbors. The French might be upon us any day; and all our people were in a buzz of excitement, Volunteers and Fencibles patrolling our shores, and fishermen's glasses forever on the look-out toward the opposite coast.

We had a great meeting in the town-hall, and of the speakers it was who should be most loyal to king and country. Subscriptions for a Defense Fund were straightway set afoot. It was determined the Cinque Port towns should raise a regiment of Fencibles. In Winchelsea alone the gentry and chief tradesmen agreed to raise a troop of volunteer horse to patrol along the shore and communicate with dépôts of the regular military formed at Dover, Hastings, and Deal. The fishermen were enrolled to serve as coast and look-out men. From Margate to Folkestone the coast was watched and patrolled: and privateers were equipped and sent to sea from many of the ports along our line. On the French shore we heard of similar warlike preparations. The fishermen on either coast did not harm each other as yet, though presently they too fell to blows: and I have sad reason to know that a certain ancestor of mine did not altogether leave off his relations with his French friends.

However, at the meeting in the town-hall grandfather came forward with a subscription and a long speech. He said that he and his coreligionists and countrymen of France had now for near a century experienced British hospitality and freedom, that when driven from home by Papist persecution, they had found protection here, and that now was the time for French Protestants to show that they were grateful and faithful subjects of King George. Grandfather's speech was very warmly received; that old man had lungs, and a knack of speaking, which never failed him. He could spin out sentences by the yard, as I knew, who had heard him expound for half hours together with that droning voice which had long ceased (Heaven help me!) to carry conviction to the heart of grandfather's graceless grandson.

When he had done, Mr. Joseph Weston, of the Priory, spoke, and with a good spirit too. (He and my dear friend, Mr. Sam, were both present, and seated with the gentlefolks and magistrates at the raised end of the hall.) Mr. James said that as Mr. Duval had spoken for the French Protestants, he, for his part, could vouch for the loyalty of another body of men, the Roman Catholics of England. In the hour of danger he trusted that he and his brethren were as good subjects as any Protestants in the realm. And as a trifling test of his loyalty—though he believed his neighbor Duval was a richer man than himself (grandfather shrieked a “No, no!” and there was a roar of laughter in the hall)—he offered as a contribution to a defense fund to lay down two guineas for Mr. Duval's one!

“I will give my guinea, I am sure,” says grandfather, very meekly; “and may that poor man's mite be accepted and useful!”

“One guinea!” roars Weston; “I will give a hundred guineas!”

“And I another hundred,” says his brother. “We shall show, as Roman Catholic gentry of England, that we are not inferior in loyalty to our Protestant brethren.”

“Put my fazer-in-law, Peter Duval, down for one 'ondred guinea!” calls out my mother, in her deep voice. “Put me down for twenty-five guinea, and my son Denis for twenty-five guinea! We have eaten of English bread and we are grateful, and we sing with all our hearts God save King George!”

Mother's speech was received with great applause. Farmers, gentry, shop-keepers, rich and poor, crowded forward to offer their subscription. Before the meeting broke up a very handsome sum was promised for the arming and equipment of the Winchelsea Fencibles; and old Colonel Evans, who had been present at Minden and Fontenoy, and young Mr. Barlow, who had lost a leg at Brandywine, said that they would superintend the drilling of the Winchelsea Fencibles, until such time as his Majesty should send officers of his own to command the corps. It was agreed that every body spoke and acted with public spirit. “Let the French land!” was our cry. “The men of Rye, the men of Winchelsea, the men of Hastings, will have a guard of honor to receive them on the shore!”

That the French intended to try and land was an opinion pretty general among us, especially when his Majesty's proclamation came, announcing the great naval and military armaments which the enemy was preparing. We had certain communications with Boulogne, Calais, and Dunkirk still, and our fishing boats sometimes went as far as Ostend, which then belonged to the Emperor. Our informants brought us full news of all that was going on in those ports; of the troops assembled there, and royal French ships and privateers fitted out. I was not much surprised one night to find our old Boulogne ally Bidois smoking his pipe with grandfather in the kitchen, and regaling himself with a glass of his own brandy, which I know had not paid unto Cæsar Cæsar's due. The pigeons on the hill were making their journeys still. Once, when I went up to visit Farmer Perreau, I found M. de la Motte and a companion of his sending off one of these birds, and Lamotte's friend said, sulkily, in German, “What does the little Spitzbube do here?” “Versteht vielleicht Deutsch,” murmured La Motte, hurriedly, and turned round to me with a grin of welcome, and asked news of grandfather and my mother.

This ally of the chevalier's was a Lieutenant Lütterloh, who had served in America in one of the Hessian regiments on our side, and who was now pretty often in Winchelsea, where he talked magnificently about war and his own achievements, both on the Continent and in our American provinces. He lived near Canterbury as I heard. I guessed, of course, that he was one of the “Mackerel” party, and engaged in smuggling, like Lamotte, the Westons, and my graceless old grandfather and his ally, Mr. Rudge, of Rye. I shall have presently to tell how bitterly Monsieur de la Motte had afterward to rue his acquaintance with this German.

Knowing the chevalier's intimacy with the gentlemen connected with the mackerel fishery, I had little cause to be surprised at seeing him and the German captain together; though a circumstance now arose, which might have induced me to suppose him engaged in practices yet more lawless and dangerous than smuggling. I was walking up to the hill—must I let slip the whole truth, madam, in my memoirs? Well, it never did or will hurt any body; and, as it only concerns you and me, may be told without fear. I frequently, I say, walked up the hill to look at these pigeons, for a certain young person was a great lover of pigeons, too, and occasionally would come to see Farmer Perreau's columbarium. Did I love the sight of this dear white dove more than any other? Did it come sometimes fluttering to my heart? Ah! the old blood throbs there with the mere recollection. I feel—shall we say how many years younger, my dear? In fine, those little walks to the pigeon-house are among the sweetest of all our stores of memories.

I was coming away, then, once from this house of billing and cooing, when I chanced to espy an old school-mate, Thomas Measom by name, who was exceedingly proud of his new uniform as a private of our regiment of Winchelsea Fencibles, was never tired of wearing it, and always walked out with his firelock over his shoulder. As I came up to Tom he had just discharged his piece and hit his bird too. One of Farmer Perreau's pigeons lay dead at Tom's feet, one of the carrier pigeons, and the young fellow was rather scared at what he had done, especially when he saw a little piece of paper tied under the wing of the slain bird.

He could not read the message, which was written in our German handwriting, and was only in three lines, which I was better able to decipher than Tom. I supposed at first that the message had to do with the smuggling business, in which so many of our friends were engaged, and Measom walked off rather hurriedly, being by no means anxious to fall into the farmer's hands, who would be but ill-pleased at having one of his birds killed.

I put the paper in my pocket, not telling Tom what I thought about the matter; but I did have a thought, and determined to commence with my dear Doctor Barnard regarding it. I asked to see him at the Rectory, and there read to him the contents of the paper which the poor messenger was bearing when Tom's ball brought him down.

My good doctor was not a little excited and pleased when I interpreted the pigeon's message to him, and especially praised me for my reticence with Tom upon the subject. "It may be a mare's nest we have discovered, Denny, my boy," says the doctor; "it may be a matter of importance. I will see Colonel Evans on this subject to-night." We went off to Mr. Evans's lodgings; he was the old officer who had fought under the Duke of Cumberland, and was, like the doctor, a justice of peace for our county. I translated for the colonel the paper, which was to the following effect:

[The paper is wanting.]

Mr. Evans looked at a paper before him, containing an authorized list of the troops at the various Cinque Port stations, and found the poor pigeon's information quite correct. Was this the chevalier's writing? the gentleman asked. No, I did not think it was M. de la Motte's handwriting. Then I mentioned the other German in whose company I had seen M. de la Motte. The Monsieur Lütterloh, whom Mr. Evans said he knew quite well. "If Lütterloh is engaged in the business," said Mr. Evans, "we shall know more about it;" and he whispered something to Doctor Barnard. Meanwhile he praised me exceedingly for my caution, enjoined me to say nothing regarding the matter, and to tell my comrade to hold his tongue.

As for Tom Measom he was less cautious. Tom talked about his adventure to one or two cronies; and to his parents, who were tradesmen like my own. They occupied a snug house in Winchelsea, with a garden and a good paddock. One day their horse was found dead in the stable. Another day their cow burst and died. There used to be strange acts of revenge perpetrated in those days; and farmers, tradesmen, or gentry, who rendered themselves obnoxious to certain parties, had often to rue the enmity which they provoked. That my unhappy old grandfather was, and remained in the smugglers' league, I fear, is a fact which I can't deny or palliate. He paid a heavy penalty to be sure; but my narrative is not advanced far enough to allow of my telling how the old man was visited for his sins.

There came to visit our Winchelsea magistrates Captain Pearson, of the Lynx frigate, then in the Downs; and I remembered this gentleman, having seen him at the house of my kind patron, Sir Peter Denis, in London. Mr. Pearson also recollected me as the little boy who had shot the highwayman; and was much interested when he heard of the carrier pigeon, and the news which he bore. It appeared that he, as well as Colonel Evans, were acquainted with Mr. Lütterloh. "You are a good lad," the captain said; "but we know," said the captain, "all the news those birds carry."

At this time our whole coast was alarmed, and hourly expectant of a French invasion. The French fleet was said to outnumber ours in the Channel: the French army, we knew, was enormously superior to our own. I can remember the terror and the excitement; the panic of some, the braggart behavior of others; and specially I recall the way in which our church was cleared, one Sunday, by a rumor which ran through the pews that the French were actually landed. How the people rushed away from the building, and some of them whom I remember the loudest among the braggarts, and singing their "Come if you dare!" Mother and I in our pew, and Captain Pearson in the rector's, were the only people who sate out the sermon, of which Doctor Barnard would not abridge a line, and which, I own, I thought was extremely tantalizing and provoking. He gave the blessing with more than ordinary slowness and solemnity; and had to open his own pulpit-door and stalk down the steps without the accompaniment of his usual escort, the clerk, who had skipped out of his desk and run away like the rest of the congregation. Doctor Barnard had me home to dinner at the Rectory; my good mother being much too shrewd to be jealous of this kindness shown to me and not to her. When she waited upon Mrs. Barnard with her basket of laces and perfumeries, mother stood as became her station as a tradeswoman. "For thee, my son, 'tis different," she said. "I will have thee be a gentleman:" and faith, I hope I have done the best of my humble endeavor to fulfill the good lady's wish.

The war, the probable descent of the French, and the means of resisting the invasion, of course, formed the subject of the gentlemen's conversation; and though I did not understand all that passed, I was made to comprehend subsequently, and may as well mention facts here which only came to be explained to me later. The pigeons took over certain information to France in return for that which they brought. By these and other messengers our Government was kept quite well instructed as to the designs and preparations of the enemy, and I remember how it was stated that his Majesty had occult correspondents of his own in France, whose information was of surprising accuracy. Master Lütterloh dabbled in the information line. He had been a soldier in America, a recruiting crimp here, and I know not what besides; but the information he gave was given under the authority of his employers, to whom in return he communicated the information he received from France. The worthy gentleman was, in fact, a spy by trade; and though he was not born to be hanged, came by an awful payment for his treachery, as I shall have to tell in due time. As for M. de la Motte the gentlemen were inclined to think that his occupation was smuggling, not treason, and in that business the chevalier was allied with scores, nay hundreds, of people round about him. One I knew, my pious grandpapa: other two lived at the Priory, and I could count many more even in our small town, namely, all the mackerel men to whom I had been sent on the night of poor Madame de Saverne's funeral.

Captain Pearson shook me by the hand very warmly when I rose to go home, and I saw, by the way in which the good doctor regarded me, that he was meditating some special kindness in my behalf. It came very soon, and at a moment when I was plunged in the very dismalest depths of despair. My dear little Agnes, though a boarder at the house of those odious Westons, had leave given to her to visit Mrs. Barnard; and that kind lady never failed to give me some signal by which I knew that my little sweet-heart was at the Rectory. One day the message would be, "The rector wants back his volume of the Arabian Nights, and Denis had better bring it." Another time, my dearest Mrs. Barnard would write on a card, "You may come to tea, if you have done your mathematics well;" or, "You may have a French lesson," and so forth: and there, sure enough, would be my sweet little tutoress. How old, my dear, was Juliet when she and young Capulet began their loves? My sweet-heart had not done playing with dolls when our little passion began to bud: and the sweet talisman of innocence I wore in my heart hath never left me through life, and shielded me from many a temptation.

Shall I make a clean breast of it? We young hypocrites used to write each other little notes, and pop them in certain cunning corners known to us two. Juliet used to write in a great round hand in French; Romeo replied, I dare say, with doubtful spelling.

We had devised sundry queer receptacles where our letters lay poste restante. There was the China pot-pourri jar on the Japan cabinet in the drawing-room. There, into the midst of the roses and spices, two cunning young people used to thrust their hands, and stir about spice and rose-leaves, until they lighted upon a little bit of folded paper more fragrant and precious than all your flowers and cloves. Then in the hall we had a famous post-office, namely, the barrel of the great blunderbuss over the mantle-piece, from which hung a ticket on which "loaded" was written, only I knew better, having helped Martin, the doctor's man, to clean the gun. Then in the church-yard, under the wing of the left cherub on Sir Jasper Billing's tomb, there was a certain hole in which we put little scraps of paper written in a cipher devised by ourselves, and on these scraps of paper we wrote: well, can you guess what? We wrote the old song which young people have sung ever since singing began. We wrote "amo, amas," etc., in our childish handwriting. Ah! thanks be to Heaven, though the hands tremble a little now they write the words still! My dear, the last time I was in Winchelsea I went and looked at Sir Jasper's tomb, and at the hole under the cherub's wing; there was only a little mould and moss there. Mrs. Barnard found and read one or more of these letters, as the dear lady told me afterward, but there was no harm in them; and when the doctor put on his grand sérieux (as to be sure he had a right to do), and was for giving the culprits a scolding, his wife reminded him of a time when he was captain of Harrow School, and found time to write other exercises than Greek and Latin to a young lady who lived in the village. Of these matters, I say, she told me in later days: in all days, after our acquaintance began, she was my truest friend and protectress.

But this dearest and happiest season of my life (for so I think it, though I am at this moment happy, most happy, and thankful) was to come to an abrupt ending, and poor Humpty Dumpty having climbed the wall of bliss, was to have a great and sudden fall, which, for a while, perfectly crushed and bewildered him. I have said what harm came to my companion Tom Measom for meddling in Monsieur Lütterloh's affairs and talking of them. Now, there were two who knew Meinherr's secret, Tom Measom, namely, and Denis Duval; and though Denis held his tongue about the matter, except in conversing with the Rector and Captain Pearson, Lütterloh came to know that I had read and explained the pigeon-dispatch of which Measom had shot the bearer; and, indeed, it was Captain Pearson himself, with whom the German had sundry private dealings, who was Lütterloh's informer. Lütterloh's rage, and that of his accomplice, against me, when they learned the unlucky part I had had in the discovery, were still greater than their wrath against Measom. The Chevalier de la Motte, who had once been neutral and even kind to me, was confirmed in a steady hatred against me, and held me as an enemy whom he was determined to get out of his way. And hence came that catastrophe which precipitated Humpty Dumpty Duval, Esq., off the wall from which he was gazing at his beloved, as she disported in her garden below.

One evening—shall I ever forget that evening? It was Friday—

[Left blank by Mr. Thackeray]—after my little maiden had been taking tea with Mrs. Barnard, I had leave to escort her to her home at Mr. Weston's at the Priory, which is not a hundred yards from the Rectory door. All the evening the company had been talking about battle, and danger, and invasion, and the war news from France and America; and my little maiden sate silent, with her great eyes looking at one speaker and another, and stitching at her sampler. At length the clock tolled the hour of nine, when Miss Agnes must return to her guardian. I had the honor to serve as her escort, and would have wished the journey to be ten times as long as that brief one between the two houses. "Good-night, Agnes!" "Good-night, Denis! On Sunday I shall see you!" We whisper one little minute under the stars; the little hand lingers in mine with a soft pressure; we hear the servants' footsteps over the marble floor within, and I am gone. Somehow, at night and 'at morning, at lessons and play, I was always thinking about this little maid.

"I shall see you on Sunday;" and this was Friday! Even that interval seemed long to me. Little did either of us know what a long separation was before us, and what strange changes, dangers, adventures I was to undergo ere I again should press that dearest hand.

The gate closed on her, and I walked away by the church-wall, and toward my own home. I was thinking of that happy, that unforgotten night of my childhood, when I had been the means of rescuing the dearest little maiden from an awful death; how, since then, I had cherished her with my love of love; and what a blessing she had been to my young life. For many years she was its only cheerer and companion. At home I had food and shelter, and, from mother at least, kindness, but no society; it was not until I became a familiar of the good doctor's roof that I knew friendship and kind companionship. What gratitude ought I not to feel for a boon so precious as there was conferred on me? Ah, I vowed, I prayed, that I might make myself worthy of such friends; and so was sauntering homeward, lost in these happy thoughts, when—when something occurred which at once decided the whole course of my after-life.

This something was a blow with a bludgeon across my ear and temple which sent me to the ground utterly insensible. I remember half a dozen men darkling in an alley by which I had to pass, then a scuffle and an oath or two, and a voice crying, "Give it him, curse him!" and then I was down on the pavement as flat and lifeless as the flags on which I lay. When I woke up I was almost blinded with blood, I was in a covered cart with a few more groaning wretches; and when I uttered a moan, a brutal voice growled out with many oaths an instant order to be silent, or my head should be broken again. I woke up in a ghastly pain and perplexity, but presently fainted once more. When I awoke again to a half-consciousness I felt myself being lifted from the cart and carried, and then flung into the bows of a boat, where I suppose I was joined by the rest of the dismal cart's company. Then some one came and washed my bleeding head with salt-water (which made it throb and ache very cruelly). Then the man, whispering "I'm a friend," bound my forehead tight with a handkerchief, and the boat pulled out to a brig that was lying as near to land as she could come, and the same man who had struck and sworn at me would have stabbed me once more as I reeled up the side, but that my friend interposed in my behalf. It was Tom Hookham to whose family I had given the three guineas, and who assuredly saved my life on that day, for the villain who attempted it afterward confessed that he intended to do me an injury. I was thrust into the forepeak with three or four more maimed and groaning wretches, and the wind serving, the lugger made for her destination, whatever that might be. What a horrid night of fever and pain it was! I remember I fancied I was carrying Agnes out of the water; I called out her name repeatedly, as Tom Hookham informed me, who came with a lantern, and looked at us poor wretches huddled in our shed. Tom brought me more water, and in pain and fever I slept through a wretched night.

In the morning our tender came up with a frigate that was lying off a town, and I was carried up the ship's side on Hookham's arm. The captain's boat happened to pull from shore at the very same time, and the captain and his friends, and our wretched party of pressed men with their captors, thus stood face to face. My wonder and delight were not a little aroused when I saw the captain was no other than my dear rector's friend, Captain Pearson. My face was bound up, and so pale and bloody as to be scarcely recognizable. "So, my man," he said, rather sternly, "you have been for fighting, have you? This comes of resisting men employed on his Majesty's service."

"I never resisted," I said; "I was struck from behind, Captain Pearson."

The captain looked at me with a haughty, surprised air. Indeed a more disreputable-looking lad he scarcely could see. After a moment he said, "Why, bless my soul, is it you, my boy? Is it young Duval?"

"Yes, Sir," I said, and whether from emotion, or fever, or loss of blood and weakness, I felt my brain going again, and once more fainted and fell.

When I came to myself I found myself in a berth in the Serapis, where there happened to be but one other patient. I had had fever and delirium for a day, during which it appears I was constantly calling out "Agnes, Agnes!" and offering to shoot highwaymen. A very kind surgeon's mate had charge of me, and showed me much more attention than a poor wounded lad could have had a right to expect in my wretched, humiliating position. On the fifth day I was well again, though still very weak and pale; but not too weak to be unable to go to the captain when he sent for me to his cabin. My friend the surgeon's mate showed me the way.

Captain Pearson was writing at his table, but sent away his secretary; and when the latter was gone shook hands with me very kindly, and talked unreservedly about the strange accident which had brought me on board his ship. His officer had information, he said, "and I had information," the captain went on to say, "that some very good seamen of what we called the Mackerel party were to be taken at a public house in Winchelsea, and his officer netted a half dozen of them there, who will be much better employed" (says Captain Pearson) "in serving the King in one of his Majesty's vessels than in cheating him on board their own. You were a stray fish that was caught along with the rest. I know your story. I have talked it over with our good friends at the Rectory. For a young fellow, you have managed to make yourself some queer enemies in your native town; and you are best out of it. On the night when I first saw you I promised our friends to take you as a first-class volunteer. In due time you will pass your examination and be rated as a midshipman. Stay—your mother is in Deal. You can go ashore, and she will fit you out. Here are letters for you. I wrote to Doctor Barnard as soon as I found who you were."

With this I took leave of my good patron and captain, and ran off to read my two letters. One from Mrs. Barnard and the doctor conjointly, told how alarmed they had been at my being lost, until Captain Pearson wrote to say how I had been found. The letter from my good mother informed me, in her rough way, how she was waiting at the Blue Anchor Inn in Deal, and would have come to me; but my new comrades would laugh at a rough old woman coming off in a shore boat to look after her boy. It was better that I should go to her at Deal, where I should be fitted out in a way becoming an officer in his Majesty's service. To Deal accordingly I went by the next boat; the good-natured surgeon's mate, who had attended me and taken a fancy to me, lending me a clean shirt, and covering the wound on my head neatly so that it was scarcely seen under my black hair. Le pauvre cher enfant! comme il est pâle! How my mother's eyes kindled with kindness as she saw me! The good soul insisted on dressing my hair with her own hands, and tied it in a smart queue with a black ribbon. Then she took me off to a tailor in the town, and provided me with an outfit a lord's son might have brought on board; and when she saw me dressed in my midshipman's uniform, she put such a great heavy purse of guineas into my pocket that I wondered at her bounty. I suppose I cocked my hat and strutted very consequentially by her side on the Mall. She had two or three friends, tradesfolk like herself, and partners no doubt in certain dubious maritime transactions at which I have hinted; but these she did not care to visit. "Remember, my son," said she, "thou art a gentleman now. Trades-people are no company for thee. For me 'tis different. I am but a poor hair-dresser and shop-keeper." And such of her acquaintance as she met she saluted with great dignity, but never offered to present me to one of them. We supped together at the Anchor, and talked about home, that was but two days off, and yet so distant. She never once mentioned my little maiden to me, nor did I somehow dare to allude to her. Mother had prepared a nice bedroom for me at the inn, to which she made me retire early, as I was still weak and faint after my fever; and when I was in my bed she came and knelt down by it, and with tears rolling down her furrowed face offered up a prayer in her native German language, that He who had been pleased to succor me from perils hitherto would guard me for the future, and watch over me in the voyage of life which was now about to begin. Now, as it is drawing to its close, I look back at it with an immense awe and thankfulness for the strange dangers from which I have escaped, the great blessings I have enjoyed.

I wrote a long letter to Mrs. Barnard, narrating my adventures as cheerfully as I could, though, truth to say, when I thought of home and a little Someone there, a large tear or two blotted my paper; but I had reason to be grateful for the kindness I had received, and was not a little elated at being actually a gentleman, and in a fair way to be an officer in his Majesty's navy. My uniforms were ready in a very short time. Twenty-four hours after they were ordered Mr. Levy brought them to our inn, and I had the pleasure of putting them on; and walked on the Parade, with my hat cocked, my hanger by my side, and mother on my arm. Though I was perfectly well pleased with myself, I think she was the prouder of the two. To one or two tradesmen and their wives, whom she knew, she gave a most dignified nod of recognition this day, but passed on without speaking, as if she would have them understand that they ought to keep their distance when she was in such fine company. "Always respect yourself, my son," she said. "When I am in the shop I am in the shop, and my customers' very humble servant; but when I am walking on Deal Parade with thee I am walking with a young gentleman in his Majesty's navy. And Heaven has blessed us of late, my child, and thou shalt have the means of making as good a figure as any young officer in the service."

As I was strutting on the Mall, on the second day of my visit to Deal, what should I see but my dear Doctor Barnard's well-known post-chaise nearing us from the Dover Road? The doctor and his wife looked with a smiling surprise at my altered appearance; and as they stepped out of their chaise at the inn the good lady fairly put her arms round me and gave me a kiss. Mother, from her room, saw the embrace, I suppose. "Thou hast found good friends there, Denis, my son," she said, with sadness in her deep voice. "'Tis well. They can befriend thee better than I can. Now thou art well, I may depart in peace. When thou art ill the old mother will come to thee, and will bless thee always, my son." She insisted upon setting out on her return homeward that afternoon. She had friends at Hythe, Folkestone, and Dover (as I knew well), and would put up with one or other of them. She had before packed my new chest with wonderful neatness. Whatever her feelings might be at our parting, she showed no signs of tears or sorrow, but mounted her little chaise in the inn yard, and, without looking back, drove away on her solitary journey. The landlord of the Anchor and his wife bade her farewell very cordially and respectfully. They asked me, would I not step into the bar and take a glass of wine or spirits? I have said that I never drank either; and suspect that my mother furnished my host with some of these stores out of those fishing-boats of which she was owner. "If I had an only son, and such a good-looking one," Mrs. Boniface was pleased to say (can I, after such a fine compliment, be so ungrateful as to forget her name?)—"If I had an only son, and could leave him as well off as Mrs. Duval can leave you, I wouldn't send him to sea in wartime, that I wouldn't." "And though you don't drink any wine, some of your friends on board may," my landlord added, "and they are always welcome at the Blue Anchor." This was not the first time I had heard that my mother was rich. "If she be so," I said to my host, "indeed it is more than I know." On which he and his wife both commended me for my caution, adding, with a knowing smile, "We know more than we tell, Mr. Duval. Have you ever heard of Mr. Weston? Have you ever heard of Monsieur de la Motte? We know where Boulogne is, and Ost—" "Hush, wife," here breaks in my landlord. "If the captain don't wish to talk, why should he? There is the bell ringing from the Benbow and your dinner going up to the doctor, Mr. Duval." It was indeed as he said, and I sat down in the company of my good friends, bringing a fine appetite to their table.

The doctor, on his arrival, had sent a messenger to his friend, Captain Pearson, and while we were at our meal the captain arrived in his own boat from the ship, and insisted that Dr. and Mrs. Barnard should take their dessert in his cabin on board. This procured Mr. Denis Duval the honor of an invitation, and I and my new sea-chest were accommodated in the boat and taken to the frigate. My box was consigned to the gunner's cabin, where my hammock was now slung. After sitting a short time at Mr. Pearson's table a brother-midshipman gave me a hint to withdraw, and I made the acquaintance of my comrades, of whom there were about a dozen on board the Serapis. Though only a volunteer, I was taller and older than many of the midshipmen. They knew who I was, of course—the son of a shop-keeper at Winchelsea. Then and afterward I had my share of rough jokes, you may be sure; but I took them with good-humor; and I had to fight my way as I had learned to do at school before. There is no need to put down here the number of black eyes and bloody noses which I received and delivered. I am sure I bore but little malice, and, thank Heaven, never wronged a man so much as to be obliged to hate him afterward. Certain men there were who hated me; but they are gone and I am here, with a pretty clear conscience, Heaven be praised, and little the worse for their enmity.

The first lieutenant of our ship, Mr. Page, was related to Mrs. Barnard, and this kind lady gave him such a character of her very grateful, humble servant, and narrated my adventures to him so pathetically, that Mr. Page took me into his special favor, and interested some of my mess-mates in my behalf. The story of the highwayman caused endless talk and jokes against me which I took in good part, and established my footing among my mess-mates by adopting the plan I had followed at school, and taking an early opportunity to fight a well-known bruiser among our company of midshipmen. You must know they called me "Soapsuds," "Powder-puff," and like names, in consequence of my grandfather's known trade of hair-dresser; and one of my comrades bantering me one day, cried, "I say, Soapsuds, where was it you hit the highwayman?" "There," said I, and gave him a clean left-handed blow on his nose, which must have caused him to see a hundred blue lights. I know about five minutes afterward he gave me just such another blow; and we fought it out and were good friends ever after. What is this? Did I not vow as I was writing the last page yesterday that I would not say a word about my prowess at fisticuffs? You see we are ever making promises to be good, and forgetting them. I suppose other people can say as much.

Before leaving the ship my kind friends once more desired to see me, and Mrs. Barnard, putting a finger to her lip, took out from her pocket a little packet, which she placed in my hand. I thought she was giving me money, and felt somehow disappointed at being so treated by her. But when she was gone to shore I opened the parcel, and found a locket there, and a little curl of glossy black hair. Can you guess whose? Along with the locket was a letter in French, in a large girlish hand, in which the writer said, that night and day she prayed for her dear Denis. And where, think you, the locket is now? where it has been for forty-two years, and where it will remain when a faithful heart that beats under it hath ceased to throb.

At gun-fire our friends took leave of the frigate, little knowing the fate that was in store for many on board her. In three weeks from that day what a change! The glorious misfortune which befell us is written in the annals of our country.

On the very evening while Captain Pearson was entertaining his friends from Winchelsea, he received orders to sail for Hull, and place himself under the command of the admiral there. From the Humber we presently were dispatched northward to Scarborough. There had been not a little excitement along the whole northern coast for some time past, in consequence of the appearance of some American privateers, who had ransacked a Scottish nobleman's castle, and levied contributions from a Cumberland sea-port town. As we were close in with Scarborough a boat came off with letters from the magistrates of that place, announcing that this squadron had actually been seen off the coast. The commodore of this wandering piratical expedition was known to be a rebel Scotchman: who fought with a rope round his neck to be sure. No doubt many of us youngsters vaped about the courage with which we would engage him, and made certain, if we could only meet with him, of seeing him hang from his own yard-arm. It was Diis aliter visum, as we used to say at Pockock's; and it was we threw deuceace too. Traitor, if you will, was Monsieur John Paul Jones, afterward knight of his Most Christian Majesty's Order of Merit; but a braver traitor never wore sword.

We had been sent for in order to protect a fleet of merchantmen that were bound to the Baltic, and were to sail under the convoy of our ship and the Countess of Scarborough, commanded by Captain Piercy. And thus it came about that after being twenty-five days in his Majesty's service, I had the fortune to be present at one of the most severe and desperate combats that has been fought in our or any time.

I shall not attempt to tell that story of the battle of the 23d September, which ended in our glorious captain striking his own colors to our superior and irresistible enemy. Sir Richard has told the story of his disaster in words nobler than any I could supply, who, though indeed engaged in that fearful action in which our flag went down before a renegade Briton and his motley crew, saw but a very small portion of the battle which ended so fatally for us. It did not commence till nightfall. How well I remember the sound of the enemy's gun of which the shot crashed into our side in reply to the challenge of our captain who hailed her! Then came a broadside from us—the first I had ever heard in battle.....

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.

THE reader has now read the last line written by William Makepeace Thackeray. The story breaks off as his life ended—full of vigor, and blooming with new promise like the apple-trees in this month of May. The only difference between the work and the life is this, that the last chapters of the one have their little pathological gaps and breaks of unfinished effort, the last chapters of the other were fulfilled and complete. But the life may be let alone; while as for the gaps and breaks in his last pages nothing that we can write is likely to add to their significance. There they are; and the reader's mind has already fallen into them, with sensations not to be improved by the ordinary commentator. If Mr. Thackeray himself could do it, that would be another thing. Preacher he called himself in some of the Roundabout discourses, in which his softer spirit is always to be heard, but he never had a text after his own mind so much as these last broken chapters would give him now. There is the date of a certain Friday to be filled in, and Time is no more. Is it very presumptuous to imagine the Roundabout that Mr. Thackeray would write upon this unfinished work of his if he could come back to do it? We do not think it is, or very difficult either. What Carlyle calls the divine gift of speech was so largely his, especially in his maturer years, that he made clear in what he did say pretty much what he would say about any thing that engaged his thought; and we have only to imagine a discourse "On the Two Women at the Mill"* to read off upon our minds the sense of what Mr. Thackeray alone could have found language for.

Vain are these speculations—or are they vain? Not if we try to think what he would think of his broken labors, considering that one of these days our labors must be broken too. Still, there is not much to be said about it; and we pass on to the real business in hand, which is to show as well as we may what "Denis Duval" would have been had its author lived to complete his work. Fragmentary as it is, the story must always be of considerable importance, because it will stand as a warning to imperfect critics never to be in haste to cry of any intellect, "His vein is worked out: there is nothing left in him but the echoes of emptiness." The decriers were never of any importance, yet there is more than satisfaction, there is something like triumph in the mind of every honest man of letters when he sees, and knows every body must see, how a genius which was sometimes said to have been guilty of passing behind a cloud toward the evening of his day came out to shine with new splendor before the day was done. "Denis Duval" is unfinished, but it ends that question. The fiery genius that blazed over the city in "Vanity Fair," and passed on to a ripe afternoon in "Esmond," is not a whit less great; it is only broader, more soft, more mellow and kindly, as it sinks too suddenly in "Denis Duval."

This is said to introduce the settlement of another too hasty notion, which we believe to have been pretty generally accepted: namely, that Mr. Thackeray took little pains in the construction of his works. The truth is, that he very industriously did take pains. We find that out when we inquire, for the benefit of the readers of his Magazine, whether there is any thing to tell of his designs for "Denis Duval." The answer comes in the form of many most careful notes, and memoranda of inquiry into minute matters of detail to make the story true. How many young novelists are there who haven't much genius to fall back upon, who yet, if they desired to set their hero down in Winchelsea a hundred years ago, for instance, would take the trouble to learn how the town was built, and what gate led to Rye (if the hero happened to have any dealings with that place), and who were its local magnates, and how it was governed? And yet this is what Mr. Thackeray did, though his investigation added not twenty lines to the story and no "interest" whatever: it was simply so much conscientious effort to keep as near truth in feigning as he could. That Winchelsea had three gates, "Newgate on S.W., Landgate on N.E., Strandgate (leading to Rye) on S.E.;" that "the government was vested in a mayor and twelve jurats, jointly;" that "it sends canopy bearers on occasion of a coronation," etc., etc., etc., all is duly entered in a note-book with reference to authorities. And so about the refugees at Rye, and the French reformed church there; nothing is written that history can not vouch for. The neat and orderly way in which the notes are set down is also remarkable. Each has its heading, as thus:

* "Two women shall be grinding at the mill, one shall be taken and the other left."

Refugees at Rye.—At Rye is a small settlement of French refugees, who are for the most part fishermen, and have a minister of their own.

French Reformed Church.—Wherever there is a sufficient number of faithful there is a church. The pastor is admitted to his office by the provincial synod, or the colloquy, provided it be composed of seven pastors at least. Pastors are seconded in their duties by laymen, who take the title of Ancients, Elders, and Deacons-precentor. The union of Pastors, Deacons, and Elders forms a consistory.

Of course there is no considerable merit in care like this, but it is a merit which the author of "Denis Duval" is not popularly credited with, and therefore it may as well be set down to him. Besides, it may serve as an example to fledgling geniuses of what he thought necessary to the perfection of his work.

But the chief interest of these notes and memoranda lies in the outlook they give us upon the conduct of the story. It is not desirable to print them all; indeed, to do so would be to copy a long list of mere references to books, magazines, and journals, where such by-way bits of illustration are to be found as lit Mr. Thackeray's mind to so vivid an insight into manners and character. Still, we are anxious to give the reader as complete an idea of the story as we can.

First, here is a characteristic letter, in which Mr. Thackeray sketches his plot for the information of his publisher:

MY DEAR S.,—I was born in the year 1764, at Winchelsea, where my father was a grocer and clerk of the church. Every body in the place was a good deal connected with smuggling.

There used to come to our house a very noble French gentleman, called the COUNT DE LA MOTTE, and with him a German, the BARON DE LÜTTERLOH. My father used to take packages to Ostend and Calais for these two gentlemen, and perhaps I went to Paris once and saw the French queen.

The squire of our town was SQUIRE WESTON of the Priory, who, with his brother, kept one of the genteel houses in the country. He was church-warden of our church, and much respected. Yes, but if you read the Annual Register of 1781 you will find that, on the 13th July, the sheriffs attended at the TOWER OF LONDON to receive custody of a De la Motte, a prisoner charged with high treason. The fact is, this Alsatian nobleman being in difficulties in his own country (where he had commanded the Regiment Soubise), came to London, and under pretense of sending prints to France and Ostend, supplied the French Minister with accounts of the movements of the English fleets and troops. His go-between was Lütterloh, a Brunswicker, who had been a crimping agent, then a servant, who was a spy of France and Mr. Franklin, and who turned king's evidence on La Motte, and hanged him.

This Lütterloh, who had been a crimping agent for German troops during the American, then a servant in London during the Gordon riots, then an agent for a spy, then a spy over a spy, I suspect to have been a consummate scoundrel, and doubly odious from speaking English with a German accent.

What if he wanted to marry THAT CHARMING GIRL who lived with Mr. Weston, at Winchelsea? Ha! I see a mystery here.

What if this scoundrel, going to receive his pay from the English admiral, with whom he was in communication at Portsmouth, happened to go on board the Royal George the day she went down.

As for John and Joseph Weston, of the Priory, I am sorry to say they were rascals too. They were tried for robbing the Bristol mail in 1780; and being acquitted for want of evidence, were tried immediately after on another indictment for forgery—Joseph was acquitted, but George capitally convicted. But this did not help poor Joseph. Before their trials, they and some others broke out of Newgate, and Joseph fired at and wounded a porter, who tried to stop him, on Snow Hill. For this he was tried and found guilty on the Black Act, and hung along with his brother.

Now, if I was an innocent participator in De la Motte's treasons, and the Westons' forgeries and robberies, what pretty scrapes I must have been in?

I married the young woman whom the brutal Lütterloh would have had for himself, and lived happy ever after.

Here, it will be seen, the general idea is very roughly sketched, and the sketch was not in all its parts carried out. Another letter, never sent to its destination, gives a somewhat later account of Denis:

My grandfather's name was Duval, he was a barber and perruquier by trade, and elder of the French Protestant Church at Winchelsea. I was sent to board with his correspondent, a Methodist grocer, at Rye.

These two kept a fishing-boat, but the fish they caught was many and many a barrel of Nantz brandy, which we landed—never mind where—at a place to us well known. In the innocence of my heart, I—a child—got leave to go out fishing. We used to go out at night and meet ships from the French coast.

I learned to scuttle a marlinspike, reef a lee scupper, keelhaul a bowsprit

as well as the best of them. How well I remember the jabbering of the Frenchmen the first night as they handed the kegs over to us! One night we were fired into by his Majesty's revenue-cutter Lynx. I asked what those balls were fizzing in the water, etc.

I wouldn't go on with the smuggling; being converted by Mr. Wesley, who came to preach to us at Rye—but that is neither here nor there....

In these letters neither "my mother" nor the Count de Saverne and his unhappy wife appear; while Agnes exists only as "that charming girl." Count de la Motte, the Baron de Lütterloh, and the Westons, seem to have figured foremost in the author's mind: they are historical characters. In the first letter we are referred to the Annual Register for the story of De la Motte and Lütterloh; and this is what we read there:

January 4, 1781.—A gentleman was taken into custody for treasonable practices, named Henry Francis de la Motte, which he bore with the title of baron annexed to it. He has resided in Bond Street, at a Mr. Otley's, a woolen-draper, for some time.

When he was going up stairs at the Secretary of State's office, in Cleveland Row, he dropped several papers on the staircase, which were immediately discovered by the messenger, and carried in with him to Lord Hillsborough. After his examination he was committed a close prisoner, for high treason, to the Tower. The papers taken from him are reported to be of the highest importance. Among them are particular lists of every ship of force in any of our yards and docks, etc., etc.

In consequence of the above papers being found, Henry Lütterloh, Esq., of Wickham, near Portsmouth, was afterward apprehended and brought to town. The messengers found Mr. Lütterloh ready booted to go a-hunting. When he understood their business he did not discover the least embarrassment, but delivered his keys with the utmost readiness. . . . Mr. Lütterloh is a German, and had lately taken a house at Wickham, within a few miles of Portsmouth; and as he kept a pack of hounds, and was considered as a good companion, he was well received by the gentlemen in the neighborhood.

July 14, 1781.—Mr. Lütterloh's testimony was of so serious a nature that the court seemed in a state of astonishment during the whole of his long examination. He said that he embarked in a plot with the prisoner in the year 1778, to furnish the French court with secret intelligence of the Navy; for which, at first, he received only eight guineas a month; the importance of his information appeared, however, so clear to the prisoner, that he shortly after allowed him fifty guineas a month, besides many valuable gifts; that, upon any emergency, he came post to town to M. de la Motte, but common occurrences, relative to their treaty, he sent by the post. He identified the papers found in his garden, and the seals, he said, were M. de la Motte's, and well known in France. He had been to Paris by direction of the prisoner, and was closeted with Monsieur Sartine, the French Minister. He had formed a plan for capturing Governor Johnstone's squadron, for which he demanded 8000 guineas, and a third share of the ships, to be divided among the prisoner, himself, and his friend in a certain office, but the French court would not agree to yielding more than an eighth share of the squadron. After agreeing to enable the French to take the commodore, he went to Sir Hugh Palliser and offered a plan to take the French, and to defeat his original project with which he had furnished the French court.

The trial lasted for thirteen hours, when the jury, after a short deliberation, pronounced the prisoner guilty, when sentence was immediately passed upon him; the prisoner received the awful doom (he was condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered) with great composure, but inveighed against Mr. Lütterloh in warm terms. . . . His behavior throughout the whole of this trying scene exhibited a combination of manliness, steadiness, and presence of mind. He appeared, at the same time, polite, condescending, and unaffected, and, we presume, could never have stood so firm and collected at so awful a moment if, when he felt himself fully convicted as a traitor to the State which gave him protection, he had not, however mistakenly, felt a conscious innocence within his own breast that he had devoted his life to the service of his country. . . .

M. de la Motte was about five feet ten inches in height, fifty years of age, and of a comely countenance; his deportment was exceedingly genteel, and his eye was expressive of strong penetration. He wore a white cloth coat and a linen waistcoat worked in tambour.—Annual Register, vol. xxiv., p. 184.

It is not improbable that from this narrative of a trial for high treason in 1781 the whole story radiated. These are the very men whom we have seen in Thackeray's pages; and it is a fine test of his insight and power to compare them as they lie embalmed in the Annual Register, and as they breathe again in "Denis Duval." The part they were to have played in the story is already intelligible, all but the way in which they were to have confused the lives of Denis and his love. "At least, Duval," De la Motte said to me when I shook hands with him and with all my heart forgave him, "mad and reckless as I have been and fatal to all whom I loved, I have never allowed the child to want, and have supported her in comfort when I myself was almost without a meal." What was the injury which Denis forgave with all his heart? Fatal to all whom he loved, there are evidences that De la Motte was to have urged Lütterloh's pretensions to Agnes: whose story at this period we find inscribed in the note-book in one word—"Henriette, Iphigenia." For Agnes was christened Henriette originally, and Denis was called Blaise.*

As for M. Lütterloh, "that consummate scoundrel, and doubly odious from speaking English with a German accent," having hanged De la Motte, while confessing that he had made a solemn engagement with him never to betray each other, and had then immediately laid a wager that De la Motte would be hanged, having broken open a secretaire, and distinguished himself in various other ways, he seems to have gone to Winchelsea, where it was easy for him to threaten or cajole the Westons into trying to force Agnes into his arms. She was living with these people, and we know how they discountenanced her faithful affection for Denis. Overwrought by the importunities of Lütterloh and the Westons, she escaped to Dr. Barnard for protection; and soon unexpected help arrived. The De Viomesnills, her mother's relations, became suddenly convinced of the innocence of the countess. Perhaps (and when we say perhaps we repeat such hints of his plans as Mr. Thackeray uttered in conversation at his fireside) they knew of certain heritages to which Agnes would be entitled were her mother absolved: at any rate, they had reasons of their own for claiming her at this opportune moment—as they did. Agnes takes Dr. Barnard's advice, and goes off to these prosperous relations, who, having neglected her so long, desire her so much. Perhaps Denis was thinking of the sad hour when he came home, long years afterward, to find his sweetheart gone, when he wrote: "Oh, Agnes, Agnes! how the years roll away! What strange events have befallen us; what passionate griefs have we had to suffer: what a merciful Heaven has protected us, since that day when your fa-

At the time she goes home to France Denis is far away, fighting on board the Arethusa, under his old captain, Sir Richard Pearson, who commanded the Serapis in the action with Paul Jones. Denis was wounded early in this fight, in which Pearson had to strike his own colors, almost every man on board being killed or hurt. Of Pearson's career, which Denis must have followed in after-days, there is more than one memorandum in Mr. Thackeray's note-book.

Serapis, R. Pearson. Beatson's Memoirs.

Gentleman's Magazine, 49, p. 484. Account of action with Paul Jones, 1779.

and then follows the question:

Qy. How did Pearson get away from Paul Jones?

But before that is answered we will quote "the story of the disaster" as Sir Richard tells it, "in words nobler than any I could supply:" and, indeed, Mr. Thackeray seems to have thought much of the letter to the Admiralty Office, and to have found Pearson's character in it.

After some preliminary fighting:

We dropped alongside of each other, head and stern, when, the fluke of our spare anchor hooking his quarter, we became so close, fore and aft, that the muzzles of our guns touched each other's sides. In this position we engaged from half past eight till half past ten; during which time, from the great quantity and variety of combustible matter which they threw in upon our decks, chains, and, in short, every part of the ship, we were on fire no less than ten or twelve times in different parts of the ship, and it was with the greatest difficulty and exertion imaginable at times that we were able to get it extinguished. At the same time the largest of the two frigates kept sailing round us the whole action and raking us fore and aft, by which means she killed or wounded almost every man on the quarter and main decks.

About half past nine a cartridge of powder was set on fire, which, running from cartridge to cartridge all the way aft, blew up the whole of the people and officers that were quartered abaft the mainmast. . . . At ten o'clock they called for quarter from the ship alongside; hearing this, I called for the boarders and ordered them to board her, which they did; but the moment they were on board her they discovered a superior number lying under cover with pikes in their hands ready to receive them; our people retreated instantly into our own ship, and returned to their guns till past ten, when the frigate coming across our stern and pouring her broadside into us again, without our being able to bring a gun to bear on her, I found it in vain, and, in short, impracticable, from the situation we were in, to stand out any longer with the least prospect of success. I therefore struck. Our mainmast at the same time went by the board. . . .

I am extremely sorry for the misfortune that has happened—that of losing His Majesty's ship I had the honor to command; but, at the same time, I flatter myself with the hopes that their lordships will be convinced that she has not been given away, but that on the contrary every exertion has been used to defend her.

The Serapis and the Countess of Scarborough, after drifting about in the North Sea, were brought into the Texel by Paul Jones; when Sir Joseph Yorke, our ambassador at the Hague, memorialized their high mightinesses the States-General of the Low Countries, requesting that these prizes might be given up. Their high mightinesses refused to interfere.

Of course the fate of the Serapis was Denis's fate; and the question also is, how did he get away from Paul Jones? A note written immediately after the query suggests a hair-breadth escape for him after a double imprisonment.

Some sailors are lately arrived from Amsterdam on board the Laetitia, Captain March. They were taken out of the hold of a Dutch East Indiaman by the captain of the Kingston privateer, who, having lost some of his people, gained some information of their fate from a music-girl, and had spirit enough to board the ship and search her. The poor wretches were all chained down in the hold, and but for this would have been carried to perpetual slavery.—Gentleman's Magazine, 50, p. 101.

Do we see how truth and fiction was to have been married here? Suppose that Denis Duval, escaping from one imprisonment in Holland, fell into the snares of Dutch East Indiamen, or was kidnapped with the men of the Kingston privateer? Denis chained down in the hold, thinking one moment of Agnes and the garden wall which alone was too much to separate them, and at the next moment of how he was now to be carried to perpetual slavery, beyond hope. And then the music-girl; and the cheer of the Kingston's men as they burst into the hold and set the prisoners free. It is easy to imagine what those chapters would have been like.

At liberty, Denis was still kept at sea, where he did not rise to the heroic in a day, but progressed through all the commonplace duties of a young seaman's life, which we find noted down accordingly:

He must serve two years on board before he can be rated midshipman. Such volunteers are mostly put under the care of the gunner, who caters for them; and are permitted to walk the quarter-deck and wear the uniform from the beginning. When fifteen and rated midshipmen, they form a mess with the mates. When examined for their commissions they are expected to know every thing relative to navigation and seamanship, are strictly examined in the different sailings, working tides, days' works, and double altitudes—and are expected to give some account of the different methods of finding the longitudes by a time-keeper and the lunar observations. In practical seamanship they must show how to conduct a ship from one place to another under every disadvantage of wind, tide, etc. After this the candidate obtains a certificate from the captain, and his commission when he can get it.

Another note describes a personage whose acquaintance we have missed:

A seaman of the old school, whose hand was more familiar with the tar-brush than with Hadley's quadrant, who had peeped into the mysteries of navigation as laid down by J. Hamilton Moore, and who acquired an idea of the rattletraps and rigging of a ship through the famous illustrations which adorn the pages of Darcy Lever.

Denis was a seaman in stirring times. "The year of which we treat," says the Annual Register for 1779, "presented the most awful appearance of public affairs which perhaps this country had beheld for many ages;" and Duval had part in more than one of the startling events which succeeded each other so rapidly in the wars with France and America and Spain. He was destined to come into contact with Major André, whose fate excited extraordinary sympathy at the time: Washington is said to have shed tears when he signed his death-warrant. It was on the 2d of October, 1780, that this young officer was executed. A year later, and Denis was to witness the trial and execution of one whom he knew better and was more deeply interested in, De la Motte. The courage and nobleness with which he met his fate moved the sympathy of Duval, whom he had injured, as well as of most of those who saw him die. Denis has written concerning him: "Except my kind namesake, the captain and admiral, this was the first gentleman I ever met in intimacy, a gentleman with many a stain, nay, crime to reproach him, but not all lost, I hope and pray. I own to having a kindly feeling toward that fatal man."

Lütterloh's time had not yet come; but besides that we find him disposed of with the Royal George in the first-quoted letter, an entry in the note-book unites the fate of the bad man with that of the good ship.*

Meanwhile, the memorandum "Rodney's action, 1782," indicates that Duval was to take part in our victory over the French fleet commanded by the Count de Grasse, who was himself captured with the Ville de Paris and four other ships. "De Grasse with his suite landed on Southsea Common, Portsmouth. They were conducted in carriages to the George, where a most sumptuous dinner had been procured for the count and his suite, by Vice-Admiral Sir Peter Parker, who entertained him and his officers at his own expense." Here also was something for Denis to see; and in this same autumn came on the trial of the two Westons, when Denis was to be the means—unconsciously—of bringing his old enemy, Joseph Weston, to punishment. There are two notes to this effect:

1782-3. Jo. Weston, always savage against Blaise, fires on him in Cheapside.

The Black Act is 9 George II., c. 22. The preamble says: Whereas several ill-designing and disorderly persons have associated themselves under the name of Blacks, and entered into confederacies to support and assist one another in stealing and destroying deer, robbing warrens and fish-ponds.... It then goes on to enact that if any person or persons shall willfully or maliciously shoot at any person in any dwelling-house or other place, he shall suffer death as in cases of felony without benefit of the clergy.

A Joseph Weston was actually found guilty, under the Black Act, of firing at and wounding a man on Snow Hill, and was hanged with his brother. Mr. Thackeray's note-book refers him to "The Westons in 'Sessions Papers,' 1782, pp. 463, 470, 473," to the Gentleman's Magazine, 1782, to "Genuine Memoirs of George and Joseph Weston, 1782," and Notes and Queries, Series I. vol. x.†

* Contemporary accounts of the foundering of the Royal George represent her crowded with people from the shore. We have seen how Lütterloh was among these, having come on board to receive the price of his treason.

† These notes also appear in the same connection: "Horse-Stealers." One Saunders was committed to Oxford jail for horse-stealing, who appears to have belonged to a gang, part of whom stole horses in the north counties, and the other part in the south, and about the

The next notes (in order of time) concern a certain very disinterested action of Duval's:

Deal Riots, 1783.

DEAL.—Here has been a great scene of confusion, by a party of Colonel Douglas's Light Dragoons, sixty in number, who entered the town in the dead of the night in aid to the excise-officers, in order to break open the stores and make seizures; but the smugglers, who are never unprepared, having taken the alarm, mustered together, and a most desperate battle ensued.

Now old Duval, the perruquier, as we know, belonged to the great Mackerel party, or smuggling conspiracy, which extended all along the coast; and frequent allusion has been made to his secret stores, and to the profits of his so-called fishing expeditions. Remembering what has been written of this gentleman, we can easily imagine the falsehoods, tears, lying asseverations of poverty and innocence which old Duval must have uttered on the terrible night when the excise-officers visited him. But his exclamations were to no purpose, for it is a fact that when Denis saw what was going on, he burst out with the truth, and though he knew it was his own inheritance he was giving up, he led the officers right away to the hoards they were seeking.

His conduct on this occasion Denis has already referred to where he says: "There were matters connected with this story regarding which I could not speak.....Now they are secrets no more.. That old society of smugglers is dissolved long ago: nay, I shall have to tell presently how I helped myself to break it up." And therewith all old Duval's earnings, all Denis's fortune that was to be, vanished; but of course Denis prospered in his profession, and had no need of unlawful gains.‡

But very sad times intervened between Denis and prosperity. He was to be taken prisoner by the French, and to fret many long years away in one of their arsenals. At last the Revolution broke out, and he may have been given up, or—thanks to his foreign tongue and extraction—found means to escape. Perhaps he went in search of Agnes, whom we know he never forgot, and whose great relations were now in trouble, for the Revolution which freed him was terrible to "aristocrats."

This is nearly all the record we have of this part of Denis's life, and of the life which Agnes led while she was away from him.§ But perhaps

§ The following memoranda appear in the note-book:

"Marie Antoinette was born on the 2d November, 1755, and her saint's day is the FÊTE DES MORTS.

"In the Corsican expedition the Legion de Lorraine was under the Baron de Viomesnil. He emigrated at the commencement of the Revolution, took an active part in the army of Condé, and in the emigration, returned with Louis XVIII., followed him to Gand, and was made marshal and peer of France after '15.

"Another Vi. went with Rochambeau to America in 1780."

it was at this time that Duval saw Marie Anfoiriette; perhaps he found Agnes, and helped her to get away; or had Agnes already escaped to England, and was it in the old familiar haunts—Farmer Perrean's Columbarium, where the pigeons were that Agnes loved; the rectory garden basking in the autumn evening; the old wall and the pear-tree behind it; the plain from whence they could see the French lights across the Channel; the little twinkling window in a gable of the priory house, where the light used to be popped out at nine o'clock—that Denis and Agnes first met after their long separation?

However that may have been, we come presently upon a note of "a tailor contracts to supply three superfine suits for £11 11s. (Gazetteer and Daily Advertiser);" and also of a villa at Beckenham, with "four parlors, eight bedrooms, stables, two acres of garden, and fourteen acres of meadow, let for £70 a year," which may have been the house the young people first lived in after they were married. Later, they moved to Fareport, where, as we read, the admiral is weighed along with his own pig. But he can not have given up the service for many years after his marriage; for he writes: "T'other day when we took over the King of France to Calais (H.R.H. the Duke of Clarence being in command), I must needs have a post-chaise from Dover to look at that old window in the priory house at Winchelsea. I went through the old wars, despairs, tragedies. I sighed as vehemently after forty years as though the infandi dolores were fresh upon me, as though I were the school-boy trudging back to his task, and taking a last look at his dearest joy."

"And who, pray, was Agnes?" he writes elsewhere. "To-day her name is Agnes Duval, and she sits at her work-table hard by. The lot of my life has been changed by knowing her; to win such a prize in life's lottery has been given but to very few. What I have done—of any worth—has been done by trying to deserve her."..... "Monsieur mon fils—(this is to his boy)—if ever you marry, and have a son, I hope the little chap will have an honest man for a grandfather, and that you will be able to say, 'I loved him,' when the daisies cover me." Once more of Agnes he writes: "When my ink is run out, and my little tale is written, and yonder church that is ringing to seven o'clock prayers shall toll for a certain D.D., you will please, good neighbors, to remember that I never loved any but yonder lady, and keep a place by Darby for Joan when her turn shall arrive."

ON THE RIGHT FOOTING.

IT was a busy time in one of our New England cities. News had come that the Federal troops were in need of stockings, which at that stage of the war had not been very abundantly supplied to the newly-organized army that was then taking the field for the fall campaign of 1861. Sisters and mothers, maidens and spinsters, were engaged in the primitive employment of knitting. Patriotism had armed the men with muskets and the women with needles. It was the autumn following the sad reverse at the battle of Bull Run; and while woman's fingers were busy adding stitch to stitch, her thoughts reverted to that fatal field as the forerunner of still greater calamities.

But some natures are so buoyant that they resist all depressing influences, and live in a sunlight of their own. My reader, therefore, need not expect a sorrowful story, because I narrate what took place at a time of national misgiving.

In a pleasant room, into which the afternoon sun was shining, sat Miss Mary Brown and Miss Mary I. Brown, much alike in name, but quite unlike in some other respects. Miss Mary I. Brown was a young maiden, Miss Mary Brown was a maiden not young. The one was eighteen, the other forty-eight. One was looking forward to matrimony as a probable and desirable thing, the other looked upon matrimony as barely possible, and on the whole unadvisable.

Miss Mary I. Brown had been named for her aunt, Miss Mary Brown, by a kind brother, who devised this method of handing down his sister's name to posterity after having abandoned all hope that it would be preserved by direct descent. The niece, however, went by the name of Bell, a contraction of her middle name, Isabel. Miss Mary lived with her brother, and thus she and Bell were constantly together, the niece having in her aunt one of those agreeable companions as is sometimes found in the character of a maiden lady who has wasted none of her native sweetness upon a heartless lover or a selfish husband.

These two were a part of the great knitting-machine that was turning out stockings by the hundreds and forwarding them to the Union army. Bell had just finished a pair, and was running the heels when she suddenly exclaimed,

"Oh, aunt, I have thought of one way to get a husband!"

"One way," replied her aunt, showing no surprise at Bell's remark. "That is nothing wonderful. You would hardly be a woman if you have but one way. In my day girls of your age had many ways to set themselves about that business."

"But they did not always succeed," said Bell, looking archly at her aunt.

"No they did not always get married, for sometimes they made up their minds beforehand to turn their attention to taking care of their rattle-brained nieces."

"That remark can not apply to me, for Uncle John told me that I haven't any brains. But I am rather glad you didn't get married, for every young lady like myself is greatly benefited by having a good aunt at hand who has no children of her own to look after."

"There, my young lady had better not ventilate any more of her sage ideas just now."

"No, aunt, not one word more after I have told you my plan for catching a husband."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why you see, 'aunt, when I marry I mean to have a good, tall, brave husband."

"Yes, I could guess that, for I never saw a little woman who did not prefer a tall man."

"I am going to write an advertisement for a husband and put it into this pair of large stockings; and as the tallest men will pick out the biggest stockings I shall advertise myself to a regular grenadier."

"You may as well advertise yourself in the New York Herald under the head of Matrimonial."

"Oh no, aunt, I don't want any of the simpletons who read and answer such advertisements. I want a good, brave Union soldier, who is not afraid to accept these stockings with the conditions I shall impose upon him."

So Bell, upon a bit of paper, wrote the following:

"This pair of stockings was knit by Miss Mary Brown, who holds herself in readiness to marry the man who will wear them on the battle-field, and afterward return to claim her hand."

"There, aunt, what do you think of that?" said Bell, after reading it aloud.

"I don't like the idea of your using my name. Why not write it out in full—Mary Isabel Brown?"

"That would tell too much. I want it so that it may stand for either of us. Then, if the fellow should take me at my word and I did not fancy him, there will be a chance to retreat."

"Such frolics are not very discreet, Bell, and I should object to your carrying out this one if I did not think you were safe. The man who finds either of us will have some hundreds of Mary Browns to pick from."

"Well, aunt, I am not going to write any thing more. It must not be too definite. The fellow will have to hunt some if ever he finds me out."

In due time the stockings from the Browns went into the same box with those from the Smiths, and others whose posterity has not multiplied so rapidly as have the descendants of the original Mr. Brown and Mr. Smith, and started for the Union camp.

In due time the stockings reached the Federal troops, and were distributed among the barefoot squads. Bell's stockings were handed over to a very small man, while a smaller pair had fallen to the lot of the only six-footer in the company, who was trying to put them on as the small man held his up, and, after taking in their dimensions with a mechanic's eye, exclaimed:

"I say, Tom, I shall get lost in these stockings. I guess they were knit for Goliath of Gath."

"They are quite different from mine, then. I have been at work upon these till I think I shall never be able to straighten my back again. See how far I have got them on," and Tom held up his foot to show his comrade his progress. He had worked his toes down to the angle where the heel belongs, while the foot of the stocking looked very limp and empty. "I hope there are no guerrillas round," continued he; "for if they should surprise the camp before I get this stocking on, I should be in an awkward predicament. I could neither fight nor run, and should have to sit still and be shot."

Dick watched him pulling and tugging, and then burst out laughing.

"What are you laughing at? I don't see any thing so very queer about all this."

"Well, I do. I think it is mighty queer that you should try to pull on that pair of stockings which will just fit me, while I have a pair that will just suit you."

Tom dropped his foot to the floor. It struck him as a very happy thought on the part of Dick. It had not occurred to him, Yankee though he was, that there could be such a transaction as a "swop" in which both parties could be benefited.

So Tom and Dick made an exchange; and Tom, seizing one of the large stockings, slipped his foot down the long leg till his toes reached the farthest extremity.

"That is a capital fit. If I could find the girl who knit that I would marry her as soon as the war is over," saying which, Tom pulled on the other stocking, and felt something in the toe of it. "I guess there is a mouse's nest in this one," said he, as he drew it off and found Bell's note. "No, it is a piece of writing, by Jove!" and Tom proceeded to open and read it.

"That note is mine, Tom. Fair play. I didn't agree to let you have all there might be in that stocking when I exchanged."

"Ah, my good fellow, you are not familiar with the law on this point. I hold the stocking and the stocking held the note, ergo I hold the note, and my good friend, Richard Smith, holds the other pair of stockings and all they contain. But hear it, and then perhaps you will withdraw your claim."

Tom read and Dick listened.

"Yes, Tom, I renounce all right to that document. I should not object to the first condition, for you know I am as valiant as Hector—"

"Hecuba you probably mean," interrupted Tom, who was aware that his comrade's knowledge of the Grecian heroes was second-hand.

"As valiant as Hecuba, then," continued Dick, accepting the correction. "But as to marrying Mary Brown, I would sooner go barefoot all my days. She is probably some old maid with more sentiment than sense."

"Nonsense, Dick; that note was not written by an old maid. I will take up the gauntlet, and when I get a furlough I'll have a hunt for that girl. I rather like the spirit of this communication."

"I should like to know how you are going to find her, unless her address is on the note."

"No it is not, and all I know about it is that she signs her name Mary Brown, and that she probably lives somewhere on our side of the Potomac."

"I think you'll find her then. You'll have a fine chance for a search! Brown is not a common name, and there can not be two Mary Browns north of Mason and Dixon's line."

"Don't try to convince me that the thing is impossible, for I'll find her sooner or later as sure as I am a good fellow."

Thereupon Tom instituted an inquiry to find out from which direction the stockings came. After a little search he ascertained that three boxes had just been emptied, but from which his had been taken he could not learn. One of the boxes came from New York, one from Boston, and one from Lowell.

"There," thought Tom, "that is about as definite as though I had found out that they came from the country where the Americans live."

But he took note of these three places for future reference, leaving it for time and chance to settle the question.

It was not a week after this circumstance before Tom found himself face to face with the foe on an obstinately-fought field, in which he received two wounds, one through the fleshy part of his leg, and the other in his shoulder. He was carried from the field on a stretcher.

At first he was faint from loss of blood; but as soon as his wounds were dressed and consciousness had fully returned he beckoned Dick toward him.

"What did they do with my stockings, Dick?"

"Never mind your stockings now, Tom; you must keep quiet."

"But I do mind about my stockings, and I can't have them lost. Those are the Mary Brown stockings, and must be found. One of them has two shot-holes in it."

"I'll look them up, Tom, but you must keep quiet. You've lost so much blood now that you are pale as a ghost."

After a few weeks spent in the hospital Tom came back to the camp to inquire for his stockings.

"Here they are," said Dick, as he handed them to him. "I have had them washed and put in the best order."

"Very much obliged to you, Dick," said Tom, as, in a group of soldiers, he examined the one containing the holes where the enemy's bullet had gone through.

"Why, Tom, were you wounded in both legs?" asked a comrade, who had discovered two similar shot-holes in the other stocking.

"No," replied Tom; "I was shot in the leg and shoulder. But how the holes came in the other stocking I don't know. My leg was in this one when the ball went through, for there is a stain of blood yet on that white toe. How is this, Dick?"

"I don't know, Tom. After they were washed I found that both of them had holes in them, and I supposed you had been shot in both legs. Are you sure you were not?"

VOL. XXIX.—NO. 171.—B B

"Quite sure. But I am not so certain that some of my friends have not been playing at Falstaff's game."

As Tom's wounds would not allow him to go on duty for some time he was promoted to the rank of captain, and sent off to recruit a company.

"Now," thought he, as soon as his papers had been made out, "I'll find that Mary Brown."

So he bought a valise, put up an extra shirt, and made himself ready.

Tom was a Massachusetts officer, and was to recruit his company in that State.

"New York, then, I must give up," thought he; "and it may be that she lives there, though I hardly think she does. The girl that got up that idea must be Yankee born, and probably lives in the Hub of the Universe. I'll try Boston first, at any rate."

So, after a flying visit to his friends, Tom opened a recruiting-office in Boston, and set himself to work to fill up his company. But while he was hunting up recruits he kept on the look-out for the Browns. He consulted the city directory; he found whole pages of Browns, and among them five Miss Mary Browns—a milliner, a washer and ironer, a boarding-house keeper, an astrologist, and a doctress. He took the address of the milliner and the doctress, and made his first call upon the former. As he entered she was writing in her account-book, one glance at which convinced him that she was not the writer of the note in his possession. Having purchased some trifling article, he left to go in search of the doctress. Having found the place, he rang the bell, and was ushered into a waiting-room. In a few moments a middle-aged woman entered. She looked a little surprised at Tom's stalwart proportions and regimentals.

"Is this Miss Mary Brown?" asked he.

"That is my name, Sir. Is there any thing I can do for you?"

"I have not called upon you in your professional capacity. I only wish to know whether you are one of a society of ladies who, three months ago, sent a box of clothing to the Army of the Potomac."

"I am sorry to say that I am not."

"The name Mary Brown was in one of the stockings, and I did not know but you might be the one. Have you any relation of that name?"

"None that I am aware of."

And then Tom, thinking he should be safe, produced the note for Miss Brown's inspection.

"Are you the man who has complied with the first condition?" asked the doctress, eying him from head to foot.

"Yes," replied he, bent upon experimenting on this matron's heart.

Afterward, in relating the circumstances to Dick, Tom said,

"When I told her that, I never in my life saw a woman look so sorry that she had not knit a certain pair of stockings."

"But what would you have done if she had been the right one?" asked Dick. "You would have been in a fine fix!"

"Not quite so fast, my good fellow. Do you suppose that after having been shot through in two places I went into battle without a chance of retreat? If she had proved the real Mary Brown, I should have told her that a friend of mine, Richard Smith, had taken the stockings, and that I had called, with his compliments, requesting her to prepare for the wedding-day!"

Tom spent some time with this female physician, who had many questions to ask of the returned soldier.

Having thus failed to find the right Mary Brown, he again turned to the directory.

"She must be the daughter of some of these Browns," said he, as his eye again ran over the long list. "But how I am to find her I don't know, unless fortune helps me. I have it!" he thought at last. "I'll go to the post-office and find out all the Browns in Boston."

He made known his business to the obliging postmaster, who gave him the address of half a score of Mary Browns. Subsequent interviews with each of these, however, threw no light upon the matter.

The next week, while looking over the newly-posted list of advertised letters, Tom came across the name Mary Brown.

"Who knows but she may be the one? Very likely she is," thought he. "The postmaster does not know who she is, and that is why she was left out of the list he gave me. I'll see if I can find out who calls for that letter."

So Tom bought the biggest morning paper he could find, and took his station within ear-shot of the place of delivery.

There were numerous calls for advertised letters, but none for Mary Brown. Tom was about abandoning his post when he observed a beautiful young lady coming into the door.

"I wish that might be Mary Brown," thought he, as he looked at her over his paper.

"Is there a letter here for Miss Mary Brown?" she asked, in a rich, musical voice, as she looked in at the pigeon-hole.

The beat of Tom's heart leaped up to two hundred a minute.

"By Jove, her name is Mary Brown!" said Tom to himself, who, in his most excited moments, never swore by any thing more sacred than the old heathen deities.

It would have been an easy matter for a business man to step up and settle the question of her identity, as Tom had done in several cases before. But his courage and presence of mind both forsook him the instant he found out that she might be the object of his search. It was not till he saw her passing out of the door that he recovered from his panic and bethought himself that his game must be followed. So off he started, keeping her in sight, though she walked away at a rapid rate.

She was tall and stately, and Tom could not help thinking what a fine-looking couple they would be, as he watched her graceful movements and thought of his own military air.

She soon reached Washington Street, and here Tom's difficulties began. The street was crowded. Tom, keeping his eye fixed upon the head and shoulders of his enchantress, had no eyes left for any other purpose. He brushed by crinolines with a force that threatened to carry them away; and had the mouth of the infernal pit been before him he would have walked into it.

After going a few blocks she entered a millinery shop. Tom stopped outside and looked at the bonnets in the show-case till she came out, and then followed on. A quarter of a mile farther, in the same direction, she entered a dry good store. Tom again lingered outside, and examined the wonderful patterns with their more wonderful names, and then took up the pursuit again. He followed for a long distance up Washington Street; but just as he was passing a large jewelry store he lost sight of her. He pushed on a block farther, doubled on his track, and looked into all the shop windows. At the jewelry store he came upon her, face to face, as she was coming out of the door. At a second sight of that queenly face Tom could hear his heart beat. He thought she must have heard it too. But as he was only one of a large number of human beings drifting the same way he escaped her notice.

"Ah," said Tom, as soon as he had recovered from the shock, "'to love is indeed a painful thrill!'"

From the jewelry store she led Tom a long chase, to the end of Washington Street and up Cornhill into a book-store. Tom, growing bolder, went in too, and looked at the books and heard her inquire for Rollin's Ancient History.

"She isn't one of the readers of 'yellow covers,'" thought Tom, as he heard the name. "She prefers solid reading. What a lucky fellow I am!"

It never once occurred to him that though this lady's name was Mary Brown she might not be the one he was in search of. So strongly did he hope that she was the right one he could not rid himself of the conviction that she was the right one.

Having made her purchases she came near Tom to look at the new books upon the show-table. Tom was spell-bound. The same thrill of which he had spoken crept over his frame, and he was as helpless as an animal fascinated by a snake.

"What is the matter with me?" thought he, as she left the store. "I never felt so in the presence of any other woman."

From the book-store Tom followed her back to Washington Street, where she started down on the other side. Instead of slackening her pace her step seemed more vigorous than ever. Tom was still somewhat weak from his wounds, and his lame leg began to complain.

"I wonder if she is going to walk back at this rate the whole length of this street," thought he.

"But there is no help for it. I shall follow her as long as I can walk."

Her calls at the different large establishments were even more frequent than when coming up the street.

"I hope she will not have to go shopping too often after I marry her," thought he. "It is equal to the Bull Run retreat. She must be rich to patronize all the high-priced establishments. But I have no objection to the money."

Toward the last part of the chase Tom had grown so incautious that the lady appeared to be aware that he was following her.

At last, after having walked back nearly the whole length of Washington Street, she got into a horse-car that was going out of the city. As there was no other course to be taken Tom went into the same car and took a seat opposite. He did not stare blankly at the straw on the car floor as some people do. His eyes wandered along the row of faces on the opposite seat, not failing to take a good look at the face which most attracted him. The game was growing more exciting, for as often as his eyes rested upon her countenance he detected her watching him. After a ride of about two miles, during which the passengers had come and gone till there were only three or four left, the car reached the end of the route, where the rest stepped out. They were no sooner out of the car than Tom saw a small, insignificant-looking man coming directly toward them, apparently on the look-out for this very woman. Tom held his breath. Could it be possible? Yes, they were kissing each other as only newly-married people do kiss. Tom heard her say, "How kind in you, my love, to come and meet me!" Then followed a few low words, during which the little man frowned at Tom as though he would like to swallow him. Tom was so disgusted that he made "a bee line" for a little oyster shop not far off, muttering as he went,

"Who would have thought that so superb a woman could fancy that insignificant specimen of a biped!" and Tom consoled himself with reflecting upon his own proud form, and wholly recovered from his disappointment by the time he had finished his second oyster stew.

Notwithstanding Tom's zeal he had been unsuccessful, and would have been obliged to give up the search had not an accident put the whole thing in his possession.

While attending to his recruiting he became known as a returned soldier who was familiar with the state of things in the camp to which the ladies of Boston were at that time sending different articles. He was therefore often consulted by them, and invited to attend the "sewing circle," where he met, among others, the person he was in search of. He had been introduced to her as Miss Brown; but as he noticed her companions called her Bell, he did not for a moment suppose she was the Mary Brown of his search. It was not till he had met her several times that he was able to identify her. He had been called upon one evening to assist in packing some clothing to be sent to the camp, when he heard one of the girls suggest that they should put a written note into each pair of stockings. The girls rattled on as only girls know how when their gentle bosoms are stirred by the spirit of patriotism, and Bell related her doings in this line.

"And did you give your address in full?" asked one of the girls.

"No, indeed," said Bell; "I just signed my name Mary Brown."

"And left the Isabel out?"

"Yes, of course; and the fellow that finds me will have something to do, I think."

That evening Tom acted as Bell's escort. He took particular notice of the street and number where he left her, and afterward walked back and looked at the name on the door-plate, that he might find out her father's name.

The next day, by consulting the directory and asking a few questions, he found out to his satisfaction that, on the whole, Mr. Brown was a very desirable father-in-law. Having made up his mind that he was ready to take Bell "for better or for worse," he overhauled his valise, took out his magic stockings and made them into a neat little parcel, into which he put the following note, which also inclosed Bell's note:

"MY DEAR BETROTHED,—I am the happy man into whose hands these stockings fell. I have complied with the condition expressed in the inclosed note, and shall call at 8 o'clock this evening to claim your hand.

"Yours forever,

Tom."

This parcel he sent by a careful messenger, and then waited as patiently as possible for the next hour to pass away.

When the parcel arrived the servant, seeing it was directed to Miss Mary Brown, took it directly to Bell's aunt and left the room. Bell was with her aunt, and declared that the package was intended for herself. Her aunt, who usually indulged Bell in her peculiar freaks, allowed her to open it. The note attracted her, and a glance at its contents told the whole story. Bell looked frightened.

"What is the matter, Bell?" asked her aunt, who was curiously examining the stockings.

"Read that, aunt," said Bell, dropping into a chair.

"This is rather bad, Bell," said her aunt. "You've found a husband sooner than you expected. But have you examined the stockings?"

Bell caught them up and glanced at the holes.

"He has been shot through both legs."

"Yes, so it seems," said her aunt. "He must have lost both of them, I am afraid."

"Oh, aunt," sobbed Bell, "how can I have a husband with both legs gone? What shall I do?"

Had the man come back sound in body she could have turned him off most easily, but to refuse a lover after he had lost both legs in his country's service was quite a different thing. But how could she get out of it honorably? After a hastily called council of war it was decided that Bell's aunt should be the real Mary Brown, and should dispose of this eccentric lover as best she could.

At the appointed time the bell rang, and Tom was shown in, dressed in his best regimentals and polished boots. He inquired for Miss Mary Brown. This the servant thought must mean the aunt, as she had always heard the niece called Bell; hence she started on her errand without asking which Miss Brown was wanted.

"I'll be down in a few minutes, Bridget," said the aunt. "But what sort of looking gentleman is he?"

"Och a fine-lookin' gintleman intirely. He is taller than me brother Patrick, and as straight as a bulrush!"

"Does he go on crutches, Bridget?" asked Bell.

"On crutches, is it?" said Bridget, opening her eyes wide. "By no manes! Why should he go wid two sticks, when he has two as good legs as iver a man wants?"

"Does he look pale and sick?" asked Bell.

"No, indade!" said the bewildered Bridget. "He looks as strong as any man of his inches, and so fresh and gintlemanly in his bright buttons that I think any young lady, like yourself, would like to have him for a swate-heart!"

"Hush, Bridget!" said Bell. "Say Miss Brown will be down in a few minutes."

As soon as Bridget had left them Bell crept quietly down stairs and took a peep through the door, which stood ajar, when of course she recognized our hero Tom. She now understood it all as soon as she recalled what she had said on the previous evening. She went quietly back to her aunt's room, and, with a countenance wearing quite a different expression, explained how matters stood.

"Then I suppose you would like to dispense with my services altogether?"

"Well, aunt, you know it would not be quite right to tell a falsehood about it, even if we could. I didn't think it was quite right before, and now that I have seen and know the fellow, I am certain it is not right."

"It is surprising how the sight of a fine-looking soldier changes a young lady's moral view of things!"

"Now be good, aunty! The scrape is bad enough as it is, and I don't know what I shall do with him."

"Do as I have done for so many years—don't commit yourself."

Bell felt rather afraid that she should commit herself, for she had looked at Tom with something more than a partial eye several times before she saw him through the crack in the door; so when she went down stairs and entered the room where he was sitting, she was careful to close the door behind her, knowing that, such is the nature of her sex, her aunt might be tempted to stand at the head of the stairs and listen. What was said and done in Mr. Brown's parlor that evening can only be guessed.

Tom in due time raised his company and returned to the field, where he has never been known to turn his back upon any thing which duty has required him to face; but he occasionally tells Dick that "when this cruel war is over" he will surely marry Mary Brown, if there is enough of him left to enable him to say, "I, Tom, take this woman," etc.

BROKEN IMAGES.

AN artist friend but recently from Rome
Gave me on his return a statuette;
With tender care I brought my treasure home,
And lovingly on yon carved bracket set
The beauteous image, there where angels keep,
Beside my bed, their vigils through the night,
That in the morning, loosed from bonds of sleep,
It first of all might greet my waking sight.

And often when the rosy light of Dawn,
On sunrise wings, from the far Orient came Through the dim window-curtains, closely drawn,
Piercing the gloom with slender shafts of flame,
My drowsy eyes the statuette have sought,
And lingered long upon the perfect face
In silent wonder at the skill which wrought
Out of the lifeless marble so much grace.

Thus looking on the artist's gift one day,
There came, meanwhile, a rapping at my door,
And from its stand my treasure fell, and lay
In scattered fragments on the cruel floor;
And entered one, a cynic, hard and cold,
Full of old dogmas of the dusty past,
Who with chill sophistry and reasoning bold
Routs all my dreams, this rude Iconoclast.

In every secret chamber of the heart
Some sculptured image in its dim shrine stands,
Wrought by a subtle and mysterious art,
And fashioned by an unseen artist's hands;
Carved out of fond desires and cherished hopes
Which long have lain concealed from others' view,
Like hidden pearls for which the diver gropes,
Far underneath the ocean's waves of blue.

Here in this chamber a sweet woman's face
Looks down with pensive smile and tender eyes;
Here in this other, from its lofty place,
Ensculptured Fame on soaring pinion flies;
Here is an image in whose outstretched hands
The yellow gold in glittering beauty shines—
Upon a mound of yellow dust it stands;
And here are fragments out of empty shrines.

So do we fill each niche within the heart
With some fair image, and our yearning eyes
Oft look within, when from the world apart,
To view the treasure which we so much prize—
Oft look within to find with bitter pain
(Oh cruel Fate, thou rude Iconoclast!)
Only the scattered fragments which remain,
The image but a memory of the past.

TREATMENT OF THE APPARENTLY DROWNED.

ILLUSTRATION No. 1.

tested by the results of extensive inquiries which the Life-boat Institution has set on foot among the medical practitioners, coroners, and other experienced persons. The following are the rules which apply in all cases, and in every country.

FOR RESTORING THE APPARENTLY DROWNED.

Send immediately for medical assistance, blankets, and dry clothing, but proceed to treat the patient instantly on the spot, in the open air, with the face downward, whether on shore or afloat; exposing the face, neck, and chest to the wind, except in severe weather, and removing all tight clothing from the neck and chest, especially the braces. The points to be aimed at are—first and immediately, the restoration of breathing; and, secondly, after breathing is restored, the promotion of warmth and circulation. The efforts to restore breathing must be commenced immediately and energetically, and persevered in for one or two hours, or until a medical man has pronounced that life is extinct. Efforts to promote warmth and circulation, beyond removing the wet clothes and drying the skin, must not be made until the first appearance of natural breathing. For if circulation of the blood be induced before breathing has recommenced the restoration to life will be endangered.

TO RESTORE BREATHING.

Place the patient on the floor or ground with the face downward and one of the arms under the forehead (Illustration No. 1), in which position all fluids will more readily escape by the mouth, and the tongue itself will fall forward, leaving the entrance into the windpipe free. Assist this operation by wiping and cleansing the mouth. If satisfactory breathing commences, use the treatment prescribed below to promote warmth.

If there be only slight breathing or no breathing, or if the breathing fail, then, to excite breathing, turn the patient well and instantly on the side (Illustration No. 2), supporting the head, and excite the nostrils with snuff, harts-horn, and smelling salts, or tickle the throat with a feather, if they are at hand. Rub the chest and face warm, and dash cold water, or cold and hot water alternately, on them.

If there be no success, lose not a moment, but

AT this season, when accidents in boating and bathing will frequently occur, it may be useful for us to publish, with the necessary illustrations, the text of those instructions for the revival of persons apparently drowned, which the British Royal National Life-boat Institution has lately compiled. The Board of Admiralty and the Controller of the Coast-guard Preventive Service have each ordered a large number of copies to be distributed among the seamen of the British Navy and those of the Coast-guard respectively. The leading principles of this method are founded upon those prescribed by the late Dr. Marshall Hall, combined with those of Dr. H. R. Silvester, but modified or instantly—to imitate breathing—replace the patient on the face, raising and supporting the chest well on a folded coat or other article of dress. Turn the body very gently on the side and a little beyond, and then briskly on the face, back again, repeating these measures cautiously, efficiently, and perseveringly about fifteen times in the minute, or once every four or five seconds, occasionally varying the side. On each occasion that the body is replaced on the face make uniform but efficient pressure with brisk movement on the back between and below the shoulder-blades or bones on each side (Illustration No. 1), removing the pressure immediately before turning the body on the side.

During the whole operation let one person attend solely to the movements of the head and of the arm placed under it. While the above operations are being proceeded with dry the hands and feet, and as soon as dry clothing or blankets can be procured strip the body and cover or gradually reclothe it, but taking care not to interfere with the efforts to restore breathing.

Should these efforts not prove successful in the course of from two to five minutes, proceed to imitate breathing as follows: Place the patient on the back on a flat surface, inclined a little upward from the feet; raise and support the head and shoulders on a small firm cushion or folded article of dress placed under the shoulder-blades. (Illustration No. 3.) Draw forward the patient's tongue, and keep it projecting beyond the lips: an elastic band over the tongue and under the chin will answer this purpose, or a piece of string or tape may be tied round them, or by raising the lower jaw the teeth may be made to retain the tongue in that position. Remove all tight clothing from about the neck and chest, especially the braces.

In order to imitate the movement of breathing take your place at the patient's head, grasp the arms just above the elbows, and draw the arms gently and steadily upward above the head and keep them stretched upward for two seconds. (Illustration No. 4.) By this means air is drawn into the lungs. Then turn down the patient's arms and press them gently and firmly for two seconds against the sides of the chest. By this means air is pressed out of the lungs. Repeat the measures alternately, deliberately, and perseveringly about fifteen times in a minute until a spontaneous effort to respire is perceived, immediately upon which cease to imitate the movements of breathing and proceed to induce circulation and warmth.

AFTER BREATHING HAS BEEN RESTORED.

Commence rubbing the limbs upward, with firm, grasping pressure and energy, using handkerchiefs, flannels, etc.: by this measure the blood is propelled along the veins toward the heart. The friction must be continued under the blanket or over the dry clothing. Promote the warmth of the body by the application of hot flannels, bottles, or bladders of hot water, heated bricks, etc., to the pit of the stomach, the armpits, between the thighs, and to the soles of the feet. If the patient has been carried to a house after respiration has been restored, be careful to let the air play freely about the room. On the restoration of life a tea-spoonful of warm water should be given; and then, if the power of swallowing have returned, small quantities of wine, warm brandy-and-water, or coffee should be administered. The patient should be kept in bed, and a disposition to sleep encouraged.

APPEARANCES ACCOMPANYING DEATH.

Breathing and the heart's action cease entirely; the eyelids are generally half closed, the pupils dilated, the jaws clenched, the fingers semi-contracted, the tongue approaches to the under edges of the lips, and these, as well as the nostrils, are covered with a frothy mucus. Coldness and pallor of surface increase.

CAUTIONS.

Prevent unnecessary crowding of persons round the body, especially if in an apartment or confined space.

Avoid rough usage, and do not allow the body to remain on the back unless the tongue is secured.

Under no circumstance hold the body up by the feet.

On no account place the body in a warm bath, unless under medical direction, and even then it should only be employed as a momentary excitant.

CHAPTER VIII.

MR. BOFFIN IN CONSULTATION.

WHOSOEVER had gone out of Fleet Street into the Temple at the date of this history, and had wandered disconsolate about the Temple until he stumbled on a dismal church-yard, and had looked up at the dismal windows commanding that church-yard until at the most dismal window of them all he saw a dismal boy, would in him have beheld, at one grand comprehensive swoop of the eye, the managing clerk, junior clerk, common-law clerk, conveyancing clerk, chancery clerk, every refinement and department of clerk, of Mr. Mortimer Lightwood, erewhile called in the newspapers eminent solicitor.

Mr. Boffin having been several times in communication with this clerkly essence, both on its own ground and at the Bower, had no difficulty in identifying it when he saw it up in its dusty eyrie. To the second floor on which the window was situated, he ascended, much pre-occupied in mind by the uncertainties besetting the Roman Empire, and much regretting the death of the amiable Pertinax: who only last night had left the imperial affairs in a state of great confusion, by falling a victim to the fury of the pretorian guards.

"Morning, morning, morning!" said Mr. Boffin, with a wave of his hand, as the office-door was opened by the dismal boy, whose appropriate name was Blight. "Governor in?"

"Mr. Lightwood gave you an appointment, Sir, I think?"

"I don't want him to give it, you know," returned Mr. Boffin; "I'll pay my way, my boy."

"No doubt, Sir. Would you walk in? Mr.

Lightwood ain't in at the present moment, but I expect him back very shortly. Would you take a seat in Mr. Lightwood's room, Sir, while I look over our Appointment Book?" Young Blight made a great show of fetching from his desk a long thin manuscript volume with a brown paper cover, and running his finger down the day's appointments, murmuring, "Mr. Aggs, Mr. Baggs, Mr. Caggs, Mr. Daggs, Mr. Faggs, Mr. Gaggs, Mr. Boffin. Yes, Sir; quite right. You are a little before your time, Sir. Mr. Lightwood will be in directly."

"I'm not in a hurry," said Mr. Boffin.

"Thank you, Sir. I'll take the opportunity, if you please, of entering your name in our Callers' Book for the day." Young Blight made another great show of changing the volume, taking up a pen, sucking it, dipping it, and running over previous entries before he wrote. As, "Mr. Alley, Mr. Balley, Mr. Calley, Mr. Dalley, Mr. Falley, Mr. Galley, Mr. Halley, Mr. Lalley, Mr. Malley. And Mr. Boffin."

"Strict system here; eh, my lad?" said Mr. Boffin, as he was booked.

"Yes, Sir," returned the boy. "I couldn't get on without it."

By which he probably meant that his mind would have been shattered to pieces without this fiction of an occupation. Wearing in his solitary confinement no fetters that he could polish, and being provided with no drinking-cup that he could carve, he had fallen on the device of ringing alphabetical changes into the two volumes in question, or of entering vast numbers of persons out of the Directory as transacting business with Mr. Lightwood. It was the more necessary for his spirits, because, being of a sensitive temperament, he was apt to consider it personally disgraceful to himself that his master had no clients.

"How long have you been in the law, now?" asked Mr. Boffin, with a pounce, in his usual inquisitive way.

"I've been in the law, now, Sir, about three years."

"Must have been as good as born in it!" said Mr. Boffin, with admiration. "Do you like it?"

"I don't mind it much," returned Young Blight, heaving a sigh, as if its bitterness were past.

"What wages do you get?"

"Half what I could wish," replied young Blight.

"What's the whole that you could wish?"

"Fifteen shillings a week," said the boy.

"About how long might it take you now, at a average rate of going, to be a Judge?" asked Mr. Boffin, after surveying his small stature in silence.

The boy answered that he had not yet quite worked out that little calculation.

"I suppose there's nothing to prevent your going in for it?" said Mr. Boffin.

The boy virtually replied that as he had the honor to be a Briton who never never never, there was nothing to prevent his going in for it. Yet he seemed inclined to suspect that there might be something to prevent his coming out with it.

"Would a couple of pound help you up at all?" asked Mr. Boffin.

On this head, young Blight had no doubt whatever, so Mr. Boffin made him a present of that sum of money, and thanked him for his attention to his (Mr. Boffin's) affairs; which, he added, were now, he believed, as good as settled.

Then Mr. Boffin, with his stick at his ear, like a Familiar Spirit explaining the office to him, sat staring at a little book-case of Law Practice and Law Reports, and at a window, and at an empty blue bag, and at a stick of sealing-wax, and a pen, and a box of wafers, and an apple, and a writing-pad—all very dusty—and at a number of inky smears and blots, and at an imperfectly-disguised gun-case pretending to be something legal, and at an iron box labeled HARMON ESTATE, until Mr. Lightwood appeared.

Mr. Lightwood explained that he came from the proctor's, with whom he had been engaged in transacting Mr. Boffin's affairs.

"And they seem to have taken a deal out of you!" said Mr. Boffin, with commiseration.

Mr. Lightwood, without explaining that his weariness was chronic, proceeded with his exposition that, all forms of law having been at length complied with, will of Harmon deceased having been proved, death of Harmon next inheriting having been proved, etc. and so forth, Court of Chancery having been moved, etc. and so forth, he, Mr. Lightwood, had now the great gratification, honor, and happiness, again etc. and so forth, of congratulating Mr. Boffin on coming into possession, as residuary legatee, of upward of one hundred thousand pounds, standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, again etc. and so forth.

"And what is particularly eligible in the property Mr. Boffin, is, that it involves no trouble. There are no estates to manage, no rents to return so much per cent. upon in bad times (which is an extremely dear way of getting your name into the newspapers), no voters to become par-boiled in hot water with, no agents to take the cream off the milk before it comes to table. You could put the whole in a cash-box to-morrow morning, and take it with you to—say, to the Rocky Mountains. Inasmuch as every man," concluded Mr. Lightwood, with an indolent smile, "appears to be under a fatal spell which obliges him, sooner or later, to mention the Rocky Mountains in a tone of extreme familiarity to some other man, I hope you'll excuse my pressing you into the service of that gigantic range of geographical bores."

Without following this last remark very closely, Mr. Boffin cast his perplexed gaze first at the ceiling, and then at the carpet.

"Well," he remarked, "I don't know what to say about it, I am sure. I was a'most as well as I was. It's a great lot to take care of."

"My dear Mr. Boffin, then don't take care of it!"

"Eh?" said that gentleman.

"Speaking now," returned Mortimer, "with the irresponsible imbecility of a private individual, and not with the profundity of a professional adviser, I should say that if the circumstance of its being too much weighs upon your mind, you have the haven of consolation open to you that you can easily make it less. And if you should be apprehensive of the trouble of doing so, there is the further haven of consolation that any number of people will take the trouble off your hands."

"Well! I don't quite see it," retorted Mr. Boffin, still perplexed. "That's not satisfactory, you know, what you're a-saying."

"Is Anything satisfactory, Mr. Boffin?" asked Mortimer, raising his eyebrows.

"I used to find it so," answered Mr. Boffin, with a wistful look. "While I was foreman at the Bower—afore it was the Bower—I considered the business very satisfactory. The old man was a awful Tartar (saying it, I'm sure, without disrespect to his memory) but the business was a pleasant one to look after, from before daylight to past dark. It's a'most a pity," said Mr. Boffin, rubbing his ear, "that he ever went and made so much money. It would have been better for him if he hadn't so given himself up to it. You may depend upon it," making the discovery all of a sudden, "that he found it a great lot to take care of!"

Mr. Lightwood coughed, not convinced.

"And speaking of satisfactory," pursued Mr. Boffin, "why, Lord save us! when we come to take it to pieces, bit by bit, where's the satisfactoriness of the money as yet? When the old man does right the poor boy after all, the poor boy gets no good of it. He gets made away with, at the moment when he's lifting (as one may say) the cup and sarser to his lips. Mr. Lightwood, I will now name to you, that on behalf of the poor dear boy, me and Mrs. Boffin have stood out against the old man times out of number, till he has called us every name he could lay his tongue to. I have seen him, after Mrs. Boffin has given him her mind respecting the claims of the nat'ral affections, catch off Mrs. Boffin's bonnet (she wore, in general, a black straw, perched as a matter of convenience on the top of her head), and send it spinning across the yard. I have indeed. And once, when he did this in a manner that amounted to personal, I should have given him a rattler for himself, if Mrs. Boffin hadn't thrown herself betwixt us, and received flush on the temple. Which dropped her, Mr. Lightwood. Dropped her."

Mr. Lightwood murmured "Equal honor—Mrs. Boffin's head and heart."

"You understand: I name this," pursued Mr. Boffin, "to show you, now the affairs are wound up, that me and Mrs. Boffin have ever stood, as we were in Christian honor bound, the children's friend. Me and Mrs. Boffin stood the poor girl's friend; me and Mrs. Boffin stood the poor boy's friend; me and Mrs. Boffin up and faced the old man when we momentarily expected to be turned out for our pains. As to Mrs. Boffin," said Mr. Boffin, lowering his voice, "she mightn't wish it mentioned now she's Fashionable, but she went so far as to tell him, in my presence, he was a flinty-hearted rascal."

Mr. Lightwood murmured "Vigorous Saxon spirit—Mrs. Boffin's ancestors—bowmen—Agincourt and Cressy."

"The last time me and Mrs. Boffin saw the poor boy," said Mr. Boffin, warming (as fat usually does) with a tendency to melt, "he was a child of seven year old. For when he come back to make intercession for his sister, me and Mrs. Boffin were away overlooking a country contract which was to be sifted before carted, and he was come and gone in a single hour. I say he was a child of seven year old. He was going away, all alone and forlorn, to that foreign school, and he come into our place, situate up the yard of the present Bower, to have a warm at our fire. There was his little scanty traveling clothes upon him. There was his little scanty box outside in the shivering wind, which I was going to carry for him down to the steamboat, as the old man wouldn't hear of allowing a sixpence coach-money. Mrs. Boffin, then quite a young woman and a pictur of a full-blown rose, stands him by her, kneels down at the fire, warms her two open hands, and falls to rubbing his cheeks; but seeing the tears come into the child's eyes, the tears come fast into her own, and she holds him round the neck, like as if she was protecting him, and cries to me, 'I'd give the wide wide world, I would, to run away with him!' I don't say but what it cut me, and but what it at the same time heightened my feelings of admiration for Mrs. Boffin. The poor child clings to her for a while, as she clings to him, and then, when the old man calls, he says 'I must go! God bless you!' and for a moment rests his heart against her bosom, and looks up at both of us, as if it was in pain—in agony. Such a look! I went aboard with him (I gave him first what little treat I thought he'd like), and I left him when he had fallen asleep in his berth, and I came back to Mrs. Boffin. But tell her what I would of how I had left him, it all went for nothing, for, according to her thoughts, he never changed that look that he had looked up at us two. But it did one piece of good. Mrs. Boffin and me had no child of our own, and had sometimes wished that how we had one. But not now. 'We might both of us die,' says Mrs. Boffin, 'and other eyes might see that lonely look in our child.' So of a night, when it was very cold, or when the wind roared, or the rain dripped heavy, she would wake sobbing, and call out in a fluster, 'Don't you see the poor child's face? O shelter the poor child!'—till in course of years it gently wore out, as many things do."

"My dear Mr. Boffin, every thing wears to rags," said Mortimer, with a light laugh.

"I won't go so far as to say every thing," returned Mr. Boffin, on whom his manner seemed to grate, "because there's some things that I never found among the dust. Well, Sir. So Mrs. Boffin and me grow older and older in the old man's service, living and working pretty hard in it, till the old man is discovered dead in his bed. Then Mrs. Boffin and me seal up his box, always standing on the table at the side of his bed, and having frequently heard tell of the Temple as a spot where lawyers' dust is contracted for, I come down here in search of a lawyer to advise, and I see your young man up at this present elevation, chopping at the flies on the window-sill with his penknife, and I give him a Hoy! not then having the pleasure of your acquaintance, and by that means come to gain the honor. Then you, and the gentleman in the uncomfortable neckcloth under the little archway in Saint Paul's Church-yard—"

"Doctors' Commons," observed Lightwood.

"I understood it was another name," said Mr. Boffin, pausing, "but you know best. Then you and Doctor Scemmons, you go to work, and you do the thing that's proper, and you and Doctor S. take steps for finding out the poor boy, and at last you do find out the poor boy, and me and Mrs. Boffin often exchange the observation, 'We shall see him again, under happy circumstances.' But it was never to be; and the want of satisfactoriness is, that after all the money never gets to him."

"But it gets," remarked Lightwood, with a languid inclination of the head, "into excellent hands."

"It gets into the hands of me and Mrs. Boffin only this very day and hour, and that's what I am working round to, having waited for this day and hour a' purpose. Mr. Lightwood, here has been a wicked cruel murder. By that murder me and Mrs. Boffin mysteriously profit. For the apprehension and conviction of the murderer, we offer a reward of one tithe of the property—a reward of Ten Thousand Pound."

"Mr. Boffin, it's too much."

"Mr. Lightwood, me and Mrs. Boffin have fixed the sum together, and we stand to it."

"But let me represent to you," returned Lightwood, "speaking now with professional profundity, and not with individual imbecility, that the offer of such an immense reward is a temptation to forced suspicion, forced construction of circumstances, strained accusation, a whole tool-box of edged tools."

"Well," said Mr. Boffin, a little staggered, "that's the sum we put o' one side for the purpose. Whether it shall be openly declared in the new notices that must now be put about in our names—"

"In your name, Mr. Boffin; in your name."

"Very well; in my name, which is the same as Mrs. Boffin's, and means both of us, is to be considered in drawing 'em up. But this is the first instruction that I, as the owner of the property, give to my lawyer on coming into it."

"Your lawyer, Mr. Boffin," returned Lightwood, making a very short note of it with a very rusty pen, "has the gratification of taking the instruction. There is another?"

"There is just one other, and no more. Make me as compact a little will as can be reconciled with tightness, leaving the whole of the property to 'my beloved wife, Henerietty Boffin, sole executrix.' Make it as short as you can, using those words; but make it tight."

At some loss to fathom Mr. Boffin's notions of a tight will, Lightwood felt his way.

"I beg your pardon, but professional profundity must be exact. When you say tight—"

"I mean tight," Mr. Boffin explained.

"Exactly so. And nothing can be more laudable. But is the tightness to bind Mrs. Boffin to any and what conditions?"

"Bind Mrs. Boffin?" interposed her husband.

"No! What are you thinking of! What I want is, to make it all hers so tight as that her hold of it can't be loosed."

"Hers freely, to do what she likes with? Hers absolutely?"

"Absolutely?" repeated Mr. Boffin, with a short sturdy laugh. "Hah! I should think so! It would be handsome in me to begin to bind Mrs. Boffin at this time of day!"

So that instruction, too, was taken by Mr. Lightwood; and Mr. Lightwood, having taken it, was in the act of showing Mr. Boffin out, when Mr. Eugene Wrayburn almost jostled him in the doorway. Consequently Mr. Lightwood said, in his cool manner, "Let me make you two known to one another," and further signified that Mr. Wrayburn was counsel learned in the law, and that, partly in the way of business and partly in the way of pleasure, he had imparted to Mr. Wrayburn some of the interesting facts of Mr. Boffin's biography.

"Delighted," said Eugene—though he didn't look so—"to know Mr. Boffin."

"Thankee, Sir, thankee," returned that gentleman. "And how do you like the law?"

"A—not particularly," returned Eugene.

"Too dry for you, eh? Well, I suppose it wants some years of sticking to, before you master it. But there's nothing like work. Look at the bees."

"I beg your pardon," returned Eugene, with a reluctant smile, "but will you excuse my mentioning that I always protest against being referred to the bees?"

"Do you!" said Mr. Boffin.

"I object on principle," said Eugene, "as a biped—"

"As a what?" asked Mr. Boffin.

"As a two-footed creature;—I object on principle, as a two-footed creature, to being constantly referred to insects and four-footed creatures. I object to being required to model my proceedings according to the proceedings of the bee, or the dog, or the spider, or the camel. I fully admit that the camel, for instance, is an excessively temperate person; but he has several stomachs to entertain himself with, and I have only one. Besides, I am not fitted up with a convenient cool cellar to keep my drink in."

"But I said, you know," urged Mr. Boffin, rather at a loss for an answer, "the bee."

"Exactly. And may I represent to you that it's injudicious to say the bee? For the whole case is assumed. Conceding for a moment that there is any analogy between a bee and a man in a shirt and pantaloons (which I deny), and that it is settled that the man is to learn from the bee (which I also deny), the question still remains, What is he to learn? To imitate? Or to avoid? When your friends the bees worry themselves to that highly fluttered extent about their sovereign, and become perfectly distracted touching the slightest monarchical movement, are we men to learn the greatness of Tuft-hunting, or the littleness of the Court Circular? I am not clear, Mr. Boffin, but that the hive may be satirical."

"At all events, they work," said Mr. Boffin.

"Ye-es," returned Eugene, disparagingly, "they work; but don't you think they overdo it? They work so much more than they need—they make so much more than they can eat—they are so incessantly boring and buzzing at their one idea till Death comes upon them—that don't you think they overdo it? And are human laborers to have no holidays because of the bees? And am I never to have change of air because the bees don't? Mr. Boffin, I think honey excellent at breakfast; but, regarded in the light of my conventional schoolmaster and moralist, I protest against the tyrannical humbug of your friend the bee. With the highest respect for you."

"Thankee," said Mr. Boffin. "Morning, morning!"

But the worthy Mr. Boffin jogged away with a comfortless impression he could have dispensed with, that there was a deal of unsatisfactoriness in the world, besides what he had recalled as appertaining to the Harmon property. And he was still jogging along Fleet Street in this condition of mind, when he became aware that he was closely tracked and observed by a man of genteel appearance.

"Now then," said Mr. Boffin, stopping short, with his meditations brought to an abrupt check, "what's the next article?"

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Boffin."

"My name too, eh? How did you come by it? I don't know you."

"No, Sir, you don't know me."

Mr. Boffin looked full at the man, and the man looked full at him. "No," said Mr. Boffin, after a glance at the pavement, as if it were made of faces and he were trying to match the man's, "I don't know you."

"I am nobody," said the stranger, "and not likely to be known; but Mr. Boffin's wealth—"

"Oh! that's got about already, has it?" muttered Mr. Boffin.

"—And his romantic manner of acquiring it make him conspicuous. You were pointed out to me the other day."

"Well," said Mr. Boffin, "I should say I was a disappointment to you when I was pinte^d out, if your politeness would allow you to confess it, for I am well aware I am not much to look at. What might you want with me? Not in the law, are you?"

"No, Sir."

"No information to give, for a reward?"

"No, Sir."

There may have been a momentary mantling in the face of the man as he made the last answer, but it passed directly.

"If I don't mistake, you have followed me from my lawyer's and tried to fix my attention. Say out! Have you? Or haven't you?" demanded Mr. Boffin, rather angry.

"Yes."

"Why have you?"

If you will allow me to walk beside you, Mr. Boffin, I will tell you. Would you object to turn aside into this place—I think it is called Clifford's Inn—where we can hear one another better than in the roaring street?"

("Now," thought Mr. Boffin, "if he proposes a game at skittles, or meets a country gentleman just come into property, or produces any article of jewelry he has found, I'll knock him down!") With this discreet reflection, and carrying his stick in his arms much as Punch carries his, Mr. Boffin turned into Clifford's Inn aforesaid.)

"Mr. Boffin, I happened to be in Chancery Lane this morning, when I saw you going along before me. I took the liberty of following you, trying to make up my mind to speak to you, till you went into your lawyer's. Then I waited outside till you came out."

("Don't quite sound like skittles, nor yet country gentleman, nor yet jewelry," thought Mr. Boffin, "but there's no knowing.")

"I am afraid my object is a bold one, I am afraid it has little of the usual practical world about it, but I venture it. If you ask me, or if you ask yourself—which is more likely—what emboldens me, I answer, I have been strongly assured that you are a man of rectitude and plain dealing, with the soundest of sound hearts, and that you are blessed in a wife distinguished by the same qualities."

"Your information is true of Mrs. Boffin, anyhow," was Mr. Boffin's answer, as he surveyed his new friend again. There was something repressed in the strange man's manner, and he walked with his eyes on the ground—though conscious, for all that, of Mr. Boffin's observation—and he spoke in a subdued voice. But his words came easily, and his voice was agreeable in tone, albeit constrained.

"When I add, I can discern for myself what the general tongue says of you—that you are quite unspoiled by Fortune, and not uplifted—I trust you will not, as a man of an open nature, suspect that I mean to flatter you, but will believe that all I mean is to excuse myself, these being my only excuses for my present intrusion."

("How much?" thought Mr. Boffin. "It must be coming to money. How much?")

"You will probably change your manner of living, Mr. Boffin, in your changed circumstances. You will probably keep a larger house, have many matters to arrange, and be beset by numbers of correspondents. If you would try me as your Secretary—"

"As what?" cried Mr. Boffin, with his eyes wide open.

"Your Secretary."

"Well," said Mr. Boffin, under his breath, "that's a queer thing!"

"Or," pursued the stranger, wondering at Mr. Boffin's wonder, "if you would try me as your man of business under any name, I know you would find me faithful and grateful, and I hope you would find me useful. You may naturally think that my immediate object is money. Not so, for I would willingly serve you a year—two years—any term you might appoint—before that should begin to be a consideration between us."

"Where do you come from?" asked Mr. Boffin.

"I come," returned the other, meeting his eye, "from many countries."

Mr. Boffin's acquaintance with the names and situations of foreign lands being limited in extent and somewhat confused in quality, he shaped his next question on an elastic model.

"From—any particular place?"

"I have been in many places."

"What have you been?" asked Mr. Boffin.

Here again he made no great advance, for the reply was, "I have been a student and a traveler."

"But if it ain't a liberty to plump it out," said Mr. Boffin, "what do you do for your living?"

"I have mentioned," returned the other, with another look at him, and a smile, "what I aspire to do. I have been superseded as to some slight intentions I had, and I may say that I have now to begin life."

Not very well knowing how to get rid of this applicant, and feeling the more embarrassed because his manner and appearance claimed a delicacy in which the worthy Mr. Boffin feared he himself might be deficient, that gentleman glanced into the mouldy little plantation or cat-preserve, of Clifford's Inn, as it was that day, in search of a suggestion. Sparrows were there, cats were there, dry-rot and wet-rot were there, but it was not otherwise a suggestive spot.

"All this time," said the stranger, producing a little pocket-book and taking out a card, "I have not mentioned my name. My name is Rokesmith. I lodge at one Mr. Wilfer's, at Hol-loway."

Mr. Boffin stared again.

"Father of Miss Bella Wilfer?" said he.

"My landlord has a daughter named Bella. Yes; no doubt."

Now this name had been more or less in Mr. Boffin's thoughts all the morning, and for days before; therefore he said:

"That's singular, too!" unconsciously staring again, past all bounds of good manners, with the card in his hand. "Though, by-the-by, I suppose it was one of that family that pinte me out?"

"No. I have never been in the streets with one of them."

"Heard me talked of among 'em, though?"

"No. I occupy my own rooms, and have held scarcely any communication with them."

"Odder and odder!" said Mr. Boffin. "Well,

Sir, to tell you the truth, I don't know what to say to you."

"Say nothing," returned Mr. Rokesmith; "allow me to call on you in a few days. I am not so unconscionable as to think it likely that you would accept me on trust at first sight, and take me out of the very street. Let me come to you for your further opinion, at your leisure."

"That's fair, and I don't object," said Mr. Boffin; "but it must be on condition that it's fully understood that I no more know that I shall ever be in want of any gentleman as Secretary—it was Secretary you said; wasn't it?"

"Yes."

Again Mr. Boffin's eyes opened wide, and he stared at the applicant from head to foot, repeating "Queer!—You're sure it was Secretary? Are you?"

"I am sure I said so."

—"As Secretary," repeated Mr. Boffin, meditating upon the word; "I no more know that I may ever want a Secretary, or what not, than I do that I shall ever be in want of the man in the moon. Me and Mrs. Boffin have not even settled that we shall make any change in our way of life. Mrs. Boffin's inclinations certainly do tend toward Fashion; but, being already set up in a fashionable way at the Bower, she may not make further alterations. However, Sir, as you don't press yourself, I wish to meet you so far as saying, by all means call at the Bower if you like. Call in the course of a week or two. At the same time, I consider that I ought to name, in addition to what I have already named, that I have in my employment a literary man—with a wooden leg—as I have no thoughts of parting from."

"I regret to hear I am in some sort anticipated," Mr. Rokesmith answered, evidently having heard it with surprise; "but perhaps other duties might arise?"

"You see," returned Mr. Boffin, with a confidential sense of dignity, "as to my literary man's duties, they're clear. Professionally he declines and he falls, and as a friend he drops into poetry."

Without observing that these duties seemed by no means clear to Mr. Rokesmith's astonished comprehension, Mr. Boffin went on:

"And now, Sir, I'll wish you good-day. You can call at the Bower any time in a week or two. It's not above a mile or so from you, and your landlord can direct you to it. But as he may not know it by its new name of Boffin's Bower, say, when you inquire of him, it's Harmon's; will you?"

"Harmoon's," repeated Mr. Rokesmith, seeming to have caught the sound imperfectly, "Har-marn's. How do you spell it?"

"Why, as to the spelling of it," returned Mr. Boffin, with great presence of mind, "that's your look out. Harmon's is all you've got to say to him. Morning, morning, morning!" And so departed, without looking back.

CHAPTER IX.

MR. AND MRS. BOFFIN IN CONSULTATION.

BETAKING himself straight homeward, Mr. Boffin, without further let or hindrance, arrived at the Bower, and gave Mrs. Boffin (in a walking-dress of black velvet and feathers, like a mourning coach-horse) an account of all he had said and done since breakfast.

"This brings us round, my dear," he then pursued, "to the question we left unfinished: namely, whether there's to be any new go-in for Fashion."

"Now, I'll tell you what I want, Noddy," said Mrs. Boffin, smoothing her dress with an air of immense enjoyment, "I want Society."

"Fashionable Society, my dear?"

"Yes!" cried Mrs. Boffin, laughing with the glee of a child. "Yes! It's no good my being kept here like Wax-Work; is it now?"

"People have to pay to see Wax-Work, my dear," returned her husband, "whereas (though you'd be cheap at the same money) the neighbors is welcome to see you for nothing."

"But it don't answer," said the cheerful Mrs. Boffin. "When we worked like the neighbors, we suited one another. Now we have left work off, we have left off suiting one another."

"What, do you think of beginning work again?" Mr. Boffin hinted.

"Out of the question! We have come into a great fortune, and we must do what's right by our fortune; we must act up to it."

Mr. Boffin, who had a deep respect for his wife's intuitive wisdom, replied, though rather pensively: "I suppose we must."

"It's never been acted up to yet, and, consequently, no good has come of it," said Mrs. Boffin.

"True, to the present time," Mr. Boffin assented, with his former pensiveness, as he took his seat upon his settle. "I hope good may be coming of it in the future time. Toward which, what's your views, old lady?"

Mrs. Boffin, a smiling creature, broad of figure and simple of nature, with her hands folded in her lap, and with buxom creases in her throat, proceeded to expound her views.

"I say, a good house in a good neighborhood, good things about us, good living, and good society. I say, live like our means, without extravagance, and be happy."

"Yes. I say be happy, too," assented the still pensive Mr. Boffin.

"Lor-a-mussy!" exclaimed Mrs. Boffin, laughing and clapping her hands, and gayly rocking herself to and fro, "when I think of me in a light yellow chariot and pair, with silver boxes to the wheels—"

"Oh! you was thinking of that, was you, my dear?"

"Yes!" cried the delighted creature. "And with a footman up behind, with a bar across, to keep his legs from being poled! And with a coachman up in front, sinking down into a seat big enough for three of him, all covered with upholstery in green and white! And with two bay horses tossing their heads and stepping higher than they trot long-ways! And with you and me leaning back inside, as grand as nine-pence! Oh-h-h-h My! Ha ha ha ha ha!"

Mrs. Boffin clapped her hands again, rocked herself again, beat her feet upon the floor, and wiped the tears of laughter from her eyes.

"And what, my old lady," inquired Mr. Boffin, when he also had sympathetically laughed: "what's your views on the subject of the Bower?"

"Shut it up. Don't part with it, but put somebody in it, to keep it."

"Any other views?"

"Noddy," said Mrs. Boffin, coming from her fashionable sofa to his side on the plain settle, and hooking her comfortable arm through his, "Next I think—and I really have been thinking early and late—of the disappointed girl; her that was so cruelly disappointed, you know, both of her husband and his riches. Don't you think we might do something for her? Have her to live with us? Or something of that sort?"

"Ne-ver once thought of the way of doing it!" cried Mr. Boffin, smiting the table in his admiration. "What a thinking steam-ingen in this old lady is. And she don't know how she does it. Neither does the ingen!"

Mrs. Boffin pulled his nearest ear, in acknowledgment of this piece of philosophy, and then said, gradually toning down to a motherly strain: "Last, and not least, I have taken a fancy. You remember dear little John Harmon, before he went to school? Over yonder across the yard, at our fire? Now that he is past all benefit of the money, and it's come to us, I should like to find some orphan child, and take the boy and adopt him and give him John's name, and provide for him. Somehow, it would make me easier, I fancy. Say it's only a whim—"

"But I don't say so," interposed her husband.

"No, but deary, if you did—"

"I should be a Beast if I did," her husband interposed again.

"That's as much as to say you agree? Good and kind of you, and like you, deary! And don't you begin to find it pleasant now," said Mrs. Boffin, once more radiant in her comely way from head to foot, and once more smoothing her dress with immense enjoyment, "don't you begin to find it pleasant already, to think that a child will be made brighter, and better, and happier, because of that poor sad child that day? And isn't it pleasant to know that the good will be done with the poor sad child's own money?"

"Yes; and it's pleasant to know that you are Mrs. Boffin," said her husband, "and it's been a pleasant thing to know this many and many a year!" It was ruin to Mrs. Boffin's aspirations, but, having so spoken, they sat side by side, a hopelessly Unfashionable pair.

These two ignorant and unpolished people had guided themselves so far on in their journey of life by a religious sense of duty and desire to do right. Ten thousand weaknesses and absurdities might have been detected in the breasts of both; ten thousand vanities additional, possibly, in the breast of the woman. But the hard wrathful and sordid nature that had wrung as much work out of them as could be got in their best days, for as little money as could be paid to hurry on their worst, had never been so warped but that it knew their moral straightness and respected it. In its own despite, in a constant conflict with itself and them, it had done so. And this is the eternal law. For, Evil often stops short at itself and dies with the doer of it; but Good, never.

Through his most inveterate purposes, the dead Jailer of Harmony Jail had known these two faithful servants to be honest and true. While he raged at them and reviled them for opposing him with the speech of the honest and true, it had scratched his stony heart, and he had perceived the powerlessness of all his wealth to buy them if he had addressed himself to the attempt. So, even while he was their gripping taskmaster and never gave them a good word, he had written their names down in his will. So, even while it was his daily declaration that he mistrusted all mankind—and sorely indeed he did mistrust all who bore any resemblance to himself—he was as certain that these two people, surviving him, would be trust-worthy in all things from the greatest to the least, as he was that he must surely die.

Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, sitting side by side, with Fashion withdrawn to an immeasurable distance, fell to discussing how they could best find their orphan. Mrs. Boffin suggested advertisement in the newspapers, requesting orphans answering annexed description to apply at the Bower on a certain day; but Mr. Boffin wisely apprehending obstruction of the neighboring thoroughfares by orphan swarms, this course was negatived. Mrs. Boffin next suggested application to their clergyman for a likely orphan. Mr. Boffin thinking better of this scheme, they resolved to call upon the reverend gentleman at once, and to take the same opportunity of making acquaintance with Miss Bella Wilfer. In order that these visits might be visits of state, Mrs. Boffin's equipage was ordered out.

This consisted of a long hammer-headed old horse, formerly used in the business, attached to a four-wheeled chaise of the same period, which had long been exclusively used by the Harmony Jail poultry as the favorite laying-place of several discreet hens. An unwonted application of corn to the horse, and of paint and varnish to the carriage, when both fell in as a part of the Boffin legacy, had made what Mr. Boffin considered a neat turn-out of the whole; and a driver being added, in the person of a long hammer-headed young man who was a very good match for the horse, left nothing to be desired. He, too, had been formerly used in the business, but was now entombed by an honest jobbing tailor of the district in a perfect Sepulchre of coat and gaiters, sealed with ponderous buttons.

Behind this domestic Mr. and Mrs. Boffin took their seats in the back compartment of the vehicle: which was sufficiently commodious, but had an undignified and alarming tendency, in getting over a rough crossing, to hiccup itself away from the front compartment. On their being descried emerging from the gates of the Bower, the neighborhood turned out at door and window to salute the Boffins. Among those who were ever and again left behind, staring after the equipage, were many youthful spirits, who hailed it in stentorian tones with such congratulations as "Nod-dy Bof-fin!" "Bof-fin's money!" "Down with the dust, Bof-fin!" and other similar compliments. These, the hammer-headed young man took in such ill part that he often impaired the majesty of the progress by pulling up short, and making as though he would alight to exterminate the offenders; a purpose from which he only allowed himself to be dissuaded after long and lively arguments with his employers.

At length the Bower district was left behind, and the peaceful dwelling of the Reverend Frank Milvey was gained. The Reverend Frank Milvey's abode was a very modest abode, because his income was a very modest income. He was officially accessible to every blundering old woman who had incoherence to bestow upon him, and readily received the Boffins. He was quite a young man, expensively educated and wretchedly paid, with quite a young wife and half a dozen quite young children. He was under the necessity of teaching and translating from the classics to eke out his scanty means, yet was generally expected to have more time to spare than the idlest person in the parish, and more money than the richest. He accepted the needless inequalities and inconsistencies of his life, with a kind of conventional submission that was almost slavish; and any daring layman who would have adjusted such burdens as his, more decently and graciously, would have had small help from him.

With a ready patient face and manner, and yet with a latent smile that showed a quick enough observation of Mrs. Boffin's dress, Mr. Milvey, in his little back room—charged with sounds and cries as though the six children above were coming down through the ceiling, and the roasting leg of mutton below were coming up through the floor—listened to Mrs. Boffin's statement of her want of an orphan.

"I think," said Mr. Milvey, "that you have never had a child of your own, Mr. and Mrs. Boffin?"

Never.

"But, like the Kings and Queens in the Fairy Tales, I suppose you have wished for one?"

In a general way, yes.

Mr. Milvey smiled again, as he remarked to himself, "Those kings and queens were always wishing for children." It occurring to him, perhaps, that if they had been Curates, their wishes might have tended in the opposite direction.

"I think," he pursued, "we had better take Mrs. Milvey into our Council. She is indispensable to me. If you please, I'll call her."

So Mr. Milvey called, "Margaretta, my dear!" and Mrs. Milvey came down. A pretty, bright little woman, something worn by anxiety, who had repressed many pretty tastes and bright fancies, and substituted in their stead schools, soup, flannel, coals, and all the week-day cares and Sunday coughs of a large population, young and old. As gallantly had Mr. Milvey repressed much in himself that naturally belonged to his old studies and old fellow-students, and taken up among the poor and their children with the hard crumbs of life.

"Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, my dear, whose good fortune you have heard of."

Mrs. Milvey, with the most unaffected grace in the world, congratulated them, and was glad to see them. Yet her engaging face, being an open as well as a perceptive one, was not without her husband's latent smile.

"Mrs. Boffin wishes to adopt a little boy, my dear."

Mrs. Milvey, looking rather alarmed, her husband added:

"An orphan, my dear."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Milvey, reassured for her own little boys.

"And I was thinking, Margaretta, that perhaps old Mrs. Goody's grandchild might answer the purpose."

"Oh my dear Frank! I don't think that would do!"

"No?"

"Oh no!"

The smiling Mrs. Boffin, feeling it incumbent on her to take part in the conversation, and being charmed with the emphatic little wife and her ready interest, here offered her acknowledgments and inquired what there was against him?

"I don't think," said Mrs. Milvey, glancing at the Reverend Frank—"and I believe my husband will agree with me when he considers it again—that you could possibly keep that orphan clean from snuff. Because his grandmother takes so many ounces, and drops it over him."

"But he would not be living with his grandmother then, Margaretta," said Mr. Milvey.

"No, Frank, but it would be impossible to keep her from Mrs. Boffin's house; and the more there was to eat and drink there, the oftener she would go. And she is an inconvenient woman. I hope it's not uncharitable to remember that last Christmas Eve she drank eleven cups of tea, and grumbled all the time. And she is not a grateful woman, Frank. You recollect her addressing a crowd outside this house, about her wrongs, when, one night after we had gone to bed, she brought back the petticoat of new flannel that had been given her, because it was too short."

"That's true," said Mr. Milvey. "I don't think that would do. Would little Harrison—"

"Oh, Frank!" remonstrated his emphatic wife.

"He has no grandmother, my dear."

"No, but I don't think Mrs. Boffin would like an orphan who squints so much."

"That's true again," said Mr. Milvey, becoming haggard with perplexity. "If a little girl would do—"

"But, my dear Frank, Mrs. Boffin wants a boy."

"That's true again," said Mr. Milvey. "Tom Bocker is a nice boy" (thoughtfully).

"But I doubt, Frank," Mrs. Milvey hinted, after a little hesitation, "if Mrs. Boffin wants an orphan quite nineteen, who drives a cart and waters the roads."

Mr. Milvey referred the point to Mrs. Boffin in a look; on that smiling lady's shaking her black velvet bonnet and bows, he remarked, in lower spirits, "That's true again."

"I am sure," said Mrs. Boffin, concerned at giving so much trouble, "that if I had known you would have taken so much pains, Sir—and you too, ma'am—I don't think I would have come."

"Pray don't say that!" urged Mrs. Milvey.

"No, don't say that," assented Mr. Milvey, "because we are so much obliged to you for giving us the preference." Which Mrs. Milvey confirmed; and really the kind, conscientious couple spoke as if they kept some profitable orphan warehouse and were personally patronized. "But it is a responsible trust," added Mr. Milvey, "and difficult to discharge. At the same time, we are naturally very unwilling to lose the chance you so kindly give us, and if you could afford us a day or two to look about us—you know, Margaretta, we might carefully examine the work-house, and the Infant School, and your District."

"To be sure!" said the emphatic little wife.

"We have orphans, I know," pursued Mr. Milvey, quite with the air as if he might have added, "in stock," and quite as anxiously as if there were great competition in the business and he were afraid of losing an order, "over at the clay-pits; but they are employed by relations or friends, and I am afraid it would come at last to a transaction in the way of barter. And even if you exchanged blankets for the child—or books and firing—it would be impossible to prevent their being turned into liquor."

Accordingly, it was resolved that Mr. and Mrs. Milvey should search for an orphan likely to suit, and as free as possible from the foregoing objections, and should communicate again with Mrs. Boffin. Then Mr. Boffin took the liberty of mentioning to Mr. Milvey that if Mr. Milvey would do him the kindness to be perpetually his banker to the extent of "a twenty-pound note or so," to be expended without any reference to him, he would be heartily obliged. At this, both Mr. Milvey and Mrs. Milvey were quite as much pleased as if they had no wants of their own, but only knew what poverty was in the persons of other people; and so the interview terminated with satisfaction and good opinion on all sides.

"Now, old lady," said Mr. Boffin, as they resumed their seats behind the hammer-headed horse and man: "having made a very agreeable visit there, we'll try Wilfer's."

It appeared, on their drawing up at the family gate, that to try Wilfer's was a thing more easily projected than done, on account of the extreme difficulty of getting into that establishment; three pulls at the bell producing no external result, though each was attended by audible sounds of scampering and rushing within. At the fourth tug—vindictively administered by the hammer-headed young man—Miss Lavinia appeared, emerging from the house in an accidental manner, with a bonnet and parasol, as designing to take a contemplative walk. The young lady was astonished to find visitors at the gate, and expressed her feelings in appropriate action.

"Here's Mr. and Mrs. Boffin!" growled the hammer-headed young man through the bars of the gate, and at the same time shaking it, as if he were on view in a Menagerie; "they've been here half an hour."

"Who did you say?" asked Miss Lavinia.

"Mr. and Mrs. BOFFIN!" returned the young man, rising into a roar.

Miss Lavinia tripped up the steps to the house-door, tripped down the steps with the key, tripped across the little garden, and opened the gate. "Please to walk in," said Miss Lavinia, haughtily. "Our servant is out."

Mr. and Mrs. Boffin complying, and pausing in the little hall until Miss Lavinia came up to show them where to go next, perceived three pairs of listening legs upon the stairs above. Mrs. Wilfer's legs, Miss Bella's legs, Mr. George Sampson's legs.

"Mr. and Mrs. Boffin, I think?" said Lavinia, in a warning voice.

Strained attention on the part of Mrs. Wilfer's legs, of Miss Bella's legs, of Mr. George Sampson's legs.

"Yes, Miss."

"If you'll step this way—down these stairs—I'll let Ma know."

Excited flight of Mrs. Wilfer's legs, of Miss Bella's legs, of Mr. George Sampson's legs.

After waiting some quarter of an hour alone in the family sitting-room, which presented traces of having been so hastily arranged after a meal that one might have doubted whether it was made tidy for visitors, or cleared for blindman's-buff, Mr. and Mrs. Boffin became aware of the entrance of Mrs. Wilfer, majestically faint, and with a condescending stitch in her side: which was her company manner.

"Pardon me," said Mrs. Wilfer, after the first salutations, and as soon as she had adjusted the handkerchief under her chin, and waved her gloved hands, "to what am I indebted for this honor?"

"To make short of it, ma'am," returned Mr.

Boffin, "perhaps you may be acquainted with the names of me and Mrs. Boffin, as having come into a certain property."

"I have heard, Sir," returned Mrs. Wilfer, with a dignified bend of her head, "of such being the case."

"And I dare say, ma'am," pursued Mr. Boffin, while Mrs. Boffin added confirmatory nods and smiles, "you are not very much inclined to take kindly to us?"

"Pardon me," said Mrs. Wilfer. "'Twere unjust to visit upon Mr. and Mrs. Boffin a calamity which was doubtless a dispensation." These words were rendered the more effective by a serenely heroic expression of suffering.

"That's fairly meant, I am sure," remarked the honest Mr. Boffin; "Mrs. Boffin and me, ma'am, are plain people, and we don't want to pretend to any thing, nor yet to go round and round at any thing: because there's always a straight way to every thing. Consequently, we make this call to say, that we shall be glad to have the honor and pleasure of your daughter's acquaintance, and that we shall be rejiced if your daughter will come to consider our house in the light of her home equally with this. In short, we want to cheer your daughter, and to give her the opportunity of sharing such pleasures as we are a going to take ourselves. We want to brisk her up, and brisk her about, and give her a change."

"That's it!" said the open-hearted Mrs. Boffin. "Lor! Let's be comfortable."

Mrs. Wilfer bent her head in a distant manner to her lady visitor, and with majestic monotony replied to the gentleman:

"Pardon me. I have several daughters. Which of my daughters am I to understand is thus favored by the kind intentions of Mr. Boffin and his lady?"

"Don't you see?" the ever-smiling Mrs. Boffin put in. "Naturally, Miss Bella, you know."

"Oh-h!" said Mrs. Wilfer, with a severely unconvinced look. "My daughter Bella is accessible and shall speak for herself." Then opening the door a little way, simultaneously with a sound of scuttling outside it, the good lady made the proclamation, "Send Miss Bella to me!" Which proclamation, though grandly formal, and one might almost say heraldic, to hear, was in fact enunciated with her maternal eyes reproachfully glaring on that young lady in the flesh—and in so much of it that she was retiring with difficulty into the small closet under the stairs, apprehensive of the emergence of Mr. and Mrs. Boffin.

"The avocations of R. W., my husband," Mrs. Wilfer explained, on resuming her seat, "keep him fully engaged in the City at this time of the day, or he would have had the honor of participating in your reception beneath our humble roof."

"Very pleasant premises!" said Mr. Boffin, cheerfully.

"Pardon me, Sir," returned Mrs. Wilfer, correcting him, "it is the abode of conscious though independent Poverty."

Finding it rather difficult to pursue the conversation down this road, Mr. and Mrs. Boffin sat staring at mid-air, and Mrs. Wilfer sat silently, giving them to understand that every breath she drew required to be drawn with a self-denial rarely paralleled in history, until Miss Bella appeared: whom Mrs. Wilfer presented, and to whom she explained the purpose of the visitors.

"I am much obliged to you, I am sure," said Miss Bella, coldly shaking her curls, "but I doubt if I have the inclination to go out at all."

"Bella!" Mrs. Wilfer admonished her; "Bella, you must conquer this."

"Yes, do what your Ma says, and conquer it, my dear," urged Mrs. Boffin, "because we shall be so glad to have you, and because you are much too pretty to keep yourself shut up." With that the pleasant creature gave her a kiss, and patted her on her dimpled shoulders; Mrs. Wilfer sitting stiffly by, like a functionary presiding over an interview previous to an execution.

"We are going to move into a nice house," said Mrs. Boffin, who was woman enough to compromise Mr. Boffin on that point, when he couldn't very well contest it; "and we are going to set up a nice carriage, and we'll go every where and see every thing. And you mustn't," seating Bella beside her, and patting her hand, "you mustn't feel a dislike to us to begin with, because we couldn't help it, you know, my dear."

With the natural tendency of youth to yield to candor and sweet temper, Miss Bella was so touched by the simplicity of this address that she frankly returned Mrs. Boffin's kiss. Not at all to the satisfaction of that good woman of the world, her mother, who sought to hold the advantageous ground of obliging the Boffins instead of being obliged.

"My youngest daughter, Lavinia," said Mrs. Wilfer, glad to make a diversion, as that young lady reappeared. "Mr. George Sampson, a friend of the family."

The friend of the family was in that stage of the tender passion which bound him to regard every body else as the foe of the family. He put the round head of his cane in his mouth, like a stopper, when he sat down. As if he felt himself full to the throat with affronting sentiments. And he eyed the Boffins with implacable eyes.

"If you like to bring your sister with you when you come to stay with us," said Mrs. Boffin, "of course we shall be glad. The better you please yourself, Miss Bella, the better you'll please us."

"Oh, my consent is of no consequence at all, I suppose?" cried Miss Lavinia.

"Lavvy," said her sister, in a low voice, "have the goodness to be seen and not heard."

"No, I won't," replied the sharp Lavinia.

"I'm not a child, to be taken notice of by strangers."

"You are a child."

"I'm not a child, and I won't be taken notice of. 'Bring your sister,' indeed!"

"Lavinia!" said Mrs. Wilfer. "Hold! I will not allow you to utter in my presence the absurd suspicion that any strangers—I care not what their names—can patronize my child. Do you dare to suppose, you ridiculous girl, that Mr. and Mrs. Boffin would enter these doors upon a patronizing errand; or, if they did, would remain within them, only for one single instant, while your mother had the strength yet remaining in her vital frame to request them to depart? You little know your mother if you presume to think so."

"It's all very fine," Lavinia began to grumble, when Mrs. Wilfer repeated:

"Hold! I will not allow this. Do you not know what is due to guests? Do you not comprehend that in presuming to hint that this lady and gentleman could have any idea of patronizing any member of your family—I care not which—you accuse them of an impertinence little less than insane?"

"Never mind me and Mrs. Boffin, ma'am," said Mr. Boffin, smilingly: "we don't care."

"Pardon me, but I do," returned Mrs. Wilfer.

Miss Lavinia laughed a short laugh as she muttered, "Yes, to be sure."

"And I require my audacious child," proceeded Mrs. Wilfer, with a withering look at her youngest, on whom it had not the slightest effect, "to please to be just to her sister Bella; to remember that her sister Bella is much sought after; and that when her sister Bella accepts an attention, she considers herself to be conferring qui-i-ite as much honor"—this with an indignant shiver—"as she receives."

But here Miss Bella repudiated, and said quietly, "I can speak for myself, you know, ma. You needn't bring me in, please."

"And it's all very well aiming at others through convenient me," said the irrepressible Lavinia, spitefully; "but I should like to ask George Sampson what he says to it."

"Mr. Sampson," proclaimed Mrs. Wilfer, seeing that young gentleman take his stopper out, and so darkly fixing him with her eyes as that he put it in again: "Mr. Sampson, as a friend of this family and a frequenter of this house, is, I am persuaded, far too well-bred to interpose on such an invitation."

This exaltation of the young gentleman moved the conscientious Mrs. Boffin to repentance for having done him an injustice in her mind, and consequently to saying that she and Mr. Boffin would at any time be glad to see him; an attention which he handsomely acknowledged by replying, with his stopper unremoved, "Much obliged to you, but I'm always engaged, day and night."

However, Bella compensating for all drawbacks by responding to the advances of the Boffins in an engaging way, that easy pair were on the whole well satisfied, and proposed to the said Bella that as soon as they should be in a condition to receive her in a manner suitable to their desires, Mrs. Boffin should return with notice of the fact. This arrangement Mrs. Wilfer sanctioned with a stately inclination of her head and wave of her gloves, as who should say, "Your demerits shall be overlooked, and you shall be mercifully gratified, poor people."

"By-the-by, ma'am," said Mr. Boffin, turning back as he was going, "you have a lodger?"

"A gentleman," Mrs. Wilfer answered, qualifying the low expression, "undoubtedly occupies our first floor."

"I may call him Our Mutual Friend," said Mr. Boffin. "What sort of a fellow is Our Mutual Friend, now? Do you like him?"

"Mr. Rokesmith is very punctual, very quiet, a very eligible inmate."

"Because," Mr. Boffin explained, "you must know that I'm not particularly well acquainted with Our Mutual Friend, for I have only seen him once. You give a good account of him. Is he at home?"

"Mr. Rokesmith is at home," said Mrs. Wilfer; "indeed," pointing through the window, "there he stands at the garden gate. Waiting for you, perhaps?"

"Perhaps so," replied Mr. Boffin. "Saw me come in, maybe."

Bella had closely attended to this short dialogue. Accompanying Mrs. Boffin to the gate, she as closely watched what followed.

"How are you, Sir, how are you?" said Mr. Boffin. "This is Mrs. Boffin. Mr. Rokesmith, that I told you of, my dear."

She gave him good-day, and he bestirred himself and helped her to her seat, and the like, with a ready hand.

"Good-by for the present, Miss Bella," said Mrs. Boffin, calling out a hearty parting. "We shall meet again soon! And then I hope I shall have my little John Harmon to show you."

Mr. Rokesmith, who was at the wheel adjusting the skirts of her dress, suddenly looked behind him, and around him, and then looked up at her, with a face so pale that Mrs. Boffin cried:

"Gracious!" And after a moment, "What's the matter, Sir?"

"How can you show her the Dead?" returned Mr. Rokesmith.

"It's only an adopted child. One I have told her of. One I'm going to give the name to!"

"You took me by surprise," said Mr. Rokesmith, "and it sounded like an omen, that you should speak of showing the Dead to one so young and blooming."

Now Bella suspected by this time that Mr. Rokesmith admired her. Whether the knowledge (for it was rather that than suspicion) caused her to incline to him a little more, or a little less, than she had done at first; whether it rendered her eager to find out more about him, because she sought to establish reason for her distrust, or because she sought to free him from it; was as yet dark to her own heart. But at most times he occupied a great amount of her attention, and she had set her attention closely on this incident.

That he knew it as well as she, she knew as well as he, when they were left together standing on the path by the garden gate.

"Those are worthy people, Miss Wilfer."

"Do you know them well?" asked Bella.

He smiled, reproaching her, and she colored, reproaching herself—both, with the knowledge that she had meant to entrap him into an answer not true—when he said "I know of them."

"Truly, he told us he had seen you but once."

"Truly, I supposed he did."

Bella was nervous now, and would have been glad to recall her question.

"You thought it strange that, feeling much interested in you, I should start at what sounded like a proposal to bring you into contact with the murdered man who lies in his grave. I might have known—of course in a moment should have known—that it could not have that meaning. But my interest remains."

Re-entering the family-room in a meditative state, Miss Bella was received by the irrepressible Lavinia with:

"There, Bella! At last I hope you have got your wishes realized—by your Boffins. You'll be rich enough now—with your Boffins. You can have as much flirting as you like—at your Boffins. But you won't take me to your Boffins, I can tell you—you and your Boffins too!"

"If," quoth Mr. George Sampson, moodily pulling his stopper out, "Miss Bella's Mr. Boffin comes any more of his nonsense to me, I only wish him to understand, as betwixt man and man, that he does it at his per—" and was going to say peril; but Miss Lavinia, having no confidence in his mental powers, and feeling his oration to have no definite application to any circumstances, jerked his stopper in again, with a sharpness that made his eyes water.

And now the worthy Mrs. Wilfer, having used her youngest daughter as a lay-figure for the edification of these Boffins, became bland to her, and proceeded to develop her last instance of force of character, which was still in reserve. This was, to illuminate the family with her remarkable powers as a physiognomist; powers that terrified R. W. whenever let loose, as being always fraught with gloom and evil which no inferior prescience was aware of. And this Mrs. Wilfer now did, be it observed, in jealousy of these Boffins, in the very same moments when she was already reflecting how she would flourish these very same Boffins and the state they kept, over the heads of her Boffinless friends.

"Of their manners," said Mrs. Wilfer, "I say nothing. Of their appearance, I say nothing. Of the disinterestedness of their intentions toward Bella, I say nothing. But the craft, the secrecy, the dark, deep underhanded plotting, written in Mrs. Boffin's countenance, make me shudder."

As an incontrovertible proof that those baleful attributes were all there, Mrs. Wilfer shuddered on the spot.

CHAPTER X.

A MARRIAGE CONTRACT.

THERE is excitement in the Veneering mansion. The mature young lady is going to be married (powder and all) to the mature young gentleman, and she is to be married from the Veneering house, and the Veneerings are to give the breakfast. The Analytical, who objects as a matter of principle to every thing that occurs on the premises, necessarily objects to the match; but his consent has been dispensed with, and a spring-van is delivering its load of greenhouse plants at the door, in order that to-morrow's feast may be crowned with flowers.

The mature young lady is a lady of property. The mature young gentleman is a gentleman of property. He invests his property. He goes, in a condescending amateurish way, into the City, attends meetings of Directors, and has to do with traffic in Shares. As is well known to the wise in their generation, traffic in Shares is the one thing to have to do with in this world. Have no antecedents, no established character, no cultivation, no ideas, no manners; have Shares. Have Shares enough to be on Boards of Direction in capital letters, oscillate on mysterious business between London and Paris, and be great. Where does he come from? Shares. Where is he going to? Shares. What are his tastes? Shares. Has he any principles? Shares. What squeezes him into Parliament? Shares. Perhaps he never of himself achieved success in any thing, never originated any thing, never produced any thing? Sufficient answer to all; Shares. O mighty Shares! To set those blaring images so high, and to cause us smaller vermin, as under the influence of henbane or opium, to cry out, night and day, "Relieve us of our money, scatter it for us, buy us and sell us, ruin us, only we beseech ye take rank among the powers of the earth, and fatten on us!"

While the Loves and Graces have been preparing this torch for Hymen, which is to be kindled to-morrow, Mr. Twemlow has suffered much in his mind. It would seem that both the mature young lady and the mature young gentleman must indubitably be Veneering's oldest friends. Wards of his, perhaps? Yet that can scarcely be, for they are older than himself. Veneering has been in their confidence throughout, and has done much to lure them to the altar. He has mentioned to Twemlow how he said to Mrs. Veneering, "Anastatia, this must be a match." He has mentioned to Twemlow how he regards Sophronia Akershem (the mature young lady) in the light of a sister, and Alfred Lammle (the mature young gentleman) in the light of a brother. Twemlow has asked him whether he went to school as a junior with Alfred? He has answered, "Not exactly." Whether Sophronia was adopted by his mother? He has answered, "Not precisely so." Twemlow's hand has gone to his forehead with a lost air.

But, two or three weeks ago, Twemlow, sitting over his newspaper, and over his dry toast and weak tea, and over the stable-yard in Duke Street, St. James's, received a highly-perfumed cocked-hat and monogram from Mrs. Veneering, entreating her dearest Mr. T., if not particularly engaged that day, to come like a charming soul and make a fourth at dinner with dear Mr. Podsnap, for the discussion of an interesting family topic; the last three words doubly underlined and pointed with a note of admiration. And Twemlow, replying, "Not engaged, and more than delighted," goes, and this takes place:

"My dear Twemlow," says Veneering, "your ready response to Anastatia's unceremonious invitation is truly kind, and like an old, old friend. You know our dear friend Podsnap?"

Twemlow ought to know the dear friend Podsnap who covered him with so much confusion, and he says he does know him, and Podsnap reciprocates. Apparently, Podsnap has been so wrought upon in a short time, as to believe that he has been intimate in the house many, many, many years. In the friendliest manner he is making himself quite at home with his back to the fire, executing a statuette of the Colossus at Rhodes. Twemlow has before noticed in his feeble way how soon the Veneering guests become infected with the Veneering fiction. Not, however, that he has the least notion of its being his own case.

"Our friends, Alfred and Sophronia," pursues Veneering the veiled prophet: "our friends Alfred and Sophronia, you will be glad to hear, my dear fellows, are going to be married. As my wife and I make it a family affair the entire direction of which we take upon ourselves, of course our first step is to communicate the fact to our family friends.

("Oh!" thinks Twemlow, with his eyes on Podsnap, "then there are only two of us, and he's the other.")

"I did hope," Veneering goes on, "to have had Lady Tippins to meet you; but she is always in request, and is unfortunately engaged."

("Oh!" thinks Twemlow, with his eyes wandering, "then there are three of us, and she's the other.")

"Mortimer Lightwood," resumes Veneering, "whom you both know, is out of town; but he writes, in his whimsical manner, that as we ask him to be bridegroom's best man when the ceremony takes place, he will not refuse, though he doesn't see what he has to do with it."

("Oh!" thinks Twemlow, with his eyes rolling, "then there are four of us, and he's the other.")

"Boots and Brewer," observes Veneering, "whom you also know, I have not asked to-day; but I reserve them for the occasion."

("Then," thinks Twemlow, with his eyes shut, "there are si—" But here collapses and does not completely recover until dinner is over and the Analytical has been requested to withdraw.)

"We now come," says Veneering, "to the point, the real point, of our little family consultation. Sophronia, having lost both father and mother, has no one to give her away."

"Give her away yourself," says Podsnap.

"My dear Podsnap, no. For three reasons. Firstly, because I couldn't take so much upon myself when I have respected family friends to remember. Secondly, because I am not so vain as to think that I look the part. Thirdly, because Anastatia is a little superstitious on the subject, and feels averse to my giving away any body until baby is old enough to be married."

"What would happen if he did?" Podsnap inquires of Mrs. Veneering.

"My dear Mr. Podsnap, it's very foolish I know, but I have an instinctive presentiment that if Hamilton gave away any body else first, he would never give away baby." Thus Mrs. Veneering; with her open hands pressed together, and each of her eight aquiline fingers looking so very like her one aquiline nose that the bran-new jewels on them seem necessary for distinction's sake.

"But, my dear Podsnap," quoth Veneering, "there is a tried friend of our family who, I think and hope you will agree with me, Podsnap, is the friend on whom this agreeable duty almost naturally devolves. That friend," saying the words as if the company were about a hundred and fifty in number, "is now among us. That friend is Twemlow."

"Certainly!" From Podsnap.

"That friend," Veneering repeats with greater firmness, "is our dear good Twemlow. And I can not sufficiently express to you, my dear Podsnap, the pleasure I feel in having this opinion of mine and Anastatia's so readily confirmed by you, that other equally familiar and tried friend who stands in the proud position—I mean who proudly stands in the position—or I ought rather to say, who places Anastatia and myself in the proud position of himself standing in the simple position—of baby's godfather." And, indeed, Veneering is much relieved in mind to find that Podsnap betrays no jealousy of Twemlow's elevation.

So it has come to pass that the spring-van is strewing flowers on the rosy hours and on the staircase, and that Twemlow is surveying the ground on which he is to play his distinguished part to-morrow. He has already been to the church, and taken note of the various impediments in the aisle, under the auspices of an extremely dreary widow who opens the pews, and whose left hand appears to be in a state of acute rheumatism, but is in fact voluntarily doubled up to act as a money-box.

And now Veneering shoots out of the Study wherein he is accustomed, when contemplative, to give his mind to the carving and gilding of the Pilgrims going to Canterbury, in order to show Twemlow the little flourish he has prepared for the trumpets of fashion, describing how that on the seventeenth instant, at St. James's Church, the Reverend Blank Blank, assisted by the Reverend Dash Dash, united in the bonds of matrimony, Alfred Lammle, Esquire, of Sackville Street, Piccadilly, to Sophronia, only daughter of the late Horatio Akershem, Esquire, of Yorkshire. Also how the fair bride was married from the house of Hamilton Veneering, Esquire, of Stucconia, and was given away by Melvin Twemlow, Esquire, of Duke Street, St. James's, second cousin to Lord Snigsworth, of Snigsworthy Park. While perusing which composition, Twemlow makes some opaque approach to perceiving that if the Reverend Blank Blank and the Reverend Dash Dash fail, after this introduction, to become enrolled in the list of Veneering's dearest and oldest friends, they will have none but themselves to thank for it.

After which, appears Sophronia (whom Twemlow has seen twice in his lifetime), to thank Twemlow for counterfeiting the late Horatio Akershem Esquire, broadly of Yorkshire. And after her, appears Alfred (whom Twemlow has seen once in his lifetime), to do the same and to make a pasty sort of glitter, as if he were constructed for candle-light only, and had been let out into daylight by some grand mistake. And after that, comes Mrs. Veneering, in a pervadingly aquiline state of figure, and with transparent little knobs on her temper, like the little transparent knob on the bridge of her nose, "Worn out by worry and excitement," as she tells her dear Mr. Twemlow, and reluctantly revived with curaçoa by the Analytical. And after that, the bridesmaids begin to come by railroad from various parts of the country, and to come like adorable recruits enlisted by a sergeant not present; for, on arriving at the Veneering dépôt, they are in a barrack of strangers.

So Twemlow goes home to Duke Street, St. James's, to take a plate of mutton broth with a chop in it, and a look at the marriage-service, in order that he may cut in at the right place to-morrow; and he is low, and feels it dull over the livery stable-yard, and is distinctly aware of a dint in his heart, made by the most adorable of the adorable bridesmaids. For, the poor little harmless gentleman once had his fancy, like the rest of us, and she didn't answer (as she often does not), and he thinks the adorable bridesmaid is like the fancy as she was then (which she is not at all), and that if the fancy had not married some one else for money, but had married him for love, he and she would have been happy (which they wouldn't have been), and that she has a tenderness for him still (whereas her toughness is a proverb). Brooding over the fire, with his dried little head in his dried little hands, and his dried little elbows on his dried little knees, Twemlow is melancholy. "No Adorable to bear me company here!" thinks he. "No Adorable at the club! A waste, a waste, a waste, my Twemlow!" And so drops asleep, and has galvanic starts all over him.

Betimes next morning, that horrible old Lady Tippins (relict of the late Sir Thomas Tippins, knighted in mistake for somebody else by His Majesty King George the Third, who, while performing the ceremony, was graciously pleased to observe, "What, what, what? Who, who, who? Why, why, why?") begins to be dyed and varnished for the interesting occasion. She has a reputation for giving smart accounts of things, and she must be at these people's early, my dear, to lose nothing of the fun. Whereabout in the bonnet and drapery announced by her name, any fragment of the real woman may be concealed, is perhaps known to her maid; but you could easily buy all you see of her, in Bond Street; or you might scalp her, and peel her, and scrape her, and make two Lady Tippins out of her, and yet not penetrate to the genuine article. She has a large gold eye-glass, has Lady Tippins, to survey the proceedings with. If she had one in each eye, it might keep that other drooping lid up, and look more uniform. But perennial youth is in her artificial flowers, and her list of lovers is full.

"Mortimer, you wretch," says Lady Tippins, turning the eye-glass about and about, "where is your charge, the bridegroom?"

"Give you my honor," returns Mortimer, "I don't know, and I don't care."

"Miserable! Is that the way you do your duty?"

"Beyond an impression that he is to sit upon my knee and be seconded at some point of the solemnities, like a principal at a prize-fight, I assure you I have no notion what my duty is," returns Mortimer.

Eugene is also in attendance, with a pervading air upon him of having presupposed the ceremony to be a funeral, and of being disappointed. The scene is the Vestry-room of St. James's Church, with a number of leathery old registers on shelves, that might be bound in Lady Tippinses.

But, hark! A carriage at the gate, and Mortimer's man arrives, looking rather like a spurious Mephistopheles and an unacknowledged member of that gentleman's family. Whom Lady Tippins, surveying through her eye-glass, considers a fine man, and quite a catch; and of whom Mortimer remarks, in the lowest spirits, as he approaches, "I believe this is my fellow, confound him!" More carriages at the gate, and lo the rest of the characters. Whom Lady Tippins, standing on a cushion, surveying through the eye-glass, thus checks off: "Bride; five-and-forty if a day, thirty shillings a yard, veil fifteen pound, pocket-handkerchief a present. Bridemaids; kept down for fear of outshining bride, consequently not girls, twelve and six pence a yard, Veneering's flowers, snub-nosed one rather pretty but too conscious of her stockings, bonnets three pound ten. Twemlow; blessed release for the dear man if she really was his daughter, nervous even under the pretense that she is; well he may be. Mrs. Veneering; never saw such velvet, say two thousand pounds as she stands, absolute jeweler's window, father must have been a pawnbroker, or how could these people do it? Attendant unknowns; pokey."

Ceremony performed, register signed, Lady Tippins escorted out of sacred edifice by Veneering, carriages rolling back to Stucconia, servants with favors and flowers, Veneering's house reached, drawing-rooms most magnificent. Here, the Podsnaps await the happy party; Mr. Podsnap, with his hair-brushes made the most of; that imperial rocking-horse, Mrs. Podsnap, majestically skittish. Here, too, are Boots and Brewer, and the two other Buffers; each Buffer with a flower in his button-hole, his hair curled, and his gloves buttoned on tight, apparently come prepared, if any thing had happened to the bridegroom, to be married instantly. Here, too, the bride's aunt and next relation; a widowed female of a Medusa sort, in a stony cap, glaring petrification at her fellow-creatures. Here, too, the bride's trustee; an oilcake-fed style of business-gentleman with moony spectacles, and an object of much interest. Veneering launching himself upon this trustee as his oldest friend (which makes seven, Twemlow thought), and confidentially retiring with him into the conservatory, it is understood that Veneering is his co-trustee, and that they are arranging about the fortune. Buffers are even overheard to whisper Thir-ty Thou-sand Pou-nds! with a smack and a relish suggestive of the very finest oysters. Pokey unknowns, amazed to find how intimately they know Veneering, pluck up spirit, fold their arms, and begin to contradict him before breakfast. What time Mrs. Veneering, carrying baby dressed as a bridesmaid, flits about among the company, emitting flashes of many-colored lightning from diamonds, emeralds, and rubies.

The Analytical, in course of time achieving what he feels to be due to himself in bringing to a dignified conclusion several quarrels he has on hand with the pastry-cook's men, announces breakfast. Dining-room no less magnificent than drawing-room; tables superb; all the camels out, and all laden. Splendid cake, covered with Cupids, silver, and true-lovers' knots. Splendid bracelet, produced by Veneering before going down, and clasped upon the arm of bride. Yet nobody seems to think much more of the Veneerings than if they were a tolerable landlord and landlady doing the thing in the way of business at so much a head. The bride and bridegroom talk and laugh apart, as has always been their manner; and the Buffers work their way through the dishes with systematic perseverance, as has always been their manner; and the pokey unknowns are exceedingly benevolent to one another in invitations to take glasses of Champagne; but Mrs. Podsnap, arching her mane and rocking her grandest, has a far more deferential audience than Mrs. Veneering; and Podsnap all but does the honors.

Another dismal circumstance is, that Veneering, having the captivating Tippins on one side of him and the bride's aunt on the other, finds it immensely difficult to keep the peace. For, Medusa, besides unmistakingly glaring petrification at the fascinating Tippins, follows every lively remark made by that dear creature with an audible snort: which may be referable to a chronic cold in the head, but may also be referable to indignation and contempt. And this snort being regular in its reproduction, at length comes to be expected by the company, who make embarrassing pauses when it is falling due, and by waiting for it, render it more emphatic when it comes. The stony aunt has likewise an injurious way of rejecting all dishes whereof Lady Tippins partakes: saying aloud when they are proffered to her, "No, no, no, not for me. Take it away!" As with a set purpose of implying a misgiving that if nourished upon similar meats she might come to be like that charmer, which would be a fatal consummation. Aware of her enemy, Lady Tippins tries a youthful sally or two, and tries the eye-glass; but, from the impenetrable cap and snorting armor of the stony aunt all weapons rebound powerless.

Another objectionable circumstance is, that the pokey unknowns support each other in being unimpressible. They persist in not being frightened by the gold and silver camels, and they are banded together to defy the elaborately chased ice-pails. They even seem to unite in some vague utterance of the sentiment that the landlord and landlady will make a pretty good profit out of this, and they almost carry themselves like customers. Nor is there compensating influence in the adorable bridesmaids; for, having very little interest in the bride, and none at all in one another, those lovely beings become, each one on her own account, depreciatingly contemplative of the millinery present; while the bridegroom's man, exhausted, in the back of his chair, appears to be improving the occasion by penitentially contemplating all the wrong he has ever done; the difference between him and his friend Eugene, being, that the latter, in the back of his chair, appears to be contemplating all the wrong he would like to do—particularly to the present company.

In which state of affairs, the usual ceremonies rather droop and flag, and the splendid cake when cut by the fair hand of the bride has but an indigestible appearance. However, all the things indispensable to be said are said, and all the things indispensable to be done are done (including Lady Tippins's yawning, falling asleep, and waking insensible), and there is hurried preparation for the nuptial journey to the Isle of Wight, and the outer air teems with brass bands and spectators. In full sight of whom, the malignant star of the Analytical has pre-ordained that pain and ridicule shall befall him. For he, standing on the doorsteps to grace the departure, is suddenly caught a most prodigious thump on the side of his head with a heavy shoe, which a Buffer in the hall, Champagne-flushed and wild of aim, has borrowed on the spur of the moment from the pastry-cook's porter, to cast after the departing pair as an auspicious omen.

So they all go up again into the gorgeous drawing-rooms—all of them flushed with breakfast, as having taken scarlatina sociably—and there the combined unknowns do malignant things with their legs to ottomans, and take as much as possible out of the splendid furniture. And so, Lady Tippins, quite undetermined whether to-day is the day before yesterday, or the day after to-morrow, or the week after next, fades away; and Mortimer Lightwood and Eugene fade away, and Twemlow fades away, and the stony aunt goes away—she declines to fade, proving rock to the last—and even the unknowns are slowly strained off, and it is all over.

All over, that is to say, for the time being. But there is another time to come, and it comes in about a fortnight, and it comes to Mr. and Mrs. Lammle on the sands at Shanklin, in the Isle of Wight.

Mr. and Mrs. Lammle have walked for some time on the Shanklin sands, and one may see by their footprints that they have not walked arm in arm, and that they have not walked in a straight track, and that they have walked in a moody humor; for the lady has prodded little spiriting holes in the damp sand before her with her parasol, and the gentleman has trailed his stick after him. As if he were of the Mephistopheles family indeed, and had walked with a drooping tail.

"Do you mean to tell me, then, Sophronia—"

Thus he begins after a long silence, when Sophronia flashes fiercely, and turns upon him.

"Don't put it upon me, Sir. I ask you, do you mean to tell me?"

Mr. Lammle falls silent again, and they walk as before. Mrs. Lammle opens her nostrils and bites her under-lip; Mr. Lammle takes his gingerous whiskers in his left hand, and, bringing them together, frowns furtively at his beloved, out of a thick gingerous bush.

"Do I mean to say!" Mrs. Lammle after a time repeats, with indignation. "Putting it on me! The unmanly disingenuousness!"

Mr. Lammle stops, releases his whiskers, and looks at her. "The what?"

Mrs. Lammle haughtily replies, without stopping, and without looking back. "The meaness."

He is at her side again in a pace or two, and he retorts, "That is not what you said. You said disingenuousness."

"What if I did?"

"There is no 'if' in the case. You did."

"I did, then. And what of it?"

"What of it?" says Mr. Lammle. "Have you the face to utter the word to me?"

"The face, too!" replied Mrs. Lammle, staring at him with cold scorn. "Pray, how dare you, Sir, utter the word to me?"

"I never did."

As this happens to be true, Mrs. Lammle is thrown on the feminine resource of saying, "I don't care what you uttered or did not utter."

After a little more walking and a little more silence, Mr. Lammle breaks the latter.

"You shall proceed in your own way. You claim a right to ask me do I mean to tell you. Do I mean to tell you what?"

"That you are a man of property?"

"No."

"Then you married me on false pretenses?"

"So be it. Next comes what you mean to say. Do you mean to say you are a woman of property?"

"No."

"Then you married me on false pretenses."

"If you were so dull a fortune-hunter that you deceived yourself, or if you were so greedy and grasping that you were over-willing to be deceived by appearances, is it my fault, you adventurer?" the lady demands, with great asperity.

"I asked Veneering, and he told me you were rich."

"Veneering!" with great contempt. "And what does Veneering know about me!"

"Was he not your trustee?"

"No. I have no trustee but the one you saw on the day when you fraudulently married me. And his trust is not a very difficult one, for it is only an annuity of a hundred and fifteen pounds. I think there are some odd shillings or pence, if you are very particular."

Mr. Lammle bestows a by no means loving look upon the partner of his joys and sorrows, and he mutters something; but checks himself.

"Question for question. It is my turn again, Mrs. Lammle. What made you suppose me a man of property?"

"You made me suppose you so. Perhaps you will deny that you always presented yourself to me in that character?"

"But you asked somebody, too. Come, Mrs. Lammle, admission for admission. You asked somebody?"

"I asked Veneering."

"And Veneering knew as much of me as he knew of you, or as any body knows of him."

After more silent walking, the bride stops short, to say in a passionate manner:

"I never will forgive the Veneerings for this!"

"Neither will I," returns the bridegroom.

With that they walk again; she, making those angry spirits in the sand; he, dragging that dejected tail. The tide is low, and seems to have thrown them together high on the bare shore. A gull comes sweeping by their heads, and flouts them. There was a golden surface on the brown cliffs but now, and behold they are only damp earth. A taunting roar comes from the sea, and the far-out rollers mount upon one another, to look at the entrapped impostors, and to join in impish and exultant gambols.

"Do you pretend to believe," Mrs. Lammle resumes, sternly, "when you talk of my marrying you for worldly advantages, that it was within the bounds of reasonable probability that I would have married you for yourself?"

"Again there are two sides to the question, Mrs. Lammle. What do you pretend to believe?"

"So you first deceive me and then insult me!" cries the lady, with a heaving bosom.

"Not at all. I have originated nothing. The double-edged question was yours."

"Was mine!" the bride repeats, and her parasol breaks in her angry hand.

His color has turned to a livid white, and ominous marks have come to light about his nose, as if the finger of the very devil himself had, within the last few moments, touched it here and there. But he has repressive power, and she has none.

"Throw it away," he coolly recommends as to the parasol; "you have made it useless; you look ridiculous with it."

Whereupon she calls him in her rage, "A deliberate villain," and so casts the broken thing from her as that it strikes him in falling. The finger-marks are something whiter for the instant, but he walks on at her side.

She bursts into tears, declaring herself the wretchedest, the most deceived, the worst-used, of women. Then she says that if she had the courage to kill herself she would do it. Then she calls him vile impostor. Then she asks him, why, in the disappointment of his base speculation, he does not take her life with his own hand, under the present favorable circumstances. Then she cries again. Then she is enraged again, and makes some mention of swindlers. Finally, she sits down crying on a block of stone, and is in all the known and unknown humors of her sex at once. Pending her changes, those aforesaid marks in his face have come and gone, now here now there, like white stops of a pipe on which the diabolical performer has played a tune. Also his livid lips are parted at last, as if he were breathless with running. Yet he is not.

"Now, get up, Mrs. Lammle, and let us speak reasonably."

She sits upon her stone, and takes no heed of him.

"Get up, I tell you."

Raising her head, she looks contemptuously in his face, and repeats, "You tell me! Tell me, forsooth!"

She affects not to know that his eyes are fastened on her as she droops her head again; but her whole figure reveals that she knows it un- easily.

"Enough of this. Come! Do you hear? Get up."

Yielding to his hand, she rises, and they walk again; but this time with their faces turned toward their place of residence.

"Mrs. Lammle, we have both been deceiving, and we have both been deceived. We have both been biting, and we have both been bitten. In a nut-shell, there's the state of the case."

"You sought me out—"

"Tut! Let us have done with that. We know very well how it was. Why should you and I talk about it, when you and I can't disguise it? To proceed. I am disappointed, and cut a poor figure."

"Am I no one?"

"Some one—and I was coming to you, if you had waited a moment. You, too, are disappointed and cut a poor figure."

"An injured figure!"

"You are now cool enough, Sophronia, to see that you can't be injured without my being equally injured; and that therefore the mere word is not to the purpose. When I look back, I wonder how I can have been such a fool as to take you to so great an extent upon trust."

"And when I look back—" the bride cries, interrupting.

"And when you look back, you wonder how you can have been—you'll excuse the word?"

"Most certainly, with so much reason."

"—Such a fool as to take me to so great an extent upon trust. But the folly is committed on both sides. I can not get rid of you; you can not get rid of me. What follows?"

"Shame and misery," the bride bitterly replies.

"I don't know. A mutual understanding follows, and I think it may carry us through. Here I split my discourse (give me your arm, Sophronia) into three heads, to make it shorter and plainer. Firstly, it's enough to have been done, without the mortification of being known to have been done. So we agree to keep the fact to ourselves. You agree?"

"If it is possible, I do."

"Possible! We have pretended well enough to one another. Can't we, united, pretend to the world? Agreed. Secondly, we owe the Veneerings a grudge, and we owe all other people the grudge of wishing them to be taken in, as we ourselves have been taken in. Agreed?"

"Yes. Agreed."

"We come smoothly to thirdly. You have called me an adventurer, Sophronia. So I am. In plain uncomplimentary English, so I am. So are you, my dear. So are many people. We agree to keep our own secret, and to work together in furtherance of our own schemes."

"What schemes?"

"Any scheme that will bring us money. By our own schemes, I mean our joint interest. Agreed?"

She answers, after a little hesitation, "I suppose so. Agreed."

"Carried at once, you see! Now, Sophronia, only half a dozen words more. We know one another perfectly. Don't be tempted into twitting me with the past knowledge that you have of me, because it is identical with the past knowledge that I have of you, and in twitting me you twit yourself, and I don't want to hear you do it. With this good understanding established between us, it is better never done. To wind up all:—You have shown temper to-day, Sophronia. Don't be betrayed into doing so again, because I have a Devil of a temper myself."

So the happy pair, with this hopeful marriage contract thus signed, sealed, and delivered, repair homeward. If, when those infernal finger-marks were on the white and breathless countenance of Alfred Lammle, Esquire, they denoted that he conceived the purpose of subduing his dear wife Mrs. Alfred Lammle, by at once divesting her of any lingering reality or pretense of self-respect, the purpose would seem to have been presently executed. The mature young lady has mighty little need of powder now, for her downcast face, as he escorts her in the light of the setting sun to their abode of bliss.

PRICES AND INVESTMENTS.

"EVERYTHING is so high!" laments everybody who has anything to buy.—"Everything is so high!" remarks, apologetically, everybody who has anything to sell.—"Nothing is high," explain certain theoretical financiers; "the trouble is that our Currency is low; with a gold dollar you can buy as much as you ever could."

The error of these theorists—so far as they are not disloyally bent upon crippling the Government by depreciating the funds—lies in this, that they look upon Gold as the one immovable thing in the universe: as the great fixed sun around which everything revolves. But the sun, so far from being fixed, is itself a moving body. The value of gold, like that of everything else, rises and falls in accordance with the inexorable law of supply and demand.

Everything is high, as everybody knows, and as everybody but theorists asserts, simply because we are at war and not in peace. War-prices are, always have been, and always will be, high prices; because war increases the demand for everything, while it diminishes the supply. War takes the farmer from his plow, and the price of corn goes up. War takes the shoemaker from his bench, and the price of shoes goes up. War takes a portion of every class of workmen from their usual work, and the price of labor goes up. At this moment fully one-third of the producers of the loyal States are directly or indirectly engaged in the war. A large portion are in the field or on the sea, as soldiers or sailors. Many are engaged in producing implements of war or military supplies—ships, guns, clothing, equipments, and the like. All these men have been withdrawn by the war from their avocations. The products of their former industry have been diminished, and so the price of these products has increased.

Again, war is wasteful. We do not here speak of fraudulent waste; for the amount wasted by fraud, great as it is, is nothing compared with the necessary waste of war. It must always cost much more to sustain a million of men in the field than it did to sustain the same men at home. A bushel of corn will feed no more men in Virginia than in Illinois; but its worth when transported to the James River is far greater than when it was harvested on the prairies.

War is costly, and its cost must be paid by those who wage it. The cost of our war may be fairly measured by the amount of our National Debt. This, on the 14th of June, amounted in round numbers to 1720 millions of dollars. Making a liberal allowance for the following weeks, our debt on the 1st of August may be stated at 2000 millions of dollars. Great as this sum is we assume that the people consider it fairly contracted, well spent, and to be paid. It is in fact a first mortgage upon every acre of land, upon every house or ship, upon every mile of railway, upon every man's savings and earnings, upon every thing, in short, which can be considered as property. The debt is to be paid, and must be paid from the accumulations of past years, and from the earnings of those that are to come.

Great as the burden must be it will not crush us. The people of the loyal States could pay it three times over from the accumulations of the ten years which preceded the war, and yet leave every man richer than he was in 1850. The census puts down the property of the loyal States at fully 6000 millions of dollars more in 1860 than it was in 1850. We are charged by others, and we charge ourselves, with extravagance; but in ten years we earned 6000 millions more than we spent. Apportioning this by head among the whole population, every man, woman, and child in the loyal States was worth 250 dollars more in 1860 than in 1850. Our debt, were it three times as great as it is, could be paid from the accumulations of the past ten years. But as it takes the shape of a loan to the people of the United States, represented by the Government, payable hereafter, most of the money-cost will be defrayed from the earnings of another generation. This is right and just. We of this generation have not undertaken this great war merely for ourselves. We have undertaken it mainly for those who shall come after us. The blood which it costs we ourselves pay. Our sons, and our sons' sons, can well afford to pay their share of the money.

Fortunately every dollar of the debt as yet contracted is due to ourselves. How shall it be apportioned among us so that each man shall bear his fair portion? As we have said, this debt is really a mortgage upon every man's property and earnings. It is represented by Government bonds of various kinds. Every man who holds such a bond has virtually a mortgage upon my property for that amount. If I hold the same sum I have an equal mortgage upon his property. In any case I must be a mortgagee; I can become a mortgagor likewise by purchasing Government bonds. In the final adjustment these mortgages will cancel each other.

Leaving patriotism, for the moment, out of the question, it is for the advantage of every man to become, as far as he is able, a creditor of the Government, or rather, of the people. The interest offered is quite equal to that of any other safe investment; and the Government, in the name of the people, assumes the responsibility of collecting and paying that interest. The security offered is the most ample possible. It is a first lien upon the entire wealth of the country. No man can be half as sure of receiving his dividends from railway or bank stock, his rents from real estate, or his profits from business, as he is of receiving the interest upon his loan to the nation. Just now Government bonds can be bought lower than the stocks of any paying railway or bank, simply because the exigencies of the times demand that a large amount shall be offered for sale. We expect to see the time when the bonds of the United States shall command a premium in gold. It is not long since the United States paid more than twenty cents on the dollar for the privilege of buying up its obligations with but a few years to run. We trust that the same thing will occur with the debt now contracted and contracting; and so the men who have invested their surplus money in the Government loan have acted not only patriotically but wisely.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 20th of June. Both the eastern and western campaign have steadily progressed, though no decisive results have yet been obtained.

At the close of our last Record the Federal and Confederate armies were confronting each other at Spottsylvania Court House on the line of the Po. The battle had been renewed on the 18th of May, after the lull of a week, during which both armies had been rested and reinforced. In this engagement Hancock, operating against the enemy's right flank, gained two lines of his intrenchments and captured several guns; Burnside drove the Confederate left some distance, but subsequently withdrew.

The next day Ewell's corps made a desperate attempt to turn Grant's right and capture his supply trains, which were loaded with ammunition and subsistence. The attack was repulsed, chiefly by the gallantry of Tyler's Division, consisting for the most part of raw recruits. The Federal loss was comparatively small—only 900 killed and wounded, while Ewell lost 1250, besides 500 taken prisoners.
